Hogan, John C. Blackstone and Story—Their Influence on the Development of Criminal Law in America. Minnesota Law Review. January, 1956.

Hogan, John C. Justice Story on the Common Law of Evidence. Vanderbilt Law Review. December, 1955.

Horvath, Barna. Rights of Man: Due Process of Law and Excès de Pouvoir. American Journal of Comparative Law. Autumn, 1955.

Irisarri y Puente, J. The Nature and Powers of a "De Facto" Government in Latin America. Tulane Law Review. December, 1955.

Levy, Anna J. V. Law and Religion in the United States. Loyola Law Review. VII/2. 1954.

Marshall, John [Various Articles.] University of Pennsylvania Law Review. October, 1955.

McKay, Robert B. Georgia Versus the United States Supreme Court. Journal of Public Law. Fall, 1955.

Monachesi, Elio. Pioneers in Criminology: Cesare Beccaria. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology, and Police Science. November-December, 1955.

Montrose, J. L. Legal Theory for Politicians and Sociologists. Political Studies. October, 1955.

Murphy, Walter F. Desegregation in Public Education—A Generation of Future Litigation. Maryland Law Review. Summer, 1955.

O'Mearn, Joseph. Freedom of Inquiry Versus Authority: Some Legal Aspects. Notre Dame Lawyer. December, 1955.

Pascual, Crisolito. Natural Law Revisited. Philippine Law Journal. April, 1955.

Plantey, Alain. Un Exemple de la Continuité des Principes du Droit Public Français: L'Affaire des Alluvions. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. July-September, 1955.

Shehan, Lawrence J. Unity in Charity—Freedom in Justice. Jurist. April, 1955.

Wade, H. W. R. The Basis of Legal Sovereignty. Cambridge Law Journal. November, 1955.

Wilson, Richard B. The Merging Concepts of Liberty and Equality. Washington and Lee Law Review. XII/2. 1955.

Special Studies and Analysis

Aaron, Daniel. Le "Nouveau Conservatisme" Américain. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. January-March, 1955.

Adorno, Theodor W. Wird Spengler Recht behalten? Frankfurter Hefte. December, 1955.

Aguilar Navarro, Mariano. Comunidad Hispánica y Nacionalidad. Estudios Americanos. October, 1955.

Almond, Gabriel. The Political Attitudes of German Business. World Politics. January, 1956.

Anderson, Eugene N. In Defense of Industrialism. Diogenes. No. 11, 1955.

Aron, Raymond. Aventures et Méavantages de la Dialectique. Preuves. January, 1956.

Aron, Raymond. Workers, Proletarians, and Intellectuals. Diogenes. No. 10, 1955.

Barcan, A. The Australian Middle Class. Past and Present. November, 1955.

Beaupère, R. Protestants et Catholiques Français Face à Face. La Vie Intellectuelle. January, 1956.

Beerling, R. F. Power and Human Nature. Philosophy and Phenomenological Research. December, 1955.

Béguin, Albert. La Révolte de l'Asie et la Conscience Européenne. Esprit. December, 1955.

Birnbaum, Norman. Die Intellektuellen in der Gegenwärtigen Politik der Vereinigten Staaten. Zeitschrift für Politik. July, 1955.

Brindillac, Charles. La Crise de l'État. Esprit. December, 1955.

Brown, H. G. Academic Freedom and Defense of Capitalism. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. January, 1956.

Brown, Robert E. Economic Democracy Before the Constitution. American Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Burekhardt, Carl J. Begegnung Mit Ortega. Merkur. December, 1955.

Burdeau, Georges. Situación de la Demo-cracia Pluralista. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July-August, 1955.

Catlin, George. Considerations on the British Constitution. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1955.

Cantoni, Remo. Contemporary Italian Letters: Philosophy. Books Abroad. Autumn, 1955.

Catholic Social Theory. [Various Articles "On Reconstructing the Social Order."] Social Order. January, 1956.

Cavalli, F. La Chiesa e le Condizioni Sociali dell'America Latina. La Civiltà Cattolica. 21 January 1956.

Conservatism and the Future. Round Table. December, 1955.

Costanzo, Joseph F. Religious Heritage of American Democracy. Thought. Winter, 1955-56.

Daniélou, Jean. Fortschrittsglaube und Christliche Hoffnung. Dokumente. October, 1955.

Dawson, Christopher. Civilization in Crisis. Catholic World. January, 1956.

Dietze, Gottfried. Der Peronismus—Ursachen und Grundzüge seines Wesens. Zeitschrift für Politik. July, 1955.

Dillistone, F. W. The Christian Doctrine of Man and Modern Psychological Theories. Hibbert Journal. January, 1956.

English, Raymond. Conservatism and the State. Virginia Quarterly Review. Winter, 1956. Existentialism. [Various Articles.] Yale French Studies. Winter, 1955-56.

Ferman, Irving. The Liberal's Responsibility. Antioch Review. Winter, 1955-56.

Fraga Iribarne, Manuel. El Poder Como Concepto Sociológico y Como Base de la Política. Revista Internacional de Sociología. October-December, 1954.

Friedrich, Carl J. Style as the Principle of Historical Interpretation. Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism. December, 1955.

Friedrich, Carl J. Two Philosophical Interpretations of Natural Law. Diogenes. No. 10, 1955.

Galbraith, J. K. The Businessman as Philosopher. Perspectives. Autumn, 1955.

Gallo, Ugo. Ortega y Gasset, lo "Spettatore." Nuova Antologia. December, 1955.

García Mellid, Atilio. Introspección Americana. Estudios Americanos. September, 1955.

Gotschalk, D. W. Politics and Civilization. Ethics. January, 1956.

Guiducci, Robert. Sulla Dialettica Politica-Cultura. Nuovi Argomenti. July-October, 1955.

Gurvitch, Georges. Le Concept de Structure

- Social. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie. July–December, 1955.
- Hacker, Andrew. Dostoevsky's Disciples: Man and Sheep in Political Theory. Journal of Politics. January, 1956.
- Haim, Sylvia G. Arabic Antisemitic Literature. Jewish Social Studies. October, 1955.
- Haiman, Franklin S. A New Look at the New Conservatism. Bulletin, A.A.U.P. October, 1955.
- Hamilton, Robert. The Scientific Revolution. Quarterly Review. January, 1956.
- Hayek, F. A. Degrees of Explanation. British Journal for the Philosophy of Science. November, 1955.
- Hermens, F. A. Demokratie ohne Sicherheitsventil. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. 3/2. April, 1955.
- Hoffer, Eric. The Intellectual and the Masses. Pacific Spectator. Winter, 1956.
- Holt, W. Stull. History and the Social Sciences Reconsidered. Kyklos. VIII/4. 1955.
- Hourani, Albert. Toynbee's Vision of History. Dublin Review. Fourth Quarter, 1955.
- Humphrey, Hubert H. Liberalism. American Scholar. Autumn, 1955.
- Hurley, Cornelius P. Soviet Peace Overtures are the Product of "Creative Marxism." Social Order. February, 1956.
- Jaspers, Karl. Der Philosophierende Mensch in Unserer Zeit. Universitas. January, 1956.
- Jordan, Pascual. Das Ende der Ideologien. Neue Deutsche Hefte. November, 1955.
- Ketcham, Ralph L. The Revival of Tradition and Conservatism in America. Bulletin, A.A.U.P. Autumn, 1955.
- Kirchheimer, Otto. Politics and Justice. Social Research. Winter, 1955.
- Kirk, Russell. American Conservative Action. Chicago Review. Fall, 1955.
- Kline, George L. Recent Soviet Philosophy. Annals. January, 1956.
- Krislov, Samuel. The Singular Case of "Pluralism." Social Science. January, 1956.
- Laber, Jeri. The Soviet Writer's Search for New Values. Problems of Communism. January–February, 1956.
- Larrabee, Eric. Changing American Attitudes Toward Point IV. Confluence. January, 1956.
- Laue, Theodore H. Von. Legal Marxism and the Fate of Capitalism in Russia. Review of Politics. January, 1956.
- Lavergne, Bernard. Les Trois Alternatives de la France. L'Année Politique et Économique. July–September, 1955.
- Levin, Harvey J. Standards of Welfare in Economic Thought. Quarterly Journal of Economics. February, 1956.
- Levin, S. M. John Dewey's Evaluation of Technology. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. January, 1956.
- Levitt, Theodore. The Lonely Crowd and the Economic Man. Quarterly Journal of Economics. February, 1956.
- Lovell, Colin Rhys. Afrikaner Nationalism and Apartheid. American Historical Review. January, 1956.
- Mackenzie, W. J. M. Pressure Groups: The "Conceptual Framework." Political Studies. October, 1955.
- McCoy, Donald R. The Politics of Satisfaction in the United States. Social Studies. October, 1955.
- Madariaga, Salvador de. Ortega y Gasset. Preuves. December, 1955.
- Mandelbaum, Maurice. Societal Facts. British Journal of Sociology. December, 1955.
- Mann, Golo. Die Deutschen Intellektuellen. Texte und Zeichen. 1/4. 1955.
- Marx, Werner. Heidegger's New Conception of Philosophy—The Second Phase of Existentialism. Social Research. Winter, 1955.
- Manuel, Frank E. From Equality to Organicism. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1956.
- Marck, S. Thomas Mann als Denker. Kant-Studien. 47/3 1955/56.
- Massenet, Michel. L'Option Démocratique. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. January–March, 1955.
- Mathey, L. La Social-Démocratie et l'État. Cahiers du Communisme. November, 1955.
- Meek, Ronald L. Some Thoughts on Marxism, Scarcity, and Gosplan. Oxford Economic Papers. October, 1955.
- Mesnard, P. Kierkegaard aux Prises avec la Conscience Française. Revue de Littérature Comparée. October–December, 1955.
- Miller, J. and M. A. New Stage in the Study of Marxism. Soviet Studies. January, 1956.
- Monro, D. H. Anthropology and Ethics. Australasian Journal of Philosophy. December, 1955.
- Morris, Bertram. Democracy and Culture. Ethics. January, 1956.
- Muns, Peter. History and Myth. Philosophical Quarterly. January, 1956.
- Mukerji, D. P. The Intellectuals in India. Confluence. January, 1956.
- Olea, Manuel Alfonso. Las Ideologías del Sindicalismo. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July–August, 1955.

- Oliver, W. Donald. Rational Choice and Political Control. Ethics. January, 1956.
- Onimus, J. Le Degré Zéro de la Métaphysique. Études. January, 1956.
- Oppenheim, Felix E. Control and Unfreedom. Philosophy of Science. October, 1955.
- Orfila Reynal, Arnaldo. Breve Historia y Examen del Peronismo. Cuadernos Americanos. November-December, 1955.
- Ortega y Gasset, José. [Various Articles.] Cuadernos Americanos. January-February, 1956.
- Paetel, Karl O. Gibt es einen Amerikanischen Faschismus? Deutsche Rundschau. December, 1955.
- Parain, Brice. Against the Spirit of Neutrality. Confluence. January, 1956.
- Pepper, Stephen C. Natural Norms in Ethics. Journal of Philosophy. January 5, 1956.
- Piganiol, A. Qu'est-ce l'Histoire? Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale. July-September, 1955.
- Pischel, Enrica. L'Occidente e l'Ideologia Rivoluzionaria Cinese. Nuovi Argomenti. July-October, 1955.
- Porter, John. Elite Groups: A Scheme for the Study of Power in Canada. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1955.
- Progress. [Various Articles.] La Nef. December, 1955.
- Pross, Helge. Die Unbekannte Wissenschaft [Sociology.] Frankfurter Hefte. October, 1955.
- Rémond, René. À Propos de la Gauche. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1955.
- Romero, Francisco. Definitions of Man. Diogenes. No. 11, 1955.
- Roschwald, M. Value-Judgments in the Social Sciences. British Journal for the Philosophy of Science. November, 1955.
- Rossiter, Clinton. The Old Conservatism and the New Diplomacy. Virginia Quarterly Review. Winter, 1956.
- Rowland, Donald. Communism in Latin America. South Atlantic Quarterly. January, 1956.
- Rueff, Jacques. Order in Nature and Society. Diogenes. No. 10, 1955.
- Russell, John L. The Theory of Evolution: The Present State of the Evidence. Month. January, 1956.
- Sandeén, Ernest. William Faulkner: His Legend and His Fable. Review of Politics. January, 1956.
- Schaefer, René. The Mythical Portrayal of Evil and of the Fall of Man. Diogenes. No. 11, 1955.
- Schapiro, Leonard. The Road to Stalinism. Problems of Communism. November-December, 1955.
- Schlesinger, Arthur, Jr. Liberalism in America. Perspectives. Winter, 1956.
- Schmidt, Paul F. Some Criticisms of Cultural Relativism. Journal of Philosophy. December 8, 1955.
- Schneider, Herbert W. La Liberté, la Loi et les Droits. La Revue Libérale. No. 12, 1955.
- Science and Human Responsibility. [Various Articles.] Journal of Public Law. Fall, 1955.
- Scitovsky, Tibor. Monopoly and Competition in Europe and America. Quarterly Journal of Economics. November, 1955.
- Sellon, Hugh. The Crisis of Western Civilization. Hibbert Journal. January, 1956.
- Sherrard, Philip. A Post-Christian Epoch? Encounter. February, 1956.
- Smith, H. The Economics of Socialism Reconsidered. Economic Journal. September, 1955.
- Sorensen, Lloyd R. Historical Currents in America. American Quarterly. Fall, 1955.
- Stark, W. Schumpeters Umwertung der Werte. Kyklos. VIII/E. 1955.
- Szeftel, Marc. Facts of Russian History and its Philosophy as Viewed by Bertram D. Wolfe. American Slavic and East European Review. February, 1953.
- Viera, Carlos Alfredo. Sociología y Economía. Revista de Economía (Montevideo). June-August, 1955.
- Weeks, O. Douglas. Republicanism and Conservatism in the South. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1955.
- Weil, Eric. Good Sense or Philosophy. Diogenes. No. 12, 1955.
- Werner, Helmut. Spengler und Toynbee. Deutsche Vierteljahrschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte. 29/4. 1955.
- Williams, William Appleman. The Frontier Thesis and American Foreign Policy. Pacific Historical Review. November, 1955.
- Woodcock, George. Utopias in Negative. Sewanee Review. January-March, 1956.
- Yolton, John W. Individuality, Leadership, and Democracy. Diogenes. No. 12, 1955.
- Zurcher, Arnold J. Democracy's Declining Capacity to Govern. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1955.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

HERBERT A. SIMON

Carnegie Institute of Technology

Philosophy of Social Science

Barber, Bernard. Structural-Functional Analysis. American Sociological Review, April, 1956.

Bates, Alan P. and Cloyd, Jerry S. Toward the Development of Operations for Defining Group Norms and Member Roles. Sociometry. March 1956.

Borgatta, Edgar F. Analysis of Social Interaction: Actual, Role Playing and Projective. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Mandelbaum, Maurice. Societal Facts. British Journal of Sociology. December, 1955.

Rivett, Kenneth. The Definition of Economics. The Economic Record. November, 1955.

Research Methods and Organization

Almond, Gabriel A.; Cole, Taylor and Macridis, Roy C. A Suggested Research Strategy in Western European Government and Politics. American Political Science Review. December, 1955.

Campbell, Donald T. An Error in Some Demonstrations of the Superior Social Perceptiveness of Leaders. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Field, Joan Bissey. The Effects of Praise in a Public Opinion Poll. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1955.

Kahin, George McT.; Pauker, Guy J.; and Pye, Lucian W. Comparative Politics of Non-Western Countries. American Political Science Review. December, 1955.

Lefkowitz, Monroe; Blake, Robert R.; and Mouton, Jane Srygley. Status Factors in Pedestrian Violation of Traffic Signals. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Maccoby, Eleanor E. Pitfalls in the Analysis of Panel Data: a Research Note on Some Technical Aspects of Voting. American Journal of Sociology. January, 1956.

Motivation and Personality

Bass, Bernard M. Authoritarianism or Acquiescence? Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Dynes, Russell R.; Clarke, Alfred C.; and Dinitz, Simon. Levels of Occupational Aspiration. American Sociological Review. April, 1956.

Eysenck, H. J. The Psychology of Politics: A Reply. Psychological Bulletin. March, 1956.

Farber, Maurice L. The Anal Character and Political Aggression. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Gregory, W. Edgar. 'Authoritarianism' and Authority. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

French, Elizabeth G. and Ernst, Raymond R. The Relation Between Authoritarianism and Acceptance of Military Ideology. Journal of Personality. December, 1955.

Gullahorn, John T. Measuring Role Conflict. American Journal of Sociology. January, 1956.

Janis, Irving L. Anxiety Indices Related to Susceptibility to Persuasion. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Roberts, Alan H. and Rokeach, Milton. Anomie, Authoritarianism and Prejudice: a Replication. American Journal of Sociology. January, 1956.

Rokeach, Milton and Hanley, Charles. Eysenck's Tender-Mindedness Dimension. Psychological Bulletin. March, 1956.

Scodel, Alvin and Freedman, Maria Livia. Additional Observations on the Social Perceptions of Authoritarians and Nonauthoritarians. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1956.

Taft, Ronald. Some Characteristics of Good Judges of Others. British Journal of Psychology. February, 1956.

Toch, Hans H. Crisis Situations and Ideological Revaluations. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1955.

Turner, Ralph H. Reference Groups of Future-Oriented Men. Social Forces. December, 1955.

Opinions and Attitudes

Becker, Howard S. and Carper, James W. The Development of Identification with an Occupation. American Journal of Sociology. January, 1956.

Broom, Leonard and Reece, Shirley. Political and Racial Interest: a Study in Content Analysis. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1955.

Deutsch, Morton and Gerard, Harold B. A Study of Normative and Informational Social Influences upon Individual Judgment. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Greenberg, Allan and Lissance, Daniel. The Accuracy of a Journalistic Poll. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1955.

Janowitz, Morris and Wright, Deil. The Prestige of Public Employment: 1929 and 1954. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1956.

Lang, Gladys Engel, and Lang, Kurt. The Inferential Structure of Political Communications. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1955.

Linton, Harriet B. Dependence on External Influence: Correlates in Perception, Attitudes and Judgment. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Luchins, Abraham S. and Luchins, Edith H. On Conformity with True and False Communications. Journal of Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Marchionne, A. M. and Marcuse, F. L. Sensitization and Prejudice. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

McCandless, Boyd R. and Holloway, Harold D. Race Prejudice and Intolerance of Ambiguity in Children. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Messick, Samuel J. The Perception of Social Attitudes. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1956.

Monk, Mary and Newcomb, Theodore M. Perceived Consensus Within and Among Occupational Classes. American Sociological Review. February, 1956.

Perlmutter, Howard V. Correlates of Two Types of Xenophilic Orientation. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1956.

Smith, Anthony J.; Jaffe, Jack; and Livingston, Donald G. Consonance of Interpersonal Perception and Individual Effectiveness. Human Relations. 1955, #4.

Smith, Howard Persifor. Do Intercultural Experiences Affect Attitudes? Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Thibaut, John W. and Riecken, Henry W. Some Determinants and Consequences of the Perception of Social Causality. Journal of Personality. December, 1955.

Weiss, Walter and Fine, Bernard J. The Effect of Induced Aggressiveness on Opinion Change. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1956.

Williams, Robert J. and Wright, Charles R. Opinion Organization in a Heterogeneous Adult Population. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Group Behavior, General

Axelrod, Morris. Urban Structure and Social Participation. American Sociological Review. February, 1956.

Bell, Wendell, and Force, Maryanne T. Urban Neighborhood Types and Participation in Formal Associations. American Sociological Review. February, 1956.

Burns, Tom. The Referent of Conduct in Small Groups. Human Relations. 1955, #4.

Crockett, Walter H. Emergent Leadership in Small, Decision-Making Groups. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Dodd, Stuart C. A Test of Message Diffusion by Chain Tags. American Journal of Sociology. March, 1956.

de Fleur, Melvin L. A Mass Communication Model of Stimulus Response Relationships. Sociometry. March, 1956.

Form, William H. and Loomis, Charles P. The Persistence and Emergence of Social and Cultural Systems in Disasters. American Sociological Review. April, 1956.

Kaiser, Richard L. and Blake, Robert R. Aspiration and Performance in a Simulated Group Atmosphere. Journal of Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Kelley, Harold H. and Woodruff, Christine Lipps. Members' Reactions to Apparent Group Approval of a Counternorm Communication. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1956.

Kidd, J. S. and Campbell, Donald T. Conformity to Groups as a Function of Group Success. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Landsberger, Henry A. Interaction Process Analysis of the Mediation of Labor-Management Disputes. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Lanzetta, John T.; Wendt, G. R.; Laugham, Peter; and Haefner, Don. The Effects of an 'Anxiety-Reducing' Medication on Group Behavior Under Threat. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1956.

Pepitone, Albert.; Diggory, James C.; and Wallace, W. H. Some Reactions to a Hypothetical Disaster. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Rose, Arnold M. Voluntary Associations Under Conditions of Competition and Conflict. Social Forces. December, 1955.

Simon, Herbert A. and Guetskow, Harold. Mechanisms Involved in Group Pressures on Deviate Members. British Journal of Statistical Psychology. November, 1955.

Spector, Aaron J. Expectations, Fulfillment and Morale. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1956.

Suchman, J. Richard. Social Sensitivity in the Small Task-Oriented Group. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1956.

Torrance, E. Paul. Perception of Group Functioning as a Predictor of Group Performance. Journal of Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Trapp, E. Philip. Leadership and Popularity as a Function of Behavioral Predictions. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Turner, Ralph H. Role-Taking, Role Standpoint, and Reference-Group Behavior. American Journal of Sociology. January, 1956.

Zander, Alvin and Cohen, Arthur R. Attributed Social Power and Group Acceptance. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. November, 1955.

Organizational Behavior

Cyert, R. M. and March, James G. Organizational Factors in the Theory of Oligopoly. Quarterly Journal of Economics. February, 1956.

High, Wallace S.; Goldberg, Lisbeth L.; and Comrey, Andrew L. Factored Dimensions of Organizational Behavior, II. Educational and Psychological Measurement. Winter, 1955.

High, Wallace S.; Wilson, Robert C.; and Comrey, Andrew. Factors Influencing Organizational Effectiveness, VIII. Personal Psychology. Autumn, 1955.

Morse, Nancy C. and Reimer, Everett. The Experimental Change of a Major Organizational Variable. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1956.

Rice, A. K. Productivity and Social Organization in an Indian Weaving Mill, II. Human Relations 1955, #4.

Schutz, William C. What Makes Groups Productive? Human Relations 1955, #4.

Shepard, Herbert A. Patterns of Organization for Applied Research and Development. Journal of Business. January, 1956.

Voting Behavior

Almond, Gabriel A. The Political Attitudes of German Business. World Politics. January, 1956.

Birmingham, W. B. and Jahoda, G. A Pre-Election Survey in a Semi-Literate Society. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1955.

Dupeux, George. The Orientations of Electoral Sociology in France. British Journal of Sociology. December, 1955.

Klain, Maurice. A New Look at the Constituencies. American Political Science Review. December, 1955.

Schlesinger, Joseph A. A Two-Dimensional Scheme for Classifying the States According to Degree of Inter-Party Competition. American Political Science Review. December, 1955.

Thayer, James R. The Contributions of Public Opinion Polls to the Understanding of the 1953 Elections in Italy, West Germany and Japan. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Culture and Institutions

Bauer, Raymond A. Some Trends in Sources of Alienation from the Soviet System. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Eisenstadt, S. N. Communication Systems and Social Structure. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1955.

Farber, Maurice L. (ed.) New Directions in the Study of National Character. Journal of Social Issues. 1955, #2, Whole Number.

Garfinkel, Harold. Conditions of Successful Degradation Ceremonies. American Journal of Sociology. March, 1956.

Goldschmidt, Walter. Social Class and the Dynamics of Status in America. American Anthropologist. December, 1955.

Harding, Charles F. III. The Social Anthropology of American Industry. American Anthropologist. December, 1955.

Hirshleifer, Jack. Some Thoughts on the Social Structure after a Bombing Disaster. World Politics. January, 1956.

Hoselitz, Bert F. Patterns of Economic Growth. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1955.

Inkeles, Alex and Rossi, Peter H. National Comparisons of Occupational Prestige. American Journal of Sociology. January, 1956.

Janowitz, Morris. Social Stratification and the Comparative Analysis of Elites. Explorations in Entrepreneurial History. Winter Supplement, 1956.

Jenson, Paul G. and Kirohner, Wayne K. A National Answer to the Question, "Do Sons

- Follow Their Fathers' Occupations?" Journal of Applied Psychology. December, 1955.
- Mayer, Albert J.; and Houtt, Thomas Ford. Social Stratification and Combat Survival. Social Forces. December, 1955.
- Meier, Richard L. Communications and Social Change. Behavioral Science. January, 1956.
- Pellegrin, Roland J. and Coates, Charles H. Absentee-Owned Corporations and Community Power Structure. American Journal of Sociology. March, 1956.
- Porter, John. Elite Groups: A Scheme of the Study of Power in Canada. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1955.
- Reissman, Leonard. Life Careers, Power and the Professions: The Retired Army General. American Sociological Review. April, 1956.
- Rothman, Stanley. Entrepreneurial Behavior and Political Consensus in England and France. Explorations in Entrepreneurial History. February, 1956.
- Sargent, S. Stansfeld and Brameld, Theodore (eds.). Anti-Intellectualism in the United States. Journal of Social Issues. 1955, #3, Whole Number.
- Wardwell, Walter I. and Wood, Arthur L. The Extra-Professional Role of the Lawyer. American Journal of Sociology. January, 1956.
- Zimmer, Basil G. Farm Background and Urban Participation. American Journal of Sociology. March, 1956.
- Value Theory and Social Policy
- Evaluation Techniques. International Social Science Bulletin. 1955, #3, Part I.
- Friedmann, John R. P. The Concept of a Planning Region. Lanc Economics. February, 1956.
- Goode, Richard and Birnbaum, Eugene A. Government Capital Budgets. International Monetary Fund Staff Papers, February, 1956.
- Levin, Harvey J. Standards of Welfare in Economic Thought. Quarterly Journal of Economics. February, 1956.
- Meier, R. L. Automatism in the American Economy. Journal of Business, January, 1956.
- Wolf, Charles, Jr. Institutions and Economic Development. American Economic Review. December, 1955.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

- ALFIERI, DINO. TRANSLATED BY MOORE, DAVID. Dictators Face to Face. New York: New York University Press. 1955. Pp. x, 307. $4.95.
- BRADY, JOSEPH H. Confusion Twice Confounded: The First Amendment and the Supreme Court—An Historical Study. South Orange, N. J.: Seton Hall University Press. 1954. Pp. 192. $3.00.
- CALDWELL, ROBERT G. Criminology. New York: The Ronald Press. 1956. Pp. x, 749. $6.50.
- CHAPMAN, GUY. The Dreyfus Case: A Reassessment. New York: Reynal & Co. 1955. Pp. 400. $5.00.
- CHENERY, WILLIAM L. Freedom of the Press. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co. 1955. Pp. 256. $3.75.
- DOBB, MAURICE. On Economic Theory and Socialism: Collected Papers. New York: International Publishers. 1955. Pp. viii, 293. $4.00.
- EBERHARDT, JOHN L. Kansas State Department of Public Instruction. Lawrence, Kan.: University of Kansas, 1955. Pp. 255.
- ESBJORNSEN, ROBERT. A Christian in Politics, Luther W. Youngdahl: A Story of a Christian's Faith at Work in a Modern World. Minneapolis: T. S. Denison & Co. 1955. Pp. 384. $3.50.
- FONER, PHILIP S. History of the Labor Movement in the United States. Vol. II: From the Founding of the American Federation of Labor to the Emergence of American Imperialism. New York: International Publishers. 1955. Pp. 480. $5.00.
- FOURASTÉ, JEAN. La Prévision Économique et la Direction des Entreprises. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1955. Pp. viii, 151.
- GALBRAITH, JOHN KENNETH AND HOLTON, RICHARD H. Marketing Efficiency in Puerto Rico. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 204. $4.50.
- HAVENS, GEORGE R. The Age of Ideas: From Reaction to Revolution in Eighteenth-Century France. New York: Henry Holt & Co. 1955. Pp. x, 474.
- HIDY, RALPH W. AND HIDY, MURIEL E. Pioneering in Big Business, 1882-1911. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1955. Pp. xxx, 839. $7.50.
- JOHANNSEN, ROBERT W. Frontier Politics and

- the Sectional Conflict: The Pacific Northwest on the Eve of the Civil War.* Seattle: University of Washington Press. 1955. Pp. ix, 240. $5.00.
- KNOX, JOHN B. The Sociology of Industrial Relations: An Introduction to Industrial Sociology. New York: Random House. 1955. Pp. xv, 348. $6.75.
- LOCHNER, LOUIS P. Always the Unexpected: A Book of Reminiscences. New York: The Macmillan Co. 1956. Pp. viii, 339. $5.00.
- LUCKYJ, GEORGE S. N. Literary Politics in the Soviet Ukraine, 1917-1934. New York: Columbia University Press. 1956. Pp. x, 323. $5.00.
- LYONS, BARROW. Tomorrow's Birthright: A Political and Economic Interpretation of Our Natural Resources. New York: Funk & Wagnalls Co. 1955. Pp. v, 424. $5.00.
- MALLORY, WALTER H. (ED.). Political Handbook of the World: Parliaments, Parties and Press as of January 1, 1956. New York: Harper & Brothers, for Council on Foreign Relations, Inc. 1956. Pp. 228. $3.75.
- MEADE, J. E. Trade and Welfare. London, New York, and Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. xiv, 618. $7.20.
- MEADE, J. E. Trade and Welfare: Mathematical Supplement. London, New York, and Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 128. $4.00.
- MOUSSA, FARAG. Les Négociations Anglo-Egyptiennes de 1950-1951 sur Suez et le Soudan: Essai de Critique Historique. Genève: Librairie E. Droz. 1955. Pp. 261. $2.95.
- MUSSATTI, JAMES (TEXT AND QUESTIONS ON THE TEXT BY) AND SHELLY, THOMAS J. (STUDY GUIDE BY). The Constitution of the United States: Its Origins, Principles, and Problems. Princeton, N. J., Toronto, New York, and London: D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc. 1956. Pp. 173. $3.50.
- O'CONNOR, HARVEY. The Empire of Oil. New York: Monthly Review Press. 1955. Pp. xii, 372. $5.00.
- ORNATI, OSCAR A. Jobs and Workers in India. Ithaca, N. Y.: Cornell University Press. 1955. Pp. xix, 215. $4.00.
- PENDLE, GEORGE. Argentina. London and New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1955. Pp. x, 159. $2.50.
- PETERSEN, WILLIAM. Planned Migration: The Social Determinants of the Dutch-Canadian Movement. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1955. Pp. x, 273. $3.50.
- PREVEDEN, FRANCIS R. A History of the Croation People. Vol. I: Prehistory and Early Period until 1397 A.D. New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. xvi, 134; 64 plates. $7.50.
- RADDOCK, MAXWELL C. Portrait of an American Labor Leader: William L. Hutcheson. New York: American Institute of Social Science, Inc. 1956. Pp. xviii, 430. $5.00.
- ROBINSON, MARSHALL A., MORTON, HERBERT C., AND CALDERWOOD, JAMES D. An Introduction to Economic Reasoning. Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution. 1956. Pp. xi, 335. $3.00.
- ROYAL COMMISSION ON AGRICULTURE AND RURAL LIFE. Agricultural Markets and Prices. Regina, Saskatchewan: Queen's Printer. 1956. Pp. xvi, 251. $1.00.
- SABATINO, RICHARD A. Housing in Great Britain, 1945-49. Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press. 1956. Pp. 88. $3.00.
- SANDFORD, CHRISTINE. The Lion of Judah Hath Prevailed: Being the Biography of His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I. New York: The Macmillan Co. 1956. Pp. xi, 192. $3.75.
- SCHORFFLER, SIDNEY. The Failures of Economics: A Diagnostic Study. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. xiii, 254. $4.75.
- SCHOENFELD, CHARLES. God and Country. New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. vi, 119. $3.00.
- THE STAFF OF THE FOUNDATION FOR RESEARCH IN LEGAL HISTORY UNDER THE DIRECTION OF JULIUS GOEBEL, JR. A History of The School of Law, Columbia University. New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. 524. $6.00.
- STAGNER, ROSS. Psychology of Industrial Conflict. New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc.; London: Chapman & Hall, Ltd. 1956. Pp. ix, 550. $8.00.
- STOKES, DILLARD. Social Security—Fact and Fancy. Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1956. Pp. x, 208. $4.00.
- SURRENCY, ERWIN C. (SELECTED AND EDITED BY). The Marshall Reader: The Life and Contributions of Chief Justice John Marshall. New York: Oceana Publications. 1955. Pp. 256. $3.50.
- TOCQUEVILLE, ALEXIS DE. EDITED AND ABRIDGED BY HEFFNER, RICHARD D. Democracy in America. New York: The New

- American Library, A Mentor Book. 1956. Pp. 317. $.50.
- Trade Barriers to Knowledge: A Manual of Regulations Affecting Educational, Scientific and Cultural Materials.* Paris: UNESCO. Pp. 364.
- VUCINICH, ALEXANDER. The Soviet Academy of Sciences. Stanford, Cal.: Stanford University Press. 1956. Pp. vi, 157. $2.00.
- WALL, JOSEPH FRAZEE. Henry Watterson: Reconstructed Rebel. New York: Oxford University Press. 1956. Pp. xvi, 362. $6.00.
- WEISSKOPF, WALTER A. The Psychology of Economics. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 266. $4.00.
- WU, YUAN-LI. An Economic Survey of Communist China. New York: Bookman Associates. 1956. Pp. x, 566. $2.50.

NEWS AND NOTES

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

1956 ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ASSOCIATION

The 1956 Annual Meeting of The American Political Science Association will be held September 6-8, 1956, in Washington, D.C. The Chairman of the Program Committee is Professor Earl Latham, of Amherst College; the Chairman of the Committee on Local Arrangements is The Reverend James B. Horigan, S.J., of Georgetown University.

The 10th Anniversary Meeting of the Western Political Science Association was held on the campus of Utah State Agricultural College, Logan, Utah, March 30-31, 1956. Nine round-tables were conducted centering on the theme: "Politics and Political Science in the Western States." G. Homer Durham, first president of the Western Political Science Association, delivered an address on "The First Ten Years of the WPSA and the Next Ten Years." Curtis Martin of the University of Colorado delivered the presidential address, entitled "The Soft War." Harold Enarson, executive director of the Western Inter-State Commission on Higher Education, spoke on the organization and activities of the Commission.

Officers elected for the following year are: president, Russell H. Fitzgibbon, University of California (Los Angeles); vice-president, Howard J. McMurray, University of New Mexico; members of the executive council for two-year terms: Bernard Borning, University of Idaho; Frank Jonas, University of Utah; Ross R. Rice, Arizona State College (Tempe). Thomas Payne, Montana State University, was elected to a one-year term on the Council. Curtis Martin, as retiring president of the association, goes on the Council as ex-officio member for one year. Members of the Council who carry over for one more year are: Freeman Holmer, Willamette University, and John Vieg, Pomona. Also continuing in office is the secretary-treasurer, R. A. Gomez, University of Arizona. The next annual meeting of the Association will be held at the University of California (Los Angeles) in the spring of 1957.

On March 27 and April 26, 1956, the District of Columbia Political Science Association (DCPSA) held its second and third meetings of the current year in the Lounge of the Brookings Institution. The speakers and their topics were: March meeting—Colonel William R. Kintner, Operations Research Office: "The Impact of Modern War on International Politics"; April meeting—William Y. Elliott, Harvard University and Executive Office of the President: "The Limits of Behaviorism in Politics."

The annual meeting of the Pennsylvania Political Science and Public Administration Association was held in Harrisburg April 13-14, 1956. The two-day program included discussion of such topics as the political issues in 1956, political scientists and the problems of government, and education for politics and public service. Among the participants were politicians, newspapermen, public administrators, and political scientists.

The Northern California Political Science Association held its ninth annual conference on May 5, 1956 at Stanford University. New officers of the association are: president, Arnaud B. Leavelle, Stanford University; vice-president, Earl C. Segrest, Sacramento State College; secretary-treasurer, Father Richard J. Roberts, Santa Clara University; councilors, Roy Archibald, San Mateo Junior College; Norman Jacobson, University of California (Berkeley); Robert C. Johnston, Mills College; Hyman Palais, Humboldt State College; and Vernon Puryear, University of California (Davis).

OTHER ACTIVITIES

Administrative Science Quarterly, a new journal published by the Graduate School of Business and Public Administration, Cornell University, and devoted to advancing basic understanding of administrative processes in all types of organizations, will appear in June, 1956. Editor of the Quarterly is James D. Thompson. The editorial board includes Sune Carlson, Melvin de Chazeau, Alexander Leighton, Edward H. Litchfield, and Ewing W. Reiley. Paul Wasserman is book review editor.

The Sixth Inter-American Congress of Municipalities will be held in Panama City, Panama, August 14-19, 1956.

A new department of political science is in the process of being born at the State College of Washington. The present department of history and political science, established in 1928, will be divided into separate departments on September 16, 1956. During twenty-three years of the combined department's existence, Professor Claudius O. Johnson served as its chairman. Since 1951, the chairman has been Herbert J. Wood. The initial staff of the new department of political science will be professors Claudius Johnson and Paul Beckett, associate professor H. Paul Castleberry and assistant professors Daniel M. Ogden, Jr. and Thor Swanson. Professor Beckett has been elected the new department's first chairman, to serve until 1959.

The Institute of World Polity, sponsored by Georgetown University and "designed to serve as an organization for systematic research and discussion of questions affecting international relations and the foreign policy of the United States" has recently been re-organized. Among the full members of the Institute are: Samuel F. Bemis, Yale University; Willard B. Cowles, State Department; Edwin D. Dickinson, University of Pennsylvania; Rev. James B. Horigan, S.J., Georgetown University; Sheldon Z. Kaplan, House Foreign Affairs Committee; Rev. Brian A. McGrath, S.J., Georgetown University; Pitman B. Potter, American University; William H. Roberts, Catholic University; Pitirim A. Sorokin, Harvard University and Quincy Wright, University of Chicago. William V. O'Brien, Georgetown University, serves as acting chairman. At a business meeting held on April 29, 1956, an extensive research and publication program was discussed and adopted.

Tulane University, in cooperation with the American Assembly of Columbia University, sponsored a Southern Assembly on April 19-22 at Buena Vista Hotel, Biloxi, Mississippi. The conference topic was "Southern State Governments: Functions and Problems," and the background report was prepared under the direction of L. Vaughan Howard, chairman of the department of political science at Tulane. The composition, organization, and procedure of the Southern Assembly follow the pattern already established by the American Assembly.

In September, 1955 the division of social science at San Jose State College was subdivided into three departments: history, economics, and geography; sociology and social service; political science and public administration.

The Institute of Government, University of Utah, is conducting a series of studies for the Local Government Survey Commission of the State of Utah.

Kenyon College will hold a conference on April 4-7, 1957 on the theme "The Essentials of Freedom: the Idea and Practice of Ordered Liberty in the Twentieth Century." The project is supported by a grant from the Fund for the Republic. It will constitute the fifth in a series of conferences held at the College since 1947.

A grant from the Ford Foundation permits the department of political science at the State University of Iowa to sponsor an eight-week Seminar on the Teaching of International Politics again in the summer of 1956. Professors Richard Snyder of Northwestern, Harold Sprout of Princeton, and Schuyler Wallace of Columbia are serving as project advisers. Kenneth Boulding, William T. R. Fox, Clyde Kluckhohn, and others will meet with the seminar as visiting consultants.

The Northern California Citizenship Clearing House has been established at Stanford University. Director of the new clearing house is assistant professor Robert A. Horn, with the assistance and advice of Thomas S. Barclay, Arnaud B. Leavelle, and Robert A. Walker.

An American Committee for the Study of War Documents has been organized, having as its executive board a standing committee of the American Historical Association. Its purpose is to direct an organized effort for the fullest scholarly utilization of documents which came into the possession of the Allies as a result of World War II; to secure the aid of the appropriate governmental agencies in making these documents available for study by American scholars; to enlist the support and cooperation of universities and colleges, faculties and graduate students, and of other scholarly organizations, in the systematic exploration of this material; to collaborate with scholars and institutions abroad in regard to such studies. Inquiries should be addressed to the executive secretary, Sidney Wallach, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York.

The Samuel S. Fels Fund has given $200,000 to the University of Pennsylvania's Institute of Local and State Government to erect an addition to the Fels Center. With the added space the Institute will expand and improve all three phases of its work—its full time curricula for college graduates aspiring to public service, its part-time courses for public officials, and its consulting and research services.

A grant of $1,500,000 to the Institute of International Education was recently announced by the Carnegie Corporation of New York. The sum, which is one of the largest single grants ever made by this philanthropic foundation, will be used by the Institute for support and development of its programs of international student exchange over ten years.

A chapter of Pi Sigma Alpha was recently installed at Howard University. It became the seventy-eighth chapter of this national political science honor society.

Thomas H. Eliot of Washington University, St. Louis, and Paul G. Steinbicker of St. Louis University are co-directors of the Metropolitan St. Louis Survey. Carl A. McCandless of Washington University and Henry J. Schmandt of St. Louis University will be on leave for one year serving as associate research directors of the Survey.

The Central Regional Conference of Pi Gamma Mu met at Indiana State Teachers College on April 13-14, 1956 to discuss "The Future of the Social Scientist." Among those who addressed the conference were Charles S. Hyneman, Rollin B. Posey, Rexford Guy Tugwell, and W. Leon Godshall.

Indiana University's Second Little United Nations Assembly was held on March 2-4, 1956. Students from 38 colleges and universities attended as delegates. Reverdy T. Gliddon, of the department of government, served as President of the General Assembly and Mr. Andrew Cordier, Under Secretary General of the United Nations, addressed the Assembly.

Henry Reining, Jr., John M. Pfiffner, and Frank P. Sherwood, all of the School of Public Administration, University of Southern California, will conduct a five-day Institute on public administration in Honolulu during the period June 18-22. The Institute is sponsored by the Hawaiian chapter of the American Society for Public Administration.

The Commemoration Authority YAD VASHEM of Jerusalem and the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research of New York are currently engaged in an extensive joint research project on the documentation of the European Jewish Catastrophe. These institutions, having some of the richest collections of material related to the era of Nazism in general and the persecution and annihilation of European Jewry in particular, concluded an agreement on January 5, 1954, providing, inter alia, for (1) the coordination of the efforts to be expended for the collection of "documentary material related to the destruction of European Jewry and its struggle against the Nazi enemy, as well as material related to the history of the destroyed communities; (2) the preparation and publication of a descriptive catalogue of the archival material held by the two parties and in the possession of other institutions and individuals; (3) the preparation and publication of a bibliography of literature of the Destruction and of the participation of the Jews in the Second World War, and of the anti-Semitic Nazi literature in general." In accordance with the stipulation of this agreement, the documentation projects were divided into three independent, yet mutually interrelated, divisions: Bibliographic Division; Archives Division; Pinkas Hakehilot (Annals of the Destroyed Jewish Communities). The first two are located in New York and the third in Jerusalem. The cooperation of the three divisions is assured through the synchronization of the work by a committee of experts, called the Joint Commission of YAD VASHEM and VIVO.

Robert E. Agger, assistant professor at the University of North Carolina, is the recipient of a three-year Faculty Fellowship from the Social Science Research Council.

Vernon V. Aspaturian, assistant professor of political science at The Pennsylvania State University, will be on leave of absence from July, 1956 to September, 1957, to do research and writing under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

Stephen K. Bailey, director of the graduate program of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton, attended the Air War College Forum at Maxwell Field, Alabama, from April 16-20, 1956.

Hollis W. Barber will be on leave from his post as professor of political science at the Chicago Undergraduate Division of the University of Illinois for the academic year 1956-1957 to work with the Council on Foreign Relations, New York City.

Thomas S. Barclay of Stanford served on the Jury of Award for the Bancroft Prizes of Columbia University during the current academic year.

Vaclav L. Benes, associate professor of government, Indiana University, addressed a conference on the Midwest Heritage at Coe College on April 7.

Denis W. Brogan, of Cambridge University, England, served as George A. Miller visiting professor of political science at the University of Illinois during the spring. He also inaugurated the series of lectures at the University of Illinois commemorating Woodrow Wilson.

Bernard E. Brown, assistant professor at Michigan State University, has received a post-doctoral Fulbright grant. He will be affiliated with the Institute of Political Science in Paris during 1956-1957.

Edward H. Buehrig, professor of government, Indiana University, has been appointed chairman of the Indiana University Summer Conference on American Foreign Policy, to be held at Bloomington, Indiana, June 29 and 30, 1956. Professor Buehrig participated in the Lectures and Seminar at the University of Chicago in connection with the celebration of the Woodrow Wilson Centennial, January 30 to February 3, 1956.

J. Alton Burdine, University of Texas, spent the spring semester 1955-1956 on a research assignment in Austin.

Byrum E. Carter, of the department of government at Indiana University, has received a summer faculty research grant from the Graduate School.

Al Castagno, a member of the government department in the School of General Studies at Columbia, has received a Ford Foundation grant for study in Africa.

William N. Chambers, associate professor of political science at Washington University, has been appointed Visiting Fellow in General Education at Harvard University for 1956-57.

Eugene P. Chase has been invited to lecture under a Fulbright grant on American Institutions at the University of Aix in Nice this summer.

Robert L. Clark has been appointed executive secretary of the National Committee for the Development of Scientists and Engineers.

Cornelius P. Cotter Stanford University, has been elected a member of the governing board of the Bay Area Chapter of the American Society for Public Administration.

Cecil V. Crabb, Jr., assistant professor of political science at Vassar College, has been made director of the Vassar-Wellesley summer interne program in Washington, D.C.

Robert A. Dahl, professor of political science, Yale University, has returned after a year at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences.

P. Allan Dionisopoulos, lecturer in government at Indiana University, has received a faculty research grant from the Graduate School.

John Dorsey, assistant professor of political science at Michigan State University, has been appointed deputy adviser in charge of the Presidency Project of the Michigan State University technical assistance program in Vietnam.

Alex N. Dragnic, professor of political science, Vanderbilt University, was granted a faculty fellowship by the Fund for the Advancement of Education and is on leave during 1955-56 spending the year at Harvard University.

Lewis J. Edinger, assistant professor of political science at the Air University, has received an International Relations Training Fellowship from the Ford Foundation for 1956-57 and will pursue his studies at Stanford University.

Russell H. Fitzgibbon, of the University of California at Los Angeles, will teach at the University of Illinois in the summer school in 1956.

Michael J. Flack, assistant professor of political science at Vassar College, served recently as independent consultant to the Ford Foundation's international relations program.

Henry C. Galant, chairman, department of government, Skidmore College, has received a summer grant from the Social Science Research Council for research in France.

Federico G. Gil has been granted a year's leave of absence from the University of North Carolina for research in Latin America.

Edward B. Glick, interim instructor in the department of political science of the University of Florida, has been appointed a consultant to the Latin American Department of the Jewish Agency for Palestine.

Albert Gorvine, Brooklyn College, will remain for a second year as director of research at the Institute of Public Administration of the University of Ankara, under arrangements with New York University, supported by the International Cooperation Administration.

Priscilla Greeley, assistant professor of government, Skidmore College, will study at the University of London this summer.

Charles M. Hardin, University of Chicago, is rapporteur general of a roundtable (on the political role of the farm community) to be held at the International Political Science Association meeting at Geneva, Switzerland, in September.

Friedrich A. Hayek, Aaron Director, and Herbert Heaton are this year's lecturers at the Institute on Freedom and Competitive Enterprise at Claremont Men's College, June 10-24, 1956.

Paul M. Herzog, associate dean of the Harvard Graduate School of Public Administration, has been appointed a member of the International Labor Office's Committee on Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. Mr. Herzog has also recently been elected Vice-President of the American Society for Public Administration.

Roger Hilsman, formerly of Princeton University, has been appointed Chief of the Foreign Affairs Division of the Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress.

Bernard L. Hyink, dean of students, and William B. Storm, of the School of Public Administration faculty, University of Southern California, will serve with the School's Institute of Administrative Affairs, University of Tehran, Iran, during the 1956-57 school year. Richard C. Gable will continue as a member of the Institute faculty during the same period.

Frederick C. Irion, associate professor and director of government research at the University of New Mexico, has been appointed editor-of-reports for the New Mexico legislature's Welfare Investigating Committee. He has also been invited to attend the Second Conference on Democratic Theory to be held at Buck Hill Falls in June.

G. Edward Janosik, assistant professor at the University of Pennsylvania, has been given a special Summer Research Grant by the University of Pennsylvania.

Rex Johnson, formerly research director and secretary of the Recreational Planning Division of the Council of Social Agencies of Rochester, is now executive director of the Mental Health Association of Dayton.

Herbert Kaufman has been granted leave from Yale University for 1956-57 and will collaborate with Wallace S. Sayre of Columbia University under a research grant from the Russell Sage Foundation.

Joseph A. Kitchin has resigned from the department of political science at Queen's College to accept appointment as director of the United States Information Service in Calcutta, India.

Louis E. Lambert will direct the 8th Annual Workshop in Problems of State and Local Government this summer, to be held under the sponsorship of the department of government and the School of Education at Indiana University.

Harold D. Lasswell, professor of law and political science at Yale University and president of the American Political Science Association delivered the second lecture in public affairs at the University of Maryland, sponsored by the department of government and politics and the Bureau of Governmental Research.

Walter H. C. Laves, chairman of the department of government at Indiana University, attended the annual meeting of the Governing Board of the UNESCO Institute for Social Science in Cologne, Germany on March 16 and 17, 1956. Mr. Laves gave the principal address at a two-day conference on Technical Assistance and the Role of Universities at the University of Liege, Belgium.

Arnaud B. Leavelle, of Stanford University, is president-elect of the Northern California Political Science Association.

Charles O. Lerche, of the department of political science at Emory University, has been appointed associate director of the faculty Seminar for the Improvement of Teaching in International Relations being held at the University of Iowa during the summer session.

Werner Levi, of the University of Minnesota, will spend the summer in Europe where he will attend an International Sociological Conference and participate in an international seminar on some problems of international relations.

Georgia Bell Levy, associate professor of political science at Prairie View A & M College, has received grants from the Ford Foundation and the Danforth Foundation to engage in research on India and SEATO.

Guenter Lewy, an instructor in Columbia College has received an SSRC grant for 1956-57 to enable him to complete his dissertation.

Oliver J. Lissitzyn will be on leave from Columbia for the academic year 1956-57.

Clarence Ludwig, member of the political science faculty and director of the Municipal Reference Bureau at the University of Minnesota, has returned from a period of service as a consultant in local government on the staff of the Institute of Public Administration at the University of the Philippines.

Arthur W. Macmahon, Columbia University, gave the annual Edmund J. James Lecture on Government at the University of Illinois on February 29, 1956.

Robert J. M. Matteron was appointed the first executive director of the American Society for Public Administration. The creation of this full-time post, which provides a chief administrative officer for the Society, was made possible by the recent $245,000 grant of the Ford Foundation to the Society for a five-year development program.

Edwin B. McPherson, Indiana University, will conduct the second summer Property Tax School for municipal and county assessors under the sponsorship of the department of government at Indiana University, July 31 and August 1, 1956.

John H. Millett, University of Rochester, will teach at the University of Illinois during the summer session of 1956.

Lennox A. Mills, University of Minnesota, will attend a conference on South and Southeast Asia which will be held July 2-6 at the School of Oriental and African Studies of the University of London.

Hans J. Morganthau, University of Chicago, will be a member of the Columbia University Summer Session staff.

Ray Olpin, president of the University of Utah, Roy V. Peel, head of the department of political science, and Franz B. Schick, professor of political science, attended the Institute of World Affairs at Riverside, California, December 11-16, 1955.

Norman D. Palmer, professor of political science, University of Pennsylvania, has been appointed a member of the Committee on Institutional Projects Abroad of the American Council on Education. On February 10, Professor Palmer delivered the opening lecture in the Gabrielson Lecture Series at Colby College and on February 3 he lectured at the Army War College.

Otto Charles Press, of the North Dakota Agricultural College department of social science, has been appointed visiting assistant professor of government at Indiana University for the summer term 1956.

Allan R. Richards, associate professor of government at the University of New Mexico, has been appointed an administrative researcher to the New Mexico Legislature's Welfare Investigating Committee.

Benjamin Rivlin, Brooklyn College, will be Lecturer on North African Affairs at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies during the summer of 1956.

James R. Roach, associate professor of government at the University of Texas, has been awarded a Foreign Area Training Fellowship by the Ford Foundation for fourteen months beginning in June, 1956.

David W. Smith, former graduate student in the department of political science, University of Utah, is now attached to Amerika House in Heidelberg, Germany, as a member of the Foreign Service of the United States.

Ralph Smuckler has been appointed acting chief adviser of the 30-man technical assistance team of Michigan State University, in Saigon, Vietnam.

Clyde F. Snider, University of Illinois, was on leave during the spring semester, 1956, to continue his study of rural local government.

Richard F. Staar, professor of political science at Harding College, presented a paper at the Ninth University of Kentucky Foreign Language Conference on April 28, 1956.

John E. Stoner, professor of government, Indiana University, has received a grant from the National Association of County Officials to conduct a study of county road administration in the State of Washington.

Henry A. Turner, Santa Barbara College, University of California, will offer courses in the summer session at the University of Nebraska.

Amry Vandenbosch, University of Kentucky, was a member of a 10-man mission to confer with scientists, university administrators, and government officials of the Colombo Plan countries on the establishment of an Asian Nuclear Center, which will be located in the Philippines.

Robert A. Walker, Stanford University, has been named chairman of the Committee on General Studies at Stanford, charged with carrying forward the extensive curricular revisions recently adopted by the faculty.

James T. Watkins, IV, Stanford University, has been appointed to the California Committee for the Study of Education by the Association of Western Colleges.

Wilfred D. Webb, associate professor of government at the University of Texas, has been appointed to the City Planning Commission of the city of Austin.

Edward W. Weidner, head of the department of political science at Michigan State University, has returned to the campus to re-assume his duties after serving as chief adviser of the Michigan State University technical assistance program in Saigon, Vietnam, for nine months.

J. D. Williams, assistant professor of political science, University of Utah, is active in the Home Rule Committee of Salt Lake City which is seeking a change from the Commission form to the city manager form of city government.

Francis G. Wilson, University of Illinois, will teach at the University of Washington summer session of 1956.

Leon Wolcott, visiting professor of government at the University of New Mexico, has been appointed executive director of the New Mexico Legislature's Welfare Investigating Committee.

Arnold Wolfers has been granted sabbatical leave from Yale University for 1956-57 and has received a research grant from the Rockefeller Foundation. Recently, the Swiss government appointed him to the six-man Governing Board of the Graduate Institute of Advanced International Studies at Geneva, Switzerland.

Chitoshi Yanaga, associate professor of political science, Yale University, has returned after a year in Japan.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

Harold F. Alderfer has resigned as executive secretary of the Institute of Local Government at The Pennsylvania State University to become Assistant Commissioner of Operations of the Urban Renewal Administration in Washington, D.C.

John A. Armstrong, Jr. has accepted an appointment as visiting assistant professor in the Russian Institute at Columbia University during 1956-57.

Roscoe Baker has become a member of the department of government and politics of the University of Maryland and will participate in their overseas program.

John Ballard, University of Iowa, has been appointed to an instructorship in political science at San Jose State College.

Walter F. Berns, Jr., has been appointed an assistant professor of political science at Yale University.

Ralph Conant has been appointed an instructor in the department of political science at Michigan State University.

Alexander Dallin will become visiting assistant professor at the Russian Institute at Columbia University during 1956-57.

Richard A. Edwards of Lafayette College will be on leave through January, 1957 to be director of research for the Commission on Government Security.

Keener C. Frazer who, as a visiting professor, has held the Chester W. Nimitz professorship of social and political science at the Naval War College at Newport, Rhode Island during the past year will return to the University of North Carolina in September.

Frank Gibson has recently assumed his duties as director of the University of Georgia bureau of public administration and as supervisor of government training and service, Georgia Center for Continuing Education.

Federico G. Gil has been appointed to the rank of professor of political science at the University of North Carolina.

Kurt Ulaster has been appointed a member of the department of government and politics to work in the University of Maryland overseas program.

Charles D. Goff, of the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee, is serving during the second semester as a lecturer in political science at the University of California at Los Angeles.

William R. Hamilton has joined the department of government and politics of the University of Maryland to work in the overseas program.

Willard R. Hancock has returned to the department of political science at the University of Pennsylvania after four and one half years as Director of the Bureau of Municipal Affairs, Department of Internal Affairs, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Charles H. Heimsath has been appointed an instructor in political science at Yale University.

Richard H. Heindel, Dean of the college of arts and sciences and professor of history and government at the University of Buffalo, has been appointed the University's first vice-chancellor for planning and development.

Edwin C. Hoyt, Jr., will join the staff of the department of public law of Columbia University to give the international law lectures.

Charles S. Hyneman, Northwestern University, has been appointed professor of government at Indiana University beginning in the fall of 1956.

William S. Jenkins has become the first director of a new bureau of public records collection and research established at the University of North Carolina. He will continue to teach his courses in constitutional law.

Samuel S. Jones, formerly with the State Department and more recently with the Foreign Service, has been appointed Burton Craige Professor of Jurisprudence at the University of North Carolina.

Joseph LaPalombara has been promoted to an associate professorship at Michigan State University.

Charles F. LeeDecker has become associate professor and executive secretary of the Institute of Local Government at The Pennsylvania State University.

Frank M. Lewis, who spent the last year doing research in Chile, has become an instructor in political science at the University of Texas.

George T. Little, University of Vermont, has been granted a leave of absence to accept the position of professor of government in the National Political University, Taipei, Taiwan.

William S. Livingston has resumed his associate professorship at the University of Texas, having served as visiting lecturer at Yale University during the fall semester, 1955-56.

Harvey C. Mansfield, Ohio State University, will be a member of the Columbia University summer session staff.

Harris Martin, Stanford University, is a member of the San Jose State College staff for the academic year 1956-57.

James A. McConnell has been appointed professor of agricultural industries at Cornell's Graduate School of Business and Public Administration as of February 1, 1956. Professor McConnell was formerly Assistant Secretary of Agriculture and Executive Vice-President of the Cooperative Grange League Federation, Inc.

David W. Miner, University of California, has accepted an appointment as instructor of government in the School of General Studies at Columbia University.

Allan S. Nanes has been promoted to the position of assistant to the deputy director for research, Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress.

Edward R. O'Connor, who received his Ph.D. in 1954 at the University of Notre Dame, has accepted an appointment as instructor in the department of government, University of Texas, effective the spring semester of 1956.

Edward R. Padgett was appointed to a position in the department of government and politics in the University of Maryland overseas program.

Paul A. Pfretzschner, Lafayette College, has been promoted to associate professor of government and law as of February 1, 1956. In addition to his regular work this year, Professor Pfretzschner is giving a course in the Institute of Local Government at the University of Pennsylvania. He will teach at the summer session at the University of Buffalo.

Emmette S. Redford, University of Texas, has been appointed to a research assignment for the fall semester 1956-57 to prepare a study of government regulation of economic enterprise.

Harry W. Reynolds, Jr., formerly of the University of Pennsylvania, has been appointed visiting assistant professor of public administration at the University of Southern California.

Fred W. Riggs, Yale University, has been appointed associate professor of government at Indiana University beginning in the fall of 1956.

Henry L. Roberts has been appointed director of the Russian Institute at Columbia University.

Heinrich A. Rommen, Georgetown University, has received an appointment as exchange professor at the law faculty of the University of Frankfurt for the spring semester, 1956 and as a Fulbright lecturer in political science to the University of Nijmegen, Netherlands, for the academic year 1956-57.

David N. Rowe, professor of political science at Yale University, will return in September after two years in Formosa.

Dankwart A. Rustow, Princeton University, will be a member of the staff of the Center of Turkish Studies at Columbia University during the year 1956-57.

John A. Schutz, Whittier College, has been promoted to the rank of full professor in the department of political science and international relations.

Robert A. Shanley, formerly instructor at the University of Detroit, has been appointed associate professor of political science at Oglethorpe University.

Allan P. Sindler has been promoted to assistant professor of political science, Yale University.

Ward Stewart, assistant commissioner of education, U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, has been appointed professorial lecturer on the part-time faculty of the American University.

Melvin P. Straus, formerly of the University of Illinois, has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of Texas.

William L. Strauss, formerly with The Fund for the Republic, Inc., has accepted a position as associate professor of political science at Arizona State College beginning in the academic year 1956-57.

Loren E. Tesdell, formerly of Stanford University, has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of Texas.

Kenneth N. Waltz has been promoted to assistant professor in the government department of Columbia College.

Earl Warner, Ohio Wesleyan, has been appointed to the rank of associate professor and has been reappointed chairman of the department of political science for a two-year period ending June, 1958.

Frédéric A. Weed, of the department of social sciences, Northern Illinois State College, has accepted a position in the department of political science, San Jose State College, effective September 1, 1956.

Henry Wells will join the political science department of the University of Pennsylvania as an associate professor. Professor Wells is presently an associate professor of political science and chairman of the political science staff at the University of Puerto Rico.

Philip M. Williams, Jesus College, Oxford, has accepted an invitation to join the department of public law and government at Columbia University during the academic year 1956-57.

Richard B. Wilson was appointed to a position in the department of government and politics in the University of Maryland overseas program.

James R. Woodworth, who recently received his Ph.D. from Harvard University, has become assistant professor of social studies at Miami University.

Paul W. van der Veur has been appointed assistant professor at the University of Hawaii.

Richard W. Van Wageningen will take leave of absence from Princeton University to join the civilian faculty of the National War College in Washington, D. C. for the year 1956-57.

Gerard F. Yates, S.J., professor of government at Georgetown University, is in charge this year of Georgetown's newly established Junior Year Abroad program at the University of Fribourg, Switzerland. He is also visiting professor at Fribourg for the year 1955-56.

IN MEMORIAM

William Madison Boyd, chairman of the department of political science at Atlanta University, died on March 10, 1956 at the age of thirty-nine after a long illness. Dr. Boyd had his A.M. and his Ph.D. from the University of Michigan.

Dr. Ernst H. Feilchenfeld, professor of international law and chairman of the Institute of World Polity, Georgetown University, died of a heart attack on March 25. A great Jew, a great German, and a great American, he embodied the most profound elements of all three civilizations in his remarkable career as a writer, advisor, and teacher. As a young man, his brilliant career at the University of Berlin was interrupted by the First World War. Although he fought at Verdun, in Silesia, and in Palestine, he never became the proverbial "professional" war veteran and military expert. He used to say jokingly, "Wherever I arrived, the front collapsed immediately."

Dr. Feilchenfeld completed his studies at Berlin, where he obtained his J.U.D. as well as the legal offices of assessor and referendar. Disturbed by trends in German society, he moved to England and finally to the United States, where he became a citizen in 1935.

At Harvard Law School, Professor Feilchenfeld became a leading figure in a new field which he did much to establish, namely: international economic law. During World War II, he went to the Treasury Department where he worked for what he insisted upon calling the Board of Economic "Illfare." By 1944 Dr. Feilchenfeld came to Georgetown where, at last, his wanderings ceased. His reputation rested upon his many publications in the field of international law.

Dr. Feilchenfeld will be missed by many eminent statesmen, scholars, and public servants who enjoyed his friendship and advice for so many years. Surely the Cosmos Club in Washington, D. C. will be different without him. But his greatest contribution lay in the inspiration and guidance which he lavished upon his students. It was moving but hardly surprising to listen to the many students who came to pay their last respects to Dr. Feilchenfeld. They all said substantially the same thing: "He had a great influence on my life; he was like a father to me." Surely these devoted students are his greatest legacy.—

WILLIAM V. O'BRIEN

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS

REPORT OF NOMINATING COMMITTEE

At the annual meeting of The American Political Science Association, to be held September 6-8, 1956 in Washington, D.C., the Committee on Nominations will propose the following officers for 1956-57: President-Elect, V. O. Key (Harvard University); Vice-Presidents, Carl Brent Swisher (Johns Hopkins University), Wilfred Binkley (Ohio Northern University), Albert Lepawsky (University of California, Berkeley); Secretary, Gladys Kammerer (University of Kentucky); Treasurer, Max Kampelman (Washington, D.C.); Members of the Council for two years, William T. R. Fox (Columbia University), Ruth Weintraub (Hunter College), John D. Lewis (Oberlin College), Thomas Eliot (Washington University, St. Louis), Alexander Heard (University of North Carolina), York Willbern (University of Alabama), Allan Saunders (University of Hawaii), Christian Larsen (Sacramento State College).

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

HAROLD D. LASSWELL
Yale University

President Elect

E. E. SCHATTSHNEIDER
Wesleyan University

Vice Presidents

JOSEPH P. HARRIS
University of California
(Berkeley)

HAROLD S. QUIGLEY
University of Minnesota

EMMETTE S. REDFORD
University of Texas

Secretary

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

Treasurer

MAX M. KAMPELMAN
Washington, D. C.

Executive Director

EYRON M. KIRKPATRICK
1726 Massachusetts Ave., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Managing Editor The American Political Science Review

HUGH L. ELSBREE
Library of Congress

Associate Director
WILSON GADDIS

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officio

GABRIEL A. ALMOND
Princeton University

STEPHEN K. BAILEY
Princeton University

JAMES M. BURNS
Williams College

GWENDOLEN M. CARTER
Smith College

SAMUEL J. ELDERSVELD
University of Michigan

AVERY LEISERSON
Vanderbilt University

LESLIE M. LIPSON
University of California (Berkeley)

NORMAN PALMER
University of Pennsylvania

WELDON COOPER
University of Virginia

PAUL T. DAVID
The Brookings Institution

HERBERT EMMERICH
Public Administration Clearing House

CLAUDE E. HAWLEY
United States Information Agency

NORMAN L. HILL
University of Nebraska

THOMAS P. JENKIN
University of California (Los Angeles)

LOUISE OVERACKER
Wellesley College

CHARLES B. ROBSON
University of North Carolina

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW

ALBERT SHAW

FREDERIC N. JUDSON

JAMES BRYCE

A. LAWRENCE LOWELL

WOODROW WILSON

SIMON E. BALDWIN

ALBERT BUSHNELL HART

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

JOHN BASSETT MOORE

ERNST FREUND

JESSE MACY

MUNROE SMITH

HENRY JONES FORD

PAUL S. REINSCH

LEO S. ROWE

WILLIAM A. DUNNING

HARRY A. GARFIELD

JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM

CHARLES A. BEARD

WILLIAM B. MUNRO

JESSE S. REEVES

JOHN A. FAIRLIE

BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH

EDWARD S. CORWIN

WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY

ISIDOR LOEB

WALTER J. SHEPARD

FRANCIS W. COKER

ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE

THOMAS REED POWELL

CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA

CHARLES GROVE HAINES

ROBERT C. BROOKS

FREDERIC A. OGG

WILLIAM ANDERSON

ROBERT E. CUSHMAN

LEONARD D. WHITE

JOHN M. GAUS

WALTER F. DODD

ARTHUR W. MACMAHON

HENRY E. SPENCER

QUINCY WRIGHT

JAMES K. POLLOCK

PETER H. ODEGARD

LUTHER H. GULICK

PENDLETON HERRING

RALPH J. BUNCHE

CHARLES MCKINLEY

The American Political Science Review

---

VOL. L

SEPTEMBER, 1956

NO. 3

---

WOODROW WILSON AS LEGISLATIVE LEADER AND ADMINISTRATOR*

ARTHUR W. MACMAHON

Columbia University

A portrayal of Woodrow Wilson's legislative leadership and administrative methods has more uses than as a reminder of achievements durably impressive in themselves. His practice partly answered his own unresolved thinking about the presidency; in turn it implied theories that serve as foils in looking at later developments. The centennial of Wilson's birth is a fitting time to recount the story drawing on memoirs that accumulated after his death. The emphasis may well be on domestic policy in view of the greater attention that has been given to Wilson's role in war and peace.

I

First we must examine the prior development of Wilson's thinking about the presidency. Our concern is the working conception of the office of American elected chief executives that he had come to hold by the time of his full entrance into public life.

As a college senior Wilson wrote on "Cabinet Government in the United States."<sup>1</sup> He deplored, as real cause of solicitude and doubt, "the absorption of all power by a legislature which is practically irresponsible for its acts." What would be the remedy for government "practically carried on by irresponsible committees"? The remedy would be Cabinet government, meaning "simply to give to the heads of the Executive departments—the members of the Cabinet—seats in Congress, with the privilege of the initiative in legislation and some part of the unbounded privileges now commanded by the Standing Committees.” At the time, milder versions of this general idea were in the air. In 1864 a select committee of the House of Representatives under the chairmanship of George H. Pendleton of Ohio reported his bill “to provide that the heads of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives.”<sup>2</sup> Part of the original rationale was the argument that the executive branch had too many personal influences in Congress; then as later men disputed whether the effect of the proposed arrangement would strengthen or weaken the chief executive. In 1879, Mr. Pendleton, by then a Senator, introduced a bill to provide “that principal officers in each of the Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives.” In 1881 he succeeded in his motion to have it referred to a select committee of ten members, by whom it was favorably viewed.<sup>3</sup> Meanwhile Gamaliel Bradford notably was calling attention to this type of proposal; his plea was echoed, for example, in an article in 1873 on the question “Shall the Cabinet have seats in Congress?”<sup>4</sup> But Wilson in his own essay in 1879 warned the advocates that they deceived themselves if they did not recognize that the system would involve cabinet resignation. He suggested that “whether or not the presidential term should, under such a change of conditions, be lengthened would be one of several practical questions which would attend the adoption of a system of this sort.”

* A discussion of certain points in this paper appears in the report of Lectures and Seminar at the University of Chicago, Jan. 30-Feb. 3, 1956 in Celebration of the Centennial of Woodrow Wilson, pp. 267-93.

<sup>1</sup> International Review, Aug. 1879, Vol. 7, pp. 146-163. The text is given in R. S. Baker and W. E. Dodd, ed., The Public Papers of Woodrow Wilson. College and State. (New York, Vol. 1, pp. 19-42). Also republished in booklet form with an introductory chapter by Thomas K. Finletter. (Stamford, Conn, 1947.) The Wilson centennial has been marked by the publication of a volume of selections from his speeches and writings, edited by August Heckscher, The Politics of Woodrow Wilson, (New York, 1956).

The same belief that the defects in the American structure were not self-adjusting and the same remedy, without a precise formula, marked Wilson’s writings in the early Eighties. In an essay in 1884 he declared roundly: “Committee government is too clumsy and too clandestine a system to last . . . English precedent and the world's fashion must be followed in the institution of Cabinet Government in the United States."<sup>5</sup> His first book, Congressional Government, completed in 1884 and published in 1885, was less imperative; it was proposive only by implication. "I am pointing out facts," he wrote, "diagnosing, not prescribing remedies."<sup>6</sup> The preface announced that the purpose of the book was to reveal the contrast between two principal types of government: "administration by semi-independent executive agents who obey the dictation of a legislature to which they are not responsible, and administration by executive agents who are the accredited leaders and accountable servants of a legislature virtually supreme in all things." The depth of the desired reorganization was indicated by the remark that "the Constitution is not honored by blind worship." The direction of change was indicated by pointing to the need to apply "with the unhesitating courage of conviction all thoroughly-tested or well-considered expedients necessary to make self-government among us a straightforward thing of simple method, single unstinted power, and clear responsibility".<sup>7</sup>

<sup>2</sup> H.R. 214. 38th Congress, H. Rept. 43, April 6, 1864. For discussion March 3, 1865, see Congressional Globe, 38th Congress, 2nd Sess., new series no. 82 App., pp. 103–108. The bill provided that, in addition to giving department heads the right to attend at any time and “to participate in matters relative to the business of their departments,” they must come twice a week “to give information in reply to questions which may be propounded to them under the rules of the House.” Pendleton himself said: “If I believed that it would increase the power of the Executive I would abandon it at once.”

<sup>3</sup> S. 227; 46th Congress, 1st Sess., discussed in an interchange between Senators Pendleton and Morrill on April 28, 1879, Congressional Record, Vol. 9, pp. 966–74; reported favorably by a select committee of ten on February 4, 1881, 46th Congress, 3rd Sess., Vol. 11, p. 1201, S. Rept. 837. Reintroduced without result as S. 307 in the 47th Congress, 1st Sess., Vol. 13, p. 53, Dec. 8, 1881.

<sup>4</sup> Nation, April 3, 1873, Vol. 16, pp. 233–34. “Mr. Bradford,” it said, “thinks that the true way is to give cabinet ministers seats in Congress. His idea is that by this means we can secure what is so much needed, ‘national representation’.” See Arthur S. Link, Wilson, The Road to the White House. (Princeton, 1947), p. 17.

In 1893, in an article in the Review of Reviews on "Mr. Cleveland's Cabinet," Wilson was saying: "What we need is harmonious, consistent, responsible party government instead of a wide dispersion of function and responsibility; and we can get it only by connecting the President as closely as may be with his party in Congress. The natural connecting link is the cabinet."<sup>8</sup> A few years later, in a talk before the Virginia Bar Association in 1897, Wilson asked: "Should we not, on the one hand, give the individual leaders of opinion in Congress a better chance to have an intimate part in determining who should be President, and the President, on the other hand, a better chance to approve himself a statesman, and his advisers capable men of affairs, in the guidance of Congress?"<sup>9</sup> Only the second part of the question seemed to be covered by his answer: "This will be done when the Executive is given an authoritative initiative in the Houses."

Significantly, Wilson was now talking about the presidency in terms

<sup>5</sup> "Committee or Cabinet Government," Overland Monthly, Jan. 1884, series 2, Vol. 3, pp. 17-33. The essay is given in Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 95-129.

<sup>6</sup> Congressional Government. (Boston, 1885), p. 315. A new preface was written for the fifteenth impression in 1900 and an introduction by Ray Stannard Baker for the impression of 1925.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., p. 332.

<sup>8</sup> Review of Reviews, April 1893, Vol. 7, pp. 286-97; reprinted in Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 198-222.

<sup>9</sup> Leaderless Government. (Richmond, 1897.) Reprinted in Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 336-59.

of "the nationalization of the motive power of the government, to offset the economic sectionalization of the country." For, he argued, the great structural defect was "that Congress is the motive power in the government and yet has in it nowhere any representative of the nation as a whole."

The final stage in a considerable shift of emphasis and outlook on the presidency can be seen in the new prefatory note to the fifteenth edition of Congressional Government in 1900 and forcefully in a magazine article two years later. "Once more," wrote Wilson, "it is our place among the nations that we think of; once more our Presidents are our leaders."<sup>10</sup>

The lectures in 1907 that were published in the next year as Constitutional Government in the United States were Wilson's last academic formulation. The book repeats the view that the war with Spain and related changes had altered the balance of the parts in American government. "Foreign questions became leading questions again, as they had been in the first days of the government, and in them the President was of necessity leader."<sup>11</sup> What is needed in the presidency, more than actual experience, Wilson argued, is some one "who will be and will seem to the country in some sort an embodiment of the character and purpose it wishes its government to have."<sup>12</sup>

Especially important in appraising Wilson's outlook on the relative nature of legislative and administrative responsibilities was his declaration that "it is therefore becoming more and more true, as the business of the government becomes more complex and extended, that the President is becoming more and more a political and less and less an executive officer." Wilson summarized it this way: "His executive powers are in commission, while his political powers more and more center and accumulate upon him and are in their very nature personal and inalienable."<sup>13</sup> As a corollary he believed that under a self-reliant President "the cabinet is an executive, not a political body."<sup>14</sup>

Such a political role for the President involves the problem of telescoped relations to party and to nation. The President, Wilson declared in Constitutional Government, "cannot escape being the leader of his party except by incapacity and lack of personal force, because he is at once the choice of the party and of the nation."<sup>15</sup> He went on to say:

<sup>10</sup> "The Ideals of America," Atlantic Monthly, Dec. 1902, Vol. 90, pp. 721-34. Reprinted in Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 416-42.

<sup>11</sup> Constitutional Government in the United States. (New York, 1908), p. 59.

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., p. 65.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., pp. 66-67.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., p. 76.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., p. 67.

"No one else represents the people as a whole, exercising a national choice; and inasmuch as his strictly executive duties are in fact subordinated, so far at any rate as all detail is concerned, the President represents not so much the party's governing efficiency as its controlling ideals and principles. . . . He can dominate his party by being spokesman for the real sentiment and purpose of the country, by giving direction to opinion, by giving the country at once the information and the statements of policy which will enable it to form its judgments alike of parties and of men."

Wilson himself, at this stage in his writing, left choices open and the issues of relationship somewhat blurred. The President, he indicated, "may be both the leader of his party and the leader of the nation, or he may be one or the other. If he lead the nation, his party can hardly resist him. His office is anything he has the sagacity and force to make it."<sup>16</sup> We shall return to this problem of party and nation when we trace Wilson's own choices in office and the working theory implicit in his statements to Congress and to the country.

While he was Governor of New Jersey and already a possible presidential candidate, Wilson remarked in an address before the Commercial Club of Portland, Oregon: "The whole country, since it cannot decipher the methods of its legislation, is clamoring for leadership; and a new role, which to many persons seems a little less than unconstitutional, is thrust upon our executives. The people are impatient of a President or a governor who will not formulate a policy and insist upon its adoption. They are impatient of a governor who will not exercise energetic leadership, who will not make his appeals directly to public opinion and insist that the dictates of public opinion be carried out in definite legal reforms of his own suggestion." It was indeed a prospectus typical of the times; Charles Evans Hughes in New York was talking and acting in these terms. Wilson's own state leadership helped to make it typical.

On the eve of entering the White House, Wilson dealt with the presidency in a public letter to A. Mitchell Palmer.<sup>17</sup> The purpose was to sidetrack a proposed amendment for a single six-year presidential term. This proposal had been endorsed by the Democratic platform and a resolution of amendment had passed the Senate on February 1, 1913.<sup>18</sup> In opposing it, Wilson pointed to what he believed was the transitional condition and the still uncertain destination of the presidency. Such uncertainty, he argued, made any early constitutional amendment undesirable. "I must speak with absolute freedom and candor in this matter, or not speak at all," Wilson wrote, "and it seems to me that the present position of the Presidency in our actual system, as we use it, is quite abnormal and must lead eventually to something very different." Why, he asked, should the President, who is expected to be the leader of the party and spokesman of policy, be responsible to no one for four years, let alone six? "Sooner or later, it would seem, he must be made answerable to opinion in a somewhat more informal and intimate fashion—answerable, it may be, to the Houses whom he seeks to lead, either personally or through a Cabinet, as well as to the people for whom they speak." He added: "But this is a matter to be worked out—as it inevitably will be—in some natural American way which we cannot yet even predict."

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., p. 69.

<sup>17</sup> The text appeared in the daily press of Feb. 6, 1913. It is given in Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 21-26.

<sup>18</sup> Congressional Record, 62d Congress, 3d sess., Vol. 49, p. 2420.

To speak in these vague terms in February 1913 was probably both tactical and honest. It bulwarked the argument that the presidency was in unresolved transition while, equally unresolved for Wilson, it retained elements of his earlier preoccupation. It left Wilson free to emphasize what was immediate and practical: that the President "is expected by the Nation to be the leader of his party as well as the Chief Executive Officer of the Government, and the country will take no excuses from him." This assumption was the basis for the crucial point in the argument. "The present fact," Wilson wrote, "is that the President is held responsible for what happens in Washington in every large matter, and so long as he is commanded to lead he is surely entitled to a certain amount of power—all the power he can get from the support and convictions and opinions of his fellow countrymen and he ought to be suffered to use that power against his opponents until his work is done." Limiting the President to a single six-year term, he argued, would seriously embarrass the fighting power of a President who is a true spokesman for the people.

II

In such passages we were given a working plan on the eve of its memorable application. Thereafter we can glean only the barest hints of Wilson's later thinking about constitutional change. There is little to offset the verdict that as man of action he helped history to pronounce: namely, that the practice of presidential leadership reduced the possibility of using the presidency as a passive pivot for evoking legislatively responsible cabinets.

As for clues to Wilson's later thinking about responsibility, it is true that on November 5, 1916, before the election, he wrote to Secretary Lansing that, if Hughes was elected, he proposed to appoint him Secretary of State and then to resign along with the Vice President so that Hughes could become President without delay. "All my life long," Wilson wrote to Lansing, "I have advocated some such responsible government for the United States as other constitutional systems afford as of course, and as such action on my part would inaugurate, at least by example. Responsible government means government by those whom the people trust, and trust at the time of decision and action. The whole country has long perceived, without knowing how to remedy, the extreme disadvantage of having to live for four months after an election under a party whose guidance had been rejected at the polls."<sup>19</sup> But President Wilson was speaking here of a special aspect of the problem of responsibility. The Twentieth Amendment has eased this angle of the problem by shortening the interregnum.

On the question of President Wilson's ultimate views about political responsibility through a cabinet, David F. Houston reported that "after he went to Washington, I never heard him refer to the proposal."<sup>20</sup> Houston added his guess that "Wilson had never really thought through this problem which interested him for so many years." Houston did not believe that Woodrow Wilson quite realized how far his own successful practice of his immediate working code had helped to remove the dilemma by closing the doors on any other course for the presidency.

Against this glancing evidence must be put the equally slight clue given by Colonel House's dictated diary note about a dinner conversation with the President on April 29, 1917.<sup>21</sup>

"The President," House recorded, "declared his intention of writing some things which were on his mind, after he retired from office. . . . He said he had no notion of writing about his administration, but expressed a desire to write one book which he has long had in mind and which he thought might have some influence for good. . . . He talked of the proposed book and its contents. I thought that if he would bring out clearly the necessity for a more responsive form of government, and the necessity for having Cabinet members sit in the House of Representatives, it would be worth while. He agreed that if the Cabinet officers sat in the House, the outcome would be that the President would have to take his material for the Cabinet from Congress. This, in the end, would give the Cabinet more power, and would have the further effect of bringing into Congress the best talent in the country. It would eventuate in something like the British system.' But what we have quoted is Colonel House, self-consciously leading; it is not Woodrow Wilson speaking directly. Moreover, so far as the report goes and is accurate, it merely says that the President "agreed" about the consequences likely to follow the imagined first step. It does not necessarily commit the President to belief in these ultimate consequences.

<sup>19</sup> Ray Stannard Baker, Woodrow Wilson, Life and Letters. (Garden City, 1927-1939), Vol. 6, p. 292-93. Baker remarks: "There is no doubt that he would have carried out his purpose of resigning in case Hughes had been elected." p. 293.

<sup>20</sup> David F. Houston, Eight Years with Wilson's Cabinet. (Garden City, 1926), Vol. 2, p. 198.

<sup>21</sup> The Intimate Papers of Colonel House. Arranged as a Narrative by Charles Seymour. (Boston, 1928), Vol. 3, p. 47.

As for Wilson's later plans for writing, we have Edith Wilson's word that, in the course of comparing various places to live after leaving the White House, "eventually Washington was decided on for these reasons, mainly: (1) the Library of Congress afforded the facilities which my husband wished to use while writing a book he had long had in mind; and (2) it was home to me."<sup>22</sup> But of the imagined content of such a book we have only the further comment that "this book which Mr. Wilson wanted to write was on the subject of Government" and that, tragically, only one page of it was ever written. This was a dedicatory page written in the White House in 1921 and handed to Mrs. Wilson with the smiling remark, as she recalled it: "I have written the dedication to the book on Government for which I have been preparing all my life and which now I will have leisure to do." Only one published article, however, came from him before his death—an essay in the Atlantic Monthly of August, 1923, on "the Road Away from Revolution."<sup>23</sup>

III

A more practical issue was the way Wilson as President conceived and dealt with the interfused, double representative roles of the office. Undoubtedly his inaugural address stated the core of his thought about the instrumental relation of majority processes and party rule to the changing national consensus. "The success of a party," he said on March 4, 1913, "means little except when the Nation is using the party for a large and definite purpose. No one can mistake the purpose for which the Nation now seeks to use the Democratic Party. It seeks to use it to interpret a change in its own plans and point of view."<sup>24</sup> The same conception was reflected in a magazine article—an interview, perhaps, it should be called—that appeared on March 8. “I am bidden,” he said, “to interpret as well as I can the purposes of the people of the United States, and to act, in so far as my purpose determines the action, through the instrumentality of persons who likewise represent that choice.” He drew the conclusion: “. . . I shall not be acting in a partisan spirit when I nominate progressives—and only progressives. I shall be acting as a representative of the people of this great country.”<sup>25</sup>

<sup>22</sup> Edith Bolling Wilson, My Memoir. (Indianapolis, 1939), p. 308.

<sup>23</sup> The text is given in Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 2, pp. 536-39. In this essay he wrote: "Everyone who has an intelligent knowledge of social forces must know that great and widespread reactions like that which is now unquestionably manifesting itself against capitalism do not occur without cause or provocation; and before we commit ourselves irrevocably to an attitude of hostility to this movement of the time, we ought frankly to put to ourselves the question, Is the capitalistic system unimpeachable? which is another way of asking, Have capitalists generally used their power for the benefit of the countries in which their capital is employed and for the benefit of their fellow men?"

<sup>24</sup> The text of the address is given in Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. I, pp. 1-6.

We shall have occasion in examining Wilson’s legislative methods to note the importance of his decision to work with the regular leaders and officers of the Democratic Party in Congress. This crucial choice of tactics was qualified but not renounced in such statements as his remark in a Jackson Day talk in January, 1915, “that politics in this country does not depend any longer upon the regular members of either party.”<sup>26</sup> He contended that the Democratic Party was two-thirds “progressive,” the Republican Party one-third “progressive.” In the spring of 1916 he said at a Jefferson Day banquet: “Party politics, my friends, sometimes plays too large a part in the United States. . . . This country demands service which is essentially and fundamentally non-partisan.” He added that he was referring as much to domestic as to foreign affairs. “For in saying non-partisan I do not mean merely as between parties and political organizations, but also and more fundamentally as between classes and interests.”<sup>27</sup>

Later, in the congressional campaign of 1918, the President’s appeal for the return of a Democratic majority seemed to project something long and deep in his thinking about party responsibility. The recollections of his cabinet associates indicate that they understood his appeal would be couched in terms of support for his policies.<sup>28</sup> Colonel House, however, noted in his diary on September 24: “. . . The President spoke of politics in general and expressed an earnest desire that a Democratic Congress should be elected. He said that he intended making a speech or writing a letter about two weeks before the elections, asking the people to return a Democratic House.”<sup>29</sup> The diary entry added: “I did not express any opinion as to the wisdom of this.” On October 25, when the President’s statement was issued and before the election, House did confide to his diary that he was “greatly disturbed by the President’s appeal” and that “I am sorry now I did not discuss it with him

<sup>25</sup> Collier’s Weekly, March 8, 1913, Vol. 50, p. 8. Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 27–30.

<sup>26</sup> Baker and Dodd, op. cit., p. 238.

<sup>27</sup> Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 144.

<sup>28</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 8, pp. 513–14.

<sup>29</sup> The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, Vol. 4, p. 68.

to a finish."<sup>30</sup> It is true the President's statement on October 25 sought to avoid the charge that he was complaining of lack of support of the war.<sup>31</sup> "I have no thought," he said, "of suggesting that any political party is paramount in matters of patriotism." But his appeal was frankly in terms of party. He went on to say that "the leaders of the minority in the present Congress have unquestionably been prowar, but they have been anti-administration." He charged that they had been constantly seeking "to take the choice of policy and the conduct of the war out of my hands and put it under the control of instrumentalities of their own choosing." Pleading that "this is no time either for divided counsel or for divided leadership," the President said to the voters: "If you have approved of my leadership and wish me to continue to be your unembarrassed spokesman in affairs at home and abroad, I earnestly beg that you will express yourselves unmistakably to that effect by returning a Democratic majority to both the Senate and the House of Representatives." It should be noted that the President based this appeal largely on the importance of being unembarrassed by divided counsel and controls. There was no commitment to stop striving when he added: "I am your servant and will accept your judgment without cavil, but my power to administer the great trust assigned me by the Constitution would be seriously impaired should your judgment be adverse, and I must frankly tell you so because so many critical issues depend upon your verdict."

Writing later in a personal letter, Wilson said of his action: "I have no idea that the President is sacrosanct in any way, and being the leader of the country and under our system necessarily the leader of a party, he certainly ought not to be rendered dumb on a point of taste at a critical moment."<sup>32</sup>

Woodrow Wilson himself recognized the relation of the moving consensus of cumulative thinking and agitation to the legislative dynamic of party action and executive leadership within and through a party. In a letter to an intimate friend on April 23, 1911, toward the close of the fruitful New Jersey legislative session of Wilson's first year as governor, he had written that it was "just a bit of natural history. I came to the office in the fullness of time, when opinion was ripe on all these matters, when both parties were committed to these reforms, and by merely standing fast, by never losing sight of the business for an hour,

<sup>30</sup> Tumulty's account indicates the President's impression after the original conversation was "that he and Colonel House had finally agreed that the thing to do was frankly to come out without preliminaries of any kind and boldly ask for the election of a Democratic Congress." Woodrow Wilson as I Know Him. (Garden City, 1921), p. 326.

<sup>31</sup> The text is given in Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 286-287.

<sup>32</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 8, p. 552.

but keeping up all sorts of (legitimate) pressure all the time, kept the mighty forces from being diverted or blocked at any point."<sup>33</sup> Governor Wilson's contemporary view of himself was echoed by Arthur S. Link as historian: "He succeeded because he marshaled into a coherent unit the force of public opinion, because he was a competent party leader, but above all because the necessary fundamental agitation had already been accomplished by other men."<sup>34</sup>

To say that Woodrow Wilson learned his politics in New Jersey (as he said) and revealed there his methods of leadership in their relation to a critical stage in the maturing of agreement does not deny important differences in the depth of controversy on state and national issues. Moreover, important and bitter choices remain even when there is general agreement that something must be done about some long-discussed matter—currency, say. Harvesting—even if it were no more than that—is not the least nor the least chancy of the skills of husbandry.<sup>35</sup>

In foreign affairs things were reversed; he sowed but he did not contrive to harvest.

IV

It is timely to pass to a closer examination of the methods of legislative leadership followed by President Wilson and to note his staff equipment for a role which, as has been said, he viewed as distinctively political. Later (having noted some of his working habits) we shall turn to the administrative views and methods of the man who in 1887 wrote a pioneering essay on the importance of administration and its study in the modern state.

"Woodrow Wilson," Lawrence Chamberlain has remarked, "was the first President to develop systematically the legislative powers of his office. Coming in a period of peace and prosperity, his first administration offered an unusually favorable climate in which to test the theory of presidential synthesis and he was equipped by training, experience, and purpose to develop his concept of the office to its fullest."<sup>36</sup> This

<sup>33</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 3, p. 170.

<sup>34</sup> Wilson, The Road to the White House. (Princeton, 1947), p. 272.

<sup>35</sup> In domestic affairs, the war lacking, the dynamic of progressivism was hardly exhausted although William Diamond, The Economic Thought of Woodrow Wilson (Baltimore, 1943), p. 126, remarks that "With the passage of the Clayton Act, the New Freedom had reached its climax. . . ." I think we may discount Wilson's indication in the autumn of 1914 that the economic program was practically complete and that much that remained was for the states to do. See Baker, op. cit., Vol. 5, p. 198. See also Arthur S. Link, Woodrow Wilson and the Progressive Era. (New York, 1954.)

<sup>36</sup> L. H. Chamberlain, The President, Congress, and Legislation. (New York, 1946), p. 17.

statement is doubtless true both in point of Wilson's historic contribution in the development of legislative leadership and also in point of the relative importance of domestic statutory policy in 1913 and 1914.

It does not diminish the importance of the events of the early years to note Ray Stannard Baker's comment, which indeed Wilson whimsically anticipated in an off-hand remark before he took the oath of office, after a campaign in which foreign affairs were hardly mentioned. Baker remarked: "such was the irony of fate that from the cabinet meeting on March 7th until Congress assembled in April—and long afterwards—Wilson's attention was largely absorbed by the clamorous problems of Mexico, China, Japan, Panama, the Philippine Islands, Nicaragua."<sup>37</sup> Along the same line, David Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, in a notation on May 20, 1913, about cabinet meetings, wrote: "Somebody pointed out that all our discussions, or nearly all, had been over foreign matters; that domestic problems of importance such as the tariff and currency were never raised by the President. Lane, in particular, was critical. I pointed out that the President had evidently and of necessity given his thoughts primarily to pressing foreign questions, that he regarded this as his particular field, one in respect to which he had unusual powers and responsibilities, that he was evidently depending upon the heads of departments initially to handle domestic economic questions each in his particular field, and that he complimented us by presenting many matters for discussion and advice while some heads of departments did not."<sup>38</sup> Colonel House, of course, saw it from a different perspective. He dictated a grumbling note for his diary on June 24, 1915: "To my mind, the President has never appreciated the importance of our foreign policy and has laid undue emphasis upon domestic affairs. I thoroughly approved this up to the end of the special session of Congress, when the tariff, banking, and such other measures were involved. . . ."<sup>39</sup>

The methods by which the President advanced the domestic legislative program were of course varied. Nevertheless it is possible to identify certain main characteristics.

(1) President Wilson used his legislative influence selectively. He pushed one measure at a time. But the pressure kept coming. While the special session that met on April 7, 1913, was concentrating on the tariff, the House committees generally were not organized. Nevertheless the Committee on Banking and Currency was chosen so that Carter

<sup>37</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 4, p. 56.

<sup>38</sup> David F. Houston, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 67-68.

<sup>39</sup> The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, Vol. 1, p. 177.

Glass (busy with a preliminary draft even before the election) could go ahead as duly constituted chairman. The tariff bill was not ready for signature until October but in late June the President addressed Congress on the need for banking legislation. In the field of antitrust, House hearings began in December, with the ground already laid in conversations with the Democratic leaders.<sup>40</sup> A presidential message in January indicated the five points for legislative action.

Overlapping selective pressure of this sort was an effective though partial answer to Wilson's long-standing complaint. "Legislation is conglomerate," he had written in 1885.<sup>41</sup> "The absence of any concert of action amongst the Committees leaves legislation with scarcely any trace of determinate party courses. No two schemes pull together."

(2) The President's legislative approach was studiously collaborative. In addressing Congress about the tariff on April 8, 1913, he opened by saying that the President should not be viewed as "a mere department of the Government hailing Congress from some isolated island of jealous power . . . that he is a human being trying to cooperate with other human beings in a common service." The President added that "after this pleasant experience I shall feel quite normal in all our dealings with one another."<sup>42</sup>

There were hazards in going to the Hill. As President-elect Wilson asked Josephus Daniels: "Did you ever hear of a President occupying a room in the Capitol called 'the President's Room'? What would be thought of it, if, instead of asking Senators with whom I wished to consult to call at the White House, I should occupy that room for such conferences?"<sup>43</sup> Daniels did not think the Senators would like it and he recalled later that Senator Simmons exclaimed: "My God . . . tell him not to do it. It would be resented by the Senators." But the favorable reaction to the personal delivery of his tariff message prompted the President to meet next day in the President's Room.

Ray Stannard Baker records illustratively the frequent and varied nature of the President's congressional contacts. "He was constantly receiving delegations of senators at the White House and he often visited the President's room at the Capitol. We have an account of one instance, June 12th, when he inquired for twenty-one senators, only seven of whom could be found. . . . On June 18th he was again at the Capitol conferring with twenty-three different Senators. He asked

<sup>40</sup> Chamberlain, op. cit., p. 36.

<sup>41</sup> Congressional Government, p. 325.

<sup>42</sup> Baker and Dodd, op. cit., Vol. 1, p. 32.

<sup>43</sup> Josephus Daniels, The Wilson Era, Years of Peace 1910-1917. (Chapel Hill, 1944) pp. 99-100.

to have a special telephone put in so that he might, on occasion, reach senators quickly and directly from the White House."<sup>44</sup>

(3) The President's legislative approach was frankly through party as the instrument for the reshaped purposes of the nation. In his tariff message he said: "I have called the Congress together in extraordinary session because a duty was laid upon the party now in power at the recent elections which it ought to perform promptly." In his message in June on banking legislation he said: "I have come to you, as the head of the Government and the responsible leader of the party in power, to urge action, now while there is time to serve the country deliberately and as we should, in a clear air of common counsel." Factional rifts reflecting different viewpoints within the party were clearly in sight on all the major early and outstanding legislative undertakings—the tariff, currency, and antitrust. "Nevertheless"—to quote John M. Blum's summary of a choice that was in fact many-sided—"in keeping with his theories of government, and on the advice of Burleson and Daniels, Wilson decided to work through his party rather than to attempt to construct a progressive coalition. The implementation of this decision called for the recognition of each important Democratic faction in the assignment of political largess. This worrisome task fell largely to Postmaster General Burleson, Secretaries Bryan and McAdoo, and Tumulty. . . ."<sup>45</sup>

(4) In seeking results through party, not coalition, the President chose to work with the regularly constituted party leaders and organs. The crucial demonstration of this tactic and its success was in bowing to seniority and accepting Senator Simmons as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. Originally, facing protective tendencies in certain Southern and Western Democrats, the President had thought that an effort should be made to sidetrack Simmons in favor of a more militantly low-tariff chairman. He yielded to the counsel of Daniels and others, however, and gained in Simmons an unusually effective supporter in defending the reductions. Another example came during the war when the President relied on the help of Claude Kitchin who in 1914 replaced Oscar Underwood as Democratic floor leader in the House. Kitchin voted against the declaration of war and indeed (as Alex M. Arnett put it, in the mood of revisionist history writing in the Thirties) was "able, in fact, to lead a majority of his colleagues almost to the point of blocking the President's tragic course."<sup>46</sup> After hostilities began, however, Arnett notes, "Kitchin never questioned his duty to do all in his power, consistent with his principles, to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion."<sup>47</sup> Nothing came of the rumor that the President would throw his influence against Kitchin's reelection as floor leader. He was indeed approved unanimously by the Democratic caucus. On the President's side there was doubtless a favorable carry-over from his earlier attitude as described by Arnett: "Although their personal contacts were infrequent, Wilson was cordial toward Kitchin when they met, respected his judgment, and admired his sincerity."<sup>48</sup>

<sup>44</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 4, p. 123.

<sup>45</sup> Tumulty and the Wilson Era. (Boston, 1951), p. 69.

<sup>46</sup> Alex M. Arnett, Claude Kitchin and the Wilson War Policies. (Boston, 1937), p. viii.

On the debit side, to be sure, a consequence of working through the regular party machinery was to deepen Southern influence. John Blum reminds us of Tumulty's growing concern about this condition. He concludes that "by 1917 it was too late to overcome the Southern predominance in Congress and in party councils."<sup>49</sup>

(5) The use of the caucus was a further feature of the plan of working through party, not coalition. On the tariff measure, a caucus of House Democrats in April, "after tumultuous debate,"<sup>50</sup> voted to support the bill and on the following day it was reported by the Ways and Means Committee, passing in the following month with only five Democrats against it. On the Senate side, where the majority in the chamber was a scant seven, the President was at first unsuccessful in his attempt to secure caucus endorsement. Later, however, the first Democratic senatorial caucus or party "conference" in many years discussed the tariff bill more than a fortnight and, in making it a party measure, substantially defended the integrity of the House bill. The currency bill was debated "behind closed doors"<sup>51</sup> in the House Democratic caucus for two days in September; the measure passed the House later that month by 287 to 85. In this caucus the administration bill had to face the dissident views of so potent a Democrat as the chairman of the Rules Committee. In securing overwhelming caucus support for a middle degree of central guidance in the proposed reserve system, the administration had Bryan's aid, especially after it was agreed that the Federal Reserve Board should be wholly public in membership, not partly banker-chosen.<sup>52</sup>

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., p. 241.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., p. 41.

<sup>49</sup> Blum, op. cit., p. 159.

<sup>50</sup> Chamberlain, op. cit., p. 115.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., p. 319.

<sup>52</sup> Mrs. Bryan wrote in her diary in the spring of 1913: "One thing which pleases me is the constantly increasing cordiality between the President and Mr. Bryan. They work together so well. Will finds him so firm and courageous and so truly progressive." The Memoirs of William Jennings Bryan. By Himself and his Wife Mary Baird Bryan. (Philadelphia, 1925), p. 350.

In view of the President's public statement of his gratification at the action of the House committee and the caucus in handling the currency bill, it is a bit puzzling to read Carter Glass' recollections about the use of the caucus in pushing the currency bill in the Senate after a divided committee had reported the measure without recommendation. Glass recalled that Wilson was at first "disposed to assert vigorously his established aversion to 'rule by caucus.'" Glass' account goes on to emphasize the indispensability of caucus action. Had he persisted in his attitude, Glass writes, "there might have been no reform of the currency for years . . . the practical politicians finally convinced the President that there must be a caucus or abandonment of all hope for legislation."<sup>53</sup> So a "conference" was held and the President, Glass adds, "did the cleverest kind of work among the Senators in healing differences and imparting a new and militant spirit to the whole movement." As to the initial reluctance about a Senate caucus thus strangely attributed by Glass to the President, it is true that Wilson had always extolled open debate. In his first book he had discussed the caucus as a corrective of legislative incoherence but observed: "the fact that makes this defense of the caucus not altogether conclusive is that it is shielded from all responsibility by its sneaking privacy."<sup>54</sup> However it is doubtful whether these tentative scruples (conceived in his earlier writings against the background of an imagined main alternative) had much weight against the necessities and methods of 1913.

(6) Essential in the President's tactics was the well-timed public appeal. When the tariff bill faced a crucial test in the Senate hearings, Wilson, apparently without consulting either Cabinet or congressmen, gave to the press on May 26 his statement against rampant lobbies that could be offset only by an alert public opinion.

(7) The President was willing to fight for legislative proposals. In connection with the movement for merchant fleet development begun in 1914, Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo recalled that "when I saw the President again, he was strongly in favor of the plan that I had submitted. He handed me back the draft of the bill and said, with a smile, 'We'll have to fight for it, won't we?'"<sup>55</sup> McAdoo adds that when he replied, "We certainly shall," the President said, "Well, then, let's fight." The fight lasted eighteen months.

‡ But against this evidence of mood and manner may be put the sort of tone in Wilson's letter to Secretary of War Lindley Garrison on January 17, 1916, before the latter's resignation. The President wrote: "I am not irrevocably or dogmatically committed to any one plan of providing the nation with such a reserve, and am cordially willing to discuss alternative proposals."<sup>56</sup> He added: "Any other position on my part would indicate an attitude toward the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives which I should in no circumstances feel at liberty to assume. It would never be proper or possible for me to say to any committee of the House of Representatives that, so far as my participation in legislation was concerned, they would have to take my plan or none."

<sup>53</sup> Carter Glass, An Adventure in Constructive Finance. (Garden City, 1927), p. 195.

<sup>54</sup> Congressional Government, pp. 328-29.

<sup>55</sup> William Gibbs McAdoo, Crowded Years. (Boston, 1931), p. 296.

(8) President Wilson's intervention in the legislative handling of particular measures was characteristically limited. During the debate on the tariff John Sharp Williams told the Senate that the President had actively concerned himself with decisions on two items only. One was clearly sugar, where firmness was needed against protective pressures from Louisiana and Colorado. Moreover, on other bills the President allowed leeway for permissive language that seemed unlikely to disturb the substantial policy the administration was advocating. Carter Glass recalled how they agreed to such a provision in the Federal Reserve Act. His account reports the President saying: ". . . if we can hold to the substance of the thing and give the other fellow the shadow, why not do it, if thereby we may save our bill?"<sup>57</sup>

Generally speaking, it may be said that in legislative leadership it was Woodrow Wilson's theory and practice, within a selective strategy in identifying certain policies for active support, to supply, not draftsmanship, but rather a stream of influence, public and personal, while he stood ready to aid in defending or adjusting a few crucial points. Illustratively, Henry Parker Willis, in his detailed story of the Federal Reserve Act, remarks in summary: "President Wilson's service to the country, important and absolutely fundamental as it was, had nothing to do with the development of any essential features of the measure and his most important effect upon its content was seen in the change made for the purpose of satisfying the Bryan element in the administration and in Congress." Willis added: "This statement in no wise underestimates the importance of President Wilson's service in connection with the adoption of the law—indeed it could never have become an act without his steady, persistent, and insistent support of it."<sup>58</sup>

<sup>56</sup> Houston, op. cit., Vol. 1, p. 172.

<sup>57</sup> Glass, op. cit., p. 125. As to this incident, Paul M. Warburg noted: "He threw Glass into consternation when he bought the support of the Bryan-Owen wing by permitting Federal Reserve notes to be issued as the obligation of the United States, but in doing so, in his own words, he 'surrendered the shadow but saved the substance.'" The Federal Reserve System: Its Origin and Growth. (New York, 1930), Vol. 1, p. 422.

<sup>58</sup> The Federal Reserve System: Legislation, Organization and Operation. (New York, 1923), pp. 531-32.

V

The institutional staffing of the presidency under Woodrow Wilson reflected little of the innovation that he brought to the use of the office. The simplicity of the formal arrangements was indeed in line with his stress upon a political role that was inherently individual. The presidency was in transition but it remained for later administrations to witness the installation and development of apparatus for an office that, in conjunction with the times, Wilson so notably helped to remake. His own use of limited equipment was shaped to his working habits.

The routines of the presidency were left to Rudolph Forster, chief clerk under many prior Presidents, and to Irwin H. (Ike) Hoover, veteran White House usher.<sup>59</sup> "Assisting Forster were Thomas Brahany, his second in command, a head correspondence clerk, a head letter clerk, the chief of the telegraph and telephone systems, and a core of stenographers and filing clerks."<sup>60</sup>

Joseph P. Tumulty, Secretary to the President, was a different kind of pivot. His role projected traditional arrangements as well as an habituated personal relationship. Tumulty's post was indeed in course of transition. John Blum, in his appreciative and informing account of Tumulty's important contribution, points out that "Tumulty was the last man to carry this load alone. Today his duties are divided among almost a dozen men. He served longer and under more trying conditions than had Lamont, Cortelyou, or Loeb, his illustrious predecessors."<sup>61</sup> Blum adds that Tumulty's "capacity for hard work and his solid, often extraordinary achievements, moreover, can be appreciated fully only in the light of his extensive ex-officio activities in Democratic politics and as an adviser on the Administration's domestic and foreign policies."

Wilson had encountered Tumulty, progressive Democrat, in the 1910 New Jersey campaign. He welcomed his company on a speaking tour. As Governor-elect he was receptive when, at the prompting of James Kerney, editor of the Trenton Evening News, a former governor suggested that he make Tumulty his secretary.<sup>62</sup> Kerney himself later paraphrased Wilson's remark about the sense of need that guided the choice: "It was absolutely necessary that I should be associated with some one, if possible, who was more familiar with the intimate course of

<sup>59</sup> See Irwin H. Hoover, Forty-two Years in the White House. (Boston, 1934.)

<sup>60</sup> Blum, op. cit., p. 58. We are indebted to Mr. Blum for much information drawn from some of the participants, from Joseph P. Tumulty's papers, and other sources. Tumulty's own book, op. cit., illuminates the operating procedures only indirectly.

<sup>61</sup> Blum, op. cit., p. 67.

<sup>62</sup> Blum, op. cit., p. 26.

politics in the State than I myself. . . ."<sup>63</sup> As President-elect, Wilson seems never to have considered any one else for Secretary. Then as later he disregarded cavil about Tumulty's religious affiliation. Colonel House asked Tumulty how many letters were coming in hostile to Tumulty for the post of Secretary. He answered that there had been five or six hundred and also indicated that he had given this information (but not all the letters themselves) to the President-elect.<sup>64</sup> Only in 1916 did Wilson's relationship to Tumulty waver. At that time the incipient break seems to have reached the stage of a proffered appointment to the Board of General Appraisers—causing Tumulty surprise and consternation—while Colonel House started to make a canvass for a replacement in the post of Secretary.<sup>65</sup> If there was some lessening of confidence after this break was avoided, the change was a matter of degree into which many factors entered.

The screening of candidates is of the essence of politics. Appointments strike so deeply into administration, however, that, if for no other reason than Tumulty's devolved responsibilities in patronage, one must qualify the generalization that as Secretary he served the political rather than the managerial side of the presidency.

Within the official circle there were compromises to engineer. Josephus Daniels' recollections illustrate a phase of Tumulty's job by telling of his service when it seemed that Bryan might resign from the Cabinet if the provisions of the currency bill went too far against his principles. "It was largely through the good offices of Tumulty," Daniels remembered, "that conferences between Bryan, Glass, Owen, and McAdoo resulted in giving the appointment of all members of the board to the President, eliminating banker selection of part of the members. . . ."<sup>66</sup>

Another phase of Tumulty's job was partly summarized in the remark of Edward Hurley, head of one of the war agencies. "Joseph P. Tumulty," he wrote, "was the weather-vane of the Wilson administration."<sup>67</sup> He gave much time to analyzing opinion in the country. John Blum tells that "every day his staff clipped the leading newspapers and magazines from all over the country, arranged the clippings topically, and pasted them on long sheets of yellow paper. Every evening Tumulty took this 'Yellow Journal' home, studied it carefully, evaluated the importance of every item, and, when appropriate, wrote memoranda based on his findings to Wilson or to a responsible department head."<sup>68</sup>

<sup>63</sup> James Kerney, The Political Education of Woodrow Wilson. (New York, 1926), p. 84.

<sup>64</sup> The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, Vol. 1, p. 99.

<sup>65</sup> Blum, op. cit., pp. 120-22.

<sup>66</sup> Daniels, op. cit., p. 227.

<sup>67</sup> Edward N. Hurley, The Bridge to France. (Philadelphia, 1927), p. 317.

<sup>68</sup> Blum, op. cit., p. 61.

In addition, among other ways, Tumulty was helped in gauging reactions in particular situations by the comments of journalists and the like who in effect often served as political scouts.

The other side was the informing and forming of opinion. Here lay the President's chief and certainly his ultimate weapon. The compression of his style was sometimes a handicap. Tumulty could serve as a coach on communicability. The President is reported to have told Ida M. Tarbell: "When it is especially important that I be understood, I try (the speech) on Tumulty, who has a very extraordinary appreciation of how a thing will 'get over the footlights.' He is the most valuable audience I have."<sup>69</sup>

Such assistance was the more important because of Wilson's embarrassments in dealing with newspapermen. He came before the time of radio and television; that was indeed ironic in view of the importance of direct public appeal in his leadership and the fact that temperamentally—as Ray Stannard Baker said—"he could be more intimate and confidential with five thousand people than with one."<sup>70</sup> Wilson broke ground by establishing the custom of biweekly press conferences. They were attended by a hundred or more reporters.<sup>71</sup> Later, however, these regular conferences were dropped. More and more press relations were left to Tumulty.

George Creel, in charge of wartime public information, was prompted by newspapermen to ask the President to renew the conferences. Wilson flatly refused. He said that he had "prepared for the conferences as carefully as for a Cabinet meeting and discussed questions of the day frankly and fully." He observed that "many men of brilliant ability were in the group, but I soon discovered that the interest of the majority was in the trivial and the personal. In the middle of an exposition of policy I would be asked about the sheep on the White House lawn . . ."<sup>72</sup> In any case he objected to what he called "conjectural journalism." One observer of Wilson's political development—an editor himself and Tumulty's collaborator in New Jersey—ventured the estimate that "for the major portion of his two terms in the White House he was seen less by newspaper people and confided less in them than any President since Cleveland or Harrison."<sup>73</sup>

<sup>69</sup> Blum, op. cit., p. 60.

<sup>70</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 6, p. 265.

<sup>71</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 4, p. 229. "Previous to this time the press had had no formal status at the White House. . . . Wilson established and regularized the custom of meeting all the correspondents twice a week."

<sup>72</sup> George Creel, Rebel At Large. (New York, 1947), p. 233.

<sup>73</sup> Kerney, op. cit., p. 344.

VI

In surveying Wilson's working habits, we note at once his preference for written communications in his conduct of the presidency. This preference had been shown as governor; it deepened as the pressure increased. His stress on policy leadership led him to overcome it in legislative contacts but in administration he followed it. The method of the memorandum applied even to his relations with Tumulty. Tumulty's office was next to the President's in the west wing of the White House; he alone had free access. "He could come and go as he chose, but the President preferred to do business in writing. Tumulty therefore submitted his most significant suggestions in memoranda to which Wilson often appended a simple 'Okeh' or 'No'."<sup>74</sup> Moreover the written word suited Wilson's dealings with House, his volunteer confidential adviser, since House was more often at his apartment in New York or abroad than in Washington.

Creel, a sympathetic observer, saw in such procedure evidence of the President's cool analysis of his physical limitations, the magnitude of his task, and the need for quiet consideration. "Instead of the 'open door'," Creel wrote later, "interviews were confined to those of official importance, and personal approaches increasingly gave way to the submission of memoranda. In the quiet of his study at night, every suggestion received the painstaking attention of the President, but even this larger efficiency failed to soothe wounded vanities."<sup>75</sup>

In 1918, when David Lawrence asked for permission to watch the President through the course of a day in order to write about his executive work, the President replied that "I can't for the life of me think it out in any way that would be striking or effective. . . . The day seldom sounds impressive when summed up, because most of the questions which I have decided come to me in the form of memoranda to which I reply in writing. My interviews and consultations are chiefly with people who need not have taken my time, and lead to nothing except the gratification on the part of those who see me that they have had their say."<sup>76</sup> Of course there was the other side voiced by McAdoo when he wrote retrospectively about Wilson: "He was inclined, because, I think, of an innate and unsuspected shyness, to withhold himself too much from contact with people whom it was important for him to know and whose coöperation was highly desirable in the conduct of public business."<sup>77</sup> As McAdoo saw it, the President "had an incurable distaste

<sup>74</sup> Blum, op. cit., p. 59.

<sup>75</sup> Creel, op. cit., p. 232.

<sup>76</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 8, p. 25.

<sup>77</sup> McAdoo, op. cit., p. 284.

for professional politicians; he did not understand their ways and did not wish to learn."<sup>78</sup> Ray Stannard Baker gives a different turn to this judgment about Wilson, admitting that "he was to learn in the hard school of experience that the best men were not always outside of politics: that training in public life, if the man was true at the core, often fitted him far better for important positions than the inexperienced 'good man'."<sup>79</sup>

Certainly Woodrow Wilson—disciplined, comprehending, and terse—suffered bores sadly. House recorded in his diary that he gave the following advice to T. W. Gregory when the latter was about to become Attorney General. "Never to go into long-winded arguments upon any subject, but to state his position in brief terms and never repeat. That when he and the President agreed upon a matter, never to give him reasons for so agreeing, as the President was too busy to listen to unimportant details. I was sure he would always be able to see the President whenever necessary if he did not burden him with unimportant and unnecessary verbiage."<sup>80</sup>

As a further comment on the President's ways of doing things, House noted in the late autumn of 1914: "The President is efficient in his manner of working. For instance, when we were discussing his message to the people concerning the Belgian Relief funds he said, 'Now let us decide what points are best to cover.' He took a telegraph blank having lines on it, and began to take down in shorthand the different points, he making some suggestions and I making others. There were about five points to be covered, and he asked me to think if that were all. When we concluded there was nothing more, he called his stenographer and dictated the message in full."<sup>81</sup> In passing, one notes the way one of Wilson's daughters described the preparation of some state papers: "first writing the substance on a single sheet of paper, partly in script and partly in shorthand, then again entirely in shorthand, making the final copy himself on his own typewriter on small sheets of thick paper. There were usually a few corrections, made in his fine, neat writing between the lines."<sup>82</sup> House closed his diary comment with the judgment: "He has one of the best ordered minds I have ever come in contact with, although he is always complaining of forgetfulness." The

<sup>78</sup> Ibid., p. 523.

<sup>79</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 4, p. 35.

<sup>80</sup> The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, Vol. 1, p. 142.

<sup>81</sup> Ibid., Vol. 1, p. 124.

<sup>82</sup> Eleanor Wilson McAdoo (in collaboration with Margaret Y. Gaffey), The Woodrow Wilsons. (New York, 1937), p. 246.

latter characteristic is mentioned by Arthur Link: "He had a notoriously bad memory for details. All of his friends testify to this fact."<sup>83</sup>

But on the side of memory and habits of follow-up, Newton D. Baker gave a somewhat different impression in a letter to his biographer. "I took to the President only the things that seemed to me to involve some departure in policy," Baker recalled.<sup>84</sup> "I never troubled him with the details of the department. He had the most orderly mind I have ever known. He sorted things out in the order of their importance. Things never got lost in his mind but lay there until it was time to act." Doubtless here the reliance on written communication helped. Baker went on to say: "Since he wanted things written out I sent him written reports. I would outline something I thought it wise to do. Then, one day, he would speak to me at Cabinet meeting, or send for me, and say: 'has anything happened in that matter?' I realized that once I told him a thing he knew it. I deliberately thought a thing into its most compact form, and when he wanted details he asked for them."

As for the degree of Wilson's interest in detailed facts, it is probable that his inclination never ran that way. Edith Gittings Reid, who knew him when he was at the Johns Hopkins University, recalled his reaction to his work with Professor Herbert B. Adams. "Facts, facts, facts!" exclaimed Wilson. "What do I care about his facts? What I want to know is what he does with them."<sup>85</sup> It should be added, parenthetically, that Adams saw him as a "promising horse" and gave Wilson scope; not only a fellowship but also a part-time lectureship at Johns Hopkins were soon forthcoming.<sup>86</sup>

As President of the United States Wilson did confess his regret that he had so little time for study. He wrote about a certain suggestion on currency reform: "The greatest embarrassment of my political career has been that active duties seem to deprive me absolutely of time for careful investigation. I seem almost obliged to form conclusions from impressions instead of from study, but I intend to go much more thoroughly into this matter before saying anything about it . . ."<sup>87</sup> The limits of "expert" guidance from practical men, however, were illus-

<sup>83</sup> Link, Wilson, The Road to the White House, p. 70.

<sup>84</sup> Frederick Palmer, Newton D. Baker. America at War. (New York, 1931), Vol. 1, p. 371.

<sup>85</sup> Woodrow Wilson. The Caricature, the Myth, and the Man. (London and New York), 1934, p. 37.

<sup>86</sup> The Seminar records of May 8, 1884, when Wilson's thesis was presented, alluded to Congressional Government as a phase of the study of institutions and noted: "Mr. Wilson's work is better than anything in that line that has been done heretofore in the Seminary." William Diamond, op. cit., p. 27.

<sup>87</sup> Reid, op. cit., p. 160.

trated by the fact that the bit of self-analysis just quoted appears in House's published papers close to a letter from House to an editor friend including the comment: "The bankers, sad to relate, know next to nothing about it, and none of them agrees as to what is best."<sup>88</sup>

Throughout his presidency, in practicing a type of leadership that depended peculiarly upon his public papers, Wilson's approach and method were strongly marked by the qualities indicated in an early letter to David Houston. "Please do not expect me to use the matter in my statements at great length or in the form in which you give it," he wrote.<sup>89</sup> "I cannot deal with questions in that way. I want all the facts and interpretations of them I can get. I shall try to digest them—to get my thought permeated with them; and then I shall try to paint a word picture. I do not like to speak for over twenty or thirty minutes."

VII

Wilson's attitudes in building and using the cabinet were aspects of his theory of his office as well as his working habits. Despite what he had written in 1908, the trend of his thought joined with felt necessities to emphasize the political role of the cabinet in party synthesis. Charles Seymour, summarizing the papers that tell of an early meeting of the President-elect with House, states that "before Wilson left, he and House drew up a tentative list for cabinet positions and discussed the best means to satisfy those who, by their work in the campaign, felt that they had earned proper rewards. It was already agreed that Mr. Bryan must be given his choice of positions."<sup>90</sup> House, a little later, thought that the President-elect might be viewing the appointments a bit too casually; the choice of Garrison was perhaps an example. House sounded a warning against loading the cabinet with party irregulars since the President's reputation would "rest entirely upon the big constructive measures he was able to get through Congress; and in order to get them through he had to be on more or less good terms with that body."<sup>91</sup> As a matter of fact, three of the cabinet members were drawn directly from Congress, notably Postmaster General Burleson of Texas. A party long out of power (despite the congressional victories of 1910) was handicapped. McAdoo, who as co-manager of the presidential campaign shared in the selections and who was so long a cabinet associate, remarked later: "The weak point of the Wilson Cabinet, it seemed

<sup>88</sup> The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, Vol. 1, p. 164.

<sup>89</sup> Houston, op. cit., Vol. 1, p. 20.

<sup>90</sup> The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, Vol. 1, p. 88.

<sup>91</sup> Ibid., Vol. 1, p. 103.

to me, was not in the essential qualities of ability, knowledge, and initiative, but in the matter of political prestige."<sup>82</sup>

We are concerned here with the cabinet as council, not with the President's relations to the cabinet members individually in carrying out his theory of administration through a departmental system. Since no minutes were taken, our knowledge of the scope and method of cabinet consultation rests on fragmentary memoir material including fugitive diary entries and letters. Jonathan Daniels has said of his father's diary jottings at the time: "He recorded the punch lines of Wilson's jokes which the President seemed sometimes to use not to point his discussions with the Cabinet, but as barriers against discussion."<sup>83</sup> Certain of the participants did attempt to put down some descriptions of standard cabinet procedure as they remembered it. Josephus Daniels, for example, summed up the President's methods as follows: "His plan from the first was to present some matter or matters about which he desired what he was fond of calling 'common counsel' and after he had received the reaction of Cabinet members, his practice was to call on each member to present any question that concerned departmental policies, for debate and exchange of views."<sup>84</sup> Daniels also mentioned Wilson's practice of alternation: "At one Cabinet meeting he would begin with the Secretary of State, and at the next the Secretary of Labor would be called upon first." As for the nature of the decisions in Cabinet, Daniels stated broadly: "He never took a vote, pursuing a course, as he often said, more like a Quaker meeting, in which after full discussion the President would say, 'It seems to me the sense of the meeting is so and so,' and the policy thus ascertained would be the program of the administration. Usually he found himself in harmony with a majority. He wished in all important decisions to know the views of his associates."

This somewhat idealized statement raises questions about the extent of Wilson's departures from the norm.<sup>85</sup> It is enough to say that, as throughout our history, group consultation in the cabinet was not consistent. But one must discount the complaints like those of Franklin K.

<sup>82</sup> McAdoo, op. cit., p. 192.

<sup>83</sup> The End of Innocence. (Philadelphia and New York), 1954, p. 18.

<sup>84</sup> Josephus Daniels, op. cit., Vol. 1, p. 137. On the same point, William C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, wrote: "If the President had matters of importance, he would state them and discussion followed. This concluded, he would ask each Secretary in order if there was business he desired to place before the Cabinet." With Congress and Cabinet. (Garden City, 1924), p. 67.

<sup>85</sup> In mid-1913 House is said to have relayed to the President the indignation of the Cabinet members because meetings had been cut to one a week; in December the bi-weekly meetings were resumed. Arthur D. Howden Smith, Mr. House of Texas. (New York, 1940), p. 94.

Lane in his letters about the very intermittent cabinet discussion of the war while it was going on, as when he wrote on March 1, 1918, "Yesterday, at Cabinet meeting, we had the first real talk on the war in weeks, yes, in months!" and then spluttered on March 12, "Nothing talked of at Cabinet that would interest a nation, a family, or a child."<sup>96</sup> It should be remembered that already much of the interchange with the President was taking place in his weekly meetings with the heads of the emergency agencies and the Secretaries of War and Navy—the "war cabinet" as it was popularly called. Besides, allowance must be made for Lane's probably irked sense of being a bit out of things, reflected in his comment in March to Walter Hines Page: "My office is a sort of place of last resort for those who are discouraged elsewhere, for Washington is no longer a city of set routine and fixed habit."<sup>97</sup> Lane himself, back in 1913, had apparently been the cause of a rebuke in the Cabinet about leakage of information. Houston brought up the matter and (as McAdoo wrote the story later) "Upon hearing Houston's remark, the President took advantage of the opportunity to repeat, quite pointedly, what he had said at the first Cabinet meeting about the confidential nature of our discussions. He said that he wanted to advise with the Cabinet freely and fully, but that he could not do so unless the rule of confidence was kept inviolate."<sup>98</sup> During the war it was perhaps Lane whom the President had in mind when he told George Creel that (as Creel phrased it): "... he dines out every night and is the life of the party. As a result, his mind has been given over to anecdotes and chitchat, and it takes him an hour to come to the matter in hand."<sup>99</sup>

VIII

Wilson the administrator is implicit in much that has been quoted. It remains to look more particularly for the assumptions on which he acted and in their light to note the practice of those years.

One finds in Wilson's writings little direct generalization about the administrative side of government after he published the prescient essay on "The Study of Administration," in 1887 while he was at his first full-time teaching post.<sup>100</sup> Emblematically, Saul Padover's little <sup>96</sup> The Letters of Franklin K. Lane. Edited by A. W. Lane and L. H. Wall. (Boston, 1922), pp. 266, 267. Later Lane commented on November 1, 1918: "At last week's Cabinet we talked of Austria—again we talked like a Cabinet." Ibid., p. 296. Houston in his reminiscences said: "Generally speaking, after we entered the war, there were few new matters of broad policy which had to be discussed in Cabinet meeting until the fall of 1918." Op. cit., Vol. 1, p. 301.

<sup>97</sup> The Letters of Franklin K. Lane, p. 274.

<sup>98</sup> McAdoo, op. cit., p. 194.

<sup>99</sup> Creel, op. cit., p. 237.

<sup>100</sup> Political Science Quarterly, June 1887, Vol. 2, pp. 197-222. The text is given in anthology of Wilson's sayings, which on most matters draws passages from many stages of Wilson's life, quotes only from the 1887 essay under the heading "administration."<sup>101</sup>

Wilson in 1887 identified in executive power what was to be the generally accepted focal point of administrative study, agitation, and progress in the three decades that followed. He deplored the fact that the English race had long and successfully "studied the art of curbing executive power to the constant neglect of the art of perfecting executive methods." He alluded to the growing complexity of the tasks of government. He declared that "large powers and unhampered discretion seem to me the indispensable conditions of responsibility." He pointed out that "administration in the United States must be at all points sensitive to public opinion" and public opinion must be the "authoritative critic." The methods of control, however, must learn to separate the essentials of liberty from its incidents. "The ideal for us," he wrote, "is a civil service cultured and self-sufficient enough to act with sense and vigor, and yet so intimately connected with the popular thought, by means of elections and constant public counsel, as to find arbitrariness or class spirit quite out of the question." Since in all governments the legitimate ends of administration are the same, we should not be frightened at looking into foreign systems for suggestions.

In these affirmations of 1887, the core idea of executive integration was present but the structural and procedural corollaries were not worked out. The essay was a contribution to perspective, as well as exhortation, in declaring that "the science of administration is the latest fruit of that study of the science of politics which was begun twenty-two hundred years ago." Administration, Wilson wrote, is "the executive, the operative, the most visible side of government, and is of course as old as government itself." But the science of administration "is a birth of our century, almost of our own generation." Such a science, he declared, is needed "to rescue executive methods from the confusion and costliness of empirical experiment and to set them upon foundations laid deep in stable principle." Civil service reform should be viewed "as but a prelude to a fuller administrative reform."

Wilson's preoccupation was always with political leadership. Increasingly he emphasized the role of the elective chief executive in such Baker and Dodd, The Public Papers . . . College and State, Vol. 1, pp. 130-158. The essay was reprinted in the Political Science Quarterly, Dec. 1941, Vol. 56, pp. 481-506, along with a note by Lindsay Rogers, pp. 507-14. Dwight Waldo has noted: "This essay has received much attention in recent years because much of it seems so modern it could have been written yesterday. It seems not to have exerted much influence, even attracted much attention, for many years." The Administrative State. (New York, 1948), p. 26 n.

<sup>101</sup> Wilson's Ideals. Edited by Saul K. Padover. Washington: American Council on Public Affairs, pp. 30-38.

leadership. This emphasis helps to explain why he did not elaborate the postulates and prescriptions of a science of administration. But his assumptions about political leadership dictated his working theory of executive organization and devolution. It was the simple and cogent theory of reliance upon the heads of departments.

(1) Wilson's application of the theory was fairly consistent. It was the more thorough because of the President's absorption in state papers and foreign policy. In carrying out his theory of devolution Wilson consciously avoided discussing the affairs of other agencies when dealing with a single department head. Early in the first administration House described and endorsed this restraint. "I told Page," he wrote, "the President consulted with the individual members of his Cabinet about their departments, but he did not consult with them on matters affecting their colleagues, and I thought he was right."<sup>102</sup> House added: "If he did this, he would soon have every Cabinet officer meddling with the affairs of the others, and there would be general dissatisfaction." Later, reminiscing about the President's wartime practice, Hurley wrote that, although "I found him ready and willing to receive suggestions," the President "was very much opposed to having one member of the Cabinet interfere with the work which came under the head of another; and to receiving suggestions as to how another man's department should be conducted."<sup>103</sup> Hurley, too, thought the President was right, noting also that an interchange was possible in the so-called "war cabinet." One sees that the net effect of such scruples helped agency morale. Its incidental effect probably increased the compartmentalization of the system.

Houston, with opportunity to observe from two cabinet posts, commented on the degree to which the President relied upon his subordinates in other fields than foreign affairs. He qualified his praise of Wilson's practice by suggesting that devolution does not mean inattention. Houston phrased his estimate as follows: "It is good administration for a chief to select the right sort of subordinates and then to trust them, but he must and will, if he possesses administrative ability of the highest order, be alert to know their problems; to be aware of the extent to which they handle them properly and to get rid of them if they do not do so. Because of this defect, Mr. Wilson was not an administrator of the first rank, but, as an administrator, I should say that he was superior to Lincoln."<sup>104</sup>

(2) Wilson's emphasis upon the departmental system inclined him against the expansion of presidential staff. This negative attitude can be traced in various directions. For example, the Bureau of Efficiency, though created by statute in 1916 as an independent agency separate from the Civil Service Commission, was never fully drawn into the executive orbit; its informal senatorial link was never broken. Another example was the fact, as we shall note in tracing budgetary reform, that the stress was for some time on congressional committee reorganization, not executive staffing.

<sup>102</sup> The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, Vol. 1, p. 128.

<sup>103</sup> Edward N. Hurley, op. cit., p. 177.

<sup>104</sup> Houston, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 169.

It is true that in the later stage of the war an outstanding bit of staff work was provided by the Central Bureau of Planning and Statistics. It was organized early in June 1918 in response to the President's request in a letter to Bernard Baruch for the creation of an organization that would provide "a conspectus of all the present war activities and upon that base a periodical checking up of the actual operations and results." This unit operated as an agency directly under the President though reporting through Bernard Baruch, Chairman of the War Industries Board. It was headed by Edwin F. Gay, who also headed and coordinated the planning and statistical divisions of the War Industries Board, the Shipping Board, and the War Trade Board. It included a central statistical clearing house. Altogether, from its apex in the presidency outward, this complex of reporting and control services involved the work of about a thousand employees.<sup>105</sup>

Summarizing on the point of executive staff, we may say that Wilson's avowed wish to proceed through departmental heads, who in their fields would also be the President's chief advisers, showed a sound instinct against short-circuiting at the top. Only in foreign affairs where several special and on the whole regrettable conditions entered did such short-circuiting occur through Colonel House. To some extent, no doubt, the relative disregard of the State Department reflected Wilson's sense of foreign policy as peculiarly the President's personal responsibility. Regardless of results, I think, the relationship to House stands as a dubious pattern for Presidents.

We are not pronouncing against the institutional developments in the Executive Office of the President that have taken place since Wilson's time. Some needs that were felt then and partly met presaged later forms of clearance under the President. For instance, on the question of haphazard speaking by the heads of departments, House reported late in 1913: "The President was pleased when I told him I had spoken to a sufficient number of the Cabinet to ensure the adoption of my suggestion that no speeches should be made in the future without his consent, and only when he thought the occasion demanded it."<sup>106</sup>

<sup>105</sup> The National Archives, Handbook of Federal World War Agencies and Their Records, 1917-1921 (1942), pp. 64-65.

<sup>106</sup> The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, Vol. 1, p. 138.

(3) The President's belief in action through a departmental system did not prevent the increase of permanent independent commissions. The administrative issue about departures from hierarchy does not seem to have been raised and decided in broad theoretical terms. Special circumstances were in play in connection with each of the entities created in a period of innovative zest.

In the case of the Federal Reserve Board it should be noted that the final arrangement was integrative in the double sense that the board was to be wholly public and that it was to contain two ex officio members. Furthermore there is evidence that Wilson on at least one occasion was prepared to remove members of the Board if it went ahead with its rumored intention in 1915 to abolish four of the reserve banks. Carter Glass, writing twelve years later, declared: "There can be no possible doubt that the Board would have been summarily reorganized by the President under his power of removal had it taken next day the action which was contemplated." The President, Glass said, looked to the law and "wholly concurred in the view that such action by the Board would constitute an intolerable usurpation of power, without either textual or implied legal sanction."<sup>107</sup> Glass added that he knew of no other time when Wilson approached the point of executive intervention with the affairs of the Federal Reserve Board. On the contrary, members of the Board had complained to him of the President's indifference to the Board. Glass recalled that when he mentioned this complaint to the President, Wilson said that he "wanted the Board to feel perfectly free to pursue its course within the law without a particle of constraint or restraint from the Executive."<sup>108</sup> The President added: "The very moment that I should attempt to establish close relations with the Board, that moment I would be accused of trying to bring political pressure to bear."

(4) When it came to war organization, it was deemed impossible to stay within the regular departmental frame. The President's inclinations ran toward simplicity: "We are in danger of creating too much machinery,"<sup>109</sup> he wrote in April 1917. Nevertheless he was ready to see a positive virtue in separating the temporary controls. In these terms the public statement in May when the food control law was passed extolled the intention "to draw a sharp line of distinction between the normal activities of the Government represented in the Department of Agriculture in reference to food production, conservation, and marketing on the one hand and the emergency activities necessitated by the war in reference to the regulation of food distribution and consumption on the other."<sup>110</sup>

<sup>107</sup> Glass, op. cit., pp. 270-71. Robert E. Cushman, The Independent Regulatory Commissions, (New York, 1941), p. 681, mentions the instance cited by Glass but does not offer other support for the following generalization: "President Wilson made plain his attitude towards the independent commissions on more than one occasion. . . . There is no doubt that Wilson with his 'prime minister' theory of the nature of the Presidential office felt that he was entitled to impress his policies on the independent commissions and to expect their conformity to those policies."

<sup>108</sup> Glass, op. cit., p. 272. Houston in his recollections made the general observation: "He respected the independence of such bodies as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Civil Service, the Federal Trade, and the Tariff Commissions." Op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 189.

<sup>109</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 7, p. 14.

Meanwhile a matrix was at hand in the Council of National Defence and its Advisory Commission. The President himself had helped by a modest request in his message of December 1915 to give an impetus to the statutory creation of the Council in the following year, when pressure came also from two voluntary movements to mobilize the country's resources. After war was declared Congress placed one hundred million dollars at the President's disposal for national security and defence. In 1918, when asking for another flexible emergency fund of half the size, the President told the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee: "I have used considerable sums for the maintenance of the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, and the War Trade Board, and for the maintenance of the proper agencies for the allocation of labor. . . ."<sup>111</sup> He pointed out that as soon as these agencies had been "thoroughly organized," their support had been shifted to regular appropriations.

The final step in the maturing of the war machinery was the consolidation of Bernard Baruch's position as chairman of the reconstituted War Industries Board—a designation which in the face of some opposition on the ground that Baruch was a speculator, not production expert, showed the President's instinct for chancy action under stress.<sup>112</sup> In a different setting and in another way he had sounded this note in his secret talk to officers of the fleet on August 11, 1917. "Please leave out of your vocabulary altogether the word 'prudent'," he said. He pointed out that "nobody ever before conducted a war like this and therefore nobody can pretend to be a professional in a war like this."<sup>113</sup>

(5) Wilson fought to keep control of the war organization. The hazards he saw were of two kinds: a congressional committee on the conduct of the War and statutory action to inject a small, plenary war cabinet.

<sup>110</sup> Baker and Dodd, The Public Papers . . . War and Peace, Vol. 1, p. 42.

<sup>111</sup> Ibid. p. 213.

<sup>112</sup> Blum, op. cit., p. 142. Carter Field, Bernard Baruch, Park Bench Statesman. (New York, 1944). See also Bernard M. Baruch, American Industry in the War. A Report of the War Industries Board. (New York, 1941).

<sup>113</sup> Baker and Dodd, The Public Papers . . . War and Peace, Vol. 1, pp. 82-88.

As to the first, his objections were set forth in letters to Senator Owen in August and to Senator Simmons in September 1917. To the latter he wrote that "an additional authority put alongside of me in this already tremendous task of directing the administrative activities of the Government is just the thing which would create confusion and make any task twice as complex as it is."<sup>114</sup> And in May of the following year when it was proposed to authorize the Senate Military Affairs Committee to be in effect a committee on the conduct of the war, the President wrote that "I deem it my duty to say that I would regard the passage of this resolution as a direct vote of want of confidence in the administration."<sup>115</sup> He declared roundly: "Such activities on the part of a particular committee of the Senate as this resolution would look forward to would constitute nothing less than an attempt to take over the conduct of the war, or at the least so superintend and direct and participate in the executive conduct of it as to interfere in the most serious way with the action of the constituted executive."

The second attack, led by Senator Chamberlain, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, took the form of a bill introduced early in 1918 to create a war cabinet of "three distinguished citizens of demonstrated executive ability," to be appointed by the President and Senate and to be supervised only by the President and to be in full control of the conduct of the war.<sup>116</sup> About this same time the President wrote to House: "It is the Junkertum trying to creep in under cover of the patriotic feeling of the moment. They will not get in. They have now no examples of happy or successful coalition to point to. The nominal coalition in England is a Tory Cabinet such as they are eager to get a foothold for here."<sup>117</sup> And from another angle of objection, the President wrote to the head of the United States Chamber of Commerce: "The faith that some people put in machinery is child-like and touching, but the machinery does not do the task; particularly is it impossible to do it if new and inexperienced elements are introduced."<sup>118</sup>

(6) The successful countering of these measures secured the passage in May of the administration-sponsored Overman Act. It authorized the President "to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act. . . ."

<sup>114</sup> Baker, op. cit., p. 251.

<sup>115</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 8, p. 143.

<sup>116</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 7, p. 485.

<sup>117</sup> Josephus Daniels, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 285.

<sup>118</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 7, p. 503.

While the bill was awaiting floor consideration after a favorable report, the President wrote to Senator Overman. "Senator after Senator has appealed to me most earnestly to 'cut the red tape.' I am asking for the scissors."<sup>119</sup> The act by its terms was geared to war needs and the war period. The leeway it allowed was used by the President in that spirit. Nevertheless as a technique the precedent had general bearing.

Apart from this limited emergency approach to executive rearrangement, the Wilson administration did not push for any general administrative reorganization. To be sure, the President in his regular message of 1914 spoke of the piecemeal growth that had been characteristic of the government and said: "I think it is generally agreed that there should be a systematic reorganization and reassembling of its parts." But it was consonant with Wilson's policies that he should add the warning: "the people of the United States do not wish to curtail the activities of this Government; they wish, rather, to enlarge them." Such an appeal, though it might be in terms of truest efficiency, was not likely to seem exigent. Finally, under interregnum conditions of 1920, a measure for a joint congressional body on administrative reorganization went into effect without the President's signature.

(7) As for personnel, Wilson took for granted the ideals of career service. He came to the Presidency aware of the burdens of the appointing process. "The mere task of making appointments to office, which the Constitution imposes upon the President," he wrote in 1908, "has come near to breaking some of our Presidents down, because it is a never-ending task in a civil service not yet put upon a professional footing, confused with short terms of office, always forming and dissolving."<sup>120</sup> He sought at the outset to refuse himself to see applicants; the responsibility must be devolved. But, as Ray Stannard Baker summed it up, "First and last the business of appointments was Wilson's greatest burden. It was often near to overwhelming him."<sup>121</sup>

As a politician he must compromise. Burleson, according to Ray Stannard Baker's account, asked the President to clear certain postmaster appointments. Wilson asked to see the entire list. Burleson sent over the documents relating to two score of pending appointments—letters, recommendations, petitions, protests. Burleson, we are told, contended that the President "would not need to yield his position. All that he needed to do was to adopt a policy of harmony and observe the laws of human nature." The argument went on for two hours. The President kept the papers another week. When the conference was resumed he said he would not appoint the man recommended by a certain congressman. Burleson explained the facts and, in Baker's words, "all of the complicated elements of politics in a democracy were bound up in this one trivial appointment." The President said: "I will appoint him."<sup>122</sup> This was not the end but it was a new marker on the difficult and shadowy border zone where the administrator, in the name of political leadership, became the practical politician.

<sup>119</sup> Ibid., Vol. 8, p. 41.

<sup>120</sup> Constitutional Government in the United States, p. 79.

<sup>121</sup> Baker, op. cit., Vol. 4, p. 53.

(8) It remains to consider budgetary reform in the Wilson administration. In January 1913 the President-elect wrote rather loosely to Senator Tillman. "Ever since I was a youngster I have been deeply interested in our methods of financial administration. Ever since then I have insisted upon the absolute necessity of a carefully considered and wisely planned budget, and one of the objects I shall have most in mind when I get to Washington will be conferences with my legislative colleagues there with a view to bringing some budget system into existence."<sup>123</sup>

But what kind? The President was seeking to collaborate through party with a Congress that had disregarded, even rebuffed, President Taft's attempt to submit a budget. Congressional leaders, if they acted at all even under the changed political situation, were likely to stress a strengthened reassemblage of the scattered committee jurisdiction over appropriation bills. In December 1914 the President's second annual message indicated that the time was at hand for more attention to administrative reform. "Our program of legislation with regard to the regulation of business is now virtually complete,"<sup>124</sup> he said, and he then mentioned "two topics, much discussed out of doors." One was government expenditures, not so much in keeping them down as in making sure that the money went for approved objects and "is being applied with good business sense and management." These were "large and general standards," as the President said; they were not a plan.

In 1915 a committee of the Democratic caucus—still concentrating upon control at the legislative end—concluded that action in that Congress would be impracticable. Significantly, the Democratic Platform of 1916 confined its plank on economy to the machinery in Congress. It favored a return by the House of Representatives to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee, "as a practicable step toward a budget system." The President's message in December 1917 did not go beyond this feature.

In December 1919 the President's regular message expressed the hope that "Congress will bring to a conclusion at this session legislation looking to the establishment of a budget system." It declared that "the burden of preparing the budget must, in the nature of the case, if the work is to be properly done and responsibility concentrated instead of divided, rest upon the executive." The message also approved a single committee in each House. It urged as not less important a type of audit that would go beyond questions of mere legality and consider whether the money had been spent wisely, economically, and effectively. "The auditors," said the message, "shall be highly trained officials with permanent tenure in the Treasury Department, free of obligation to or motives of consideration for this or any subsequent administration," reporting their findings to Congress and to the Secretary of the Treasury. Naturally, much of the debate in these years turned on the question of audit as a legislative prerogative.

<sup>122</sup> Ibid., p. 47.

<sup>123</sup> Ibid., p. 212.

<sup>124</sup> Baker and Dodd, The Public Papers . . . The New Democracy, Vol. 1, pp. 222-23.

Meanwhile consideration in Congress had quickened. On February 28, 1919, before the end of the Democratically controlled Congress, the House approved a provision for a joint commission on financial methods.<sup>125</sup> It was adopted as an amendment to a deficiency bill that did not pass the Senate. The upper chamber had been considering a joint resolution for a commission to report a budget plan. This measure passed on February 28, 1919<sup>126</sup> but was not acted on in the House. It is interesting that some proponents were still saying that Cabinet members should defend the budget before Congress.<sup>127</sup> Later in 1919 a budget bill was worked out by select committees in both chambers. It was vetoed by the President on Houston's recommendation because the provision permitting the removal of the Comptroller General only by concurrent resolution was deemed to be an unconstitutional invasion of executive power. The attempt to pass the bill over the veto failed.<sup>128</sup>

Thus Woodrow Wilson lost the chance to claim as an achievement of his presidency the statute that laid the basis for the modern Executive Office of the President.

Never again could the presidency shrink enough to fit a lesser man. Only by degrees would the institutional elements of the office grow to fit its tasks. Amid the machinery, Woodrow Wilson's record remains a reminder of what is inalienably personal and the stature needed in expressing the purpose of a people.

<sup>125</sup> 65th Congress, Third Session, H.R.16187. Congressional Record, Vol. 57, p. 4623.

<sup>126</sup> 65th Congress, S. J. Res. 121, Congressional Record. Vol. 57, p. 4532.

<sup>127</sup> See F. A. Cleveland and Arthur E. Buck, The Budget and Responsible Government. (New York, 1920), pp. 361, 375.

<sup>128</sup> Houston, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 85. 66th Congress, 2nd sess., H. Doc. 805; Congressional Record, Vol. 59, p. 8613, June 4, 1920.

CIVILIAN CONTROL AND THE CONSTITUTION

SAMUEL P. HUNTINGTON

Harvard University

"Civilian control of the military is a basic principle of the American Constitution"; so runs the commonplace. It is the thesis of this article that the cliché could hardly be more inaccurate, for actually the American Constitution in the twentieth century obstructs the achievement of civilian control. It is well known that civil supremacy was a major concern of the Framers. They provided for it in the only form in which they knew it. But civilian control in the eighteenth century is very different from civilian control in the twentieth century: the Constitution which was expertly designed to provide for it then, for this very reason, frustrates it now. In presenting this thesis, it is necessary: (1) to show how the meaning of civilian control has changed over the intervening years; (2) to describe the Framers' concept and show how it was embodied in the Constitution; and (3) to demonstrate how the provisions which they thought would guarantee it impair its effectiveness today.

I. CIVILIAN CONTROL IN THE EIGHTEENTH AND TWENTIETH CENTURIES

The late eighteenth century knew two general types of military force.<sup>1</sup> The standing army was an institution of the European monarchy. Enlisted men were recruited for long periods of service from the worst elements of society through a mixture of bribery and coercion. Officers, on the other hand, were drawn from the aristocratic classes. On the continent, birth and social status determined eligibility for commissions. In England the purchase system prevailed: military commissions were only open to those who had sizeable independent means. A sharp line thus divided the officers from the enlisted men. The latter were an outcaste group with few ties to civil society; the officers were drawn from the same groups which furnished the social and political leadership of the country. The standing army was essentially an aristocratic institution, and the eighteenth century could not conceive of it otherwise.

The alternative to the standing army was the citizen militia. England had a long militia tradition, but it had also been a long time since the English county militia had ever resembled an effective military force. In America, on the other hand, the militia units of the various colonies played a not unimportant role in maintaining the security of the colonies and protecting the settlements against Indian attacks. The militia tradition, moreover, received renewed vigor in the "minute man" companies of the Revolution. Unlike the standing army, the militia was essentially a democratic institution, with officers and enlisted men drawn from the common body of citizens. Indeed, in many militia units the officers were elected. Neither officers nor enlisted men were divorced from society; their military duties were simply one aspect of their role as free men in a free society.

<sup>1</sup> This discussion is purely in terms of land forces because it was these which gave rise to the issues of civilian control. What is said here about the eighteenth century standing army, however, could also apply, with slight modification, to the eighteenth century navy.

Both systems provided for civilian control, and through essentially the same method, that is, by insuring that the military leadership of the armies reflected the same interests, values, and outlook as the political leadership of society. The organization of the armed forces depended upon the political constitution of society: there were no universal principles of military organization good for all societies. In an aristocratic society, the armed forces were aristocratically organized: the lower classes were excluded from officership. In a democratic society, the armed forces were democratically organized: commissions were open to all and officers were chosen by election from the ranks or by appointment by democratically elected legislatures. Throughout the struggles in Europe at the end of the eighteenth century between the Old Regime and the bourgeois liberal elements, the supporters of the former strove to preserve the existing standing armies while the latter advocated some form of national militia or Landwehr. No clear distinction existed between what was political and what was military. Military and political leadership merged, sharing a common origin and outlook. In one sense, civil-military relations did not exist because military institutions were not yet differentiated from the other institutions of the state and society. Group conflicts in the political arena were paralleled by conflicts among the representatives of the same groups in the military arena. Civilian control in this sense may be described as subjective.<sup>2</sup>

In the nineteenth century subjective civilian control became obsolete. The mass armies of the French revolutionary and American civil wars, the growth of population, the development of technology, the beginnings of industrialism, and the rise of urbanism—all contributed to increased functional specialization and division of labor. Armies and navies became complex organisms embodying hundreds of different specialties. Thereby the need for still another specialist arose: the expert in coordinating and directing all these diverse parts to their assigned goal. No longer was it generally possible to master this skill while still remaining competent in other fields. No longer could the European amateur aristocrat and the American Jacksonian citizen soldier direct armies as a part-time pastime. Military science and military leadership emerged as a distinct area of human knowledge and endeavor, to be mastered only by sustained and concentrated effort. Officership became an exclusive role, defined by skill rather than by social status or popularity. In short, officership was professionalized. The professional skill of the officer became, in Harold Lasswell's phrase, "the management of violence," and his professional responsibility became the military security of his client, society.

This change forced nation after nation to alter the character of its officer

<sup>2</sup> On the differences between subjective and objective civilian control, see this author's "Civilian Control of the Military: A Theoretical Statement," in Heinz Eulau, Samuel J. Eldersveld, and Morris Janowitz (eds.), Political Behavior: A Reader in Theory and Method (Glencoe, 1956), pp. 379-85.

corps. Entrance was opened to all social classes on the basis of merit and education. Promotion was based upon professional qualification measured by experience and ability. Unskilled outsiders were gradually excluded from positions of military command. Educational institutions such as Sandhurst and West Point for the preliminary training of officers were established in the first part of the century. The proliferation of advanced military schools, staff and war colleges followed. Military staffs developed to apply professional knowledge to the direction of military operations. The officer corps thus became an autonomous professional body with its own distinctive skills, standards, organization, esprit, and sense of professional responsibility to the state which it served. Military institutions no longer reflected the political principles dominant in society. Instead, they reflected occupational imperatives springing from the nature of the military function.<sup>3</sup>

The same change drastically altered the nature of civilian control. Actually, by differentiating the role of the officer from other social roles, it created the modern problem of civil-military relations. The soldier becomes the professional military adviser to the political leaders. In acquiring a distinct area of professional competence, however, he also acquires an incompetence in areas outside that field. Civilian control thus depends upon the extent to which the military leaders adhere to their roles as professional advisers. Civilian control is undermined if they stray outside the military sphere or if the civilians make it impossible for them to discharge their professional responsibilities. The professional military officer obeys the state not because he shares the outlook and values of its leadership, but simply because it is his professional responsibility to obey. This objective civilian control is the form required by the conditions of modern western society. It is directly opposed to the subjective control prevalent in the eighteenth century. Subjective control achieved its end by civilianizing the military, making them the mirror of the state. Objective control achieves its end by militarizing the military, making them the tool of the state. Subjective control presupposed military participation in politics; objective control requires military abstention from politics. Most of the countries of Europe, North America, and the British Commonwealth have achieved some degree of objective control; subjective control still prevails in much of Latin America, the Middle East, and Southeast Asia. Subjective control is furthered by constitutional forms and governmental institutions which mix political and military responsibilities and which disperse control over military affairs among a number of governmental agencies. Objective control is furthered by forms and institutions which clearly delimit political and military responsibilities and which place control over military affairs in a single recognized legitimate authority.

<sup>3</sup> For fuller treatment of the professional character of modern officership, see chaps. 1 and 2 of this author's forthcoming volume, The Soldier and the State: The Theory and Politics of Civil-Military Relations, to be published early in 1957 by the Harvard University Press.

II. THE FRAMERS AND CIVILIAN CONTROL

For the purposes of objective civilian control the American Constitution was drafted at just the wrong time in history. Twenty-five years or more later, its clauses about military affairs might well have been written very differently. For with all their political wisdom and insight the Framers, with a few exceptions, did not foresee the emergence of military professionalism and objective civilian control. Their ideas on military officership, military forces, and governmental organization with respect to military affairs all reflected a subjective theory of civilian control.

Military Officership. The Constitution does not envisage a separate class of persons exclusively devoted to military leadership. "I am not acquainted with the military profession," George Mason proclaimed at the Virginia ratifying convention, and except for Hamilton, Pinckney, and a few others he spoke for all the Framers. Military officership was the attribute of any man of affairs. Many members of the Federal Convention had held military rank during the Revolution; Washington was only the most obvious of the soldier-statesmen. They combined in their own persons military and political talents much as the samurai founders of modern Japan also combined them a hundred years later. Echoing Blackstone, Washington believed that when he "assumed the soldier" he "did not lay aside the citizen. . . ." And Jefferson similarly condemned the distinction "between the civil and military, which it is for the happiness of both to obliterate."<sup>4</sup>

These views were clearly revealed in the ineligibility and incompatibility clauses of Article I, Section 6:

No Senator or Representatives shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any Office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

The Convention almost unanimously supported the second clause of this paragraph making legislative office incompatible with judicial or executive (including military) office. This helped to enforce the separation of powers. It reflected the necessity of keeping the legislature distinct from the executive rather than the desirability of keeping the political distinct from the military. Attention at the Convention centered on the first clause of the paragraph. As reported from the Committee of Detail, this clause proposed to make members of the legislature ineligible for appointment to any national office during the time for which they were elected. Opinions on the desirability of permitting legislators to assume civil office varied and were finally resolved by compromise. There was, however, a universal belief that Senators and Representatives should be eligible for appointment to a military office. "Exclude the officers of the army & navy," said Gouverneur Morris, "and you form a band having a different interest from & opposed to the civil power: you stimulate them to despise & reproach those 'talking Lords who dare not face the foe.' " What would occur, he inquired, in the case of a war, and the Citizen the most capable of conducting it, happening to be a member of the Legislature. What might have been the consequence of such a regulation at the commencement, or even in the Course of the late contest for our liberties.

<sup>4</sup> See P. F. Boller, Jr., "Washington and Civilian Supremacy," Southwest Review, Vol. 39, pp. 10-12 (Winter, 1954); The Writings of Thomas Jefferson (Washington, Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association ed., 20 vols., 1905), IV, 218; William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England (Oxford, 3rd ed., 4 vols., 1768), I, 407, 413-14.

Others such as John Randolph who favored the general ineligibility of legislators for executive office also recognized that military talent might well exist in Congress; they supported an exception with respect to military office. Consequently, the final draft applied incompatibility to both civil and military office but the eligibility limitations only to civil office. Subsequently in the Virginia convention Madison defended the eligibility provisions concerning civil office by citing the absence of any such restrictions upon appointment to military office. His argument, together with the lack of any opposition to legislative eligibility to military office in the ratification debates, indicates how widespread was the acceptance of this Cincinnatus theory of military leadership.<sup>5</sup>

Military Forces. The Framers' concept of nonprofessional officership could have been embodied in either a standing army or a citizen militia. The distance of the United States from Europe, however, made a permanent military force seem unnecessary except for small frontier garrisons to deal with the Indians. Consequently the Framers generally agreed that a citizen militia was the only form of military force suitable for the new republic. It embodied the democratic principle that defense of the nation was the responsibility of every citizen. The distinction between officers and enlisted men was minimized and did not correspond to any sharp social cleavage.

Preference for the militia was almost universal throughout the states. "There was not a member in the federal Convention," John Randolph remarked with only slight exaggeration, "who did not feel indignation" at the prospect of a standing army. The ratifying conventions were even more strongly opposed to regular military forces. Nonetheless, they approved a Constitution which, while barring standing armies to the states, gave the national government unlimited power to maintain a military force, the only restriction being that no appropriations for this purpose could be made for more than two years. The reasons for this apparent anomaly were twofold. First, it was generally recognized that the national government would have to maintain some sort of permanent force along the frontier. Secondly, there was always the possibility that a standing army might be necessary in an emergency. But the hope and expectation were that this emergency would never occur and that the power would never be utilized. Few provisions in the Constitution were agreed to with more reluctance; some delegates most vehemently against standing forces refused to sign the Constitution. Criticism of this unrestricted congressional power was widespread in the state conventions. A number of states proposed requiring an extraordinary majority in Congress for the maintenance of such a force or adding amendments declaring the militia to be "the natural defence of a free state" and standing armies in peace "dangerous to liberty."<sup>6</sup>

<sup>5</sup> See Max Farrand (ed.), The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 (New Haven, 4 vols., 1911-1937), I, 380, II, 287-90; Jonathan Elliott (ed.), The Debates in the Several Conventions (Washington, 4 vols., 1836,) III, 372-73. For the few instances in which the clause has been invoked in practice, see Hind's Precedents of the House of Representatives (Washington, 1907), chap. XVI, and Cannon's Precedents (Washington, 1935), chap. 16.

The preference for the militia had two important results for future civilian control. First, it assigned a major place in the American military scheme to a force which could never be professionally officered or subjected to effective control. At the time, of course, professional officers were just as rare in standing armies as they were in citizen militias. The former, however, because they were composed of full-time soliders, could eventually evolve into a disciplined body of professionals. This was impossible in a part-time militia force. Secondly, the expectation that the militia would be the main reliance for defense made the Framers relatively unconcerned with devising institutional techniques to control military forces in being. In part, this was the result of the feeling that such devices were doomed to fail; to a larger extent, it reflected the view that they were unnecessary. The republic would be defended by its loyal citizen soldiers. Civilian supremacy would be maintained by eliminating a distinct military force.

Governmental Organization. The Framers' concept of civilian control was to control the uses to which military forces might be put rather than to control the military per se. They were more afraid of military power in the hands of political officials than of political power in the hands of military officers. Unable to visualize a distinct military class, the Framers could not fear such a class. But there was need to fear the concentration of authority over the military in any single governmental institution. As conservatives the Framers wanted to divide power, including power over the armed forces. The national government if it monopolized military power would be a threat to the states; the President if he had sole control over the armed forces would be a threat to the Congress. Consequently, the Framers identified civilian control with the fragmentation of authority over the military. The issue of the relative desirability of a militia versus a standing army was subordinate to the issues of the relative power of the states and the nation, the executive and the legislature, over the military forces, whatever their character. Those who wished a strong national government had no hesitancy in arguing: (1) that continuation of the Articles of Confederation would mean standing armies in every state; (2) that the proposed national government necessarily had to have the power to raise a standing army; and (3) that to avoid the necessity of exercising this power, the national government ought also be able to organize and discipline the militia. The states righters, contrariwise, argued that it was unnecessary for the national government to have a standing army and that, in any case, the states ought to have exclusive control over the militia in order to protect themselves against the standing army of the national government.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Farrand, Records, II, 326, 329-30, 563, 640, III, 207; Elliott, Debates, I, 326, 328, 335, II, 77-80, 136-37, III, 381, 660, IV, 244; Charles Warren, The Making of the Constitution (Cambridge, 1947), pp. 474, 483; James Madison, No. 41, The Federalist (Modern Library ed.), pp. 262-63.

The fragmentation of authority over military affairs had paradoxical results. The very aspects of the Constitution which the Framers and later commentators have cited as establishing civilian control are in fact those which hinder its realization: civilian control would be more easily achieved in the twentieth century if the Framers had been less eager to achieve it in the eighteenth century. Objective civilian control is maximized if the military are limited in scope to professional matters and relegated to a subordinate position in a pyramid of authority culminating in a single civilian head. The military clauses of the Constitution, however, provide for almost exactly the opposite. They divide civilian responsibility for military affairs and thereby foster the direct access of the professional military authorities to the highest levels of government:

(1) Within the total federal system of government, the militia clauses divide control over the militia between the state and national governments.

(2) Within the national government, the separation of powers divides control of the national military forces between Congress and the President.

(3) Within the executive branch of the national government, the Commander in Chief clause tends to divide control over the military between the President and departmental secretaries.

These latter two provisions reflect the distribution of military powers in the British government in the eighteenth century. The similarity, however, turned into a fundamental difference in the course of a century and a half. The evolution of British government centralized all authority over the military in the Cabinet, and the British constitution today provides for effective objective civilian control. The American Constitution, however, remains frozen in the eighteenth century pattern. The centrifugal politics of this country and the written, inflexible character of the Constitution combined to obstruct changes similar to those in Great Britain. American lack of concern with military affairs, furthermore, left the constitutional structure almost unsupplemented by statutory enactments. Prior to the twentieth century the only significant additions to the constitutional institutions were the office of the Secretary of War created in 1789 and the office of the Secretary of the Navy created in 1798. For most of American history, the Constitution and little else determined the legal structure of American civil-military relations.

III. THE MILITIA CLAUSES AND MILITARY FEDERALISM: THE EMPIRE WITHIN AN EMPIRE

The militia clauses of the Constitution hamper civilian control in two ways.

<sup>7</sup> Farrand, Records, I, 465, II, 385; No. 8, The Federalist, pp. 42-43; Elliott, Debates, II, 520-21, III, 169, 378, 410-11. Patrick Henry said of the nationalist claim: "This argument destroys itself. It demands a power, and denies the probability of its exercise."

First, they give constitutional sanction to a semimilitary force which can never be completely subordinated to military discipline nor completely removed from political entanglements. Secondly, they give constitutional sanction to a division of control over the militia between state and national governments which necessarily involves the militia in the conflicting interests of the federal system. This unique combination of characteristics—part civilian and part military, part state and part national—tends to make the militia independent of the policy-making institutions of government.

The Framers had good reasons to prefer a militia force to a regular army. But there was little rational justification for splitting up the control of this force. As Madison said, this control “did not seem in its nature to be divisible between two distinct authorities.” Politics if not logic, however, forced the Framers, Madison included, to support dual control. Some, such as Hamilton, wanted complete control in the United States. Others wished for the national government to be completely excluded from authority over the militia. The clash of these two viewpoints produced a variety of compromise suggestions. In the end, the balance of political forces produced the following militia clauses:

The Congress shall have Power . . .

To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions;

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. . . . The President shall be Commander-in-Chief . . . of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States. . . .

In addition, of course, Congress also has the authority to “raise and support armies” under the army clause.<sup>8</sup> The exercise of these powers falls historically into two periods. From 1792 to 1903, the militia was under state control in time of peace and dual control in time of war. After 1903 the militia was under dual control in time of peace and national control in time of war.

State control existed in peacetime throughout the nineteenth century because Congress in the Militia Act of 1792, the basic legislation in this field until 1903, abdicated its powers under the militia clauses and provided neither for effective federal supervision nor for effective federal support. Consequently, the militia remained purely state forces when not in the active service of the United States. When in such service, however, the dual control of the militia clauses resulted in constant confusion and bickering over the purposes for which the militia might be used and over the appointment of officers. In 1812, for instance, when the President called out the militia, the governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut asserted that they and not he had the right to decide whether the circumstances justified the call. Later in the war militia forces on the Niagara frontier refused on constitutional grounds to enter Canada to support regular American troops fighting there. In the Spanish American War militia units likewise refused to serve outside the United States.

<sup>8</sup> Farrand, Records, II, 136, 168, 182, 330, 385, II, 332; Elliott, Debates, III, 382, IV, 422-24.

The President was constitutional Commander in Chief of the militia while it was in federal service. Yet how could he function in this capacity when his officers, in war as in peace, were appointed by state governors? In the War of 1812 state governors challenged the authority of the President to subordinate militia units to the command of Regular Army general officers. State officials removed their troops from national service as they saw fit and upset the lines of command by appointing militia officers to higher rank than the regular officers to whom the militia units were theoretically subordinate. In the Civil War the states appointed the regimental officers of the militia and of the national volunteers assigned to the states while the President appointed the general officers. The Act of April 22, 1898 providing for the Volunteer Army for the Spanish American War reproduced this division of authority.<sup>9</sup>

Dual control in war did not survive the nineteenth century. The militia has fought the twentieth century wars of the United States as an exclusively national force under the army clause. Nor did the system of purely state control in time of peace extend past 1903. Dual control under the militia clauses became a reality when Congress passed the Dick Act of that year. The effects of these changes were twofold. The military importance of the militia in time of war was enhanced because it now had the wherewithal to become an effective military body. The political power of the militia in time of peace was enhanced because it was placed between the two competing authorities. Objective civilian control of the militia, which in the nineteenth century was difficult in time of war, became in the twentieth century virtually impossible in time of peace. The militia clauses are thus the constitutional base for a potent political organization: the National Guard and its spokesman, the National Guard Association. It is generally recognized that constitutions are created by political forces. But constitutions likewise create or impel the creation of political interests, and this is the case with the militia clauses and the National Guard.

The National Guard Association was formed in 1878 by a group of militia officers for the primary purpose of getting Congress to act under the militia clauses. It was designed to "present a united front" for joint control.<sup>10</sup> Its founders wished the national government to supply money, instruction, standards, and a certain measure of supervision to the state militia. The Regular Army was opposed because it did not think the militia could be an effective national force. The dual control advocates, however, won their first victory in <sup>9</sup> See Emory Upton, The Military Policy of the United States (Washington, 1912), pp. 100-103; F. B. Wiener, "The Militia Clause of the Constitution," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 54, pp. 192-93 (December, 1940); Leonard D. White, The Jeffersonians (New York, 1951), pp. 540-41. Cf. Washington's revolutionary difficulties, James B. Scott, The Militia (S. Doc. 695, 64th Cong., 2d Sess., 1917), pp. 25-26.

<sup>10</sup> F. P. Todd, "Our National Guard: An Introduction to Its History," Military Affairs, Vol. 5, pp. 73-86, 152-170, at pp. 162-63 (Summer, Fall, 1941). Aside from these brief articles and a few law review pieces, little scholarly work has been done on the National Guard and the National Guard Association.

1903 and subsequently strengthened and maintained their position despite the continuing hostility of the Regular Army. Throughout its existence the Guard has recognized its dependence upon the militia clauses and has stoutly defended its dual status. Guard officers maintain that these clauses embody the true sentiments of the Framers on military policy. Constitutional "dual control" is opposed to central control and to exclusive state control. The latter is impractical because the states will not carry the entire cost of the Guard and the former is unconstitutional because, according to the Guard, the army clause only gives Congress the power to maintain a standing army not to keep a federal militia. For the Guard, dual control in peace means that the national government should supply the funds and the know-how while the states supply the command and direction. The Association has consistently sought more federal money for Guard activities but has resolutely opposed extensions of federal control. In 1949, for instance, the Association demanded increased federal aid for armories and construction, a uniform clothing allowance for National Guard officers, and the franking privilege for National Guard mail. At the same time it vigorously condemned further federal control over the Guard, describing the 1948 Gray Board recommendation for a single national reserve force as "unconstitutional, un-American . . . contrary to our concept and philosophy of life . . . ill-advised and illegal. . . ." Upon the constitutional base of the militia clauses, the National Guard has created a political force of formidable proportions. As the president of the Association frankly and accurately proclaimed, the Guard is an "empire within an empire."<sup>11</sup> Within its sphere of interest its word is law, or becomes law very quickly. The extent of this power, and the ways in which the militia clauses contribute to it, may be seen in (1) its legal status; (2) its constitutional symbolism; (3) its official representation in state and national governments; (4) the status of the National Guard Association; and (5) the influence of the Guard with Congress.

Legal Status. The efforts of the Association to enhance the Guard's dual status have put the latter in a unique legal position. The National Guard is one organization but it has a double existence. As the "National Guard of the several states and territories" it is organized under the militia clause and has the mission of preserving law and order within the states under the orders of the state authorities. In this capacity it may be "called forth" by the President under the appropriate authority of Congress for the limited constitutional purposes of executing the laws of the United States, suppressing insurrection, and repelling invasions. If this were its only status, the Guard would be constitutionally incapable of participating as an organization in a foreign war. In 1917, without authority permitting overseas service, its members were drafted as groups of individuals into the national army, and Guard organization was disrupted. As a result, in 1933 the Association secured the passage of an act which makes the Guard as the "National Guard of the United States" a reserve component of the Army of the United States under the army clause. In this capacity its mission is to furnish units for all types of military operations anywhere in the world. As the National Guard of the United States, the Guard may be "ordered" to active service by the President after Congress has declared the existence of a national emergency. The Guard has the best of two worlds. Its status under the militia clause protects it against federal control in peacetime. Its status under the army clause insures it of an institutional and prominent role in wartime.

<sup>11</sup> Official Proceedings of the Natl. Guard Assoc., 66th Annual Convention, 1944, pp. 28-29, 44; 1948, pp. 111, 242-44, 254-55; 1949, pp. 202-210. For the Gray Board recommendations, see Committee on Civilian Components, Reserve Forces for National Security (Washington, 1948), pp. 9-24.

Constitutional Symbolism. As a militia under dual control, the Guard identifies itself with two venerated constitutional symbols: the Citizen-Soldier and States Rights. Guardsmen are "amateur soldiers," citizens first and soldiers second in the Minute Man tradition. "In the future as in the past," the Association declared in 1944, "and based upon sound tradition, long experience, and this Nation's fundamental law, the citizen-soldier must be the major dependence of the Nation in time of war . . ." The federal reserves, however, can likewise claim to be citizen soldiers. But only the Guard can also invoke the banner of States Rights. Our "organizations," claimed President Walsh, "belong to the States and are merely loaned to the Federal Government in wartime." The Guard wants the "Federal system adhered to" in the military establishment. The Guard can thus expect the support of the state governments against the national government. In 1943, for instance, the Conference of Governors urged continued dual status for the Guard in the postwar period, and in 1948 the Executive Committee of the Conference joined the Guard in denouncing the Gray Board Report. Its state affiliations enhance the political influence of the Guard relative to that of the reserve associations of the national forces. In 1954 the Reserve Officers Association had 60,000 members and the NGA 34,000. The ROA normally has had more money and a larger staff than the NGA. Nonetheless, without a secure base of operations in the states, the ROA has not equaled the NGA in political influence. In 1946 the president of the ROA himself described his organization as the "younger brother" of the National Guard Association and admitted with reference to political influence that "The National Guard has much of what we the Reserves have not had."<sup>12</sup>

State and National Representation. The position of the Guard is strengthened by its official foothold in both the state and national governments. The heads of the Guard in the states are the adjutants general appointed by the governors. These officials represent the Guard within the state governments and are linked nationally through the Adjutants General Association which is a "corollary" organization of the NGA. The Guard is represented in the Department of the Army by the Chief of the National Guard Bureau who under the National Defense Act of 1920 must be a Guardsman and by the National Guard members of the joint General Staff committees which, under the same act, must consider all policies affecting the Guard. These national representatives have kept the NGA informed of what transpires within the Army and the War Department. The Guard has regularly insisted that it be included at an early stage in the preparation of War Department policies which might affect it. Exclusion of the Guard in the development of policy has usually meant opposition by the NGA when the programs are submitted to Congress.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>12</sup> Statement of Policy Adopted by the Natl. Guard Assn. and the Adjutants General Assn. in Joint Convention, Baltimore, May 4, 1944, pp. 1, 4; Proceedings, NGA Convention, 1944, p. 100; 1945, pp. 65-66; 1946, pp. 114-15; 1948, p. 65; Public Administration Clearing House, Public Administration Organizations, 1954 (Chicago, 1954), pp. 102, 119.

The National Guard Association. The NGA occupies an ambiguous position on the borderline between a private association and a public body. Legally it is simply a voluntary organization of National Guard Officers. Nonetheless, it considers itself to be "the authorized Representative of the National Guard of the United States." It is also closely tied in with the official state and national representation of the Guard. In 1948 when only 42% of Guard officers belonged to the NGA, the Association declared it to be the responsibility of the adjutants general "to insist that every National Guard Officer be a member of the National Guard Association." To this end it urged the states to require each new Guard officer to fill out an NGA membership application prior to appearing before the official Examining Board. Through such techniques, the NGA by 1953 achieved a 99% membership among Guard officers. As a private association the NGA carries on public relations activities, publishes the monthly National Guardsman, and represents the Guard with respect to a wide variety of legislation. At one point in the debate over the Selective Service Act of 1948, for example, when it looked as if the Guard viewpoint would not prevail, the Association brought members from thirty-four states to Washington to lobby with their congressmen. In two days they were eminently successful in getting Congress to adopt the National Guard position. In President Walsh's words, the great virtue of the NGA is that it is the only agency on which the National Guard can rely to protect its interests, for the Association is free and untrammelled and it does not have to conform to any particular pattern nor is it bound within the narrow limits of channels of communication or the chain of command.<sup>14</sup>

Influence with Congress. In the final analysis the influence of the Guard boils down to its influence with Congress. The fate of the militia is legally in the hands of Congress. NGA officers, however, assert that "we should settle the future of the National Guard." To this end it must settle the actions of Congress on National Guard affairs. For half a century it has been astoundingly successful in doing exactly this. The local roots of the Guard, its appeals to States Rights and the Citizen Soldier, its support from the state governments, its lobbying and pressure tactics, have made it a power on Capitol Hill. "Congress," in the words of President Walsh, "has ever been our refuge and our strength."

The record of National Guard success with Congress begins with the Dick

<sup>13</sup> Proceedings, NGA Convention, 1948, pp. 89, 93-96; 1945, pp. 50-55.

<sup>14</sup> Proceedings, NGA Convention, 1945, p. 47; 1946, p. 43; 1948, pp. 34, 66, 80-81; 1950, pp. 264-65; 1953, pp. 288-90.

Act of 1903. Representative Dick himself was a former president of the National Guard Association. In 1908 the Association secured the passage of the second Dick Act strengthening federal support of the Guard. In 1916 the Guard "threw every ounce of its energy into an effort to defeat" the Continental Army plan of the General Staff. It was successful, and the National Defense Act of that year was in line with its views. The position of the Guard was greatly strengthened four years later by the National Defense Act of 1920, which the Guard described as "a great achievement and a great victory." In passing the 1933 act making the Guard a reserve component of the Army in peace as well as war "Congress saw eye to eye with the proposals submitted by the National Guard. . . ." Throughout the twenties and thirties, the NGA successfully devoted its efforts to increasing the appropriations of the Guard from $13,000,000 in 1920 to $72,000,000 in 1941. In 1940 when the Selective Training and Service Bill as originally introduced did not secure the interests of the Guard, the Association had inserted into it the "National Guard protective clause" which declared it to be "essential that the strength and organization of the National Guard as an integral part of the first line of defense of this nation be at all times maintained and assured." In 1946 the Guard fought efforts by the War Department to set up a large Organized Reserve Corps which the Guard viewed as a "competing" and "parallel" organization. A War Department recommendation for a $40,000,000 appropriation for the ORC was eliminated by Congress at the insistence of the National Guard. The Guard had no difficulty, however, in getting funds for itself. For Fiscal Year 1949 the Budget Bureau recommended $195,000,000 for the Guard. The NGA did not think this enough and got the economy-minded 80th Congress to appropriate $290,000,000. In 1948 the Association was also successful in having its views written into the Selective Service Act and in blocking the legislative recommendations of the Gray Board. In 1954 when an Assistant Secretary of Defense suggested that the Guard should be used only for Home Guard and civil defense functions, President Walsh confidently picked up the challenge: "If they want war, let it begin here."<sup>15</sup>

The record shows that Congress has indeed given, in Mr. Walsh's phrase, "generous support" to the Guard. Continuing his reflections on the 80th Congress, the president went on to wonder if any organization has been so successful in the legislative field in so brief a period as the National Guard Association. It is indeed a great accomplishment to have attained all the major legislative objectives of this Association.

Two years later the NGA Legislative Committee reported that the Association had "been phenomenally successful in obtaining the enactment of legislation essential to its well-being and development."<sup>16</sup> So long as the Guard retains its jealously protected dual status, this will continue. Ensnared behind the militia clauses this premier military lobby effectively dominates the proceedings of Congress concerning it. And it is the Constitution which underwrites its slogan that "There will always be a National Guard."

<sup>15</sup> Proceedings, NGA Convention, 1948, pp. 56, 67, 88; 1944, pp. 44, 53, 55, 58, 65, 69, 73, 74; 1945, p. 56; 1946, pp. 28-32; 1948, pp. 47-49, 57, 91-92; 1953, p. 28; Time, LXIII (Mar. 1, 1954), 18.

<sup>16</sup> Proceedings, NGA Convention, 1948, pp. 33-34; 1950, p. 245.

IV. THE SEPARATION OF POWERS: DUAL CONTROL OVER THE NATIONAL FORCES

In many respects the most significant aspect of the separation of powers is not the division of power between President and Congress, but the effects of this division upon the power of other groups. The existence of two coordinate bodies means that the power of each vis-à-vis other groups is less than it would be if either possessed full sovereign authority. The principal beneficiaries have been organized interest groups, bureaucratic agencies, and the military services. The separation of powers is a perpetual invitation, if not an irresistible force, drawing military leaders into political conflicts. Consequently, it has been a major hindrance to the development of military professionalism and objective civilian control in the United States.

With few modifications the Framers reproduced in the Constitution the division of authority over the military which prevailed in England and the colonies in the middle of the eighteenth century, "The purse & the sword," said George Mason, "ought never to get into the same hands [whether Legislative or Executive]." The President inherited the powers of the English king, Congress the powers of the English Parliament. The executive authority of the President, Hamilton stated in The Federalist, "will resemble equally that of the king of Great Britain and of the governor of New York." The Framers did, however, make one major adjustment in favor of the legislature. In granting Congress the war power they altered British practice and established a significant precedent in the evolution of representative government. The result was that Congress was given the power

To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water;

To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a longer Term than Two Years;

To provide and maintain a Navy;

To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces.

... And

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

And the President was made "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. . . ."<sup>17</sup>

<sup>17</sup> For discussion of royal and parliamentary authority, see Blackstone, Commentaries, I, 257-58, 262, 412-13; J. S. Omond, Parliament and the Army, 1642-1904 (Cambridge, 1933), pp. 7-8; John W. Fortescue, A History of the British Army (London, 13 vols., 1899-1930), II, 568. The Framers at first adopted in toto the language of the basic English statute, 13 Car. II, c. 6 (1661), but then realized that they could not make the President like the King commander in chief of the militia in peace as well as war. See Farrand, Records, I, 139-140, II, 185, 426-27; No. 69, The Federalist, p. 448. For the continuing debate as to whether the war power was properly legislative or executive, see Farrand,

The general intent of the Framers in making this division of power is clear. Problems arise, however, from the nature of the grant of presidential power. This clause is unique in the Constitution in granting authority in the form of an office rather than in the form of a function. The President is not given the function "to command the Army and Navy"; he is given the office of "Commander in Chief." This difference in form is of considerable importance, for it left undefined the specific powers and functions. This eased the approval of the Constitution in the ratifying conventions, but it gave subsequent generations something to argue about.

The powers of the Commander in Chief might range from the extremely broad power to conduct war to a narrowly restricted power of military command. They certainly exclude all powers specifically assigned to Congress or the states, and they probably include all purely military powers not so assigned. But does the office possess nonmilitary powers as well? The Framers themselves seemed to hold conflicting opinions on this point. The Supreme Court in 1850, however, declared that the duty and power of the President as Commander in Chief were "purely military," and denied the similarity between the presidential authority and the royal prerogative.<sup>18</sup> So long as the Commander in Chief power was interpreted as purely military, it remained, in Professor Corwin's phrase, "the forgotten clause" of the Constitution. In the Civil War and in World War II, however, Lincoln and Roosevelt used the clause to justify an extraordinarily broad range of nonmilitary presidential actions largely legislative in nature. The justification of these actions by the Commander in Chief clause was persuasive, however, only because John Rutledge defined that power as an office rather than a function. It could be argued that the office of Commander in Chief possesses authority to seize a strike-bound war plant. It would be harder to argue that the function of commanding the Army and Navy implied such authority. The Commander in Chief clause, in other words, has been of relatively little direct use in securing civilian control over the military. Indeed, in one respect it has been directly detrimental to such control. But because it was phrased as an office rather than a function, it has been of great use to the President in expanding his power at the expense of Congress. This, in turn, has broadened the area of conflict between these two institutions and, consequently, if indirectly, has further impeded civilian control by increasing the likelihood that military leaders will be drawn into political controversy.<sup>19</sup>

---

Records, I, 64-66; Alexander Hamilton, Works (New York, 12 vols., Federal ed., 1904), IV, 145-46; James Madison, Writings (New York, 9 vols., 1900-10), VI, 145; Clarence A. Berdahl, War Powers of the Executive in the United States (Univ. of Illinois, 1921), p. 79. Cf. W. W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution (Chicago, 2 vols., 1953), I, 422-28.

<sup>18</sup> Fleming v. Page, 9 How. 603, 615, 618 (1850). The powers of the British King as general of the kingdom extended to many nonmilitary areas. Blackstone, Commentaries, I, 262ff. For the views of Framers on the Commander in Chief power, see Farrand, Records, I, 244, 292, II, 145, 319, 426-27, III, 624; Elliott, Debates, IV, 114; The Federalist, pp. 448, 482.

<sup>19</sup> For the boundaries between presidential and congressional military powers, see

The President has exercised his powers with respect to military affairs through the appointment of military personnel, the issuance of executive orders and commands, and reliance upon the instrumentality of the civilian secretary. Congressional weapons include statutes, appropriations, and investigations. These devices have normally been wielded in the name of Congress by the military and naval affairs committees, the appropriations committees, and special wartime investigating committees. On occasion both sides have found it necessary or expedient to appeal to the military for support of their plans or to seize upon and push military plans for purposes of their own. The involvement of the national officer corps in politics consequently has been less consistent and more sporadic in nature than the involvement of the militia officer corps. The division of authority between two separate governments demanded a permanent political spokesman for the interests of the militia. The division of authority between two branches of the same government led to the transitory involvement of individuals and cliques of officers in controversies over military policy and, most particularly, over the force levels of the armed services.

Prior to 1940 the pattern of national politics respecting the strength of military forces tended to obscure the extent of military political participation. The executive was usually more favorably inclined towards a larger military establishment than was Congress. Congress had less immediate contact with foreign dangers and was under greater popular pressure to cut spending. In addition, the easiest way to assert congressional authority in the budget process was simply to reduce executive requests. Thus, the institutional jealousy of the two branches, even apart from constituent pressure, tended to make Congress less favorable to military appropriations. In some cases, to be sure, the General Board of the Navy found a more favorable audience for its recommendations in the Congress than in the executive branch. But, generally, the military leaders appeared before congressional committees to support the President's program. Military involvement in politics on the side of Congress tends to be conspicuous and dramatic; on the side of the President it tends to be subtler and less obvious. Undoubtedly, some administrations used popular officers to rally congressional support for their military proposals. But it is extremely difficult to draw the line between the soldier giving professional advice to Congress as to what the country needs for its defense and the soldier lobbying with Congress for the administration. The two roles are distinct in theory but blended in practice.

In the post-World War II period, on the other hand, the increased importance of national defense issues and the greater concern of Congress with them has caused the legislature to insist upon an independent review of military force levels. On occasion Congress has voted more money for a particular service or activity than was recommended by the President.<sup>20</sup> Congress can only play an independent role, however, if it has access to the same professional military advice available to the President. With respect to the military budget in particular, congressmen argue that their constitutional responsibilities demand that they be able to compare the purely "military" recommendations of the Joint Chiefs with the President's budget "compounded of a number of extra-military considerations. . . ."<sup>21</sup> The legal milestone marking the shift from the prewar pattern was the provision in the National Security Act of 1949 permitting a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to present to Congress "on his own initiative, after first informing the Secretary of Defense, any recommendation relating to the Department of Defense that he may deem proper."<sup>22</sup> This was the first statute in American history authorizing a professional military chief to present his views directly to Congress. While it did not make the Chiefs of Staff the principal military advisers to Congress as it did with respect to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense, it nonetheless freed them from the legal restrictions of the 1921 Budget and Accounting Act. This legal authorization, however, can become inoperative unless there are political means of protecting the military chiefs against pressure or retaliation from the executive branch. After the dismissal in 1949 of Admiral Denfeld, Chief of Naval Operations, following his participation in the B-36 hearings, the House Armed Services Committee warned that any further "intimidation" of this nature would lead it to "ask the Congress to exercise its constitutional power of redress."<sup>23</sup> The "constitutional power," however, is one which it is easier for Congress to assert than to exercise. Few effective devices are available to it to protect military officers against executive action.

---

Edward S. Corwin, The President: Office and Powers (New York, 1948), chap. vi; Ex Parte Milligan, 4 Wall 2 (1866); Berdahl, War Powers, passim; Howard White, Executive Influence in Determining Military Policy in the United States (Urbana, 1924), chap. iii.

The vulnerability of the chiefs places a tremendous burden upon them as to whether to speak up or to remain silent. What is the proper professional behavior when called before a congressional committee and invited to criticize the President's recommendations? How strong should be the doubts and disagreements of a Chief with the President's policy before he takes the initiative

<sup>20</sup> The most notable instances have been the increase in National Guard funds mentioned above, a 1946 increase in research and development funds, the extra money voted for the 70-group Air Force in 1948 and 1949, the increase in Marine Corps appropriations in 1955 and in Air Force appropriations in 1956. In three of these instances, the President directed that the additional funds be impounded: a clearly unconstitutional action, as I think, arrogating to the President an item veto over appropriations bills. See J. D. Williams, The Impounding of Funds by the Bureau of the Budget, ICP Case Series: No. 28 (University, Alabama, 1955). Congress, however, has yet to develop legal or political means of forcing the President to spend funds it appropriates. See Cong. Record, Vol. 95, p. 14922 (Oct. 18, 1949); H. Rept. 1797, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 309-311 (1950); House Committee on Armed Services, Unification and Strategy, H. Doc. 600, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 49-50 (1950); Hearings before House Armed Services Committee on National Defense Program—Unification and Strategy, 81st Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 97-99, 300-301 (1949); Hearings before House Committee on Appropriations on Department of Defense Appropriations for 1951, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 50-62 (1950).

<sup>21</sup> Carl Vinson, Cong. Rec., Vol. 95, p. 3540 (March 30, 1949).

<sup>22</sup> Sec. 202 (c) (6), National Security Act, 63 Stat. 578 (1949).

<sup>23</sup> H. Doc. 600, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 10-12, 45, 52.

in criticizing it before Congress? The annual psychic crisis of the Chiefs of Staff before the congressional appropriations committees has become an enduring phenomenon. If the military chief accepts and defends the President's policies, he is subordinating his own professional judgment, denying to Congress the advice to which it may constitutionally claim to be entitled, and becoming the political spokesman of an Administration policy. If the military chief expresses his professional opinions to Congress, he is publicly criticizing his Commander in Chief and furnishing ammunition to the latter's political enemies.

There is no easy way out of the dilemma. Military leaders in the post-war period have varied from more or less active campaigning against presidential policies (the admirals with respect to unification and the B-36 controversy) to the defense of presidential policies which ran counter to their professional judgment (General Bradley with respect to the Fiscal 1951 budget). A middle course, however, appears to be the most desirable one. The military chief has the professional duty to speak frankly to both President and Congress. General Ridgway's behavior under Senate questioning in 1954 and 1955 reflected an effort to find the proper path. In both cases, the general emphasized his acceptance of higher level executive decisions fixing the size of the Army which obviously did not accord with his own judgment. In 1954 he gave his own views in executive session; in 1955 he presented in public his military opinion on the desirable strength of his service.<sup>24</sup> With respect to any significant issue of military policy, however, the national officers inevitably tend to be drawn into the legislative-executive struggle on one side or the other. The separation of powers makes it impossible for American officers ever to be at ease in their professionalism.

V. THE COMMANDER IN CHIEF CLAUSE: THE POLITICAL-MILITARY HIERARCHY

One major function of the Commander in Chief clause has been to justify the exercise of broad Presidential powers in times of national emergency. A second principal function has been to complicate the achievement of civilian control in the executive branch. Just as the separation of powers is a standing invitation to military leaders to make an end run around the President to Congress, the Commander in Chief clause is a standing invitation to make an end run around the civilian secretary to the President.

The Commander in Chief clause is the outstanding example of the Framers' mixing of political and military functions. The same thinking which permitted them to envision Senators becoming generals in war also permitted them to accept a civilian President as military Commander in Chief. In most societies from primitive nomadic tribes down to their own time, it had been customary for the chief of state also to be the chief military commander. This had been true of the Greek city state, the Roman republic, and the European national monarchies; it was to be true of Napoleonic France. Virtually all the state constitutions at the time made the governor commander in chief of the militia. Military command was as much a function of the chief executive as the appointment of administrative officials or the negotiation of alliances. It was only natural for the Framers to assign this role to the President. He was to be a republican Soldier-President patterned upon the Royal Warrior of the European states.

<sup>24</sup> Hearings before Senate Committee on Appropriations on Dept. of Defense Appropriation Bill for 1955, 83rd Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 43-44 (1954); Hearings before Senate Committee on Appropriations on Dept. of Defense Appropriation Bill for 1956, 84th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 211-12, 215-19 (1955).

The extent to which the Framers expected the President to exercise military functions may be seen in their failure to curb his authority personally to lead troops on the field of battle. Such a restriction was contained in the New Jersey plan and had the support of Hamilton. The Convention, however, explicitly rejected these attempts to limit his authority. Some criticisms of this power were voiced in state conventions but there, too, efforts to curtail it were unsuccessful. The intention and the expectation of the Framers and of the people was that the President could, if he so desired, assume personal command in the field. Early presidents did not hesitate to do so. Washington led the troops called out to suppress the Whiskey Rebellion. James Madison took a direct hand in organizing the ineffectual defense of Washington in 1814. During the Mexican War President Polk, although he did not command the army in the field, nonetheless personally formulated the military strategy of the war and participated in a wide range of exclusively military matters. The last instance of a President directly exercising military functions was Lincoln's participation in the direction of the Union armies in the spring of 1862. The President personally determined the plan of operations, and through his War Orders directed the movement of troop units. It was not until Grant took over in Virginia that presidential participation in military affairs came to an end. No subsequent President essayed the direction of military operations, although Theodore Roosevelt in World War I argued conversely that his previous experience as Commander in Chief proved his competence to command a division in France.<sup>25</sup>

Until the middle of the nineteenth century, no real distinction existed in the United States between political and military competence. Just as successful generals made popular presidential candidates, so any man of affairs was capable of command. The exercise of his military functions by the President created no logical difficulties. There was a single, clear political-military hierarchy running from the President through the Secretaries of War and the Navy to the uniformed commanders. Political and military responsibilities and abilities were mixed all along the line. The President frequently had previous military experience; the Secretary of War almost always had. The top generals, on the other hand, were usually involved in politics. The organization of the service departments, consequently, was little different from that of any other department.

This unified hierarchy began to break up as the military function became professionalized. The President was no longer qualified to exercise military command, and even if he were qualified by previous training, he could not devote time to this function without abandoning his political responsibilities. The political functions of the Presidency became incompatible with the military functions of the Commander in Chief. Nor were the civilian politicians appointed Secretaries of War and the Navy competent to exercise military command; they were usually lawyers. On the other hand, the emergence of the military profession produced officers whose experience had been exclusively military, who were quite different types from the politician secretaries, and who were technically qualified to command. The constitutional presumption that the President exercised command still remained, however, and complicated the relations among President, secretary, and military chief. The military chief was military, the secretary political, and the President political and military. One might assume that the secretary, with his duty to represent the interests of his department, would be more military in outlook, if not in capability, than the President with his broader interests and responsibilities. The Constitution, however, reversed this relationship, and obscured the clarity of the hierarchy. Did the chain of command go up through the secretary, a civilian politician, to the President? Or were there two lines of authority emanating from the Presidency: a political-administrative line to the secretary and a military command line directly to the highest professional officer? These issues have beclouded American military organization down to the present day.

<sup>25</sup> See Farrand, Records, I, 244, III, 217-18, 624. IV, 53; Elliott, Debates, II, 408, 412, 522-523, III, 59-60, 496-98; Leonard D. White, The Jeffersonians, p. 220, and The Jacksonians (New York, 1954), pp. 51-57; Pendleton Herring, The Impact of War (New York, 1941), pp. 146-47.

Three different types of civil-military organizational relations have existed among the President, secretary, and military chief. The balanced pattern assigns to the President a purely political function: the decision of the highest policy issues and the general supervision of the military establishment. Beneath him the secretary, also a purely political figure, is responsible for the entire military organization. Below the secretary, the hierarchy divides into military and administrative components. The highest professional officer is the leading military adviser to the secretary and normally has command of the military forces. He is subordinate to the secretary who is subordinate to the President, but neither of the two civilian officials exercise military command, which stops at the level of the military chief. Also subordinate to the secretary are administrative officials (civilian or military) who direct the nonmilitary supply, logistical, and financial activities of the department.

This balanced pattern of organization tends to maximize military professionalism and civilian control.<sup>28</sup> Civilian and military responsibilities are clearly distinguished, and the latter, on paper at least, are clearly subordinated to the former. The President and the secretary handle political matters; the military chief military matters; and the staff or bureau chiefs administrative matters. The scope of the authority of the professional military chief is limited to the military realm by the administrative bureaus, and the level of his authority, subordinate to the secretary, does not often involve him in overt political decisions. Administrative and military interests are balanced by the secretary under the authority of the President. English civil-military relations have been organized along comparable lines since the last half of the nineteenth century. Between 1794 and 1870 the War Office administered the civilian affairs of the army, and the Commander in Chief, directly under the sovereign, was responsible for military command and discipline. In 1870, however, the Cabinet insisted that the military chief be subordinated to the Secretary of State for War. A fully balanced scheme was achieved with the abolition of the post of Commander in Chief in 1895 and the subsequent creation of the office of Chief of the Imperial Staff. The same system also existed at the Admiralty. This organization was possible only because the sovereign consented, however reluctantly, to have his role as first general and admiral become, in Bagehot's phrase, a "dignified" part of the constitution. The "efficient" hierarchy of control ran from Parliament to Cabinet to Prime Minister to Secretary of State for War and then to the military chief and the administrative bureaus of the War Office. In the United States, however, no President has permitted his constitutional functions as Commander in Chief to atrophy. These remain efficient and not dignified. Consequently, the balanced pattern of organization has been difficult to achieve and even more difficult to maintain. In American government the Navy Department alone since 1915 has attempted to organize itself along these "balanced" lines. Only with great difficulty has it maintained this organization against the pressures of the Chiefs of Naval Operations either to expand their authority over the bureaus or to establish a direct line of responsibility to the President.<sup>27</sup> American civil-military relations almost inevitably tend in the direction of other arrangements which tend to weaken military professionalism and civilian control.

<sup>28</sup> The theoretical rationale of the balanced pattern was developed in A. T. Mahan, "The Principles of Naval Administration," Naval Administration and Warfare (Boston, 1908), pp. 3-48, and Spenser Wilkinson, Preface to the 2d edition of The Brain of an Army (London, 1913). Mahan's essay and Wilkinson's preface are brilliant analyses of executive military organization and are basic to an understanding of the subject.

The coordinate scheme involves the separation of military and administrative functions immediately below the President. The secretary is limited to non-military administrative duties, and the military chief discharges his military functions directly under the President. The chain of administration goes from President to Secretary to bureau chiefs; the chain of command from President to military chief to the military forces. This accords with constitutional theory and keeps civilians, except the President, out of the military hierarchy. It tends, however, to undermine civilian control. The scope of the authority of the military chief is limited to military matters, but the level of his authority with direct access to the President involves him in political issues. The President is normally too busy with other affairs to devote sufficient attention to the interrelation of political and military policies, and the military chief consequently has to make political decisions. His direct access to the President also encourages the latter to try his hand at military affairs and to intervene in professional military planning and command where he has no special competence. The Army and the War Department were organized on a coordinate basis from 1821 to 1903. The Secretary of War was responsible for fiscal and administrative matters and supervised the activities of the staff departments. The Commanding General of the Army, on the other hand, was independent of the Secretary and directly responsible to the President for the military command and discipline of the Army. The result was continuous friction erupting at times into violent acrimony between the Secretary and the Commanding General.

<sup>27</sup> See U. S. Navy Dept., Naval Administration: Selected Documents on Navy Department Organization, 1915-1940, passim; R. E. Coontz, From the Mississippi to the Sea (Philadelphia, 1930), p. 400; Ernest J. King and Walter Whitehill, Fleet Admiral King: A Naval Record (New York, 1952), pp. 261 ff., 471-478; Paul Y. Hammond, "The Secretaryships of War and the Navy: A Study of Civilian Control of the Military" (Ph.D. Thesis, Harvard University, 1953), pp. 223-246, 293-305.

The vertical pattern solves the problem of the Commander in Chief clause in a different manner, but one equally inconsistent with civilian control. In this scheme the secretary and the military chief have identical supervisory responsibilities. The administrative bureau heads are subordinated to the professional military chief, and the professional military chief is subordinated to the secretary who is in turn responsible to the President. Since the President is still Commander in Chief, and some connection must exist between him and the rest of the military hierarchy, the secretary is given a place in the military chain of command and is described as the President's deputy commander in chief or in some similar terms. The military chief, however, is given control over all the activities of the department under the secretary, the specifically military command and planning functions being delegated down the hierarchy to a subordinate of the military chief's on the same level as the administrative chiefs of bureaus. This prevents the military chief from achieving direct access to the President because his responsibilities are identical with those of the secretary. He can claim no peculiar relation to the President. On the other hand, he supervises all the activities of the department below the secretary and, by reason of long familiarity with the establishment, may be able to reduce the transient secretary to a figurehead. By combining in his own person political and administrative responsibilities, as well as functions of military command, the military chief transgresses beyond his competence. He sacrifices higher level for broader scope which is equally damaging to his professional status. Also, the extension of the constitutional myth so that not only the President but also the secretary is assumed to exercise military command violates the facts of reality. Since 1903, the General Staff system of the Army has closely approximated the vertical pattern of civil-military relations.

The National Security Act of 1947 raised the problem of executive civil-military relations from the single service level to the central defense level. The Act itself was a compromise, not clearly and definitively establishing any one of the three patterns of civil-military relations. Elements of the coordinate system, however, existed in those provisions of the Act which made the Joint Chiefs of Staff the "principal military advisers" to the President and to the National Security Council and which placed the Chiefs under the "authority and direction" of the President as well as the Secretary. In actual practice the Joint Chiefs organization at times tended to view itself as a semi-autonomous corporate body not wholly subordinate to the Secretary of Defense. In addition, in both the Truman and Eisenhower Administrations the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs was more than just a professional military adviser. He played a key role in the formulation and advocacy of national policy. It is still too early to say finally which of the three patterns of civil-military relations the Department of Defense will approximate. But it is clear that the constitutional hindrances to the achievement of the balanced system have not been entirely overcome.

VI. CIVILIAN CONTROL AND CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

Objective civilian control has at times existed in the United States. It has been, however, the product of geographical isolation and the international balance of power which permitted the virtual elimination of standing military forces and the exclusion of the military from political power. Civilian control in this sense has been so effective that Americans have called it a fundamental principle of their system of government. But they have been deluding themselves in ascribing to the Constitution a virtue of geography. Objective civilian control in the United States has been extra-constitutional, a part of our political tradition but not of our constitutional tradition. Civilian control has, in a sense, been like the party system. The Framers did not foresee the rise of popular democracy; consequently, they did not provide for political parties. They did not foresee the rise of the military profession; consequently, they did not provide for objective civilian control. Neither is contemplated in the Constitution, yet both have been called into existence by nonconstitutional forces. The Constitution has contributed its share to obstructing the growth of a strong party system such as exists in Great Britain. It has also contributed its share to obstructing effective civilian control such as exists in Great Britain. The restraints of a written constitution have proved effective against some of the most powerful functional imperatives.

The question thus arises: To what extent is it possible, short of amending the Constitution, to provide for objective civilian control in the existing framework? The difficulties are constant but they are not all of equal strength. The extent to which the Commander in Chief clause operates to damage civilian control largely depends upon the individuals who occupy that office. It adds nothing and detracts much from military professionalism and civilian control. The British Prime Minister who is not Commander in Chief and has no military functions has more effective control over his military forces than does the American President. The principal positive use of the clause has been to expand presidential power against Congress in nonmilitary areas. If the clause can come to be viewed primarily in this nonmilitary sense; and if presidents would exercise constitutional self-restraint so as to make their military command of the armed forces as honorific as that of the king of England, this obstacle to civilian control would be removed, and a balanced pattern of executive organization be made workable.

The militia clauses directly hamper the development of military professionalism in only one segment of the armed forces. Conceivably, of course, Congress could abolish dual control over the militia. But in the face of the political strength of the National Guard this hardly seems likely. And, given the existing situation, it probably would not even be desirable. The more appropriate course is to make the best of the situation of military federalism. The existence of the Guard will necessarily prevent the development of a strong and ready national reserve organization. The Constitution has made the Guard into a powerful political force, and it is not inconceivable that this political strength may make the Guard into an effective military organization. At the end of 1954, the Army and Air National Guard had almost 400,000 men on drill pay status—twice the number of the Army and Air Force Reserves. At the beginning of 1956 Guard ground forces consisted of twenty-one infantry divisions, six armored divisions, nine regimental combat teams, nine armored cavalry regiments, 123 antiaircraft battalions, seventy-four field artillery battalions, and miscellaneous other units. The Air National Guard was organized into twenty-seven combat wings. The readiness of the Guard was at a higher level than ever before in its history. Many of the antiaircraft units and interceptor squadrons were participating in the air defense of the nation on a semi-active alert status.<sup>28</sup> By its very nature the National Guard can never be brought fully within objective civilian control. But it may still be possible to create a respectable reserve force within the existing constitutional and political framework.

The real constitutional stumbling block to objective civilian control is the separation of powers. This is the essence of the American system of government, and its impact is felt throughout the armed forces. Short of fundamental constitutional change, the separation of powers cannot be altered. Indeed, it is highly questionable even if such change were possible, whether it would be worth the price. There are values other than civilian control and military professionalism, and these were the values the Framers had in mind when they wrote the Constitution. Foreign countries may have more effective systems of civilian control but no country has as effective a system of restraints upon arbitrary political power or such a unique balance of executive unity and legislative diversity. Inevitably, both military officers attempting to adhere to professional standards and civilian secretaries attempting to exercise civilian control look with envy to the cabinet system. Such a system, however, is not for the United States. Within the framework of the separation of powers, institutional adjustments can be made which will reduce its deleterious effects upon civilian control. But it will never be possible to eliminate these effects completely. A lesser measure of objective civilian control and lower standards of military professionalism are the continuing prices the American people will have to pay for the other benefits of their constitutional system.

<sup>28</sup> Secretary of Defense, Semiannual Report, July 1 to December 31, 1954, p. 58; New York Times, January 13, 1956, p. 6; New York Herald Tribune, November 22, 1953, p. 1. November 20, 1955, Sec. 2, p. 3.

NEWTON D. BAKER ON EXECUTIVE INFLUENCE IN MILITARY LEGISLATION

[The following letter from Professor White's files was offered to the Review, by a happy coincidence, just in time to be read in conjunction with the two preceding papers. It was written, as the text shows, in response to the receipt of a copy of his book (Urbana, University of Illinois Studies in the Social Sciences, Vol. XII, nos. 1 and 2). Mr. Baker was then in the private practice of law in Cleveland. MAN. ED.]

May 8, 1925

Dr. Howard White,
Ohio Wesleyan University,
Delaware, Ohio.

My dear Dr. White:

I have received and read with great interest your monograph on "Executive Influence in Determining Military Policy in the United States."

With the period covered by Parts 1 and 2, I cannot profess any intimate familiarity. From 1861 on, however, I have had occasion to study the problem and feel that I am on familiar ground as I read your comments.

Two conflicts are age-old in the question of American military policy,—first, that between the organized militia of the several states and the regular army, and second, that between the bureau chiefs and any centralized staff control. With the second of these conflicts Secretary Root dealt comprehensively and, in my judgment, demonstrated himself to be the greatest Secretary of War the country has ever had. From the time of the passage of the General Staff Bill, however, until now, the efforts of the bureau chiefs to secure independence have been persistent, and during my administration of the War Department they nearly succeeded, but for a decision which I made on legal grounds interpreting an act which the Congress probably intended to have the effect of an entering wedge against the General Staff.

The fact is that legislative determinations of military policy are more profoundly influenced by military men than they are by the executive directly, or by spontaneous legislative impulse. Nearly every member of the House and Senate committees on military affairs, and many other representatives and senators, have pet soldiers with whom they confer and whom they regard as counsellors who will steer them clear of all the vices of opinion which they attribute to the General Staff and to the executive informed by the General Staff. Ambitious young majors and captains make the social acquaintance of senators and representatives and so impress them with their military knowledge, and thereafter the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, when they urge military legislation, find themselves facing measures and suggestions offered by members of the committees, but drawn by these ambitious and intelligent young men, which are often excellent, but more often are unconsciously influenced by bureau or arm ambition.

The worst form of this conflict arises from the presence in Washington of large numbers of retired officers who, having nothing else to do, seek to run the War Department and the army by the use of the social vehicle, and are constantly trying to restore the army to what it was in their day, having the common human belief that the Golden Age is always in the past. The most powerful influence in military affairs in Washington during the first three years of my residence there was General Ainsworth, former Adjutant General, a retired officer and an intimate friend and counsellor of Mr. Hay. I never saw General Ainsworth, but I felt his presence at every turn, and so nearly as I could discover, he was a man of great talents, but wedded to old army methods and old bureau methods and having very pronounced likes and dislikes in the army.

When I went to Washington, Secretary Garrison had resigned, and the President had accepted the Hay-Chamberlain compromise. I found it possible to exert but little influence on that bill and my acceptance of it was merely the acceptance of a fait accompli. It was the product of the attrition of the national guard lobby upon the regular army lobby, and I have always believed it was probably as effective a compromise as could have been hoped for. The use I made of it was to bring about the immediate federalization of the national guard, and the disturbance on the Mexican frontier gave us an opportunity to train the federalized militia in a way that constituted our most important preparation for the later European conflict. Fortunately, we were able to get the militia pretty nearly to war strength before April, 1917, and were therefore able to have the new army built consistently on the Draft Law without a protracted period of volunteering, which would have greatly complicated the operation of the draft.

You may be interested in the history of the Draft Law. My belief is that the suggestion came from General Leonard Wood. It came to me through Major General Hugh L. Scott, Chief of Staff, some time in January, 1917. General Scott urged that it was the democratic and effective, if not necessary, way to raise armies on a large scale, and told me that he had discussed it with General Wood, who agreed with him about it. I immediately examined the history of the Civil War draft and the British experience in the World War, and came to the conclusion that the draft was necessary to prevent the disorganization of the industries upon which the war depended, and the continuity of other vital governmental operations and grave social injustices and disturbances. In addition to this, it seemed to me to assert the obligation of national defense in the only way consistent with fundamental democratic theory. Having reached this conclusion, I took the matter up with the President. We discussed it perhaps for an hour, at the end of which time he told me that he was satisfied that my conclusion was right and that I should start immediately to prepare a suitable law and that if we actually came to war, he would ask draft legislation in his war message to Congress. I called General Enoch Crowder, then Judge Advocate General, to my office and asked him to prepare the law. General Crowder is a brilliant and accomplished lawyer and a thoroughly informed student of military history. He expressed grave doubts that such a law would be accepted by Congress or the country. I told him that question was decided and that he should prepare the draft. This he did in cooperation with me. For several weeks we discussed, daily, difficulties and policies which arose as the law was being drafted. Finally, when the President read his war message, he did include a request to the Congress to enact a draft and promised that a suitable law would be presented. On the same afternoon, General Crowder and I took the draft to the Congress and started discussing it with the committees. In the Senate the difficulty was not great. In the House it was very great. The President did use his influence to the limit to get the bill through and I spent weeks considering and rejecting compromises suggested by members of Congress, with the result that the bill was enacted substantially as presented.

I, of course, note the contrast you draw between the President's unwillingness to press the continental army of Mr. Garrison, and the vigor with which he fought for the Selective Service Law. In the one case, the President was merely cooperating with the Congress in the determination of a permanent military policy; in the other, as Commander-in-Chief, in the presence of actual major war, he was demanding fight instruments to accomplish an urgent purpose. This, I think, accounts for the difference in his point of view and action.

Cordially yours,
(Signed) NEWTON D. BAKER
NEWTON D. BAKER

THE CHANGING ROLE OF THE NATIONAL GUARD

BENNETT M. RICH AND PHILIP H. BURCH, JR.

Rutgers University

The dual status of the National Guard as a component of the national defense establishment and as a military force under state control has long been an object of Congressional and military concern, and lately has drawn some scholarly attention. It has not been generally appreciated, however, that without benefit of legislation or much public notice the domestic function of the Guard has been subtly and radically transformed during the past decade. From an embodiment of force it has become largely an instrument of rescue and relief. The change appears to be bringing a welcome increase in local prestige to this sometimes neglected and often controversial organization. But it suggests a serious problem in case an atomic attack should result in the mobilization of the Guard into national military service just at a time when its new domestic services are most urgently needed at home.

Prior to World War II, governors called upon the National Guard to perform a variety of policing activities, such as the suppression of race riots and the control of labor disputes. Particularly during the depression, the Guard was called out to combat local disturbances and to curb labor-management conflicts. Lapses of gubernatorial discretion in this period were not infrequent.

The preservation of law and order of course remains a Guard function, though the instances are few within recent years. Prison riots have provided some occasions. In 1954, to take a more unusual example, the murder of the prospective State Attorney General resulted in a proclamation of martial law at Phenix City, Alabama. Local law enforcement authorities were replaced by Guardsmen who for 214 days assumed responsibility for the management of municipal affairs.<sup>1</sup> In October, 1955, the National Guard was called out to put down the violence which erupted during a labor-management dispute at New Castle, Indiana.<sup>2</sup> Widespread rioting at the time of the February, 1956, national stock car races at Daytona Beach, Florida, led to the mobilization of local Guard units.<sup>3</sup> Notwithstanding these and other cases of law enforcement duty, the policing function has been progressively overshadowed by the development of the state military bodies as community service organizations.

Since 1945, indeed, recourse to the National Guard for police work has fallen off so drastically that such an event today elicits considerable controversy. State executives have become increasingly cautious about summoning the Guard in the name of maintaining the peace. Their present reluctance is due in part to the accelerated growth of the regular state police forces within the last two decades. In mid-1938 the total strength of all state police organizations was a mere 8,413.<sup>4</sup> Two states, Nevada and Wisconsin, had fewer than a dozen

<sup>1</sup> U. S. Annual Report of the Chief, National Guard Bureau, 1955 (Washington, 1956), p. 8.

<sup>2</sup> New York Times, October 11, 1955, p. 1.

<sup>3</sup> New York Herald Tribune, February 27, 1956, p. 1.

<sup>4</sup> The Book of the States 1939-40 (Chicago: The Council of State Governments, 1939), p. 133. Florida had no state police organization until 1939, and many states restricted their police to highway patrol.

men each. As of June 30, 1953, on the other hand, the national total had risen to 21,632,<sup>5</sup> almost as many as New York City maintains. Other factors are the growth of a prosperous economy, the stabilization of labor-management relations, and the hostility of labor unions to National Guard intervention in industrial disputes. Outbreaks of overt racial antagonism such as frequently led to the mobilization of the Guard during the 1920's and 1930's have also fallen off sharply. In spite of recent tensions over the segregation issue, racial conflicts had not, until the Clinton, Tennessee incident in August, 1956, been of such magnitude as to compel any governor to order units of the Guard into action.

National Guard assistance to stricken communities has increased perceptibly during the last three decades. Between World War I and Pearl Harbor, this was, as a rule, viewed with skepticism. The prevalent attitude during the early twenties was aptly expressed by the officer in charge of National Guard affairs in the First Corps area:

Investigations and reports, [he declared] . . . indicate that this (community service) duty is most demoralizing to the morale of the National Guard. It has stopped recruiting and has no military value as instruction. It is, however, of splendid value to the citizen and has furnished ample protection to life and property.<sup>6</sup>

The frequency of National Guard community service work rose from an annual national average of four instances in the early twenties to nine at the close of the decade.<sup>7</sup> The trend did not increase appreciably during the 1930's. Since World War II, however, the yearly incidence of Guard aid to the community has doubled. Recognition of its growing importance was reflected rather belatedly in the annual reports of the National Guard Bureau after 1948, under the heading "Service to the State and Community."

The service trend has been most pronounced in connection with floods. Previously, National Guard activity in flood-damaged areas was, in general, limited to the prevention of looting. The devastating floods along the Ohio Valley in the spring of 1936 afforded numerous illustrations.<sup>8</sup> In New England too, state troops were placed on patrol duty in practically every major community along the Connecticut and Merrimack Rivers. When flood waters again inundated the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys in 1937, thousands of Guardsmen were mobilized in four different states to protect abandoned homes and stores from pillage.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Ibid., 1954-55, pp. 282-283.

<sup>6</sup> U.S. Annual Report of the Chief of the Militia Bureau, 1922 (Washington: 1922), p. 43.

<sup>7</sup> These figures of Guard duty are approximations. The annual reports of the National Guard Bureau relating to the use of state military forces " . . . are very general in character, are lacking in detailed information, and are not regarded as either complete or authoritative. . . ." U.S. Annual Report of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau 1936 (Washington: 1936), p. 16. In addition, the content of these reports has varied greatly over the last thirty years. Some accounts contain an elaborate description of National Guard state activity, while others do not carry a single line on the subject. This absence of uniform reporting standards still persists.

<sup>8</sup> E.g., New York Times, March 21, 1936, p. 7.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid., January 28, 1937, p. 16.

The character of the National Guard's community service has altered markedly in the last decade.<sup>10</sup> The former emphasis on patrol duty has shifted to more extensive participation in the evacuation of flood victims, the establishment of relief centers, and the provision of emergency medical supplies and treatment. The National Guard today also employs its technical skills and equipment during and after an emergency. In addition to its manpower, it has at its disposal aircraft, communications systems, and amphibious and heavy equipment vehicles. Forest fires and serious storms furnish another type of occasion for help. In addition to actual fire-fighting, Guard units now supply food and shelter to the homeless and provide communications services to fire-fighters. A common form of National Guard assistance to communities ravaged by hurricanes or tornadoes is the establishment of field kitchens for the hungry and the utilization of local armories for housing the temporarily displaced. Air National Guard units from Louisiana and California flew in emergency supplies to aid local detachments on the scene in relief and reconstruction work following the famous Texas City explosion of April, 1947; this was an unusual example of interstate cooperation.

National Guard community services have not been confined solely to major disasters. Mercy flights frequently include the transportation of desperately ill persons to distant hospitals and the carrying of rare serums to meet special emergencies. The Guard has often been called upon to assist in searches for lost or marooned persons, escaped criminals, and possible victims of accident or foul play. During a drought in the New Orleans area in 1950, Guardsmen car-

<sup>10</sup> A survey entitled Participation of National Guard Units in Post-War Civil Emergencies was prepared in October, 1953, by Ruthrauff and Ryan, Inc., a research agency, for the National Guard Bureau. According to this report, the incidence of Guard state activity from 1947 to 1953 was as follows:

Type of Activity	Number of Instances	Per Cent
Floods	115	29.7
Windstorms	59	15.2
Search for lost persons	55	14.2
Fires and Explosions in cities	24	6.2
Forest fires	23	5.9
Transportation of ill or injured persons and medical supplies	23	5.9
Snowstorms	20	5.2
Traffic and crowd control	15	3.9
Aircraft and train wrecks	14	3.6
Strike duty	8	2.1
Search for escaped prisoners and prison riot control	6	1.6
All other	25	6.5
Total	387	100.0

For an earlier, though incomplete, compilation of National Guard action during the 1918-1947 period, see pp. 180-181 of Reserve Forces for National Security, Report to the Secretary of Defense by the Committee on Civilian Components (Washington: 1948). For a detailed list of National Guard state action from 1934 to 1935, see 80 Congressional Record, 2069-2081. Current illustrations will be found in the annual reports of the National Guard Bureau, 1947 to 1954.

ried in over a quarter of a million gallons of water for drinking and cooking purposes. In the middle of a severe winter the Minnesota National Guard transported much-needed provisions to Indians isolated in the northern part of the state. At the request of the United States Forest Service in 1954, an Idaho unit fired high-explosive shells into the base of great over-hanging slabs of snow to eliminate the possibility of an avalanche in Sun Valley. In order to reduce the death toll over the 1954 Labor Day weekend, 682 Michigan Guardsmen were called out on a volunteer basis.<sup>11</sup> Connecticut followed suit on Memorial Day, 1956.

This sort of record of community service in recent years is an important factor in the increased prestige which the Guard has come to enjoy. The role of the individual members has been in large measure reversed. Guardsmen now are called upon principally to help their neighbors, in marked contrast with their former all too frequent duty of being arrayed, in battle garb, against the people of their own communities.

How far this trend will go depends in part upon appropriate recognition by state and federal officials of its value. State use of the Guard may easily be abused. Individual Guardsmen are being asked as volunteers in some states to bear burdens which should be shared by the entire citizenry. Community service action by the Guard is often not officially authorized, for to do so would entail the expenditure of state funds. In an emergency, individual units may be ordered into action on a volunteer basis by their local commanding officers. The state headquarters has little recourse but to condone this. Fighting a fire or a flood would seem to offer practical training, especially in combatting an atomic attack, but this duty is not recognized for training purposes by the federal authorities, and consequently no federal payments accrue. If both the state and the nation benefit from the Guardsman's action, it can be argued that both levels of government should share in the costs.

The community service function of the Guard raises questions concerning future policy. For example, is the civilian defense and disaster control effort being slowed by state reliance upon the Guard? In previous decades the Guard was sometimes used as an inexpensive substitute for a state police. There is a danger that today the Guard may be considered an inexpensive substitute for a civilian defense and disaster control organization.

A more basic question is whether the community assistance activities should be assumed by other agencies. As a component of the Ready Reserve the National Guard is subject to immediate mobilization and assignment whenever the armed forces of the nation are needed. In World Wars I and II virtually the entire Guard was utilized. In the Korean incident selected units were mobilized for national purposes. Almost certainly, any war emergency would deprive the states of their military units. Their principal resource against disaster would suddenly disappear.

Initial steps toward the provision of alternative sources of trained manpower have taken two forms. One is through legislative authorization for civil defense forces to operate in the event of disaster.<sup>12</sup> However, in most states the civil defense forces are not sufficiently organized, trained or equipped to cope with a disaster of any magnitude. They would be hopelessly, indeed dangerously, inadequate in the event of civil disorder.

<sup>11</sup> John W. Lederle and Robert H. Pealy, "'Halo' over Michigan Drivers," State Government, XXVII (December, 1954), 252-254.

A second alternative is to organize additional state military forces. In 1955 Congress was persuaded to enact legislation authorizing this.<sup>13</sup> The argument of its proponents was summed up by the Assistant Secretary of the Army:

Present law prohibits peacetime State military forces other than the National Guard. Therefore, State Militia, needed to perform internal security or civil-defense missions when the National Guard is ordered away in Federal service, cannot be organized and maintained now. Such forces should be made ready before any emergency when their immediate availability could be decisive.<sup>14</sup>

The 1955 act does nothing more than authorize additional state military forces. The federal government assumes no responsibility. The entire cost of organizing and training a second body of troops thus would rest upon the individual states, though the federal government might, of course, distribute surplus equipment as was done for State Guard units in World War II.

Thus far, the new legislation has produced no significant results. Governors and state legislatures are preoccupied with meeting public demands for schools, highways, and other services. In most states, a request for funds to set up a substitute military organization would have low priority. The recent act therefore offers little hope for those seeking additional protection against disaster. Indeed, authorizing the states to organize new military forces, unrestrained by federal standards of training and discipline, has opened the door to possible new risks if the authority were suddenly invoked in a time of panic.

A better alternative might simply provide for the enlargement of the Guard with a mutual federal-state understanding that, in the event of Guard mobilization for national purposes, a small percentage of each state's total manpower and equipment would be retained for local emergencies. To hold back perhaps ten or fifteen percent of the troops would negate to some degree the present theory that each state's force constitutes an integral part of the whole defense system. But some adjustments would have to be made under existing conditions. From an enlarged Guard, a reserve could be drawn which would more than suffice in the event of minor civil disorder. Such a body would also provide the trained and disciplined nucleus essential for the support of civilian defense and disaster control agencies.

<sup>12</sup> As of mid-1955 forty-one states had passed enabling legislation. The Book of the States 1956-57. (Chicago: Council of State Governments, 1956), p. 348.

<sup>13</sup> 69 Stat. 686.

<sup>14</sup> Statement of Hugh M. Milton II, Assistant Secretary of the Army, in Hearings Before the Committee on Armed Services, United States Senate, 84 Cong. 1 sess, on H.R. 7289, July 28, 1955 (Washington: 1955), p. 6.

ONE-PARTY POLITICS AND THE VOTER*

WARREN E. MILLER

University of California (Berkeley)

The existence of one-party systems of politics within the larger framework of the democratic society merits an increased share of the attention of students of American politics. For too long the common conception has been that one-party politics is a problem unique to the Southern states. This misconception persists even though systematic studies such as the monumental work of V. O. Key and Alexander Heard have illustrated that the politics of the so-called Solid South is in many respects the politics of the nation.<sup>1</sup>

As a case in point, an examination of the composition of contemporary legislative delegations indicates that monopolistic control of elective offices is clearly not the exclusive province of the Southern Democrats. In 1955, three out of every four state legislative bodies or congressional delegations were so completely dominated by a single political party that that party controlled more than 66 per cent of the members of the group. Excluding the 15 Border and Southern states, fully half of the remaining 33 state legislatures were controlled by one party holding at least two out of every three seats; in only six states was the controlling margin below 55 per cent. Within the same group of non-Border, non-Southern states, 25 of the 33 congressional delegations were dominated by one party controlling two-thirds or more of the delegation members; only four delegations were so evenly divided as to give the majority party less than 55 per cent of the members.

Perhaps somewhat more familiar to students of political statistics is the knowledge that over three-fourths of all congressional districts can be classified as relatively safe districts in which a candidate representing the majority party can count on receiving at least 55 per cent of the two-party vote for his office.<sup>2</sup>

The following discussion will suggest that fundamentally important aspects of the political process may be discovered if attention is focused on the phenomenon of single-party dominance of politics. In an attempt to illustrate one version of the "proper" focusing of attention, the discussion will be addressed to the task of describing some of the effects, or some aspects of the impact, which single-party dominance has on the political behavior of the individual voter.

* This analysis is based in large part on data from a national sample survey conducted by the Survey Research Center, University of Michigan, under the sponsorship of the Political Behavior Committee of the Social Science Research Council. While the author is grateful to the Center and the Committee for access to the data, neither the Center nor the Committee bears any responsibility for this analysis. The author is also indebted to Joseph Humorestok, University of California, for his most valuable assistance in planning the analysis of data on which this discussion is based, and to Angus Campbell, Director of the Survey Research Center, for his critical appraisal of and contribution to the subsequent interpretations.

<sup>1</sup> V. O. Key, Jr. and Alexander Heard, Southern Politics in State and Nation (New York 1949). See also V. O. Key, Jr., Politics, Parties and Pressure Groups, 3rd ed. (New York, 1953), pp. 224-31, and American State Politics (New York, 1956).

<sup>2</sup> Malcolm Moos, Politics, Presidents, and Coattails (Baltimore, 1952), pp. 24-29.

In the general case, the phenomenon with which we are concerned may be said to be the relative extent of single-party dominance of politics. However, the process of concretizing this statement forces us to make at least two tentative, restrictive assumptions before proceeding with an analysis of the phenomenon. Inasmuch as "dominance" can be found at many different levels of politics (precinct, ward, city, county, congressional district, state, regional) and with respect to almost as many different levels of government (city, township, county, state, or nation), we will have to define the limits of our initial investigation in a rather arbitrary fashion. The major independent variable as we shall treat it will be the relative one-party dominance which obtains in the two-party vote division among voters of a single county. The particular vote division selected for study will be that found among the votes cast for President in 1952.<sup>3</sup> The assumption that dominance within the county is a meaningful form or locus of dominance will be supported in the discussion which follows. The question of whether dominance on other levels may be more meaningful must be tested by an independent investigation. Similarly, the assumption that the vote for President is, in fact, the vote most pertinent for most people in defining political dominance must, in an independent context, also be tested.

The counties to be studied, 72 in number, are further defined for us by the availability of relevant and crucial data. They are the counties included in the Survey Research Center sample of the adult citizens of the United States as that sample was selected for the SRC study of the 1952 presidential election.<sup>4</sup> Because of the rather unique nature of the two-party competition in the South in 1952, an additional 23 counties representing the 15 Border and Southern <sup>3</sup> The time base selected for study is also more or less arbitrarily chosen. The entire analysis reported here was also carried out using the average division in votes cast for President over the years 1936-1948. The pervasiveness of the swing to the Republican presidential candidate in 1952 resulted in a relatively even shift of from 10 to 15 percentage points, from the 1936-1948 average, in most of the areas with which we shall be concerned. Consequently, the two analyses (one using the period 1936-1948 as a base, the other using the one year, 1952) are completely parallel with respect to most major findings. The final selection of 1952 as the base year followed from two major considerations. (1) The analysis is not centrally concerned with problems of historical trend or development. The assumption that significant trends did—or, indeed, did not—precede the 1952 election constitutes an assumption that lies outside the framework of the analysis. Although the historical or developmental context of the analysis is, for the most part, ignored in this discussion, it clearly calls for careful examination as a separate enterprise. (2) All of the survey data used in the analysis pertain to the election of 1952 and have been validated only for that election.

<sup>4</sup> With the exception of the county election data, all of the data presented in this discussion were produced by the SRC study. A full description of that study, and of the data reported here, may be found in the volume The Voter Decides, by A. Campbell, G. Gurin, and W. E. Miller (Evanston, 1954). It should be noted that this investigation of one-party dominance was not anticipated in the design of the SRC study. Many of the apparent inadequacies in the data should be interpreted with this in mind.

states are not included in the present analysis, but are reserved for a subsequent and separate investigation.<sup>5</sup>

Throughout the analysis, persons residing in the 72 counties are studied not as residents of particular counties but as persons who have experienced one of four different types of one-party dominance. The counties, and thus the persons in the sample, are subdivided into four categories ranging from one group representing the most pro-Democratic counties in the nation (outside of the South), through two intermediate groups of counties, to a group at the other extreme representing the most pro-Republican counties. We are not particularly interested in what happens in the "pure-type" Democratic counties or in "Republican" counties as these categories might be defined by some absolute norm. We are interested, rather, in what happens to voters who live in counties that are more, or less, predominantly Democratic (or more, or less, predominantly Republican) than other counties with which they can be compared. Consequently, attention is not focused on any one or two categories of counties. Instead, the analysis emphasizes the relationships which are found to inhere in the continuum of relative partisan dominance.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Preliminary investigation of the Southern and Border state data indicated substantial discontinuities between them and the data representing the rest of the nation.

<sup>6</sup> This is an important consideration which governs the categorization of counties. As can be seen in Table I, the "most Republican" counties were in 1952 more extremely pro-Republican than the "most Democratic" counties were comparably pro-Democratic. If the 1936-1948 average were used, instead of the data for 1952, the situation would be reversed (without seriously rearranging the counties), with few or no counties being as extremely pro-Republican as their most pro-Democratic opposite numbers. The difficulty of attempting to decide what absolute standards are sufficient to define "extremely Republican" or "extremely Democratic" under two such different situations as represented by the 1936-1948 period and the one year 1952 is avoided, without adjusting or otherwise violating the data, by the use of the relative "most Republican" and "most Democratic" designations.

Tables II, III, and IV, and the exploratory analyses on which they are based, provide an empirical justification for talking about counties as being distributed on a continuum of greater-to-lesser Democratic (or Republican) dominance. Adoption of a fixed breaking point to define one-party control would seem to imply a discontinuity, or at least curvilinearearity, in relationships which, in fact, has not been observed in these data. One might assume, for example, that a partisan division as extreme as 70-30 would indicate a qualitatively different situation from that indicated by any more evenly balanced division, such as 65-35, 58-42, 51-49. One might assume further that once the 70-30 point was reached,

FIG. 1

The subsequent discussion will be divided into three parts. We will first attempt to validate the simultaneous use of aggregate election data and individual survey data. We will next study the effects which single-party dominance has on relationships between each of three motivational variables and the voting behavior which is associated with them. Finally, attention will be given to the problem of discovering segments of theory which will satisfactorily knit together all of the relevant data.

I

The first two tables of data to be presented give us no new substantive information. They merely serve as a means of demonstrating the validity of the survey sample and of the basic process of studying individual motivation and behavior with the aid of aggregate election data. These tables illustrate the close relationship found to exist between the official county election data and the individual data gathered in the sample survey of the national population. Those deviations which can be observed in the relationships are all well within the limits of probable sampling error. Table I indicates that, as should be expected from an adequate sample, reported individual behavior varies directly with the aggregate data of which the individual reports are but small samples.

In the major analysis of the SRC study, a good deal of attention was given to demonstrating that selected motivations were highly related to voting behavior. Inasmuch as the data were collected in a survey of the national population, they were individual rather than aggregate or group data. The more extreme divisions would not alter the essentially "one-party" nature of the situation. If this set of assumptions were to be verified, one would then expect a general case of relationships involving party dominance and any other related factor to be something like that in Figure 1. In Figure 1, of course, co-variation between party dominance and Factor "X" is found only in the middle of the two-party vote range and disappears when either party gains complete control. In all relevant instances in the analysis with which this discussion is concerned, the observed relationships were of the general type where co-variation extended in an apparently linear fashion from one extreme of partisan dominance to the other as in Figure 2. There was no indication that a real breaking point did in fact exist near either end of the dominance continuum. Consequently, the use of the concept of a continuum of relative dominance not only provides a needed solution to the methodological problem involved, but also appears to provide the solution most compatible with the relevant data. This is not, of course, intended to constitute an argument that all relationships involving party dominance are linear, nor that they are necessarily continuous.

FIG. 2

TABLE I. REPORTED VOTE FOR PRESIDENT AMONG RESIDENTS OF FOUR GROUPS OF COUNTIES

Partisan Dominance, in Terms of Democratic % of Two-Party Vote for President, 1952, by County	Respondents' Reported Vote for President
	Democratic	Republican	Non-Voter	Total
20%-30%* ("Most Republican")	48 (26%)	140 (74%)	28	216
31%-40%	93 (35%)	169 (65%)	57	319
41%-50%	138 (44%)	173 (56%)	67	378
51%-60%† ("Most Democratic")	104 (51%)	101 (49%)	42	247
				1,160‡

* Includes 27 cases from two counties with Democratic proportions of 18% and 19%.

† Includes 9 cases from one county having a 62% Democratic vote.

‡ Fourteen cases where the vote of the respondent is unknown are excluded from this and all other tables.

data described three different types of reaction to political phenomena. The types were designated as Party Identification, Issue Orientation, and Candidate Orientation. Each of these variables was operationally defined so that the intensity and direction (partisanship) of each motivation possessed by a person could be inferred from the data relevant to that person.

TABLE II. INCIDENCE OF POLITICAL MOTIVATIONS* AMONG RESIDENTS OF FOUR GROUPS OF COUNTIES

Partisan Dominance Democratic % by County	Motivations Associated with Political Preference									Total
	Party Identification			Issue Partisanship			Candidate Partisanship
	Demo.	Neut.	Rep.	Demo.	Neut.	Rep.	Demo.	Neut.	Rep.
20%–30%	71 (45%)	59	86 (55%)	57 (38%)	67	92 (62%)	22 (18%)	96	98 (82%)	216
31%–40%	110 (49%)	95	114 (51%)	102 (47%)	103	115 (53%)	46 (23%)	118	155 (77%)	319
41%–50%	163 (60%)	105	110 (40%)	135 (52%)	119	124 (48%)	74 (32%)	149	155 (68%)	378
51%–60%	128 (66%)	54	65 (34%)	97 (61%)	89	61 (39%)	55 (42%)	117	75 (58%)	247
										1,160

* For a description of the definitions and meaning of these motivations, see Campbell, Gurin, and Miller, The Voter Decides, Part II.

Table II is perhaps the more important of the first two tables in that it demonstrates that the incidence of the sample of individual motivations related to the presidential vote varies appropriately with variations in a total count of the aggregate voting behavior of the counties. As the Democratic proportion of the two-party vote within the county increases, reading from top to bottom in Table II, so the incidence of motivations associated with the Democratic vote undergoes an increase relative to the incidence of pro-Republican motivations.<sup>7</sup>

II

Having established the congruence of the two sets of data being used, we can next turn to the major analytic considerations. The addition of Tables I and II to previously published data establishes that each of three variables is positively and to a significant extent associated with the other two. In The Voter Decides it was demonstrated that individual motivations are positively and significantly associated with individual voting behavior. We have observed (in Table I) that individual data relating to voting behavior are appropriately associated with aggregate data also related to voting behavior. We have also observed (in Table II) the existence of the expected relationship between individual motivational data and aggregate voting data. The next question concerns the possibility that, despite the uniform consistency of these relationships, the degree of association between individual motivational data and individual voting data may somehow be affected by variations in the variable measured or "indicated" by the aggregate voting data. Does a variation in one of three interrelated factors influence or otherwise affect the interrelationship of the other two? We shall explore two sets of data in an attempt to answer this question. In the first instance, we shall utilize the four categories of partisan dominance to examine the two-party vote division within a single category of motivation. In the second instance, we shall also utilize the four categories of party dominance, but we shall be concerned with what at first glance seems to be no more than the mirror image of the first set of relationships, namely, the incidence of each motivational factor within single categories of voting behavior. In other words, we shall first study the voting behavior of persons with selected motivations and we shall then turn around and study the motivations of selected groups of voters.

Before examining the first set of data, two of the logical possibilities might be noted. We could expect either that (1) the relationship between individual motivations and behavior would be affected by the political environment provided by the county or that (2) it would be independent of variation in the political complexion of the county. If the former obtains, the data will demonstrate that the voting behavior of persons sharing a particular motivation is not uniform but varies with some regularity in accord with, if not in response to, the variation in the two-party division within the county. If, on the other hand, the motivation-behavior relationship is independent of the political environment supplied by the county, persons who have a given motivation and who reside in one group of counties should divide their votes in the same manner as other persons who possess the same motivation but who live in a different group of counties.

<sup>7</sup> Inasmuch as the individual vote-motivation relationships have been established elsewhere (see The Voter Decides, Chs. 7-9), Table II indicates that these relationships are so high that they persist even when one variable (voting behavior) is only indirectly reflected by the two-party division of all voters in the counties in which the possessors of these motivations being measured reside.

When we utilize the four categories of partisan dominance within the counties to provide four different circumstances for studying the vote division within a single category of motivations, it becomes apparent that some factor associated with the partisan dominance which prevails in the counties does affect the motivation-vote relationship. As an example we may look at the voting behavior of persons exhibiting Democratic Issue Partisanship. The proportion of individuals who voted for Stevenson in each of the four groups varied consistently, with Stevenson receiving least support from persons of Democratic issue persuasion who resided in the "most Republican" counties and most support from residents of the "most Democratic" counties. This is expressed in Table III by numerical entries which indicate that Stevenson enjoyed a margin of 52 out of every 100 person who were Democratic Issue Partisans in the extreme Democratic counties (specifically, out of each 100 members of the adult citizenry, 69 voted for Stevenson, 17 voted for Eisenhower, and 14 did not vote at all), against a margin of only one person out of every 100 Democratic Issue Partisans in the extreme Republican counties (where 44 voted for Stevenson, 43 voted for Eisenhower, and 13 were non-voters).<sup>8</sup> Table III presents a summary of the data showing the relationship

TABLE III. THE VOTING BEHAVIOR OF PERSONS WITH SELECTED MOTIVATIONS, AS RELATED TO COUNTY ENVIRONMENT

Partisan Dominance Democratic % by County	Motivations Associated with Political Preferences*
	Vote of Party Identifiers			Vote of Issue Partisans			Vote of Candidate Partisans
	Demo.	Neut.	Rep.	Demo.	Neut.	Rep.	Demo.	Neut.	Rep.
20%-30%	18*	-46	-90	1	-37	-74	-9	-21	-71
31%-40%	33	-16	-85	5	-17	-64	41	1	-62
41%-50%	52	-26	-84	33	-5	-60	42	11	-54
51%-60%	48	-22	-72	52	-15	-56	47	11	-48

* The entry in each cell is an index of voting partisanship. It is derived by subtracting the proportion of Republican voters from the proportion of Democratic voters. An index of 100 would indicate that all persons voted Democratic, while an index of -100 would indicate 100 per cent Republican voters.

* Because of the complexity of the data involved, the relative margin of support (or opposition) will be used throughout the analysis as a summary index of the distributions being examined.

between the division of votes cast for President and the county environment, for persons exhibiting all three types of each of the three different motivational factors.

In Table III it can be seen that in every one of the 18 possible comparisons among persons exhibiting a pro-Republican motivation, but living in different categories of counties, the same impact of the partisan complexion of the county is demonstrated. The more pro-Republican the county, the larger the proportion of Eisenhower voters among persons with a common motivation predisposing to an Eisenhower (or Republican) vote. In 17 out of 18 comparisons, the same effect of the county environment can be noted for relationships involving pro-Democratic motivations. (The one exception involves the two bottom categories under Democratic Party Identifiers.) The chances are infinitesimally small that two such patterns of consistent relationships would occur by chance. Moreover, in most instances the differences between the extremes are large enough to warrant confidence at the one per cent level that such individual differences are not merely the result of sampling error.<sup>9</sup>

Neither the patterns nor the absolute differences are quite as striking for the various groups of "neutral" persons. Nevertheless, the impact of county environment on these groups is quite unmistakable and is consistent, in 14 out of 18 comparisons, with the findings relative to the motivated groupings. The systematic analysis of the neutral or non-partisan persons lies outside the present discussion. It might be noted, however, that "neutrality," as indicated by the measures of the three motivational variables, includes both indecision or conflict and lack of involvement. Unresolved conflict and lack of involvement both could be expected to produce a blurred perception of political phenomena or a reduced degree of sensitivity to the political environment, and either of these phenomena, in turn, might well explain the variations in question.

<sup>9</sup> An extension of the analysis indicates that the uniformity of the three motivation-vote relationships is not merely the result of the fact that each motivational factor is correlated with each of the other two as well as with the vote. First, the voting behavior of persons with different motivational patterns was examined. Persons possessing strong pro-Democratic motivations (pro-Democratic on all three factors or pro-Democratic on two and neutral on one) voted more heavily Democratic in extreme Democratic counties (with a Voting Partisanship Index of +70) than in extreme Republican counties (where their Vote Index dropped to +36). Similarly, persons exhibiting mildly pro-Democratic motivations (pro-Democratic on one factor and neutral on two, or pro-Democratic on two and pro-Republican on one) varied consistently from a +43 Vote Index in Democratic territory to +24 in Republican country. The comparable data for persons with Republican motivations showed the same pattern of consistent relationships.

In a second test, each segment of Table III was reproduced, but with the second and third motivational factors controlled. Although the number of comparisons was limited because of insufficient cases in many cells, this procedure again supported the thesis that each relationship observed in Table III exists independently of the other two factors. It should also be noted that the functional relationship between the county vote and the individual vote raises the possibility that the persistence of this relationship under the controlled conditions depicted in Table III is artifactual. Although this possibility cannot be denied with certainty, the preponderance of judgments obtained from statisticians on this point supported the presumption that the findings were, in fact, not spurious.

The most basic conclusion to be drawn from Table III is that the minority party suffers, as the majority party profits, from the lack of balance in the county division of partisan strength. The minority party not only has fewer persons possessing or exhibiting motivations supporting it (see Table II), and consequently fewer persons voting for its leading candidate than does the majority party (see Table I), but also receives smaller dividends from its supporting motivations. Conversely, the ratio of motivations to votes is much lower among majority party supporters.

The observed relationship is at least superficially similar to that noted by Schattschneider and others with respect to voting strength and success in electing candidates in two-party competition.<sup>10</sup> Just as the minority party seldom elects its "fair share" of candidates for office, so in the phenomenon with which we are concerned the minority fails to receive its "fair share" of votes if the relative incidence of supporting motivations is used as the criterion of fairness.

This finding may have more than incidental relevance for the understanding of the effectiveness of campaign activities. There is a strong suggestion that minority party campaigning is, perhaps to a larger extent than has been suspected, a discouraging, uphill battle. Given the very fact of minority status, one can expect that local organizational activity is at a minimum. Moreover, the situation seems to be one in which even if the "message" of the minority party can be conveyed to the voters (whether through organizational activity or through effective use of the mass media of communication), the results will be less than satisfactory. With proportionally less activity, or at least with proportionally less success in implanting the proper motivations, the majority party can hope for greater returns at the polls from its efforts than can the minority strategists. A corollary of this may be that, given a choice of action and limited resources, campaign activities will produce maximum results if concentrated in areas of strength rather than in areas of weakness. The notion that a party can do better by attempting to win votes in territory monopolized by the other party than by reworking friendly territory should at least be subject to modification. Unless there are virtually no additional votes available in one's own territory, effort expended there may well produce larger dividends than if the same effort is devoted to gaining converts from enemy territory.<sup>11</sup>

A second, and perhaps more important, implication relates to the persistence of one-party politics. Since this analysis does not, at this point, deal directly with the development or evolution of the political structure, we are limited to speculation concerning tides and trends in politics. The above finding does suggest, however, that if—through whatever course of events—one-party dominance becomes established in a county, its very existence works against a redressing of the political balance and a revival of two-party competition. Much further investigation is needed before this suggestion, or hypothesis, can be established as a working description of this aspect of American politics. However, given the extent to which one-party politics dominates the local political scene of today, the testing of the hypothesis would appear to deserve high priority. It may be that, barring the intervention of events of major social or economic importance, the second party in local politics fights not for eventual primacy and dominance but merely to avoid extinction as a real political force. Demonstration that this is the case would provide crucial information relevant to a re-evaluation of the theories of democratic representation as well as to a reappraisal of the significance of federalism in American politics.

<sup>10</sup> Elmer E. Schattschneider, Party Government (New York, 1942), pp. 74-80.

<sup>11</sup> This suggestion is made without benefit of insight into the nature of the effects which county environment may have on the evolution of political motivations. Although this is a fit subject for further study, we are here concerned only with the subsequent problem: given motivating factors, however developed, what effect does county environment have on the relationship between them and individual voting behavior?

Before attempting additional statements of the implications of this finding, we must consider the second instance in which the effect of single-party dominance in the county is noticed in the motivation-vote relationship. Up to this point we have been looking at the voting behavior of persons with a particular political motivation. We may also turn the data around and look at the motivations of persons with a particular, reported kind of voting behavior.<sup>12</sup>

Given the data observed in Table III, it would still be quite possible to find any one of three relationships obtaining between variations in the political environment furnished by the county and variations in the incidence of motivations within groups of Democratic and Republican voters. It might be discovered, for example, that all four groups of Democratic voters, regardless of county environment, display the same "amount" of identification with party, adherence to party-line on issues, or support for party candidate. It might also be, and this perhaps a bit more in line with traditional expectations and speculation, that the less support a party's voters receive from their county environment, the more they behave like beleaguered and outnumbered intruders in hostile territory. From this latter base we would perhaps intuitively expect that voters whose party has something less than unanimous support in their county might, both logically and within the mathematical limits of the data, show more in-group feeling, more homogeneity with respect to partisan motivations, than would fellow members of their party who reside in counties in which their party is more dominant. Conversely, the third possible relationship, and the one which in fact tends to predominate, would find more heterogeneity, or less unity and less homogeneity, among voters who receive less reinforcement from their county environment. In Table IV it can be seen, for example, that in line with this third possibility, each 100 Democratic voters in the extreme Democratic counties boasted 19 more Stevenson supporters, as measured by Candidate <sup>12</sup> It should be noted that the presence of a relatively large number of persons with no observed partisanship, relative to any one motivational factor, and the existence of a sizable group of non-voters allows these two ways of studying the vote-motivation relationship to produce results which are complementary but which have quite different implications. See note 9, above.

Partisanship, than Eisenhower supporters, while Democratic voters in the most Republican counties were split exactly 50-50 in their preference for the two candidates.

TABLE IV. THE MOTIVATIONAL CHARACTERISTICS OF SELECTED GROUPS OF VOTERS, AS RELATED TO COUNTY ENVIRONMENT

Democratic % by County	Motivations Associated with Political Preferences*
	Party Identification of Voter			Issue Partisanship of Voter			Candidate Partisanship of Voter
	Demo.	Non- Vote	Rep.	Demo.	Non- Vote	Rep.	Demo.	Non- Vote	Rep.
20%-30%	79	- 4	-37	33	7	-38	0	-29	-49
31%-40%	66	12	-43	25	17	-27	9	-18	-63
41%-50%	75	34	-42	40	30	-37	13	- 4	-55
51%-60%	73	48	-33	57	5	-25	19	5	-42

* The entry in each cell is an index of motivational partisanship. It is derived by subtracting the proportion of persons with a pro-Republican motivation from the proportion with pro-Democratic motivation. An index of 100 would indicate that all persons in the group exhibited a pro-Democratic motivation, while an index of -100 would indicate unanimous pro-Republican motivation.

The general finding for both Republican and Democratic voters, with respect to Issue Partisanship and Candidate Partisanship, is that minority voters demonstrate less unity or homogeneity and more heterogeneity than do their majority counterparts.<sup>13</sup> These findings do not hold, however, with respect to Party Identification.<sup>14</sup> No significant relationship exists between county environment and Party Identification, either for Democratic or for Republican voters.

Insofar as the Democratic voters are concerned, the data related to all three factors are clear and unambiguous. It will be noted, however, that there are three deviations in Table IV in the data on issues and candidates. One of these, the relatively low pro-Eisenhower motivation found among Republican voters in most Republican counties (indicated by a Candidate Partisanship Index of -49), is large enough to warrant brief comment.

It might be thought that these Republican voters included a relatively <sup>13</sup> Hereafter, when intra-party comparisons of groups of voters are made, the terms minority and majority will be used. The discrimination will be made only on the base of lesser and greater support from county environment. Thus, Democratic voters in counties voting 41-50 per cent Democratic will be minority voters when compared to Democratic voters in the 51-60 per cent Democratic category, and they will be majority voters when compared to Democratic voters in counties voting 31-40 per cent Democratic.

<sup>14</sup> For either Issue or Candidate Partisanship, the probability is less than one out of 100 that the observed relationship occurred by chance. For Party Identification, the combined data for both Democratic and Republican voters approach a completely random distribution. Out of 12 possible comparisons, six conform to the pattern observed for Issue and Candidate Partisanship and six run directly counter to that pattern.

greater proportion of Taft supporters than were to be found among Republican voters in less predominantly Republican counties. However, shortly before the election all respondents were asked whether they would have preferred some other nominee, and the eventual Republican voters in the extreme Republican counties indicated no greater preference for Senator Taft, nor any less satisfaction with Eisenhower, than did the other three groups of Republican voters.

It is also possible that intra-party factionalism may be responsible for a part of the ambiguity in the data. It might be hypothesized that factionalism tends to develop when one party is so dominant as to be able to afford the luxury of internal dissension or when the opposition party is so hopelessly outmanned as to reduce interest in the local two-party competition. In the absence of real competition, partisans of both persuasions may become so preoccupied with internal conflict as to give the impression that they are, in fact, less than completely devoted to their respective parties.<sup>15</sup> This hypothesis would, of course, be most clearly sustained if the indicators of the partisanship of groups of voters indicated great homogeneity for both parties in evenly divided counties and, at the same time, indicated least homogeneity for the dominant as well as the subordinate party in the extreme counties. In terms of the 1952 election, the extreme counties (outside the South) were pro-Republican; the most pro-Democratic counties were, in fact, relatively evenly divided. A positive test of the suggested role of factionalism should find, therefore, maximum homogeneity for both parties in the "most Democratic" counties and maximum heterogeneity among voters of both parties in the "most Republican" counties. Such was, most unmistakably, not the case. Consequently, we are limited to concluding that factionalism (1) may reduce the magnitude of some relationships and (2) may be responsible for some of the discrepancies and aberrations in other instances.<sup>16</sup>

It should also be pointed out that the deviations may be chance phenomena which occur as a function of the sampling process and do not necessarily, therefore, represent evidence contradicting the basic findings. In any event, none of the three deviations noted in Table IV provides sufficient grounds for dismissing the remaining consistencies with respect to Issue and Candidate Partisanship as not meriting further attention. Rather, we may conclude that the data clearly indicate minority group heterogeneity with respect to the two motivations involved.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>15</sup> V. O. Key, Jr., "The Direct Primary and Party Structure: A Study of State Legislative Nominations," this Review, Vol. 48, pp. 1-26 (March, 1954).

<sup>16</sup> Another possible explanation might be thought to lie in the distribution of 1948 Truman supporters who voted Republican in 1952. Some 10 or 11 per cent of the residents in each group of counties are to be found in this category of 1948-1952 switchers. Removing them from the columns of Republican voters does not, however, greatly change the entries in Table IV and does not eliminate the aberrations.

<sup>17</sup> Because our concern is with understanding the behavior of voters, we shall not examine in detail those data in Table IV pertaining to non-voters. Nevertheless, it should be noted that the non-voters appear to be extremely sensitive to their political environment; with but one deviation they reflect in all three motivations the relative impact of the postulated differences in environment.

Turning to the third factor being examined, the evidence indicates a uniformly high sense of Democratic Party Identification among Democrats, regardless of the county environment in which they find themselves. The level of identification is somewhat lower for Republican voters, but it also appears to be quite uniformly pro-Republican. The data suggest, then, that, of the motivational factors under investigation, Party Identification shows the greatest resistance to the assault of the countering majority forces of county environment.

A review of the major tables indicates two broad conclusions. Table III demonstrates that persons exhibiting partisan motivations, either Democratic or Republican, give their respective parties less frequent support at the polls if they live in a community where those motivations are in the minority than they do if they live in a community where their points of view are in the majority. Table IV illustrates that minority voters show markedly less evidence of supporting or reinforcing Issue and Candidate Partisanship than do their majority counterparts, but they do not show any less evidence of identification with the party they support at the polls. There is no support for the notion that the minority voter reacts to his minority status by accentuating his devotion to his party and to its leaders and policies. Instead, the minority voter appears to do no more than match the sense of identification with party which the majority voter expresses, and he actually shows less evidence of commitment to the candidates and issues which he supports with his vote.

III

While these conclusions seem to constitute a new and possibly useful description of the role of single-party dominance in American politics, they also provide a series of new challenges. A corollary of the second conclusion, in particular, challenges the student of politics to pursue the implications of the findings, particularly with reference to the nature of change in two-party political competition over time. In the absence of some fifth factor which contributes to partisan motivation and which is distributed in such a manner as to offset the impact of the community environment and the accompanying diminution of vote-supporting Candidate and Issue Partisanship, the explanation which the data provide for the votes cast by minority voter groups seems clearly less adequate than that offered for the voting behavior of majority groups. Despite (or because of) the lack of relationship between Party Identification and county environment, when variations in voting are controlled as in Table IV, it is apparent that when all the motivational factors are considered together, minority voters exhibit significantly fewer "supporting" motivations (motivations which are consistent with and which may be held to "explain" their voting behavior) than do majority voters.<sup>18</sup> The interpretations which may be advanced to accommodate this finding are many.

<sup>18</sup> If one were to assume that under most circumstances Party Identification, too, gives less support to minority voters than to majority voters, the problem of explaining the minority vote would, of course, only be accentuated.

First, one may consider the notion that it only looks as though we have an authentic photograph of the Indian rope trick: when the next frame is developed we will find that the minority voters were not suspended in mid-air but were really in the process of plunging to earth. Somewhat more formally, it can be suggested that minority voters constitute groups significantly less stable than those composed of their majority counterparts. We may have observed them at a time when they had lost some of the motivational underpinnings of their accustomed political behavior, but before this loss was manifested in an actual change in the behavior itself. At the risk of suggesting an unduly simple and overly mechanical model for the analysis, it may well be that as the motivation-to-vote ratio is decreased, the subsequent behavior becomes less predictable, less stable, and more equivocal. Inasmuch as the groups of voters were defined in terms of a portion of that subsequent behavior, the validation of this thesis depends on utilizing other indicators of instability.

A number of preliminary tests were conducted in an attempt to assess the relative stability of minority voter groups. Three aspects of voting behavior were examined: time of arriving at final vote decision, consideration given to voting for the other candidate, and extent of ticket splitting. These items were presumed to be crude indicators of individual voters' indecision and vacillation.<sup>19</sup> A careful scrutiny of their incidence among the groups of voters did not disclose any evidence of disproportionate instability in the 1952 election on the part of minority voters, either Democratic or Republican.<sup>20</sup>

A fourth attempt to test for instability by referring to reports of previous voting behavior produced conflicting and consequently ambiguous findings. An examination of the respondents' reported 1948 voting behavior disclosed that, in 1952, 32 per cent of the reported Truman voters in extreme Democratic counties (extreme majority Democrats) either did not vote or else voted for Eisenhower. The proportion of defecting, i.e., unstable, Truman voters increased steadily to 33, 36, and finally to 49 per cent in extreme Republican counties. On the other hand, this pattern of higher instability and defection among minority groups did not hold for the Dewey voters of 1948; moving from extreme Republican counties to extreme Democratic counties, the proportion of defectors in 1952 held constant at nine or 10 per cent.

<sup>19</sup> For discussions of the use of these items as indicators of instability see Morris Janowitz and Warren E. Miller, "The Index of Political Predisposition in the 1948 Election," Journal of Politics Vol. 14, pp. 710-27 (June, 1952), and also The Voter Decides, pp. 17-26. It should be noted that the absence of supporting partisanship is not the same as absence of the motivational factor. Of the two dimensions measured for each factor, intensity or strength and direction or partisanship, we are concerned only with the latter.

<sup>20</sup> It is, of course, conceivable that we are observing a rather unique threshold-contingency relationship between motivational factors and behavior. If an individual's motivation is sufficient to produce a vote, it is also sufficient to produce the entire range of behaviors open to citizens; the addition of motivational factors, as in the case of the majority voters, does not produce any additional variance in behavior. Such an explanation is less than satisfactory on theoretical grounds and runs counter to observed relationships involving the same data. See The Voter Decides, Chs. 10, 11.

These first attempts to interpret the data by documenting a part of the dynamic nature of American politics were thus less than spectacularly successful. It is apparent, however, that less ambiguous indicators of instability, combined with panel-derived records of voting behavior over time, are needed to provide a satisfactory test of the utility of this particular line of speculation.

A second study of the theme of political change involves shifting from a concern with voting behavior to further consideration of Party Identification. It seems clear that for voters who were in the minority in their home communities, Party Identification in 1952 performed a relatively more important function in guiding their political behavior than it did for their fellow partisans who were in the majority in their respective communities (relative, that is, to the other motivational factors examined). Moreover, it does seem evident that, of the three factors, Party Identification is most likely to endure and persist unchanged over time. Candidate and Issue Partisanship of necessity depend for much of their existence on the quadrennial redefinition of the issues of political battle and on the selection of new champions. The parties, however, live from election to election as among the most durable of our political institutions. This aspect of American politics facilitates the carry-over of identification with a party to a greater extent than it permits reaffirmation of personal allegiances or crystallization of ideology.

However, it is less than clear that Party Identification will, through time, be able to sustain the loyalty and maintain the support of the minority party members for their party, given the relative absence of reinforcement from the other motivations which we have studied. It is quite possible that Party Identification is only somewhat more resistant to environmental influences than are the other partisan motivations. Examination of the respondents' recall of changes in Party identification indicated that in 1952 one out of five persons had a sense of identification, or of independence, which differed from a prior partisan identification which they remembered. The reported changes constituted a net loss for the Democratic party of some six per cent of the electorate, distributed uniformly in all four categories of counties. However, when these changes were computed as a proportion of the total number of persons who were currently identified with a given party or who had at some earlier time been identified with that party, the findings paralleled those involving 1948-1952 changes in voting behavior. The Republican losses were not related to party dominance; the Democratic losses were apparently quite clearly related. Some 35 per cent of one-time Democratic identifiers in extreme Republican counties now, in 1952, called themselves Independents or Republicans; the Democratic losses in heavily Democratic counties were only slightly over 20 per cent.

On the other hand, an investigation of changes in identification among the voters of 1952, disclosed a very different situation. To maximize reliability, the data for both Democratic and Republican voters were combined, and the voters were categorized on a majority-minority dichotomy (instead of on four degrees of difference in partisan dominance). Among minority voters there were 75 persons whose identification had changed in favor of the party they supported at the polls, compared with only 28 persons who were now less closely identified with their voting party than they had been, a ratio of 2.7 to 1. Among majority voters, the ratio was 84 to 44 or 1.9 to 1. This provided some small evidence, that, contrary to the above indications, more change in Party Identification may take place in defiance of the community environment than takes place in accord with that environment.

Pending further study of Party Identification, it may be profitable to explore other theories of political behavior which may be applied to our present problem. One such possible explanation of the data we have examined would seem to be provided by a theory of persistence of one-party dominance advanced by Berelson, Lazarsfeld, and McPhee in their analysis of voting behavior in Elmira, New York. The authors of Voting suggest that:

"the stability of a [political] preference . . . varies with the chances of social support for it. And the chances of social support for given political choices, in turn, vary with the distribution of such preferences in the particular segment of the community. Within a given group, then, the political majority holds the informal social pressures to stay a majority. . . . The circumstances that produce an unequal distribution of political preferences within a group also produce an unintended means of maintaining the inequality—namely, unequal chances for social support of unpopular views in the group. . . . An example illustrates the arithmetic of this result. Take a group of 100 people with 80 holding a preference and 20 not holding it. Suppose the subsequent rates of change were exactly proportionate to the chances of each type being matched in social discussion with a randomly chosen friend holding the opposite view. Then the majority would lose at only one-fourth the rate of the minority, say, 10 per cent versus 40 per cent defection from each. This would seem discouraging to individual proponents of the unpopular view and satisfying to the stable popular majority, but, in fact, each would have exchanged the same number (i.e., 8 adherents) with the other. Thus they would remain the same in size."<sup>21</sup>

The relevance of this statement to our present problem is quite clear. Unfortunately, the statement reflects the single community context of its origin in that it does posit an absence of change in the aggregate division of strength between major and minor parties within a community. Election statistics demonstrate, of course, that change does occur within many communities in each election, and the present analysis has been forced to deal with the nationwide sum of these changes which took place between 1948 and 1952.<sup>22</sup> However, the Voting statement is directed at analyzing the unequal division of strength with which we are confronted and it is specifically concerned with the fate of minority party voters in one-party communities. Furthermore, this theory might be thought to hold great promise precisely because it does add to our construction a new, non-motivational concept of the process of social (or political) change. There are, however, major obstacles to be overcome once the attempted application of the theory to our data is undertaken. In the first place, if the assumed randomness of person-to-person interaction is granted (although the Elmira data repeatedly demonstrate that interaction in matters political is anything but random), the theory of major party-minor party exchange of personnel apparently rests on an assumed randomness of the results of interaction. In the hypothetical example given, 16 "interactions" are said to produce eight defections from major to minor party and eight defections from minor to major. Unfortunately for our present purposes, however, this seems to assume, in turn, that major and minor party members possess equal degrees of partisanship, whereas our problem exists precisely because minority partisanship apparently does not equal majority party partisanship. It would not seem reasonable to expect an even 8-8 division if the major party adherents were strongly partisan and the minor party adherents only mildly convinced of their own partisanship. Rather, the results of interaction between major and minor party adherents would seem to be a function of the strength of partisanship as well as of the opportunity for interaction. This would seem to be particularly true in the situation in question. Our differences in intensity of partisanship are to be found in precisely those areas which presumably form the basis for political interaction and discussion, namely, considerations of governmental policy and the personal characteristics of the candidates.

<sup>21</sup> B. Berelson, P. F. Lazarsfeld, and W. N. McPhee, Voting (Chicago, 1954), p. 126 and note 2, pp. 126-27.

<sup>22</sup> The authors of Voting were, of course, aware that external events do alter the equilibrium which they posit in their analysis.

One difficulty with using some of our data to amend the Voting theory lies, of course, in the fact that the combined results of change proportionate to opportunity for interaction and change proportionate to strength of partisanship may not produce the stable, unchanging aggregate majority-minority division of the vote which the theory was originally intended to explain. Any majority-minority differential in strength of partisanship might be expected to produce an erosion in the numerical strength of the party with weaker partisans. Inasmuch as we have observed that minority party voters do tend to be weaker partisans than do majority party adherents, we might now expect their number to diminish rather steadily. As we have noted, however, the data of the SRC study did not support the hypothesis that such erosion was in progress in the Fall of 1952.

This line of reasoning is closely related to a second major implication of the one-party dominance thesis as originally presented in Voting. It would seem to follow from the example reproduced from Voting that the minor party groups would, over a relatively short period of time, come to be composed largely of former major party members.<sup>23</sup> The implication of the Voting theory would seem to be, for example, that Democratic voters in the extreme Democratic counties should count a smaller proportion of former Republicans in their midst (as 80 Democrats become 72 Democrats and eight Republicans after one exchange of personnel) than would Democratic voters in extreme Republican counties (when 20 Democrats become 12 Democrats and eight Republicans). Data on voters' reported party regularity in previous elections gave no support to the expectation that there would be such dilution or disproportionate heterogeneity on the part of minority party adherents in our sample of the national population.

<sup>23</sup> Even if it were assumed that all inter-party exchange was provided by the same relatively small group of changers who circulate, election-to-election, from one party to the other, still we should find at any one point in time that minor party members were relatively more heterogeneous in terms of previous political affiliation and experience, than their counterparts who were fortunate enough to reside in predominantly friendly territory.

It is, however, quite possible that the rates of exchange and the rapidity with which new party members shed all evidence of past allegiance proceed much faster than we have anticipated. (The numerous assumptions which have been made about the rate of change and the accompanying characteristics of change should serve to point up the pressing need for continued research in this area of politics.) It is consequently possible that the suggestions advanced by Berelson and his associates can be sustained as the basis for a theory of one-party politics if some notion of non-random, aggregate change is accepted.

In the meantime, however, prudence calls for at least a minimal respect for the accretions of relevant data. Giving such data the benefit of the doubt in this instance, we may summarize the attempt to apply the Voting theory of persistent one-party dominance as follows: the assumed randomness of interaction must be rejected (on the basis of data presented in Voting as well as data to be found in the SRC study) and the assumed randomness of the results of interaction should be rejected (on the basis of the observed differential in majority-minority partisanship). Moreover, our attempts to tamper with the Voting theory produced theoretical implications which, in turn, were also denied by the data.

Finally, it should be noted that a return to tentative acceptance of the notion that Party Identification plays a crucial role in sustaining minority voters carries with it some important implications for the other bits of theory which have been discussed. In the first place, a serious question is raised about an original assumption of this analysis. The assumption was that the qualitative differences distinguishing the motivational factors from each other could be ignored in the study of one-party politics, in favor of emphasizing the strong commonality of their relationship to political behavior. This assumption was proved incorrect early in the analysis and subsequent attempts to reintroduce it in terms of a probability theory of the role of motivations also met with defeat. Instead it is clear that, for many purposes, the interaction of motivational factors must be analyzed in such a fashion as to allow for wide variations in the essential meanings which can be attached to the different combinations of the factors.<sup>24</sup>

A second and closely related implication of our examination of one alternative hypothesis which might reconcile our data may be stated as the observation that probability theories applied to the nature and results of face-to-face interaction in the political process must be greatly modified if they are to overcome the obstacles discovered in this investigation. If the data of our analysis are at all typical of the data relevant to this aspect of politics, it would seem that they demand such substantial modifications of the specific probability theory advanced in Voting as to minimize appreciably the value of that theory. It should be noted, however, that a major part of the problem may well be related to the attempt to utilize a theory of face-to-face, personal interaction to explain data pertaining to national phenomena and secondary group identification.

<sup>24</sup> It might be noted in passing that serious attention could not be given this admonition in the current analysis because of the restricted size of the sample. Early efforts to analyze the various patterns of motivation which might be associated with varying states of one-party dominance were abandoned when it became obvious that the number of cases in crucial cells too frequently diminished beyond the point of no return.

A third implication of the theorizing about Party Identification relates to the need for a further understanding of the nature and role of group identification in general and of Party Identification in particular. If we are correct in concluding that an identification with a secondary group has, under certain conditions, more meaning for the individual than have many more immediate, proximate pressures, it behooves us to give increased attention to delineating the nature of the historical and political conditions under which this is true.

SUMMARY

One-party dominance of politics militates against the effectiveness of minor party motivations in producing minor party votes and increases the effectiveness of major party motivations in producing voting support for the major party. This may result in facilitating majority party campaign accomplishments and in limiting the effectiveness of minority campaigning. It may also bear responsibility for sustaining one-party political systems and working against eventual equalization of party competition at the level of local political units.

One-party dominance of politics is associated with divisiveness, lack of unity, and a significantly high degree of heterogeneity among rank and file minor party voters with respect to felt partisanship for candidates and issues.

The incidence of Party Identification does not vary with changes in political environment, at least insofar as minority voters are concerned. It appears to be the one factor of those examined which sustains the minor party vote, independent of the partisan complexion of the local political environment. Any diminution of the role of Party Identification in voting behavior might well result in a lack of unity and cohesiveness among minority voters which could, in turn, lead to a persistent erosion of minority party strength. Were this to occur, it could be expected that the already high degree of single-party dominance of American politics would be accentuated to a perhaps dangerous extent.

VERBAL SHIFTS IN THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY: A CONTENT ANALYSIS

JAMES W. PROTHRO

Florida State University

I. PROBLEM AND HYPOTHESIS

The resurgence of conservatism may be described as the most significant post-war development in American thought. "No intellectual phenomenon has been more surprising in recent years," Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., concedes, "than the revival in the United States of conservatism as a respectable social philosophy."<sup>1</sup> No longer can one lament, as Alpheus T. Mason did in 1948, that "conservatism, once more than respectable political theology (especially among the educated), now carries overtones of reaction well nigh as discrediting as the rabidities attributed to communism."<sup>2</sup> Intellectual spokesmen are now, on the contrary, making a concerted effort to revisit and revitalize the conservative point of view.<sup>3</sup>

Although most of this "egg head" element in the conservative camp may be, and has been,<sup>4</sup> dismissed as expressing an anachronistic yearning for the anti-commercial traditions evolved in British feudalism, the business leaders whom they neglect have themselves been revising and actively selling a conservatism that appears to be more closely related to the realities of the American social situation. Russell Davenport and the editors of Fortune have turned to business rather than to a nonexistent American aristocracy for leadership in meeting the mass demands for economic security.<sup>5</sup> Contemporary business spokesmen may be no more enthusiastic than their predecessors in the 1920's about the "Welfare State," but their opposition seems more clearly focused on the state as the agent for its realization than on the goal of mass welfare and security as such. That these business spokesmen, unlike the academic "New Conservatives," have a real role in the Eisenhower administration is plain.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> "The New Conservatism: Politics of Nostalgia," The Reporter, Vol. 12, p. 9 (June 16, 1955).

<sup>2</sup> The Democratic Process: Lectures on the American Liberal Tradition (New London, 1948), p. 32.

<sup>3</sup> See e.g., Francis Wilson, Case for Conservatism (Seattle, 1951); Russell Kirk, The Conservative Mind: From Burke to Santayana (Chicago, 1953); Clinton Rossiter, Conservatism in America (New York, 1955); and Peter Viereck, Conservatism Revisited: The Revolt Against Revolt (New York, 1949). The current appeal of conservatism among academicians is perhaps best attested by the fact that critics of the "New Conservatives" now argue, not against the defects of their conservatism, but that they are really liberals without knowing it. See Bernard Crick, "The Strange Quest for an American Conservatism," The Review of Politics, Vol. 17, pp. 359-76 (July, 1955).

<sup>4</sup> See Schlesinger, op. cit. The most conspicuous exception to this charge is Professor Rossiter, who holds that "the full conservative tradition, a graft on feudalism, simply will not flourish on this soil." "Toward an American Conservatism," Yale Review, Vol. XLIV, p. 357 (Spring 1955).

<sup>5</sup> U.S.A., The Permanent Revolution (New York, 1951). And see Clarence B. Randall, A Creed for Free Enterprise (Boston, 1952).

<sup>6</sup> A. A. Berle, Jr., "Businessmen in Government: the New Administration," The Reporter, Vol. 8, pp. 8-12 (February 2, 1953).

It is not surprising, then, that the old individualistic dogmas seem to be in similar process of modification in the hands of the political leadership of American conservatism. President Eisenhower's incomplete search, despite the assistance of some of the country's most efficient advertising men, for an appropriate slogan to describe his public philosophy—with "progressive moderation" being replaced by the equally equivocal "dynamic conservatism"—reflects at least an uneasiness about the appeal of Hoover-style Republicanism. The apparent contrast between this emerging point of view and that of pre-New Deal conservative spokesmen<sup>7</sup> suggests the importance of systematic analyses of shifts in conservative thought as a problem for students of American political theory. Specifically, it suggests the hypothesis which this article will attempt to examine. The New Deal, it is submitted, involved the addition of a permanent increment to the main body of the American tradition, establishing beyond effective challenge the concept of government responsibility for alleviating mass economic distress, on the assumption that such distress stems from impersonal forces beyond the control of the individual rather than from personal deficiencies. On the basis of this fundamental assumption, it is hypothesized that one evidence of such a change will be found in the failure of politically successful spokesmen for the conservative point of view to reject the basic political appeals of the New Deal. It is further hypothesized that the apparent reluctance with which this shift was made, under pressure of the general acceptance of New Deal appeals, will be reflected in a retention of many symbols of pre-New Deal style.

This two-fold hypothesis could be tested in a variety of ways, one promising possibility being the examination of changing voting behavior in Congress. Another appropriate method, and that which will be followed in this study, is the analysis of important policy pronouncements from the supreme headquarters of American politics—the office of the president. Although the vote is clearly a more crucial indicator of political attitudes than purely verbal behavior, the difficulty of aligning congressmen into conservative and liberal groups, the unquestioned pre-eminence of the president as party leader, and the great weight attached to his considered promises and recommendations on policy all appear to support this as an appropriate approach to the hypothesis presented.

II. METHOD

The method of content analysis for this problem is chosen in the hope that the hypothesis is formulated with sufficient precision to permit the application of quantitative methods to a field of political science that has been perhaps the least responsive to refinements in methodology. The materials selected for analysis are the first acceptance speeches, inaugural addresses, and state of the union messages of presidents Hoover, Roosevelt, Truman, and Eisenhower. Roosevelt and Truman were chosen because of their association with the New Deal, Hoover and Eisenhower because of their leadership of the conservative party in the immediate pre- and post-New Deal periods. In keeping with the hypothesis, the political appeals and symbols of the two Democrats should differ (in the same direction) from those of Hoover, whereas Eisenhower should endorse or at least fail to reject the New Deal appeals while offering symbols more like Hoover's.

<sup>7</sup> See the author's The Dollar Decade: Business Ideas in the 1920's (Baton Rouge, 1954), especially pp. 209–21.

The addresses picked to reflect the policy orientations of the presidents may be more easily explained in terms of their importance and comparability than their number. Each appears to represent the most important statement involving a particular type of appeal, the acceptance address oriented to the party, the inaugural to the general public, and the State of the Union Message to the congress. In addition to the time-consuming nature of content analysis, two factors explain the decision not to add more speeches. First, it would be impossible to make additions without destroying the balance among the three types of audience orientation: two more campaign and state of the union messages could have been added but at the cost of under-representing the type of general appeal to the nation found only in the inaugural. Although three speeches from each president seem at first glance too few for this argument to hold, it will be seen, in the second place, that the nature of the units of analysis is such as to offer a universe of considerable magnitude without going beyond these singularly important sources.

The first category chosen for the analysis, of the "what is said" or substance type,<sup>8</sup> is the political appeal, which is utilized to classify the subject matter of the different political arguments, proofs, or themes offered by the presidents. For this category the thematic paragraph is the recording unit—"the smallest body of content in which the appearance of a reference is counted"—and the paragraph is the context unit—"the largest body of content that may be examined in characterizing a recording unit."<sup>9</sup>

A second category is the demand symbol, which is considered in terms of its direction as well as its substance; for this category the single word or term is the recording unit and the paragraph the context unit. Adopting Harold Lasswell's definition, demand symbols are taken to be the "meaning events" in a medium of communication which "refer to objects of preference or determination, or are utilized in expressing preference or determination."<sup>10</sup> The meaning events thus excluded are identification symbols, which are here defined as neutral references to persons or groups, e.g., "we Americans," or "Russia," and acceptance symbols, which "are objects of reference in acceptance statements, or are utilized in making the reference," i.e., those which reflect "matter-of-fact assumptions about the shape of events in the past, present, and future."<sup>11</sup>

<sup>8</sup> For the types of categories employed, and on content analysis in general, see Bernard Berelson, Content Analysis in Communication Research (Glencoe, Illinois, 1952).

<sup>9</sup> Harold D. Lasswell, Analyzing the Content of Mass Communication: A Brief Introduction (Washington, 1942), p. 16.

<sup>10</sup> "Describing the Contents of Communications," in Propaganda, Communications, and Public Opinion: A Comprehensive Reference Guide, ed. Bruce L. Smith, Harold D. Lasswell, and Ralph D. Casey (Princeton, 1946), p. 85.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., pp. 85, 82.

Operating with these definitions, the same word or expression may, of course, be counted differently in different contexts. As Lasswell puts it, "... when 'national unity' or 'social security' are objects of preference or determination, they count as demand symbols; when only acceptance statements are made about them, they are acceptance symbols."<sup>12</sup> Demand symbols alone are considered in this study because the hypothesis focuses attention on attitudes rather than cognition.

Although analysis in terms of these two categories should suffice for the examination of the hypothesis, a third category has been added to help account for the influence of changes in world conditions on the political appeals and symbols employed. This is a simple category for the classification of subject matter in terms of its international or domestic orientation; the paragraph serves as both the recording and context unit.

The procedures followed will be more completely reported in the presentation of the findings, but the question of validity and the procedures for testing reliability should be noted here as a final methodological problem. The demand symbols and international-domestic subject matter categories appear to offer little difficulty on the score of validity. They present the simple problem of counting the occurrence of symbols (and their synonyms) and of paragraphs devoted to international or domestic subject matter. In such cases, "there is no doubt about the validity of the analysis," according to Bernard Berelson. "The instrument measures what it is intended to measure. . . . In other words, in cases in which there is high agreement on the definitions of the relevant categories, there is little difficulty in achieving validity in content analysis."<sup>13</sup> In the identification of political appeals, however, the clarity of the basic definitions may not be so great and the problem of validity less easily dismissed. Although the attempt will be made to define the political appeals precisely, the validity of this category evidently depends on the clarity of these definitions.

For the problem of reliability, generally recognized checks are available. Two kinds of consistency are held necessary to establish the reliability of analysis of communication content: "1) consistency among analysts—that is, different coders should produce the same results when they apply the same set of categories to the same content; and 2) consistency through time—that is, a single coder or a group of coders should produce the same results when they apply the same set of categories to the same content but at different times."<sup>14</sup> In practice, such checks are reported in only one out of every five or six studies and most of these have been applied to relatively simple types of content analysis. "The reliability of a list of symbols," Berelson submits, "may be high, but the reliability of a complex . . . analysis is another matter."<sup>15</sup>

With this caveat in mind, the author repeated his coding of political appeals after an interval of several months, and induced a colleague to apply this same

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., p. 85.

<sup>13</sup> Berelson, op. cit., p. 167.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., p. 172.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., p. 173.

indicators used in coding these categories need definition here. Most of the fourteen categories in the table are, it is hoped, virtually self-explanatory; they are used here with the following meanings:

Government Aid: appeals to the wisdom or necessity of government intervention in the economy designed to promote the interests of special or general groups.

Economy, Efficiency: arguments in favor of reducing government expenses or increasing government efficiency by such devices as administrative reorganization.

Bright Realities: references to conditions regarded as highly desirable and gratifying to Americans in general, e.g., a high general level of prosperity, mass satisfaction with the contemporary state of affairs.

Peace: communications stressing the importance of achieving or sustaining a condition of peace among nations; included in this category are arguments in favor of such means to peace as United States leadership in world affairs and mechanisms of international co-operation.

Law Enforcement: appeals to the public to respect the law and promises to lead in its enforcement with impartiality and vigor.

Community Cooperation: praise of existing cooperation both within private groups and between such groups and the government and assurances of its encouragement as a device of "self-government" free from "governmental restraints."

Government Regulation: arguments stressing the wisdom or necessity of government intervention in the economy designed to regulate the behavior of special groups in the general interest.

Progress: references to progress as a viable ideal, as evidenced either by improvements in process of being made or foreseeable in the future.

Class: appeals to differences of interest between different classes, specifically between "ordinary citizens" and the "privileged few."

Economic Unity: the contention that domestic groups are economically interdependent to such an extent that no one group can prosper alone.

Social Optimism: the theme that man's difficulties result not from his own deficiencies but from impersonal forces that he is competent to alter.

Dark Realities: references to conditions regarded as highly undesirable and as deprivations by Americans in general, e.g., threats of military aggression.

Party: praise of one's own political party or condemnation of the opposing party.

National Power: arguments stressing the importance of maximizing the military and economic strength of the United States.

These same categories were applied to the same materials at a later date, and chi square values were computed as a measure of reliability. Examination of Table I for the differences in the incidence of thematic paragraphs with the six leading political appeals of the four presidents in the first and second codings

TABLE II. INCIDENCE OF SIX POLITICAL APPEALS OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AS RECORDED BY TWO CODERS OF THE SAME MATERIALS

Political Appeal	First Coder	Second Coder
Government Aid	19	21
Government Regulation	18	16
Progress	18	16
Class	7	7
Economic Unity	5	5
Social Optimism	5	9

TABLE III. LEADING DEMAND SYMBOLS OF FOUR PRESIDENTS AND THEIR INCIDENCE IN THREE MAJOR ADDRESSES*

President	Symbols	Frequency
Hoover	Law	35
	Peace	28
	Opportunity	23
	Progress	21
	Fundamental Principles	19
	Cooperation	16
	Tariff	16
	Prosperity	15
	- Crime	14
	Freedom	10
Roosevelt	Employment	22
	Action	15
	- Profit	12
	- Surpluses	12
	Economic Security	10
	- Money Changers	9
	Progress	9
	Candor	8
	- Traditions	8
	Planning	7
Truman	Peace	21
	Freedom	19
	Prosperity	17
	Equality	13
	- Privileged Few	12
	Economic Security	11
	Ordinary People	11
	Democracy	9
	- Republican Party	9
	- Communism	8
Eisenhower	Freedom	41
	Power	25
	Faith	21
	Peace	16
	National Security	14
	- Controls	11
	God	11
	Initiative	11
	Productivity	11
	- Aggression	10

* Negative symbols are designated by a minus sign preceding the symbol; all other symbols are positive.

reveals a relatively high degree of reliability in each case. Some confidence that the differences are not derived from consistent errors on the part of the author appears warranted, moreover, by the results reported in Table II. The errors of the second coder<sup>17</sup> tend to be of no greater magnitude than those of the author. The chi square value in this case is 1.4, the same as that obtained from the author's codings of the Roosevelt materials.

The coding of demand symbols, with the single word or term as the recording unit, was from a universe of 49,755 words, with a total of 1,541 symbols.<sup>18</sup> In the interest of focusing on major emphases, the ten symbols appearing most frequently in the materials from each president have been selected. These symbols and their incidence are reported in Table III.

The second coding of demand symbols, applied only to the Roosevelt and Eisenhower materials, manifests the high level of reliability that is expected for such a clear-cut category. The chi square values computed from it are, for the Roosevelt content, 0.1, and for the Eisenhower content, 0.9. The probability that values this large would occur from chance variation alone is greater than .99 in both cases.

The international-domestic subject matter findings summarized in Table IV

TABLE IV. INTERNATIONAL-DOMESTIC SUBJECT MATTER BY PARAGRAPH INCIDENCE IN THREE MAJOR ADDRESSES OF FOUR PRESIDENTS

Subject Matter	Hoover		Roosevelt		Truman		Eisenhower
	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%
International	31	13	5	4	78	35	85	37
Domestic	182	76	109	89	127	56	108	47
Unclassifiable	25	11	8	7	19	9	37	16
Total	238	100	122	100	224	100	230	100

<sup>17</sup> The author is indebted to Penrose B. Jackson for his willingness to serve as second coder.

<sup>18</sup>

DEMAND SYMBOLS DATA FROM PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESSES

President	Total No. of Words	Total No. of Symbols	Percent of Symbolism*	Incidence of Ten Lead- ing Symbols	Degree of Concentra- tion of Symbols
Hoover	22,581	540	2.4%	197	36%
Roosevelt	8,499	281	3.3%	112	40%
Truman	8,226	382	4.6%	130	34%
Eisenhower	10,449	338	3.2%	171	51%
Total or Mean	49,755	1,541	3.4%	610	40%

* This figure is obtained by dividing column 2 by column 1.

** This figure is obtained by dividing column 4 by column 2.

are recorded on the same paragraph basis that was employed in the political appeals category.

IV. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

Analysis of the findings on political appeals shows that the peculiar themes of the New Deal—the only two not characteristic of Hoover but common to Roosevelt and Truman—were arguments stressing the necessity of government regulation and the existence of class distinctions. Roosevelt's appeals to progress, economic unity, and social optimism dropped from prominence in the Truman content with the substitution of an international military crisis for the former domestic economic crisis. The reflection of this situational change is found not only in the tremendous increase in the amount of attention devoted to international problems, but also in the emergence of peace as the leading appeal of Truman.

The crucial problem for the first part of our hypothesis—that acceptance of the New Deal will be evinced by the failure of conservative political leadership to reject its basic political appeals—is the relationship of Eisenhower's appeals to those of Roosevelt and Truman. Neither government regulation nor class appears as a leading Eisenhower appeal. Indeed, the only themes not stressed by Hoover which Eisenhower has in common with a New Deal president are two appeals that he shares with Truman, dark realities and party. The focus on international problems in both cases as the dark realities and the fact that party appeals are not identified with the New Deal eliminate these similarities as supports for the hypothesis.

If the second part of the hypothesis be valid, however—that conservative acceptance of the New Deal is occurring only reluctantly, with a retention of earlier styles of symbols—frequent positive emphasis of New Deal appeals is hardly to be expected from Eisenhower. And there is one important difference between the appeals of Hoover and Eisenhower relevant to New Deal influences. Hoover's appeal to community cooperation, which strongly emphasizes the non-regulatory role of government, disappears from the arguments of Eisenhower no less than from those of Roosevelt and Truman. The fact that positive rejection of this central feature of the New Deal was a leading pre-Roosevelt conservative appeal but disappears from the prominent themes of Eisenhower lends some support to the hypothesis. That Eisenhower failed to repudiate the New Deal appeals, especially when they had been embodied in law, would by itself be only a weak support for the hypothesis. But when this is coupled with Hoover's recurrent attacks on such arguments, it does appear to confirm the postulate that the basic tenets of the New Deal can no longer be frontally attacked by the top conservative political leadership.

The quality of the change represented by this quantitatively established difference may be given greater meaning by a pair of quotations. "The larger purpose of our economic thought should be to establish more firmly stability and security of business and employment and thereby remove poverty still further from our borders," Hoover submits. "Our people have in recent years developed a new-found capacity for cooperation among themselves to effect high purposes in public welfare. It is an advance toward the highest conception of self-government. Self-government does not and should not imply the use of political agencies alone. Progress is born of cooperation in the community—not from governmental restraints."<sup>19</sup> Eisenhower's route to the same end sounds somewhat different: "This administration is profoundly aware of two great needs born of our living in a complex industrial economy. First, the individual citizen must have safeguards against personal disaster inflicted by forces beyond his control; second, the welfare of the people demands effective and economical performance by the Government of certain indispensable social services."<sup>20</sup> This "profound awareness" on the part of a Republican president of great needs demanding government intervention may, in terms of this analysis, be regarded as a progeny of the New Deal.

Whatever the basis of analysis, the findings on demand symbols serve to align the presidents into two contrasting pairs—the symbols of Roosevelt and Truman being clearly differentiated in every examination from those of Hoover and Eisenhower.<sup>21</sup> This is, of course, exactly in keeping with what one would expect from the hypothesis.

Considering first the relative emphasis on negative as opposed to positive symbols, one finds the presidents ranked in descending order of "negative symbolism" as follows: Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Hoover. Four of Roosevelt's leading ten symbols (profit, surpluses, money changers, and traditions) and three of Truman's (privileged few, Republican Party, and Communism) are negative, as compared with two for Eisenhower (controls and aggression) and one for Hoover (crime). The more frequently critical attitude of the New Deal presidents appears to be a function of their liberalism; the more nearly exclusive use of positive symbols by Hoover and Eisenhower logically appears, contrariwise, to be a product of their conservatism. This interpretation is, of course, an inference rather suggested than demanded by the content. What has been demonstrated is covariation between party identification and direction of symbolism, and this supports the hypothesis.

When classed in terms of generality versus specificity, the demand symbols of Hoover and Eisenhower are again differentiated from those of Roosevelt and Truman. Nine of the ten leading symbols of both Hoover and Eisenhower are highly generalized (the respective exceptions being tariff and a negative symbol, controls), but this is true of only three of Roosevelt's (progress, candor, and a negative symbol, traditions) and five of Truman's (peace, freedom, prosperity, democracy, and a negative symbol, Communism). The symbolism of both Republican presidents, we conclude; characteristically manifests a much higher level of generality than that of the two Democrats.

<sup>19</sup> "Inaugural Address," in Inaugural Addresses of the Presidents of the United States: From George Washington 1789 to Harry S. Truman 1949, House Document No. 540, 82nd Cong., 2nd sess., pp. 215-24.

<sup>20</sup> "The State of the Union—Address by the President of the United States," Congressional Record, Vol. 99, pp. 748-53 (February 2, 1953).

<sup>21</sup> Two themes specially stressed by Hoover, cooperation and law enforcement, may be partly attributed to factors only tangential to a liberal-conservative alignment: his Quaker background and his concern for prohibition enforcement.

Examination in terms of status quo versus reformist orientation shows similarly striking results. Eight of Roosevelt's leading symbols (employment, action, economic security, planning, and four negative symbols, profit, surpluses, money changers, traditions) and five of Truman's (equality, ordinary people, economic security, and two negative symbols, privileged few and Republican Party) carry reformist connotations. This can be said of none of those emphasized by Hoover or Eisenhower. Equally extreme is the contrast found in the fact that none of the leading symbols of Roosevelt or Truman carry implications of dedication to the status quo, as compared with five for Hoover (law, fundamental principles, opportunity, cooperation, and tariff) and four for Eisenhower (faith, initiative, productivity, and a negative symbol, controls). Again the presidents place themselves squarely in opposed camps in terms of a New Deal-conservative dichotomy.

The generality-specificity and the status quo-reformist classifications might be subsumed under a more general distinction labelled middle class versus working class symbolism. So combined, they leave Hoover and Eisenhower with ten middle class symbols each, and Roosevelt and Truman with two and five, respectively.<sup>22</sup> Other bases of classification might well be devised to order the data on symbols, but the consistency of the results already presented suggests, that, whatever the basis of analysis, Hoover and Eisenhower will be found together in a classification opposed to that of Roosevelt and Truman.

It may be noted that in every case, within their common classifications, Roosevelt occupies a more extreme position than Truman and, in the other direction, Hoover a more extreme position than Eisenhower, whenever the two are not identical. One might conclude from this, first, that increasing international responsibilities and general acceptance of the New Deal have decreased the frequency of New Deal-style symbols and, second, that Eisenhower is not so extremely different from the Democratic presidents in symbol style as Hoover. This is submitted as a tentative hypothesis for further investigation.

On the basis of the analysis of both the political appeal and the demand symbol categories, we conclude that both facets of the hypothesis have been validated. As judged by analysis of the leading policy pronouncements of Hoover, Roosevelt, Truman, and Eisenhower immediately before, during, and after their assumption of office, it may be held: (1) that the chief post-New Deal political spokesman for the conservative point of view, in contrast to his pre-New Deal counterpart, failed to reject the basic political appeals of the New Deal; and (2) that the reluctance with which this shift was made is reflected in a retention of symbols of pre-New Deal style. It is hardly necessary to add that this conclusion, like the data from which it emerges, is strictly limited to verbal behavior on the part of conservative leadership. The fact that the essential features of the New Deal can no longer be frontally assaulted by a Republican president does not preclude the possibility of such flank attacks as budgetary reductions for New Deal agencies or the vesting of administrative responsibility for New Deal functions in opponents of the programs.

<sup>22</sup> The middle class symbols for Roosevelt are progress and candor, for Truman peace, freedom, prosperity, democracy, and a negative symbol, Communism.

Going beyond the limited data of this study, it may be added that this verbal reformation of conservative political leadership appears highly similar to the post-Jacksonian change in conservative pronouncements that Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., describes as "The Whig Counterreformation."<sup>23</sup> Frank rejections of such Jacksonian dogmas as the right of every adult white male to vote disappeared once these people were granted the suffrage, just as Hoover's frequent denunciation of government regulation in the mass interest has disappeared from prominence in Eisenhower's verbalization. Moving even farther from our data, it may be asked if the fate of the Jacksonian symbols may hold a portent for the future. Robert McCloskey has ably explained the fashion in which these slogans were drained of their original implications and imbued with conservative connotations.<sup>24</sup> Should the parallel be maintained, one may speculate that there will eventually be a conservative adoption of New Deal symbols accompanied by a transformation of their meaning.

This possibility is given a certain immediacy by Clinton Rossiter's recent exhortation to conservatives that they "... should give us a definition of liberty that is positive and all-embracing, not negative and narrow. In the new conservative dictionary, liberty will be defined with the help of words like opportunity, creativity, productivity, and security."<sup>25</sup> If such New Deal symbols as "security" become the property of conservatives in their attempt to adjust to the loss of appeal of Hoover-style symbols, will the "new conservative dictionary" still give them their New Deal meanings? One might assume that the new usage of security would suggest the type of "Welfare Capitalism" urged by Fortune magazine<sup>26</sup> rather than the "Welfare State." If the academic "New Conservative" can make himself heard in political circles, it may be possible to reformulate these conjectures as testable hypotheses in the relatively near future. It is probably not an accident that some Republicans have taken to describing their views as "Jeffersonian."

V. CONCLUDING NOTE ON METHODOLOGY

Although the possibilities and limitations of content analysis have long been familiar in the social sciences, its novelty in normative political theory, the one field of political science where it is perhaps most appropriate, warrants appending a methodological note to the substantive conclusions and speculations presented above. In the first place, Bernard Berelson's insistence on the crucial character of the categories in content analysis may be underlined: "Content analysis stands or falls by its categories," he warns. "Particular studies

<sup>23</sup> The Age of Jackson (Boston, 1947), pp. 267-82.

<sup>24</sup> American Conservatism in the Age of Enterprise (Cambridge, Mass., 1951).

<sup>25</sup> "Toward an American Conservatism," loc. cit., p. 361. Emphasis his.

<sup>26</sup> See Davenport, op. cit.

have been productive to the extent that the categories were clearly formulated and well adapted to the problem and to the content. . . . Although competent performance in other parts of the analytic process is also necessary, the formulation and the definition of appropriate categories take on central importance. Since the categories contain the substance of the investigation, a content analysis can be no better than its system of categories."<sup>27</sup> Had either demand symbols or political appeals been used alone in this study, an incorrect or incomplete conclusion would necessarily have emerged. Analysis of demand symbols by themselves would have incorrectly suggested that no verbal changes of significance had taken place; use of political appeals alone would have revealed the nature of the shift, but without detecting its incomplete or reluctant character.

Berelson's warning applies equally to definitions within a single broad category. At the outset, it was planned in this analysis to use "government intervention" as a category to comprise all thematic paragraphs arguing the necessity of an active government role in the economy. Had this category not been divided, there would have been no distinction between government aid and government regulation in the coding, which would have made it difficult not only to see any clear difference between Hoover and his New Deal successors but also to understand his non-interventionist theme of community cooperation. On the negative side, it is now clear that the government aid category should have been differentiated still further. The promotional measures recommended by Hoover were almost exclusively devoted to such general or business-oriented programs as river and highway development, waterpower projects, conservation, airline and shipping subsidies, business research services, and tariff increases. "The government," he frankly declared, "can be of invaluable aid in the promotion of business."<sup>28</sup> For Eisenhower no less than Roosevelt and Truman, these promotional themes tend to be replaced or overshadowed by appeals to promotion of the economic needs of the great majority. Without categories designed to reveal it, however, this important distinction can be presented only as an impression, not as a conclusion.

More generally, it may be said that the anticipated advantage of arriving at conclusions with a measure of confidence and some assurance of objectivity and reliability appears to have been realized. The hypothesis validated in this study might have been advanced and more engagingly argued as a pre-determined conclusion with the "proof" selected by the not-so-random method of searching for supporting data. In this case, however, the area of agreement could be expected to extend no further than to those who (on the basis of their own impressionistic observations) agree with the thesis or who are overwhelmed by the literary quality of the presentation. With such positive, if modest, advantages available, it is difficult to understand the intolerant spirit in which people classified as political scientists can reject the scientific method in toto, as in cavalier references to "the all too typical methodological perfections and political irrelevancies that crown the scientific study of politics."<sup>29</sup> As applied even to such a garden-variety scientific method as content analysis, such a comment is doubly inaccurate: content analysis could appear as "methodological perfection" only in contrast to the most primitive method; it has no more inherent tendency to issue in "political irrelevancies" than the impressionistic methods. The method of content analysis is certainly not appropriate for many basic problems of political theory, but for the limited sort of problem considered here it does seem to offer some possibility of the greater precision which makes for cumulative research efforts.

<sup>27</sup> Berelson, op. cit., p. 147.

<sup>28</sup> "Address of Acceptance," in The New Day Campaign Speeches of Herbert Hoover, 1928 (Stanford University, 1928), pp. 9-44.

The data of this study are not in conformity, for example, with what one would expect from William Carleton's contention that there has been a post-New Deal "Triumph of the Moderates."<sup>30</sup> Since the evidence in support of his argument was submitted with no explanation of the rationale behind its collection, however, the contrasting conclusions are difficult to compare. In terms of the materials examined here, it would appear to be correct to speak of a triumph of the moderates only with the important qualification that there has been a general shift to the left. The "conservative" Eisenhower would have sounded "liberal" in 1932; at the highest level of leadership a verbal revolution has taken place in American conservatism.

<sup>29</sup> Bernard Crick, "The Strange Quest for an American Conservatism," The Review of Politics, Vol. 17, pp. 359-60 (July 1955). The gratuitous character of this remark, in an article re-labelling most of our professed "New Conservatives" as liberals, suggests the interesting possibility that methodological and political conservatism may be positively correlated. This condition might, indeed, be logically expected from persons at either extreme of the ideological spectrum since they would presumably be committed to politics as a vehicle for the realization of their values rather than as a subject for objective analysis. To argue that no political science is possible is a perfect rationalization for the pursuit of artistic polemics rather than scientific inquiry.

<sup>30</sup> William G. Carleton, "The Triumph of the Moderates," Harper's, Vol. 210, pp. 31-37 (April 1955).

COMMENTARY ON PROTHRO'S CONTENT ANALYSIS

HOWARD B. WHITE

New School for Social Research

James W. Prothro's hypothesis is that, while there has been a resurgence of "conservatism" in American political theory and practice, the actual intervention of the New Deal between the conservative government of Hoover and the conservative government of Eisenhower makes the complete rejection of New Deal appeals by a conservative administration difficult, if not impossible. There can be little quarrel with that thesis itself. Once given the assumptions that "conservatism" is an adequate frame of reference, that Hoover and Eisenhower may in some understandable way be classed as "conservatives," and that, since the administration did in fact reluctantly accept certain New Deal symbols, they were necessarily obliged to do so, there is some question as to whether the thesis is not obvious. Prothro, however, gives serious reasons for buttressing "impressions" with precision, and presents a careful content analysis which strengthens his argument and should serve to enhance our understanding of current political trends.

His presentation, however, raises at least three meaningful questions: whether "conservatism" is an adequate frame of reference for the discussion of political ideas, whether content analysis is a sound method for distinguishing political ideas, and whether, and under what conditions, it is useful to give scientific precision to "impressions." In exploring these questions I do not propose to pick a quarrel with Prothro. Differences will come out in the discussion, but the larger problems relate to the general study of political theory, and the exploration may at times take me far from the specific questions raised in Prothro's scholarly paper. I fully sympathize with the author's impatience with those who reject the scientific method on purely aesthetic grounds. By all means let us seek precision, as far as that can be had, on all levels of investigation.

I.

The question whether "conservatism" is a suitable frame of reference for the study of what Prothro calls "normative political theory" takes us far beyond any single application of that frame. He himself says that the "resurgence of conservatism may be described as the most significant post-war development in American thought." (p. 726) Whether this is in fact so is not the same question as whether it is a suitable frame of reference, but the answer to the second question is clearly and radically affected by the answer to the first. Prothro himself, it seems to me, rests his case not simply on the "meaningfulness" of the content but also on the meaningfulness of the frame of reference. I, however, do not think that the "resurgence of conservatism" is "the most significant post-war development in American thought." I even suspect that, by definition, it cannot be. Prothro makes a distinction between the academic "New Conservatives," who may possibly "be dismissed" and the business leaders who seem to him to be "selling a conservatism" . . . "more closely related to the realities of the American social situation." I do not think, however, that significance in political thought can be measured by the role a group of men play in a particular administration, particularly if we can accept the judgment of James Reston that this administration "is not one of originators and thinkers."<sup>1</sup> The significance of any body of thought cannot rest solely on the political position or the number of its adherents, particularly when measured over a very few years, but on whether or not they are right; or at least on the claim they make to inquire into the most important political questions. Since some at least of the proponents of the "New Conservatism" associate that with "aristocracy" and the "aristocratic spirit," the democratic standard of numbers could not, on their own terms, indicate their significance.<sup>2</sup> Indeed, Clinton Rossiter says that the most important "element in the Conservative mood is the aristocratic spirit" and adds that the Conservative "is moved almost to tears by noblesse oblige." If so, the interpretation of Samuel Lubell that the nation is "struggling to give effective voice and force to (its) conservatism"<sup>3</sup> is largely irrelevant. When a successful political movement in modern America is brought to power by a voting population that is moved almost to tears by noblesse oblige, we shall have radically to revise our analyses of voting behavior.

It is to those whom Prothro calls the academic "new Conservatives" that we must look for the significance of conservatism in post-war American thought and as a frame of reference. Obviously no thorough examination of neo-conservative arguments can be conducted here. It must suffice to say that some of those who made this contribution to American political thought have consciously and deliberately limited its philosophic significance, as they are, I believe, obliged to do. If, as Rossiter claims, the first part of the Conservative's mission is the defense of the established order, its defense must take precedence over its understanding.<sup>4</sup> Rossiter does not, I believe, mean that he would defend any established order regardless of its injustices. Generally Rossiter and other New Conservatives seem to restrict conservatism to a particular period of history (roughly since Burke) and to a particular framework of constitution (roughly liberal constitutional government).<sup>5</sup> But the very defense of just this order assumes a superiority which non-loyal, philosophical inquiry cannot assume. Neo-conservatism, I think, assumes a starting point where philosophical

<sup>1</sup> New York Times, August 3, 1956, p. 7.

<sup>2</sup> Russell Kirk, The Conservative Mind (Chicago, 1953); pp. 9-10, 54 ff.; Clinton Rossiter, Conservatism in America (New York, 1956), pp. 50-51, 166-68, and passim; Rossiter, "Toward an American Conservatism" in 44 Yale Review (Spring 1955), especially p. 362, in which the "bold conservative thinker" must try "describing the process through which plutocracy may become aristocracy." Rossiter understands that that is no easy task.

<sup>3</sup> Conservatism in America, p. 50; Lubell: Revolt of the Moderates (New York 1956), pp. 3-4.

<sup>4</sup> Op. cit. 52.

<sup>5</sup> Rossiter, op. cit., pp. 10, 16; Yale Review, loc. cit., pp. 356-7; Kirk, op. cit., pp. 3 ff., 423; Peter Viereck, Conservatism Revisited (New York 1949), also stresses the modern historical period, while paying tribute to pre-modern roots.

speculation (and therefore "significant political thought") may conceivably end but cannot begin. It happens that many conservatives share in the search for natural right, but, insofar as they are genuinely conservative, they must be ready, for all or for most practical purposes, to accept the old as the good. I do not say that there is anything wrong politically with such an acceptance. It is, however, fundamentally unspeculative, as Rossiter grants,<sup>6</sup> and it is therefore fundamentally unphilosophical, even anti-philosophical.

What the New Conservatives have taken from Burke, whom they so resolutely admire, is less the Burkean debt to Aristotle than the Burkean departure from Aristotle: the tendency to abhor dangerous speculation rather than to present it in a prudent setting, and to substitute a conventional aristocracy for the natural, non-conventional aristocracy of the classics. Burke's natural aristocracy is, I think, almost the opposite of Aristotle's.<sup>7</sup> I make the comparison not to pre-judge the case in favor of Aristotle but to suggest a certain relation between philosophy and history.

Conservatism cannot be, I think, a sufficient frame of reference for "normative political theory" because it is fundamentally historical rather than philosophical. That does not deny that it may be very sound politics, at least at times. Nowhere is that clearer than in the treatment, in some of the works of New Conservatives, of the role of religion in western society. They hold religion, particularly Christianity, as an essentially conservative force. Yet that very fact suggests that they may be, as Viereck says of Metternich, "less concerned with the supernatural aspects of Catholicism than with its function as a political and cultural stabilizer." I do not mean that the canon of Conservative thought "that a Divine Intent rules society as well as conscience" is held merely because the churches are buttresses of tradition, an assumption sometimes questionable. I certainly do not mean to question the depth and earnestness of their convictions. My point is simply that the doctrine which sees religion as a part of history is perfectly compatible with Burke's description of religion as a "prejudice."<sup>8</sup> When Rossiter says that the Conservative might be happier under an established church, but honors "his nation's traditional solution to the problem of church and state," he says what may well be common sense, but his method of analysis and the focus of his interest are fundamentally different from those of the old theologians. They could not have looked upon religion in this way, any more than old sceptics could have been content with the assertion of Kirk that "men who will not acknowledge the author of their being have no sanction for truth."<sup>9</sup> The most significant movements of thought, religious or sceptical, are built on inquiry, not on tradition.

<sup>6</sup> Rossiter, op. cit., pp. 20, 231; Kirk, op. cit., opening; cf. Viereck, op. cit., p. 6, where he speaks of the "nostalgia for the permanent beneath the flux." Nostalgia is not search. Note also Reston's article cited above.

<sup>7</sup> On the importance of Burke see Kirk, passim, esp. Ch. 2; Viereck, 83 ff.; Rossiter, pp. 16, 44; when Kirk speaks of the aristocracy "inextricably interwoven with the fabric of every civilized society," he refers (p. 55) to Burke, who describes a "class of legitimate presumptions, which, taken as generalities, must be admitted as actual truths." Appeal, Works (Boston 1866), Vol. IV, pp. 174-5. In Aristotle, the very comparison of aristocracy and oligarchy would suggest the contrary.

<sup>8</sup> Viereck, op. cit., p. 26; Kirk, op. cit., p. 7; also Kirk, Academic Freedom (Chicago 1955), pp. 30-1; Francis Graham Wilson, The Case for Conservatism (Seattle, 1951), pp. 61-2.

I do not say these things because I have violent objections to established churches, or because I believe that everything the New Conservatives say is wrong. I do not. I say it because I am alarmed, lest, once we get rid of "progress" or "relativism" as a frame of reference for political thought, we should substitute "tradition," a frame almost as tenuous. My agreement or disagreement with the immediate aims of these writers (not all of whose aims are identical) is irrelevant. What is relevant, what is very much at stake, is the direction political thought is to take. Let me examine what I think is the most far-reaching statement in Prothro's paper: that "normative political theory" is "the one field of political science where (content analysis) is perhaps most appropriate." (p. 737) If that means that we may use content analysis to understand political philosophies which have sought a norm for political life, we certainly may, and generations of scholars have done so. If it means, as I think Prothro intends, that we may establish political theories which develop such norms by studying the writings of those who make political pronouncements, regardless of their penetration or judgment, to see a trend, regardless of its seriousness, the establishment of such theories and norms will be largely accidental. No serious scholar would waste his time trying to understand Hegel, for example, merely to find out whether or not Hegel is a "conservative." The effort required to study Hegel is such that it is useless to undertake it, unless we have good reason to believe that we may find something that will help us in our political search. If it is merely to label Hegel, why bother?

Of course there are certain differences in the speeches of public men. It is strange that in studying the political thought of this country, we study public men to a surprising degree, whereas historians of western political thought generally study primarily political philosophers. Is it because we have so many prudent statesmen, or because we have so few political philosophers? It does not vitiate the value of studying one's ancestors to say that, if the trend to conservatism means that we shall have more biographies of Adams and fewer of Jefferson that result will not help us to solve our political problems, at least not radically. What the study of trends in popular appeal means is brought out by Prothro when he sees the possibility that if the "academic New Conservative" can get a political hearing, conjectures regarding new symbols and the "new conservative dictionary" may be reformulated as testable hypotheses. Such a function, however, differs but little from salesmanship. It involves the discovery of principles by a government, as Gordon Harrison urges, "justifying its present action and defining its future intent." (italics mine)<sup>10</sup> It is indeed possible that that is being done, though perhaps not in the manner indicated. Prothro's Table III shows that "God" figures as a demand symbol only in the speeches of Eisenhower. Is that "conservatism"? Is it anxiety? Is it a new trend in public opinion? Is it a new trend in speech-writing? Is it a deeper personal conviction than those of Eisenhower's predecessors? It certainly might be adopted by a conservative administration, if it is true that religion is a bulwark of conservatism.

<sup>9</sup> Rossiter, op. cit., p. 44; Kirk, Academic Freedom, p. 31.

<sup>10</sup> Road to the Right (1954), p. 6.

It is true, I think, that there is a tension in "conservative" thought between one's own old, and the best, or the oldest, or the most lasting old, as conservative writers recognize.<sup>11</sup> Insofar, however, as conservatism is wedded to tradition, it hardly needs a conceptual frame. It might inquire whether current doctrines of "religious establishment" or the New Deal are prescriptive rather than whether they are right. Why should a conservative, if conservatives pride themselves on the relative unimportance of speculation, level vigorous attacks on New Deal agencies, if those agencies have become prescriptive? Subversion might be accepted, but even subversion would have to be, in conservative language, "with the materials at hand." Prothro's hypothesis should therefore not only be one that conservatives could accept, but also one that is, I suspect, implicit in their doctrine. It may or may not be true that, as Thoreau implied, a tradition loses every moment some of its integrity.<sup>12</sup> It is certainly true that it loses some of its radicalism, and makes an appeal for the attachment of the conservative, which grows with longevity. In effect, what Prothro is saying is that the New Deal has, as he suggests, become a part of history, and history is, to Clinton Rossiter, the "Creator of all the Conservative holds dear." (including God?)<sup>13</sup> Again we are faced with the problem of whether that which, by definition, takes its bearings by the sweep of events, can furnish a frame of reference for the interpretation of those events. It seems to me to follow that it cannot, and this is not at all to say that "the conservatives" cannot, but only that conservatism cannot. Granting, however, that conservative thought cannot be the "most significant thought," it may still furnish us with useful categories and a useful interpretation for specific purposes; a question which leads to the problem of content analysis.

II.

Let me again eschew any aesthetic objections to content analysis, which seems to me a very fruitful method for answering certain rather circumscribed questions, which is exactly what I understand Prothro to say. A basic assumption of content analysis is, however, according to Bernard Berelson, that "inferences about the relationship between intent and content . . . can validly be made."<sup>14</sup> These inferences can be made, however, only if the precise character of that relation can be accurately described, or, at least suggested. I do not mean that we have to insist on "sincerity." Propaganda analysts certainly investigate the planned lie. My problem is whether speakers say what they want to say, and it seems to me that there are reasons why they might not. Among

<sup>11</sup> Wilson, op. cit., p. 25; Kirk, op. cit., pp. 428 ff.; Rossiter, Yale Review, loc. cit., p. 356; Harrison, op. cit., p. 314, etc.

<sup>12</sup> Civil Disobedience, in Works, Canby ed. (Boston, 1937), pp. 789-90.

<sup>13</sup> Op. cit., p. 45.

<sup>14</sup> Bernard Berelson, Content Analysis in Communication Research (Glencoe, Illinois, 1952), p. 18.

these, and I do not claim them as definitive, are urgency, ignorance, and prudence. Though these factors do not necessarily relate to Prothro's hypothesis, their relation to the content he analyzes is by no means far-fetched. He fully recognizes the problem of urgency, and points to the enormous increase in international items, in Table V. We could perhaps expand that. Herbert Hoover's personal commitment to prohibition and his dismay at the experience with the Eighteenth Amendment may have led him into stressing law enforcement, while at another time he might have stressed food relief. Let me add that I have not checked any findings; I am depending purely on impressions. It is interesting to me, however, that while "class appeals" (Table I), stand higher in rank in Roosevelt than in Truman, they are fewer in number. I wonder whether that would have been true if the Roosevelt of 1936 had been analyzed. I wonder to what extent class appeals may have been a form of counter-attack, which is itself a kind of urgency. There is no need to dwell on it, because, while urgency may be complex, implying the urgency of the issues, of public opinion, of party pressure, and so on, it is none the less strong.

Much more complicated is the problem of ignorance. Theoretically a president may, especially in our time, know nothing of the difficult problems confronting his administration, and rely altogether on advisers, including speech-writers. Or he may know exactly where he stands on all major issues, and require only to be briefed by intelligent subordinates, who know what he wants to achieve and faithfully present the facts to him. State-of-the-Union messages are notoriously written for the President mainly by the several departments and agencies, in the form of paragraphs submitted to him for inclusion. Surely the content analyst would find it useful to know something of the knowledge or ignorance of a president. Yet the problem is not even so simple as that. Obviously, what a president may learn, he may not know at the moment of his acceptance speech. Prothro, in testing his hypothesis, concentrates on the incoming and relatively unknowing presidents. By analyzing the "first acceptance speeches, inaugural addresses, and state of the union messages", for very good reasons, he none the less precludes any analysis in terms of the lessons of experience. That you can study "conservatism" or the antithesis in terms of what a man was just before and just after he became president, almost presupposes an inability to learn. The acceptance speech is, moreover, a very special case, though it is one-third of the sample. What Franklin Roosevelt did to the acceptance speech when he flew to the convention in 1932 is well-known. It was the despair of those political scientists who, like Sait, regarded that speech, in Blaine's formulation as "the legitimate creed of the party." Whatever else it portended, it certainly put the dark horse at a disadvantage. Stevenson in 1952 was reported to have been working rather furiously on his acceptance speech, while his advisers asked him to be at the door of the convention, so that he might appear as soon as he was nominated. Obviously what a man thinks in a hurry and what a man knows deliberately are often quite different, and the acceptance speech may well differ from all other speeches, implying, for better or worse, more spontaneity and less painstaking. On the other hand, a carefully planned acceptance speech, intended to pitch the tone of the campaign, may be the least spontaneous of all speeches. These distinctions may weigh, quite heavily, in one's findings, and even more so in the future, if conventions are to be managed by movie actors.

Yet we have not even begun to explore the problem of ignorance. Prothro presents a dichotomy between generality and specificity, and, in one of his most suggestive findings, shows a higher level of generality among the Republican presidents. But, I am obliged to ask, what, besides conservatism, might lead to a high level of generality? Apart from sheer audience appraisal, I can think of two things: ignorance and delicacy. Prothro's hypothesis that the acceptance of New Deal symbols by Eisenhower is reluctant would, while granting the importance of audience appraisal in their acceptance, substantially preclude that factor in their rejection. Beyond that, I should not dare to resolve the question. We have no right to demand that delicacy, often required in matters of foreign policy, be treated as ignorance or insincerity. Delicacy comes off rather badly in content analysis, and it is part of the mystery of foreign policy that we must often assume its spokesmen to be wiser than we honestly believe them to be. As far as the Acceptance speech and campaign speeches generally are concerned, I should like to suggest another hypothesis: we may expect a high level of generality when a candidate has or believes that he has a commanding lead. Witness Dewey's speeches in 1948 and the conversion of Ives in 1954 from high level generality to low level polemic when the going was rough.

A speaker may, in other words, be silent, or speak tongue-in-cheek, not only through knowing too little, but also, as Lincoln pointed out, through knowing too much.<sup>15</sup> To say the contrary, in our time, is to say that every scientific experiment should at once be made public, and few responsible persons say that. This restraint is a part of what the ancients called practical wisdom, or prudence, and its incidence in verbal material is not easy to explore, by content analysis or by any other method which I know. Whether, indeed, it is actually relevant to Prothro's own findings, I cannot possibly say. Without, however, knowing all the literature of content analysis, I may at least wonder how far its practitioners have explored the factor of prudent silence. Let me repeat that I do not mean by this simply the well-planned lie. I mean a silence that is knowing but disinterested; or even a lie that is noble but disinterested. The importance of this method of communication has been brought to our attention particularly by Leo Strauss,<sup>16</sup> and its usefulness in the analysis of many historic works in political philosophy is certain. That Shakespeare, in King John does not mention Magna Charta, that Bacon avoids mentioning Bruno, that Locke avoids mentioning Hobbes, that several political writers avoid mentioning Spinoza, though they may be indebted to him: these and many other instances of prudent silence cannot be interpreted in terms of timidity or insincerity alone and are integral parts of content. Of course, the speech of a public man is something else again, but we should not preclude the possibilities of prudent silence. If, as many of us believe, the study of "normative political theory" is best furthered by the study of old and often neglected texts, wherein writers come unashamedly to grips with the recurrent problems of the political life, the radical revision of content categories follows. Even in the conservative tradition, the fact that the word "democracy" is little in evidence among, for example, the founding fathers, is not insignificant; nor is the reason obvious. And in political history generally, what a man does not say is often of as much importance as what he does. Where was "civil rights" in the list of Eisenhower appeals?

<sup>15</sup> Speech on War with Mexico, January 12, 1848, opening paragraph.

<sup>16</sup> Persecution and the Art of Writing (Glencoe, Illinois, 1952), particularly Essay 2, of same title.

Keeping in mind, however, the limited role of political spokesmen, I should like to explore certain of the problems raised by Prothro's extremely interesting tabulations. His suggestion that political appeals show the shift from Hoover to Eisenhower, while demand symbols indicate the reluctant character of that shift is persuasive, and confirms his carefulness in using both categories. What, however, is the nature of the ambiguity? Is it intrinsic, and do "appeals" relate more closely than "demands" to the insistence of the audience? If I think, however, in terms of urgency, which seems to me the most obvious limitation on the President's freedom in major speeches, I am particularly inclined to compare Truman and Eisenhower, who share, as Prothro shows us, the appeal to "dark realities". The Korean War should not obscure the fact so tellingly indicated in Table V that Truman, although not then involved in actual warfare, was obliged, like Eisenhower to stress, to an overwhelming degree, "international" questions. This similarity lends particular color to the question of peace. Yet, while 63 of the Truman appeals dealt with peace, only 23 of the Eisenhower appeals dealt with it. In terms of demand symbols, the contrast is perhaps even more striking. Peace, which stood second highest on Hoover's list, with 28 demands, 14% of all Hoover demands, stood highest on Truman's list, with 21 demands, 16% of Truman demands, but is reduced to fourth place in the Eisenhower speeches, with 16 demands, 9% of the total. By way of contrast, there are but 19 demands for freedom in the Truman speeches, while there are 41 (or more than twice as many as peace) in the Eisenhower. Out of context, of course, it is hard to judge, and, I repeat, I have not checked any speeches. The suspicion in this corner is, however, that a radical shift in the verbalization of foreign policy was even then under way, and that we may see in these figures something of the moral intransigence of the State Department. It is indeed possible, though I cannot be sure from the presentation, that the exclusive use of the demand symbol "faith" by Eisenhower may contribute to the same result. One of the tenets of a conservative program suggested by Russell Kirk is "national humility."<sup>17</sup> There may be evidence in Prothro's tabulations, and there is certainly evidence outside them, that this particular tenet of conservatism has not been stressed by the party in power.

My great difficulty is, however, the feeling that Prothro's hypothesis cannot really be tested unless we can be sure that the men whose speeches are analyzed are not unduly timid towards public opinion. The postulate that the "basic tenets of the New Deal can no longer be frontally attacked at the highest level of conservative leadership" is certainly supported, but it is not demonstrated, by the fact that the "chief post-New Deal spokesman for the conservative point of view" did not so attack it. It seems to me that, if there is a body of doctrine which can be called "conservatism", the question of whether its tenets may be influenced or modified by anti-conservative doctrines and practices might better be studied by a content comparison of the speeches of Winston Churchill with those of an earlier conservative, like Disraeli, and those of a later "liberal", like Franklin Roosevelt. Churchill, after all, writes his own speeches, and he once scorned excessive timidity towards public opinion by scorning those who maintain the embarrassing position of keeping their ears to the ground. To say that is not to say that Churchill is not a politician. It is reasonably certain, however, that no one from Madison Avenue ever told him what to say. We can never be certain that someone like Churchill would not frontally have attacked what appears no longer susceptible of successful frontal attack. Madison Avenue, on the contrary, makes it difficult to get fruitful results as to the structure of conservatism and its potentiality. Madison Avenue must, moreover, have its own content analysts, who go by their own well-paid hunches. It is sad to reflect on the possibility that the skillful use of content analysis by those who plan speeches may to some extent vitiate its use by those who study them.

<sup>17</sup> Op. cit., p. 423.

Briefly to answer the first two questions that I have put to myself: it seems to me that content analysis is a very useful method for the study of political theory, on the whole, however, rather for historical than for "normative" purposes. In the study of philosophic texts, simple computations may be replete with meaning. But these tools are useful provided that two factors, at least, are present: 1) the writer studied is worth the care that the method requires, and 2) the writer intended to speak to more than one audience, and would have welcomed the content analysis of the careful reader. The first factor precludes wasting time; the second precludes assuming that we are wiser than the writer we study. Hence the value of content analysis tends to decline in those areas where communication is concerned with getting the maximum possible support from the maximum possible audience. In such cases, it may evaluate propaganda themes; it can seldom disclose "thought" or find reason in the essentially irrational. It can seldom detect "conservatism" in a universe of audience response, despite the fundamentally anti-philosophical character of "conservatism." Philosophers may be conservatives, as many have been, but, if we studied their own work, we should be disappointed to find nothing but "conservatism."

III.

My third problem, that of giving precision to impressions, has yet to be touched. I suppose that content analysis, however refined its modern procedures, is an old and reputable method. Every reputable scholar wants to confirm or refute his own impressions, to substitute precision for predisposition. I suppose that content analysis may correctly be described as the method used to understand a difficult text, almost any text that could not be read while running. That method certainly involves computation, though it is by no means restricted to computation. It rests, I suppose, on the desire of the analyst to understand what a text means. It is, I think, the way Bacon studied Machiavelli, or Rousseau studied Montesquieu. In this case, the analyst studies the text because he believes that the text has something he wants. Of the contemporary content analyst, however, that is no longer altogether true. He studies the emptiest comic books as well as the most important texts. He does so, not because of their intrinsic importance but because he thinks that they may help us to understand "our world". Whatever commentary on "our world" that suggests, he may be right. He is certainly right in supposing that, in a world that rests so easily upon opinion, he must explore the solidity of that opinion. He must therefore investigate impressions which people regard as "self-evident". In any society, the "obvious" is not necessarily true, and in modern democracy, the fact that the obvious is not true is of real political importance. If that democracy depends, as it certainly must, on the "common sense of the common man", it is necessary that that common sense be buttressed by the refutation of certain false shibboleths. That does not, however, tell us, and I cannot here explore, which false shibboleths should be refuted, and when, on the contrary, it may be useful for the "most rational government" to have "the prejudices of the community on its side."<sup>18</sup> Prothro has shown, and, I think, conclusively, that the "impressionistic" interpretation of Eisenhower's relation to Hoover on the one hand and the New Deal on the other is essentially sound. Such a demonstration may be less startling than the contrary would have been, but it is no less solid, and no less helpful to the voter, who wants the answer to these questions.

What, however, are the prospects, and what are the limits of giving precision to the imprecise? It is an ancient political question and I can here do no more than touch upon it. Obviously, beliefs about the most important political things cannot be given support, nor can they be refuted, by content analysis alone. The suggestion that they could would involve an authoritarian view of some specific content. The support which content analysis may give to "impressions" cannot carry that far, but it is still far-reaching. One reason for exploring what is generally held and is believed to be obvious is the polemical. If a man has a just quarrel, he has every reason to enforce that just quarrel with facts, even though they seem but to furnish proof where impressions should have made proof unnecessary. If content analysis can possibly convince the hunter that he should pause in his hunting, it is a boon to the hunter and the hunted as well. To show in figures, so that the unreasonable man may read what the reasonable man already understands, is often a boon. On such a ground, I believe, one must commend studies of communism that show the complexity of attachment to injustice, presenting the real reasons why young and inexperienced persons may regard injustice as just. Whether by content analysis or by some other method, the use of naked figures to challenge cant is never altogether useless.

<sup>18</sup> Federalist, No. 49.

TOTALITARIANISM AND RATIONALITY

ZBIGNIEW BRZEZINSKI*

Harvard University

The experience of modern totalitarian regimes suggests that they are not likely to perish through internal revolt unless that occurs at a time when the totalitarian regime is in mortal danger from an external challenge, as in the marginal Italian case, or these the totalitarian movement in power is about to undertake decisive measures to turn the country into a totalitarian system, as in the case of the counter-revolution against Peron in Argentina. Other than that, and even considering the succession crises, modern totalitarian regimes have shown themselves capable of maintaining their totalitarian character in spite of domestic and foreign opposition. More recently it has been argued (e.g., by I. Deutscher, Russia: What Next) that modern totalitarian regimes, if not overthrown by external forces, will nevertheless in the end be quietly and inevitably transformed into more democratic states by the subtler but irresistible influence of rationality inherent in the bureaucratic and managerial apparatus that no modern state can do without. This proposition will be developed more fully and given critical consideration in subsequent pages in order to test whether rationality, regarded in this context as a certain mode of thought and behavior induced by the requirements of modern industrialized and bureaucratized societies, is in fact incompatible with modern totalitarianism. To do that, however, we first have to seek some specific political definition of the system of rule currently known as totalitarianism. That this is no simple problem is illustrated by the variety of approaches taken by such distinguished authorities as Arendt (The Origins of Totalitarianism), Fainsod (How Russia is Ruled), Friedrich (ed. Totalitarianism), S. Neumann (The Permanent Revolution) and others. A preliminary attempt to posit a working definition and to discuss the process of totalitarian development in terms which might justify the application of the term "totalitarian" to such otherwise varied systems as the Nazi, the Soviet and possibly the Fascist, thus seems proper.

I. A DEFINITION OF TOTALITARIANISM

The crux of any attempted definition of totalitarianism is the perplexing issue of its uniqueness; what is distinctively new about it? Certainly, autocratic systems in the past displayed many of the features developed and accentuated by modern totalitarianism. Diocletian's tyranny or the Shogunate in Japan, for instance, stressed to a high degree the acquiescence of the population in centralized control. Both systems also institutionalized an atmosphere of fear through a system of secret police informers not unlike the totalitarian societies of the twentieth century. Similarly, we find among many of the nineteenth century European reformers a readiness to use violence for the sake of postulated improvements and reforms much like the ideological intolerance and consequent brutality of the Rosenbergs or Zhdanovs of our own age.<sup>1</sup> Cromwell's regime also displayed some analogies. The examples could easily be multiplied to include many other cases involving features similar to some of the characteristics of totalitarianism. Spain is a contemporary example.

* The author is indebted to the Russian Research Center, Harvard University, for the support given him.

Totalitarianism, being a dictatorship, characteristically includes the coercive qualities noted in such varied dictatorial systems. But unlike most dictatorships of the past and present, the totalitarian movements wielding power do not aim to freeze society in the status quo, but on the contrary institutionalize, or plan to, a revolution which mounts in scope, and frequently in intensity, as the regime stabilizes itself in power. This revolution is to pulverize all existing social units in order to replace the old pluralism with a homogeneous unanimity patterned on the blueprints of the totalitarian ideology. The power of the totalitarian regime is derived not from a precarious balance of existing forces (e.g., church, landed gentry, officer corps) but from the revolutionary dynamism of its zealous supporters who disarm opposition and mobilize the masses both by force and by an appeal to a better future. This appeal is normally framed in the official ideology, or action program, of the movement. In time, of course, the dynamism decreases, but by then the system is buttressed by complex networks of control which pervade the entire society and mobilize its energies through sheer penetration. An institutionalized revolution, patterned on the totalitarian ideology, thus makes totalitarianism essentially a forward-oriented phenomenon. Most dictatorships, on the other hand, have as their object the prevention of history from keeping in step with time. Their survival depends on maintaining the status quo. When they fail, they become history.<sup>2</sup>

This proposition can be further developed by examining the fate of restraints on political power, which are present in varying degrees in all societies, once the totalitarian movement seizes power. These restraints can be broadly listed in three categories: 1) the direct restraints, expressed through pacta conventa such as the English Magna Carta or the Polish Nihil novi . . ., the Bill of Rights, constitutional guarantees, a rule of law, or even the broad consensus of tradition which rules out certain types of conduct, such as the use of violence; 2) the indirect restraints which stem from the pluralistic character of all large-scale societies, and which necessitate adjustment and compromise as the basis for political power, e.g., the churches, the economic interests, professional, cultural or regional pressure groups, which all impede the exercise of unrestrained power; and 3) the natural restraints, such as national character and tradition, climatic and geographical considerations, kinship structure and particularly the primary social unit, the family. These also act to restrain the scope of political power.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Much was made of this in J. L. Talmon's The Rise of Totalitarian Democracy (Boston, 1952).

<sup>2</sup> This is the political tragedy of such leaders as Chiang Kai-Shek or Naguib who came to power to effect a revolution but became dependent in their control of power on conservative elements.

<sup>3</sup> One might also consider a supernatural restraint in the sense of a transcendent

In constitutional societies all three categories of restraint are operative on political power. In practice, of course, various violations occur, but these generally constitute a deviation from the norm rather than the norm itself. Dictatorial or ancient autocratic societies are characterized by the absence of the direct restraints since these are incompatible with the nature of arbitrary, and frequently personal, leadership. Suspension of civil rights, open or masked subversion of established constitutional practices, and negation of popular sovereignty have been characteristic of all non-constitutional states, totalitarian or not.

The indirect restraints, however, have usually escaped the dictatorial scythe except when a significant social grouping chooses to resist directly the dictates of those in power. If, for instance, the church or the nobility, for one reason or another, clashes with the ruler, it is then subjected to the dictatorial pattern of coercion. Generally, however, the broad outlines of social life are not disturbed by the dictator even though an individual objector, even in high place, is struck down. An average Hungarian under Horthy or a Frenchman under Louis XIV was not directly drawn into the operations of the regime, and could continue in his traditional associations much as before the advent of the ruler. The ruler himself based his power to a great extent on the varying alliances reached among combinations of social-political forces, and maintained himself in power as long as such alliances endured. Revolutionary changes were hence anathema to a dictatorship of this kind.

It is only totalitarianism of our own age which rejects all three kinds of restraints.<sup>4</sup> It not only subverts the direct restraints immediately after the seizure of power but, unlike traditional dictatorships, it proceeds, once entrenched, to pulverize all existing associations in society in order to remake that society and subsequently even man himself, according to certain "ideal" conceptions. In time it even attempts, not always successfully, to overcome the natural restraints on political power. Without doing so, totalitarianism can never achieve the isolation of the individual and the mass monolithic homogeneity that are its aim. Only with both of them (the paradox between them is more apparent than real) can the existing pluralism be transformed into an active unanimity of the entire population which will make the transformation of society, and ultimately man, possible. Only through them can man be conditioned to the totalitarian image, for the totalitarian hope is that action patterns will lead to thought patterns. This process, however, even if purposely gradual (as, for instance, in Poland under the communists), inevitably involves the regime in evergrowing applications of coercion. Some of the "unredeemable social misfits" have to be removed, and it is difficult for the regime to single out for extinction particular social groups without soon involving itself in large-scale moral order to which many governments pay lip service. In fact, however, its political significance is probably covered fully by the three outlined above, and particularly by the first two.

---

<sup>4</sup> Democracies do so, to a limited extent, in time of recognized danger; this is the concept of constitutional dictatorship. However, it always has some time limit.

terror. Society is composed, after all, of largely overlapping associations and loyalties. Terror thus becomes an inevitable consequence, as well as instrument, of the revolutionary program. But the totalitarian revolution would be meaningless without a justification to induce the active unanimity of the population. Hence ideology is not merely a historical guide. It becomes a daily dose of perpetual indoctrination. The total social impact of the totalitarian efforts to make reality conform to totalitarian thought, involving terror and indoctrination as well as institutional and social reorganization, makes for a quantitative difference from old dictatorships which is sufficiently great to become a qualitative difference.

In order to define totalitarianism one may also attempt to isolate its objective attributes, some of which have already been implied. C. J. Friedrich suggests that these may include, in a syndrome, the following: an official ideology, a single mass party, a technologically conditioned near-complete monopoly of all means of effective armed combat and of effective mass communication, and a system of terroristic police control.<sup>5</sup> The combination of these by no means exclusively totalitarian characteristics with the total social impact stemming from the inherently dynamic revolutionary spirit of totalitarianism makes it, in terms of the accepted categorizations of political systems, historically distinct. Totalitarianism, therefore, has to be considered as a new form of government falling into the general classification of dictatorship which includes the ancient autocracies, tyrannies, despotisms, absolute monarchies and traditional dictatorships. Totalitarianism is a system where technologically advanced instruments of political power are wielded without restraint by centralized leadership of an elite movement, for the purpose of effecting a total social revolution, including the conditioning of man, on the basis of certain arbitrary ideological assumptions proclaimed by the leadership, in an atmosphere of coerced unanimity of the entire population.<sup>6</sup> This definition thus goes beyond Friedrich's descriptive syndrome of discernible characteristics of totalitarianism, and attempts to point also to its essence, i.e., its institutionalized revolutionary zeal.

II. DYNAMICS

Existing political situations in a number of countries provide useful illustrations of the stages of totalitarian development. Admittedly these overlap. In France and Italy, the totalitarian movements operate today, competing electorally and plotting conspiratorially, in a non-totalitarian environment. Their task is to overthrow, at an opportune moment, the existing political systems and to seize power as a prerequisite to the implementation of their programmatic goals. Their situation, broadly speaking, is analogous to the position of the NSDAP in the Weimar Republic prior to 1933 or to the Bolsheviks in Russia prior to 1917, although the latter had to rely much more on conspiratorial action. This is the pre-revolutionary stage, which may range through varying phases of maturity and ripening before the actual moment of seizure of power.

<sup>5</sup> Totalitarianism, p. 53. (Cambridge, 1954). The author acknowledges his debt to C. J. Friedrich with whom he has collaborated in teaching a graduate seminar on dictatorship. A product of that collaboration is their forthcoming book on Totalitarian Dictatorship and Autocracy (Harvard University Press).

<sup>6</sup> For a fuller discussion, see the author's The Permanent Purge—Politics in Soviet Totalitarianism (Cambridge, 1956), esp. pp. 1-8, 168-175.

The next stage follows the seizure of power, with the totalitarian movement solidifying its hold on the instruments of power. This is the period of entrenchment, of occasional compromise, of preparation. Active opposition elements are removed and comprehensive plans for future operations drafted. Gradual efforts to penetrate and neutralize hitherto abstaining groups, which could become potential sources of resistance, are made in anticipation of their total absorption. This was the situation prevailing in Italy during almost the entire Fascist period,<sup>7</sup> in Germany roughly till the war, in the USSR till the early thirties, and in Argentina until the actual collapse of the Peronist regime when it was about to embark on its revolutionary program. It is thus a stage of consolidation and anticipation, of tactical appeasements masking strategic planning.

The totalitarian system begins to materialize with the launching of the internal revolution and the attempted pulverization of existing social units. At this stage not only the indirect restraints but even the so-called natural ones are assaulted. As the image and the structure of the totalitarian movement come to be reflected in the new institutions, organizations, and the factories built on the ashes of the old society, the system takes shape. In all walks of life the operational principles of the movement become the standards for conduct, and the race into the future starts. All the energies of the population are mobilized through force, rewards, opportunities and propaganda. Ideology, reduced to the level of the daily exhortation, is used to justify the existing sacrifices and to give meaning to the unending search for the ideal Tomorrow. This is the situation initiated in the USSR by the first Five-Year Plan and in the satellites since about 1948.

Inevitably, however, stabilizing factors begin to intervene even before the full impetus of the internal revolution is felt. Power, like wealth, has an inherent tendency to attract strong attachments in those who enjoy it. Consequently the triumphant elite, while not officially abandoning its ultimate ends, tends to stress immediate power considerations. An ideological rationalization for such a tendency is ever-ready: power must be consolidated if further advances are to be made. The sincerity or insincerity of such reasoning notwithstanding, the consolidation of power becomes a conservative tendency. In an ideologically motivated, zealous organization this breeds its own antithesis among those anxious to push ahead. Those who toiled and risked to seize power accordingly become all the more fearful of the rising young stars and new constellations in the movement, into which many late arrivals have flocked. Some therefore urge that revolutionary changes be pushed immediately lest new elements come to the fore. Others urge greater restraint, and even compromise with the former dominant groups, now suppressed, but still not liquidated. Purges provide a partial solution for this dissension. The history of the right and left wing deviations in the USSR, and of the SA-SS clash in Germany, is instructive in this respect. The intervention of such stabilizing factors, in the initial stages at least, thus tends merely to accentuate the tension. Its longer run consequence, however, so far as available experience teaches, is to generate even greater violence and unpredictability.

<sup>7</sup> Fascist inability to cope decisively with the old officer corps, the monarchy and the Vatican probably also explains the relative swiftness of the collapse of Fascist power as compared to the Nazi capacity to control the situation until the final annihilation.

But in time other pressures towards gradualism and stability develop. As the ruling elite ages, it becomes more and more concerned with succession, with status, and also with the transmission of its privileges to its children. Revolutionary considerations begin to be obscured by a desire to assure one's own offspring better education, advancement opportunities, etc. Such processes develop unconsciously as an inevitable consequence of privilege. Distinct class differentiation thus develops, producing thereby another element impeding the totalitarian revolution which tends to emphasize social mobility, arbitrariness and uncertainty.

This process in communist totalitarian systems has been specifically linked with the rapid development of an industrial economic order. Communist dictatorships have made industrialization and (to a lesser degree) collectivization the central theme of their internal revolution, partially to prove ex post facto the correctness of Marxist assumptions, partially because in a technological age industry is the backbone of national power, and especially because they seized power in backward areas where industrial development had been seriously retarded but had become the focal point of aspirations. Industrialization, imposed politically and without regard to cost, necessitates not only great sacrifices from the people but also involves the application of tremendous coercive force on those who, because of tradition, self-interest or apathy, resist it. In that sense Soviet terror in the thirties was functionally rational, although its aberrations and excesses were frequently irrational. Some theorists, like Arendt, have tended, however, to overemphasize the latter aspects. The oppression and terror of the Soviet system was significantly linked with this at-all-cost, ruthless attempt to destroy the existing way of life. It involved the commitment of all the energies of the regime to push the program and mobilize the entire population to carry it through.

The first repercussions of this program were therefore in the direction of accentuating the totalitarian character of the system. As industrialization and collectivization through coercion grew in scope, an ever larger number of people were affected. Traditional allegiances and alliances were shattered, and those suspected of opposing the party program were arrested, deported or shot. Terror and fear grew rapidly. Not even the party was immune, and countless members were purged for alleged inefficiency, often translated into accusations of sabotage and wrecking.<sup>8</sup> The first consequences of industrialization, to repeat, were thus to maximize existing fear, arbitrariness, caprice and terror; in other words, to stress the irrational elements. At the same time, a tremendous social upheaval was created, and literally millions of people were torn from their traditional occupations or surroundings. While this meant misery or death for many, unprecedented opportunities for rapid advancement also opened up. The totalitarian revolution, therefore, stimulated not only negative reactions; it appealed to the imaginations and self-interest of many others. The presence in this upheaval of a disciplined, and the only organized body, the Communist Party, gave its leaders almost unlimited power to channel the revolution, to direct it, to head it. A society in this stage of destruction and construction could not produce any restraints on the totalitarian leadership. A society subjected to so total a revolution, socially and economically, offers only two political alternatives: anarchy or totalitarian control. The disciplined and militant totalitarian movement insured the latter alternative.

<sup>8</sup> See The Permanent Purge (cited in note 6) particularly chapters 4 and 5.

We do not know what forms the totalitarian revolution, unhindered externally, would have taken in the more advanced societies where totalitarian movements came to power before World War II. Those, like Poland and Czechoslovakia, that have come under communist dictatorships since the war have in a broad sense been subjected to the same pattern, although with significant variations pointing in the direction of greater gradualism. Nonetheless, collectivization, nationalization of trade and expansion of heavy industry all have tended to reproduce this total social impact which dissolves the traditional society. Very specific circumstantial factors prevented the Fascist and Nazi regimes from launching similarly large-scale schemes of social reconstruction. Nonetheless it is sufficient to read Starace's plans to change the Italian national character or Mussolini's remarks on the need to eradicate the Italian "softness," as well as some of the party regulations on daily behavior of the citizen issued in 1938, to realize that such a revolution was being seriously contemplated in Italy. In the case of the Nazis, there is even more ample evidence that the New Order in Europe would have resulted in revolutionary changes in Germany proper, changes highly inimical to the established order. Hitler's wartime conversations and Himmler's plans for the SS are full of projects that would have involved radical changes in German society and economy.

The question arises, however, what happens when the initial impetus of purposefully induced change has spent itself? What happens when the initial economic drive is more or less achieved, and further efforts are merely the accentuation of something already existing?

III. A RATIONALIST TOTALITARIANISM?

It could be argued, and some have, that Soviet totalitarianism, the most advanced totalitarian society of our age, is now entering upon a new stage of development, the character of which will be determined by the industrialized nature of the Soviet economy. This analysis, partaking somewhat of a material determinism, stresses the incompatibilities between totalitarianism and the requirements of a modern, industrial and hence also bureaucratic order. Noting that totalitarianism in the past has seemed largely irrational, it argues that the rationalistic routines of the indispensable managers of the industrial society will necessarily transmit themselves to the totalitarian leadership and gradually effect a fundamental transformation of the system itself. This transmission will be aided by the fact that the totalitarian movement has become highly bureaucratized and therefore shares in many of the operational patterns associated with running the industrial machine. Furthermore, it is argued, the totalitarian movement itself has become increasingly staffed by the managerial-bureaucratic elements to whom party membership means no more than an important club association necessary to satisfy career ambitions. The revolutionary torch and the unending quest are accordingly displaced by the swivel chair and the punch-clock.

Totalitarianism, in the extreme form of this argument, is thus to disappear imperceptibly and unintentionally. As stability, predictability and overall rationality set in, fear, terror, and arbitrariness will fade. Mass enthusiasm and passionate unanimity will give way to disagreements on matters of expertise, and hence also on policy. Policy discussion will then become genuine arguments on alternate courses of action; selection will be made on the basis of rational (technical, objective assessments of the implications of perceived reality) considerations without violent (hence arbitrary and fear-inspiring) consequences for those whose arguments did not prevail. This, together with the growing stability of various privilege groups, will in turn lead to a form of pluralism, suggestive of the existing democratic systems. Democracy, even though likely a curtailed one, will enter by the back door.

One example of this type of reasoning is the argument advanced by I. Deutscher in his Russia: What Next? Deutscher stresses the point that: "the economic progress made during the Stalin era has at last brought within the reach of the people a measure of well-being which should make possible an orderly winding up of Stalinism and a gradual democratic evolution."<sup>9</sup> This argument leaves considerable room for dissent. Democracy involves more than what Deutscher suggests. It requires, in the view of some, a certain philosophical tradition, a basic recognition of some sort of higher law, a fundamental attitude of toleration, an absence of doctrinal fanaticism—all of which are, at most, only indirectly linked to a state of "well-being" and none of which seem to be even remotely present in the existing Soviet scene. One may also wonder what is actually meant by "a measure of well-being," especially since wants are relative. Furthermore there is little of substance in what is known today of totalitarian institutions to indicate the likelihood of such a democratic development. It is difficult to assume that the party, having such a vested interest, will be willing to resign its absolute control of the instruments of power. The argument also assumes a short-range quality to the goals of the party, and it ignores the impact of international developments on domestic policies.

<sup>9</sup> (New York, 1953), p. 227. Deutscher's argument should not be confused with B. Moore's reasoned analysis in Terror and Progress USSR. This weighs alternative patterns of development in terms of the possibility of continued totalitarian development, or a technical-rational pattern, or the emergence of a traditionalist form.

Deutscher's analysis thus falls down on two counts: its highly monistic interpretation of democracy fails to see democratic development in its complex and pluralistic perspective, the economic aspects of which are merely one component part of a diversified whole; and its interpretation of Soviet totalitarianism fails to perceive the self-generating power of the system of controls and the resulting vested interests in the maintenance of these controls. Fainsod, in concluding his examination of the Soviet regime, makes this statement:

As long as the Kremlin leaders continue to see their future in terms of industrial and military might, they will probably persist in relying on totalitarian instruments to force the pace of industrialization. Those who possess absolute power do not part with it willingly. The governing formula of Soviet totalitarianism rests on a moving equilibrium of alternating phases of repression and relaxation, but its essential contours remain unchanged. The totalitarian regime does not shed its police-state characteristics; it dies when power is wrenched from its hands.<sup>10</sup>

The question remains, however, whether in the long run totalitarianism is compatible with a rationalistic orientation prevailing in its extensive bureaucracy and in the managerial classes of its industrial order. To some extent, this issue, like the one discussed above, is made more complex by the general problem of the range of predictability in political science. It is doubtful that any "scientific" prediction can be made in matters not clearly connected with institutional, legal, stable processes; such as, for instance, one that presidential elections will occur in the United States in 1956 and 1960, and that, barring some drastic denouement, the contenders will be the Democratic and Republican parties. Predictability becomes more difficult, and its range much shorter, in matters involving general problems of political-social development in a system where little is known of the processes of decision-making at the top, of the motivations and considerations involved, of the nature of the various power alignments, and last, but not least, of the morale of the leaders. There are also few biographical data, beyond the barest essentials, about most of the leaders. In such cases, one must rely to a considerable degree on the projection of past experience, and estimate the future implications of current commitments of the system.

The experience of Germany with Nazi totalitarianism, albeit brief, may therefore not be irrelevant. The Nazi system was imposed with all the earmarks of revolutionary totalitarianism on a society with a highly developed industrial order, with an established and conservative managerial class, with the most efficient and routinized bureaucracy in all Europe. Yet there is no indication in all the available evidence that the fanatical, often irrational and usually brutal, Nazi leadership was in any way deterred from its purposes by the influence or orientations of the German technocrats or bureaucrats. With few exceptions, the German bureaucrats and technocrats adjusted meekly to the requirements of the totalitarian movement and were happy to reap any material benefits that Nazi successes produced. It was not until the Nazi regime began to crumble that the bureaucratic and technocratic elements, e.g., Speer, showed any initiative or purposeful action of their own. Until then, it was more a matter of the bureaucrats absorbing Nazi values, e.g., in the treatment of slave laborers, than of the Nazis absorbing a bureaucratic orientation. It seems, therefore, that a violent, arbitrary totalitarianism can, at least, arise and maintain itself in an industrially advanced area without loss of its revolutionary zeal and fanatic brutality. It did so in Germany and Italy and Czechoslovakia.<sup>11</sup> The crucial factor throughout was the presence of a movement with a revolutionary morale able to wield effectively the instruments of power.

<sup>10</sup> Merle Fainsod, How Russia is Ruled (Cambridge, 1953), p. 500.

A rebuttal, however, might point to the fact that both the German and Italian systems were of brief duration, and the experience of Czechoslovakia is too recent for confident evaluation. Furthermore, the emergence of a new and imposing industrial and bureaucratic order under the totalitarian regime itself in the USSR is obviously of the greatest importance for the domestic political development of the Soviet society. It is a development not paralleled in any of the other countries mentioned, where the totalitarian movements were superimposed on already existing industrial systems.

One must acknowledge, therefore, that conceivably totalitarianism may become, because of the factors suggested and in spite of the Nazi experience, rationalistic and hence less unpredictable, arbitrary and openly terroristic. But there is no evidence to suggest that this in itself is incompatible with totalitarianism, which need not be interpreted, as H. Arendt seems inclined to do, in terms of irrational terror almost for the sake of terror. Such a rationalist system, arising in the context of one-party domination (not to mention international pressures), could be nothing less than a rationalist dictatorship, just as total in control as its less predictable and more violent antecedent of the thirties. The institutionalized revolution which still characterizes the existing totalitarianisms will inevitably slow down in the future, but by then it will be involved in an economic commitment which also has its own political logic. The totalitarian economy, as many have observed, has been developed in the USSR over the last thirty years in keeping with plans oriented to a final (if not yet precisely defined) goal. It is thus a goal-oriented economy, the goal being communism. That this goal needs more definite formulation is, for our purposes, irrelevant. The important thing is that those in charge of the Soviet society have assumed that economic and social development in all its aspects can be purposefully steered by man in the direction of an ideal solution. This produces consequences not only economic but also political, quite different from those induced by other equally technologically advanced economic systems where, to a large extent, economic life is self-directive and ultimate goals, such as plenty and progress, are purposely vague. These goals have less bearing on current decisions than such factors as past experience, demand, prices, competition, and opportunity. In the latter case, a measure of freedom of interplay is inherent. In the former, all decisions and plans are made, or are rationalized, in terms of the ultimate goal.

<sup>11</sup> There is also the case of Japan, where industrialization advanced rapidly under a form of government which was increasingly marked by totalitarian tendencies. All indications prior to 1945 suggested that a "democratic evolution" was not to be expected.

Consequently it makes little political difference whether the range of man's alternatives is limited by uneducated revolutionaries or by scientific Ph.D.'s, once the entire economy is subjected to a process of human engineering oriented on a goal which cannot be questioned. Admittedly, operations conducted by trained bureaucrats and technocrats may be more "rational" and less directly oppressive (in so far as extreme oppression may be uneconomical, which is not entirely certain). But to be less totalitarian such operations would have to involve some degree of withdrawal on the part of those in charge from their commitment to total social and economic engineering, thus granting to those living under the system the opportunity to make important choices not in keeping with the goal. But such a politically meaningful development would in turn involve a further condition, which at the present appears highly unlikely, namely the decline of ideology and a basic reconsideration of the firmly instituted schemes of economic development. Barring that, the totalitarian economic system would continue to exert pressures for the maintenance of a dictatorship capable of enforcing the kind of discipline that such total plans demand. It is doubtful that as long as the party remains in power the tendency of the regime to stress unattainable goals will vanish. Indeed, it is these goals, inherent in the current ideology, which justify to the population the sacrifices which the party's domination involves. Thus, as long as the party continues to hold its successful grip on the instruments of power, we can expect it to continue stressing first the long-range goals of an ultimate utopia, and then the consequent sacrifices to achieve them, even though possibly at a diminishing rate of effort.

The rationalist tomorrow, if it ever comes, will therefore not be an introduction to a democratic form of government, but rather a stage in further totalitarian evolution, accentuating rationalist features present from the start and minimizing some of the irrational outbursts already noted. The prototypes of such a rationalist totalitarianism need not be sought only in Orwell's 1984. They exist, in an embryonic stage, in our own industrial organizations and bureaucracies. If one could imagine the entire United States run like some executive department, with its myriad of minute, and often incomprehensible, regulations, routinized procedures, even sometimes arbitrariness of officials, one would be all the more inclined to be thankful that the rule of law (rooted in a traditional regard for the individual) and legislative fears of administrative expansion (a democratic "irrationalist" feature) act as a check.<sup>12</sup>

Totalitarianism and rationality, therefore, when viewed in a developmental perspective and not merely from a standpoint of a static definition pinpointing certain characteristics of a given epoch, are not necessarily incompatible. Rationality alone is hardly a sufficient condition for the inevitable growth of a democratic order. At different stages, totalitarianism can be characterized by a minimization of rationalist considerations (as in the thirties in the USSR), or by an increased emphasis on them. But it is as unlikely that totalitarianism can become fully rational as it is incorrect to claim that it has been essentially irrational in the past. Today, for instance, in the USSR the totalitarian system is operating in an environment where the need (as seen by the leadership) for unbridled violence, terror in its most open form, and unpredictability based on dictatorial whims seems no longer to be present or desirable. The population appears to be relatively pliant, the younger generation has absorbed a great deal of the indoctrination, resistance of an active kind is almost entirely absent. The domination of the party in the country, and of the leadership in the party, appears to be firmly established. If only the party could be satisfied with the status quo, a rationalist totalitarianism could possibly become reality.

<sup>12</sup> For another example, consider the political implications of Kafka's Trial.

But even then the problem of power would not disappear. Governmental rationality cannot go far beyond the realm of function and account for all human action. Basic drives for power are not likely to wane. And given the nature of the system, even if the Party declines and is supplanted ultimately by the bureaucracy (or merges with it), the total control of the system over those under it will not disappear even though its exercise will become more functionally rational. In such a system it is likely that the institutional controls will be utilized to maintain the existing interests of the ruling class, and social stratification will become even more marked as position, education, and even wealth become inheritable. The abyss between those wielding power and the masses will create a real ruling caste, which itself will be highly stratified in terms of the proximity of its members to the center of power. It will create too an entire non-political stratum of those who will be given a vested interest in the status quo by virtue of their utility to the system, such as the specialists, artists, military scientists, etc. In many respects such a system will more nearly resemble the Nazi-Fascist dictatorship than the earlier Stalinist model. This curiously dialectical consequence might deprive Soviet totalitarianism of its revolutionary essence while maintaining its institutional forms. The lesson of history is, however, that this does not necessarily spell the end of the system.

That appears to be, however, at best only a distant prospect. The tasks that face the totalitarians today in the captive nations in Europe, among the long dormant masses of China, in the rice paddies of northern Vietnam, or in the Malayan jungles, not to speak of the virgin lands, overgrown urban centers and ever-struggling collective farms in the USSR, are very difficult and likely to command all their energies for many years to come. Indeed, the commitments currently made by the present Soviet leaders indicate that the party is not satisfied with the status quo; hence the abandonment of large-scale drives, which involve in turn the maintenance of discipline, does not seem imminent even in the USSR, the most developed totalitarian system. These commitments are both domestic and international. Domestically, they suggest a three-pronged attack on the following goals: an increased emphasis on party zeal, especially in terms of a reassertion of "Leninism" as defined by the present leadership; continued expansion of heavy industry with major goals set for 1960; further drives in the agricultural sector, including both reclamation projects and the diminution of private plots. On the international plane, briefly, the commitments made to China and the satellites, coupled to those now being made to the underdeveloped countries, will continue to be felt on the domestic scene through scarcities and insistence on maximum effort. At the same time, with Stalin dead and Stalinism impracticable without him, the new leadership is searching for a new basis for power both in the realm of ideological justification and practical measures. This already has meant the rejection of some of the vicious attributes of Stalinism as well as an attack on Stalin himself. This may involve in turn some unsettling consequences, as an accepted frame of reference is destroyed and old slogans and operational procedures fall by the wayside. Finally, the problem of succession, given the age bracket of the present leaders, cannot be dismissed as having been resolved entirely. From all of this, it might appear therefore that both internally and externally the likelihood of a status quo situation in the foreseeable future is doubtful. If so, the era of revolutionary totalitarianism may not yet be over.

THE TWENTIETH C.P.S.U. CONGRESS: A STUDY IN CALCULATED MODERATION*

CHARLES D. KENNEY

Michigan State University

The world listened attentively while the Twentieth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union was in session in the spacious vaulted white and gold Great Hall of the Kremlin palace from February 14 to February 25, 1956. This was the first congress since the death of Stalin, and in the interim events had prompted some bewilderment and much speculation among interested observers everywhere. Specifically, outside spectators looked to the congress to illuminate the pattern underlying a series of developments between March, 1953, and February, 1956: the resignation of Georgi M. Malenkov as Premier; the ascendancy of First Secretary Nikita S. Khrushchev; Soviet assent to a peace treaty with Austria, politically "neutralizing" that country; Soviet withdrawal from bases in Porkkala, Finland, and Port Arthur; the visits of Khrushchev and Premier Nikolai A. Bulganin to India, Burma, and other countries; the announced reduction of Soviet military forces and military budget; the attempted rapprochement with Yugoslavia; initiation of an unprecedented Soviet economic offensive; and many other "unexpected," Soviet-instigated moves.

The congress proceedings constitute a source of information on current policy emphasis; but despite the fact that the party rules designate the congress as the "supreme" policy-making organ of the CPSU, it has no real "legislative" significance. At least in the past twenty-five years, the congress has in no case exercised control over the leadership except through prearranged and co-ordinated criticism (and "self-criticism") of technical shortcomings, nor has it instituted policy after debate and open compromise of views. Rather, speeches at the sessions occasionally indicate shifts in policy. Indeed, the Soviet leaders have tended to convoke the congress if and when they wished to prepare the country, and sometimes the world or parts of it, for a reorientation of approach or otherwise to publicize decisions of great portent. Thus the Nineteenth Congress in 1952 signified that Malenkov was Stalin's chosen "successor," and the Eighteenth Congress in 1939 issued a subtle warning that unless the Western powers stopped appeasing Hitler, the USSR might conclude a pact with Germany to insure its own security. As an institution, the congress dates back to 1898 when the so-called Congress of the Russian Social Democratic Workers Party assembled in Minsk. It typically convened annually after the 1917 revolution; but as Stalin eliminated one rival after another and his deification as the sole fountainhead of Marxist-Leninist wisdom progressed, there were longer intervals, though the party statute specified at least one congress every four years. Today, as under Stalin, the delegates perform the ritual of committee reports, debate sequences, and formal resolutions; but the principles and policies they "approve" have been worked out in advance. In eleven days, the Twentieth Congress sanctioned everything its "agents" on the Central Committee had done in a period of three years and four months; confirmed the whole body of present and future foreign and domestic policy, down to all the details, technical and nontechnical, of the Sixth Five-Year Plan (1956-1960); and heard about sixty separate but highly stylized "warm fraternal greetings" from the various communist parties. In the Great Hall, no tempers were lost and no one quibbled over points of procedure. Everything took place with perfect decorum, flawless discipline. For the governing élite, the congress is a propitious occasion to tell the Soviet people how many remarkable, farsighted moves have been and will be made in their behalf, to authenticate who or what is responsible for deficiencies, and to remind the world that Moscow stands for peace, democracy, brotherhood, and truth. All this the leaders did with the consummate skill of articulate and imaginative propagandists with a flair for realistic appraisal of the requirements of Soviet national security, the opportunities for the advance of "socialism" under prevailing world conditions, and the aspirations of a people long under the aegis of Stalinist regimentation. But as far as the rank-and-file delegates were concerned, the more things "changed" the more they remained the same. They were called together as always for dramatic background.

* [Editor's Note: Among its other merits, this paper may be read for evidence tending to confirm or deny Mr. Brzezinski's thesis in the preceding article.]

The number of delegates varies from congress to congress, depending upon the numerical strength of the party ranks and the representational formula applied. At the Twentieth Congress were 1,355 delegates with the right to vote, one for every 5,000 party members, and eighty-one with a "consultative" voice, one for every 5,000 party candidates. In comparison with the Nineteenth Congress, the voting delegates represented 2.7 times as many workers engaged directly in production, twice as many collective farmers, a much higher educational level (well over half had completed higher education), and a far greater proportion of the total in the over-fifty age-bracket.<sup>1</sup> The bias toward increasing overrepresentation of the administrative and technical bureaucracy so apparent at earlier congresses was countered, though these elements distinctly predominated. Fifty-five delegations of the "fraternal communist and workers parties" were also on hand, including most of the leaders with international reputations except those of the Yugoslav and American parties.

"Collective Leadership" and the Second Death of Stalin. Western interest in developments at the congress, aside from matters of foreign policy, centered upon the post-Stalin leadership pattern. On this subject, the Kremlin executed a spectacular turnabout perhaps more far-reaching in its implications than anything else said at the congress. Not only did the élite underscore the principle of "collective leadership," but also frontally attacked the "cult of the individual" (or the "cult of personality") using Stalinism as a critical point of departure. Rarely, however, were such allusions direct personal references. During the regular proceedings, Stalin was mentioned by name in only five instances. Khrushchev conveyed the impression that one-man rule is a matter of the regrettable past and that Soviet leadership today is not split into contending cliques but impersonally bound together by the "cause" to which it is morally dedicated: "The leading core of the party is not a group of men bound by personal relations of mutual advantage, but a working collective of leaders whose relations are based on ideas and principles permitting neither mutual forgiveness nor personal antagonism."<sup>2</sup> Admitting that under Stalin's tutelage, the central party organs had not met regularly nor dealt with important policy-making subjects, Khrushchev assured the congress that "the Presidium of the Central Committee has become a regularly acting collective body dealing with all the most important questions of the life of the party and country." In a thinly veiled reference to the quasi-religious nature of the Stalin myth, he asserted that the Central Committee "resolutely oppose(s) the cult of personality alien to the spirit of Marxism-Leninism, which turns one or another leader into a miracle-performing hero. . . ."<sup>3</sup> The concrete evils of the "cult" enumerated at the congress are a pointed commentary on the stringencies and effects of rigorous dictatorship. Mikhail A. Suslov, chief of the propaganda apparatus under Stalin, declared:

<sup>1</sup> Averkys B. Aristov, Report of the Credentials Commission to the 20th CPSU Congress (Feb. 16, 1958), 20th CPSU Congress Proceedings, Part II (Department of State, Washington, D.C., 1956), pp. D-6 and D-10. This material, in three volumes, is the most complete record of the congress sessions presently available in English. It constitutes the chief source utilized in the preparation of this article. Subsequent citations appear as: 20th CPSU Congress Proceedings.

The theory and practice of the cult of personality . . . diminished the role of the popular masses and the role of the party; lowered collective leadership; undermined intra-party democracy; suppressed the activity of party members, their initiative, and independent work; led to lack of supervision, irresponsibility, and even to arbitrariness in the work of individual persons; hindered the development of criticism and self-criticism; and engendered a unilateral and sometimes even erroneous solution of problems.<sup>4</sup>

Suslov guaranteed that the spread of "dogmatism and parrot-learning" resulting from the "cult of personality" would be methodically counteracted.

Anastas I. Mikoyan, one of Stalin's closest associates, delivered the most outspoken, stinging rebuke of the Stalinist style of leadership. He criticized the previously sacred theoretical content of Stalin's last major economic analysis of capitalism, published on the eve of the Nineteenth Congress: "In analyzing the state of the economy in contemporary capitalism, it is doubtful that we can be helped by—and it is doubtful if it is correct—Stalin's well-known dictum in 'The Economic Problems of Socialism in the USSR' . . . ." Moreover, he intimated that party histories would be revised to expunge deliberate distortions: ". . . Up to quite recently, we have had books . . . which were current and were even regarded as an unchallenged yardstick in which facts were falsified. Some persons were arbitrarily exalted in them, others got no mention at all."

<sup>2</sup> Nikita S. Khrushchev, Report of the Central Committee to the 20th CPSU Congress (Feb. 14, 1956), ibid., Part I, p. A-94.

<sup>3</sup> Both quotations ibid., Part I, p. A-96.

<sup>4</sup> Mikhail A. Suslov, Speech at 20th CPSU Congress (Feb. 16, 1956), ibid., Part I, p. C-10.

Referring to Stalin's device of dispensing retroactive "justice" to fortify his own power position, Mikoyan condemned the former dictator by deploring "... alleged sabotage on the part of some of the party leaders of (the civil war period) who were wrongly declared to have been enemies of the people many years after the events described had taken place." Mikoyan ended his dissection by sneering at the famous "Oath to Lenin," a pseudo-religious piece of sentimental oratory by Stalin at Lenin's funeral in 1924. This "oath," memorized by Soviet school children for years in a form resembling prayer, was caustically alluded to in these terms: "How great would be Lenin's joy if he now, . . . could see that we not only swear by Lenin's name but are exerting our efforts to put into practice Lenin's ideas and are fulfilling his behests reverently." Mikoyan's comments were doubly barbed because they were accompanied by an insinuation directed at Lenin's renowned "last will and testament" which Stalin had suppressed. Mikoyan reminded the congress of "Lenin's great anxiety about the fate of our party . . . before he left us."<sup>5</sup> In his testament, Lenin questioned the power which Stalin had accumulated and expressed misgivings concerning his discretion in using it. Then in a postscript, Lenin wrote:

Stalin is too rude and this fault becomes unbearable in the Office of General Secretary. Therefore I propose to the comrades to find a way to remove Stalin from that position and appoint to it another man, more patient, more loyal, more polite and more attentive to comrades, less captious, and so forth.<sup>6</sup>

On June 30, Lenin's "testament" was finally published in the magazine Kommunist for the enlightenment of the Soviet people. It was accompanied by the most candid public criticism of Stalin up to that time. Other documentary material long buried in the Kremlin archives will no doubt be similarly publicized sooner or later. The man who spoke so contemptuously at the congress was the same Mikoyan who remarked at the Nineteenth Congress that the old dictator "... enlightens with the bright flame of Stalinist genius the road forward to a more brilliant communist future."

Actually, much of the luster had been rubbed from the idol for some time before the congress delegates assembled. Within a month after Stalin's death, his name had virtually disappeared from the Soviet press. Then, in the early summer of 1953 the "Kremlin doctors' plot" (primarily a "conspiracy" of Jewish physicians) against the lives of high leaders was re-evaluated as a "concoction of false allegations" by the police in general and Lavrenti P. Beria in particular. This was the onset of the exposé of the complicated plots and intrigue characteristic of the Stalinist régime, now no longer a matter of conjecture, since the same men who participated in them have candidly acknowledged that they were "unwillingly" entangled in the system. A third pre-congress development was the freeing of a few surviving Old Bolshevik leaders from their long imprisonment, while the authorities set about ameliorating conditions in "forced labor camps" generally. Hence before the congress, an anti-Stalin operation was underway, but observers did not suspect that the assault would be pressed to an all but open refutation of some of the most fundamental precepts of Stalinism.

<sup>5</sup> All foregoing quotations from Anastas I. Mikoyan, Speech at 20th CPSU Congress (Feb. 16, 1956), ibid., Part I, pp. D-22, D-25, D-26, and D-28.

<sup>6</sup> Quoted by Harrison Salisbury in New York Times, Feb. 24, 1956, p. 4.

In the weeks following the congress, it became increasingly evident that only the opening round had been fired in the bombardment of Stalinism. Apparently the leaders decided when Stalin died to unfold their repudiation gradually, aware that poor timing might incite elements of the population conditioned by every medium of mass persuasion for more than two decades to revere him as the symbol and infallible guiding hand of Soviet society. Thus, nearly three years elapsed before the élite revealed how far they intended to go. About two weeks after the congress, Moscow confirmed persistent rumors that Khrushchev had delivered a three-hour address on February 24 to a closed session of the congress in which he presented a detailed indictment. The principal charges, in the form of a congress resolution read to mass meetings of party members all over the USSR, were: Stalin terrorized his colleagues so thoroughly that, as Khrushchev put it, "we never knew when we entered Stalin's presence whether we would come out alive"; by liquidating several top army men on false charges during the purges of 1937-1938, he decreased the overall caliber of military leadership and demoralized the army at the threshold of imminent German aggression; he was a blunderer who immodestly thought of his nonaggression pact with Hitler in 1939 as a personal diplomatic triumph, and failed to have the Soviet forces properly deployed to resist German invasion despite clear and repeated warnings that an attack was being prepared; and, especially in later life, Stalin was obsessed with phobias that led him to distrust and scheme against even his most intimate confreres. The gravest recriminations were not simultaneously made known to the general population, though in time all the particulars will undoubtedly be brought before the public. But verbal reports of Khrushchev's sensational document spread anyway, touching off protest demonstrations in March in Tiflis, the capital of Stalin's (and Beria's) native Georgia. At their peak, the demonstrations reportedly were joined by "many thousands" of residents led by students at Tiflis university. The outburst was forcibly crushed with a toll of about one hundred deaths. Other imputations against Stalin included: expostulation against "the vicious method of administration by mere injunction" and "such ugly practices as the concealing of shortcomings"; an allegation that Stalin, contrary to the official explanation attributing her death to suicide, murdered his second wife, Nadezhda (Nadia) Alliluyeva, in a paroxysm of rage in November, 1932; an ostensible "request" by Stalin's family that he be buried beside Nadia in Moscow's Novo Deviche cemetery (the excuse the leaders must be seeking to remove his body from its place of honor next to Lenin in the hallowed mausoleum in Red Square); and censure of the old dictator for making "grievous errors" of procedure during the drive for the collectivization of agriculture in the early 1930's as well as for expling Yugoslavia from the Cominform in 1948.<sup>8</sup> Only a régime confident of its hold on the reins of power would dare explode a myth in such a manner; but then, those who toppled the image once worked just as assiduously to emblazon it. That is the way of dictatorship—thorough doing often necessitates thorough undoing.

<sup>7</sup> Quoted in New York Times, March 18, 1956, Sect. 4, p. 2. See the purported full text of his "confidential" speech, ibid., June 5, 1956, pp. 13-16.

What the stress on “collective leadership” and anti-Stalinism means is fairly obvious. Above all, the leaders “disproved” certain maxims and classified some things Stalin did as malpractices for pragmatic reasons. They desire maximum flexibility for their own notions of internal and external expediency. In “emancipating” themselves from some of the more dogmatic aspects of Stalinism and from the more rigid mechanisms of the old régime to gain freedom of action, the current leaders have the logic of objective circumstances uppermost in mind. Their reactions to the excesses of Stalinism are not those of shocked and sensitive humanitarians, for they have not disowned the efficacy of secret police methods as such, nor did they hesitate to use the same techniques of repression in disposing of Beria (however justifiably) or in breaking up the Georgian pro-Stalin demonstrations that they once employed in the service of Stalinism. However, a dictatorship requires a source of clairvoyance, an emotional comfort for the faithful at the core of their secular religion, which in this case might take Stalin’s place. The answer provided by the Twentieth Congress is Lenin who presently enjoys primacy in the pantheon of neoMarxist deities. If the speeches at the congress were taken literally, it would seem that Lenin had never ceased to be “correct” and that Stalin wilfully perverted canonical Leninism, necessitating his excommunication. Soviet monotheism has been continued, but with a god removed from the realm of temporal authority. Their sole aim, so the current leaders sermonize, is to be about the master’s business: “Lenin’s spirit and Leninism permeate our entire work, all our decisions, as if Lenin were living and among us.”<sup>9</sup> Tangible works must follow re-conversion to the one true creed, and in the process, the Soviet people will likely be governed in the immediate future more temperately than in nearly three decades. Probably Stalin will get credit in the forthcoming textual revisions only for his part in the revolution and civil war, his leadership during the few years between Lenin’s death and the destruction of his rivals, and his emphasis on priority for heavy industry.

Genuine “collective leadership,” however, is more than mere spiritual incantation. Khrushchev’s status at the congress suggests that even if he is not in absolute control in the Stalinist sense, undeniably there is no one who outranks him, nor is anyone else in so favorable a position to succeed in accumulating supreme power should he try to do so later. In making the keynote address, in which he systematically set forth a doctrine with a partly new, malleable framework, Khrushchev placed himself, wittingly or unwittingly, in the role of bidding for recognition as the ideological heir of Stalin and chief interpreter of

<sup>8</sup> Pravda, March 28, 1956; New York Times, April 1, 1956; Pravda, April 7, 1956; and New York Times, June 5, 1956.

<sup>9</sup> Mikoyan, 20th CPSU Congress Proceedings, Part I, p. D-27.

Lenin. Most analysts are agreed that the First Secretary displayed expansive but not overbearing confidence in this guise. As Welles Hangen of the New York Times described it: "Khrushchev . . . addressed the 20th Congress . . . with the assurance of a successful corporation director reporting to a stockholders' meeting."<sup>10</sup> Events justify such assurance. Since Stalin's death, Khrushchev saw Beria executed and Malenkov demoted. These were the men who might have contested his position as First Secretary which he assumed in September, 1953. Furthermore, the internal control mechanisms of the party and the highly bureaucratized power structure of Soviet society generally encourage the rise of a single leader. Stalin achieved supremacy by virtue of his post as General Secretary, from which vantage point he played off potential competitors against each other until he had disposed of all of them and established his claim to absolute doctrinal succession as well. An ambitious man adept in intrigue can surge to the top simply by using the existing apparatus. Khrushchev's affirmation that the present leadership is "not bound by personal relations of mutual advantage" nor distinguished by "personal antagonism" runs against the grain of Soviet history. The régime's incessant struggles for power, resulting in countless political exiles and liquidations, are testimony to the fact that "personal advantage" (if life itself is a "personal advantage") is precisely the lever by which the dictatorship has habitually operated. "Collective leadership" may therefore be partly an expedient "gentleman's agreement" among the top leaders aimed at reciprocal self-preservation. The execution of powerful police-chief Beria, who was in a favorable position to arrogate exclusive power to himself, and the subsequent "reform" of the organization and procedure of the police establishments, support such a conclusion. Much tribute was paid at the congress to "decentralization" of both party and government responsibility but there is no evidence that the power edifice has been altered. In addition, irrespective of the many references at the congress to proper regard for "socialist legality," the rule of law has never been adhered to in practice. The élite, at least, have always been above the law, following Lenin's axiom that "law is politics," that law, like all other institutionalized arrangements, can never be interpreted as superior to the "needs" of the dictatorship. The leaders, of course, define those "needs" as they go. The USSR is still governed in the final analysis by executive decree. The prestige and overall authority of the police are more limited today than for many years, but the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the Committee of State Security are very useful to the oligarchy. The men at the apex of a steep power pyramid require secret police because a régime impervious to any limitations other than its own sense of restraint cannot govern permanently without it.

Nevertheless, there is increased tolerance toward deviation and dissent. During the congress, Khrushchev and other leaders attended a recently revived play by Nikolai Pogodin, despite the fact that Pravda had severely criticized the author. Such a thing would have been inconceivable in Stalin's day. How long the comparatively relaxed atmosphere will last is conjectural—probably until another inflexible dogma is developed by one man able to insulate himself as the center and the symbol of the power structure. One unique feature of the Twentieth Congress was the tendency to praise the whole "Leninist" Central Committee rather than to glorify any existing leader. Apparently in the foreseeable future the dictatorship will be more subtle, less personalized, and perhaps more difficult to assess realistically than in the past. The leaders have gone to considerable lengths since the congress to convince Western diplomats that full and free discussion of all issues is the modus operandi of the Central Committee. They have iterated and reiterated that "dissent" is permitted, that all dissenting opinions are recorded so that if a "majority decision" later turns out to be incorrect, the dissenters cannot be blamed for the error, and that experts in appropriate fields are consulted before decisions are made. It is probably true that the Central Committee is now a more genuine forum for the expression of opinion than the USSR has known in at least two decades, and to this extent a "democracy of the élite" may well exist. However, it must also be concluded that: (1) there is still an interlocking oligarchy astride both party and government hierarchies; (2) there is no evidence that public debate of policy is any more widespread than under Stalin; and (3) major policies are still formulated in traditional oligarchical, if not personal, fashion. With respect to Khrushchev, the judgment of the Department of State seems most substantiated: that there are no conclusive reasons for assuming he has won the race for succession, but that certainly he is top candidate.<sup>11</sup> The vital question is whether a thoroughly bureaucratized, dogmatized totalitarian system, whatever the avowed intentions of its leaders, can really afford the luxury of genuine "collective leadership."

<sup>10</sup> New York Times, Feb. 15, 1956, p. 1.

The Stars in the Soviet Firmament. The membership of the Central Committee, ostensibly the highest policy-making organ of the party between congresses, was expanded from 125 to 133 on February 25, including fifty-three persons elected to that body for the first time. Seventy-six of the 122 candidate members were replaced. Most of those who were dropped were simply victims of recent changes in party and government organization in the provinces. Among the new full members, reflecting the shakeup of the police, are Colonel-General Ivan A. Serov, chairman of the Committee of State Security, and Nikolai P. Dudorov, newly appointed Minister of Internal Affairs. Prominent among those dropped were Sergei N. Kruglov, who had been removed as Minister of Internal Affairs in January, 1956, and Admiral N. G. Kuznetsov, chief of staff of the Soviet navy (until he was also relieved of that post in April, 1956, because of "illness"). The navy is now represented only by a few officers still serving as candidates. A total of ten military men were dropped from the Central Committee and its candidate membership, while only four new officers were elected. Not a single naval officer and only a few army leaders spoke during the congress sessions. Clearly, the military is not especially close to the center of political power in this totalitarian system, as it is in most others.

Two days after the congress ended, the freshly elected Central Committee announced the personnel it had chosen to fill the all-important positions on its Presidium and Secretariat. The eleven members of the Presidium, the real locus of power charged with making policy between plenary sessions of the Central Committee, were re-elected without change: Bulganin, Kliment E. Voroshilov, Lazar M. Kaganovich, Alexei I. Kirichenko, Malenkov, Mikoyan, Vyacheslav M. Molotov, Mikhail G. Pervukhin, Maxim Z. Saburov, Suslov, and Khrushchev. Also elected were six alternate members of the Presidium; and it was on this second level of party power that the most drastic reshuffling occurred. Three of the four alternates chosen on the day after Stalin's death were not retained, meaning that five of the six present alternates are newcomers to the select circle. In the order in which they were announced, the alternates are: Marshal Georgi K. Zhukov, the first professional military man to ascend to the top bracket; Leonid I. Brezhnev, chief of the party organization in the Kazakh SSR and one of the key men in the recently instituted program for development of virgin and idle lands east of the Urals; Nikolai A. Mukhitdinov, party leader and former Premier of the Uzbek SSR, another focal area in the drive to increase agricultural output; Dmitri T. Shepilov, editor of Pravda and a leading party theorist who replaced Molotov in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on June 1, 1956; Ekaterina A. Furtseva, rapidly rising First Secretary of the Moscow party organization, who is the first woman to be elevated to the highest echelon; and Nikolai M. Shvernik, titular chief of state until Voroshilov replaced him and current head of both the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions and the Party Control Commission, who was the only alternate to be re-elected. The roster of the eight-member Secretariat, the executive arm of the all-union party apparatus, reveals the names of Khrushchev, Brezhnev, Suslov, Furtseva, and Shepilov, all of whom are also either full or alternate Presidium members. The other three secretaries, who were re-elected, are Averky B. Aristov, Nikolai A. Belyayev, and Pyotr N. Pospelov. The radical changes in the Presidium's alternate membership and in the candidate membership of the Central Committee reflect the apparent desire of the "collective leadership" at the pinnacle to build a strong, relatively youthful organization dedicated to the "new" policies.

<sup>11</sup> New York Times, Feb. 16, 1956, p. 3.

The men whose prestige suffered most, though they were not officially demoted, were Molotov and Malenkov, the latter now Minister of Electric Power Stations. Molotov had engaged in "self-criticism" and confessed he had been at fault in telling the Supreme Soviet in 1955 that only the "basis" of socialism had been built in the USSR. He also admitted to being "the captive of habits and conventions created before World War II" and to "shortcomings manifest in the work of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which fact our party Central Committee pointed out in time."<sup>12</sup> At the congress, Mikoyan referred to past foreign policy as "ossified" and implied that the "collective leadership" had taken over active direction of foreign affairs. When Shepilov was appointed Foreign Minister in June, Mikoyan's hint was substantiated, though Molotov remained a member of the Presidium—distinctly a more important post than that of Foreign Minister. While Malenkov was Premier, March 6, 1953, to February 8, 1955, he evidently attempted to expand consumer goods industries at a faster rate than tradition or expediency dictated, resulting in his “resignation.” At the congress, however, Malenkov paid his respects to heavy industry and lauded the “Leninist” principle of revealing mistakes, “no matter by whom they were made.”<sup>13</sup> Doubtless a capable man who convinced observers during his visit to Britain in April, 1956, that a comeback is likely, Malenkov is one of the few leaders in Soviet history to fall from the summit yet remain in the party’s central power nucleus.

<sup>12</sup> Vyacheslav M. Molotov, Speech at 20th CPSU Congress (Feb. 18, 1956), 20th CPSU Congress Proceedings, Part I, p. G-10.

In addition to Khrushchev, those who emerged from the events surrounding the congress on a higher plane of prestige were Mikoyan who presided over the deflation of the Stalinist hero-figure; Shepilov who delivered a withering attack on “Western imperialism”; and last but far from least, Marshal Zhukov. Zhukov’s personal acquaintance with President Eisenhower, his elevation to alternate Presidium status, and his post as Defense Minister of the Soviet government suggest that in any future correspondence or any future meetings with the President, Zhukov would be able to speak and act with authority.<sup>14</sup> It is no mere coincidence that Zhukov was listed first among the six alternates, implying that he is subordinate only to the eleven full members. This probability is reinforced by the fact that the other party bodies were listed in strict alphabetical order, except that Khrushchev, as First Secretary, appeared at the top of the Secretariat roster. As the conqueror of Berlin, Zhukov was so popular at the end of the war that Stalin assigned him to inconsequential posts, beginning in 1946, and kept the marshal in official obscurity. Zhukov’s rise in less than three years increases his already considerable popular stature as well as the prestige of Red Army leadership generally. His promotion also fits into the pattern of “rewriting history” to delete falsified “treason” charges against several military leaders, including Marshal Tukhachevsky, who were executed during the purges of 1937–1938. The other four new alternates are comparatively unknown figures closely associated with Khrushchev in the past. Their promotion is additional evidence of his primacy in the “collective leadership.”

Party Organizational and Ideological Tasks. Khrushchev announced at the congress that party membership on February 1, 1956, was 7,215,505, including 6,795,896 full members and 419,609 candidates.<sup>15</sup> This is the largest roster in the history of the CPSU, about three times the number of members after the purges of the late 1930’s and 333,360 more than at the time of the Nineteenth Congress, an increase since October, 1952, of about five per cent.<sup>16</sup>

The leaders emphatically asserted that party work falls short of desired standards in several important respects. In accordance with the Leninist dictum

<sup>13</sup> Georgi M. Malenkov, Speech at 20th CPSU Congress (Feb. 17, 1956), ibid., Part I, p. E-3.

<sup>14</sup> Cf. Harry Schwartz’ article in New York Times, Feb. 28, 1956, p. 7.

<sup>15</sup> 20th CPSU Congress Proceedings, Part I, p. A-93.

<sup>16</sup> Figures by Aristov, ibid., Part II, p. D-6.

that quality of personnel and performance is much preferable to sheer numbers, the congress' final Resolution stated:

Following the principle that the main thing is not the numerical growth but the improvement of the quality of the party ranks, the congress instructs party organizations to intensify their care for the individual selection for party membership of leading personalities, primarily from among workers and collective farmers.<sup>17</sup>

For many years, as the régime sought to solve the organizational and technological problems connected with fulfillment of the successive five-year plans, the trend was progressively toward a preponderance of party members belonging to the élite administrative and technical class. The leaders have openly lamented this situation for some time. The congress speakers stressed the need to recruit many more women, young people, and ordinary workers and farmers; to pay more attention to the training of cadres; to show more inclination to promote younger members; and to distribute party personnel more rationally among the various economic and cultural sectors of Soviet society. It is not unknown in this country either, when the trend of behavior runs counter to official doctrine, to repeat the doctrine more vehemently as practice diverges further from it. In tune with the desire to inject new blood and more economically productive elements into the party, the leaders voiced the complaint again and again that too many members devote themselves excessively to "paper work," resulting in cumbersome "bureaucratic formalism" and abstract theorizing at the expense of working acquaintance with concrete economic subjects and problems. "A communist has no right to be an onlooker," Khrushchev philosophized.<sup>18</sup> Members must study technology, agronomy, and production.

To achieve "closer ties with the masses," the congress was told, the party would continue its practice of increasing the number of primary party organizations (i.e., party groups in factories, collective farms, Machine Tractor Stations, and the like). Aristov informed the delegates that the total number of primary party organizations is now about 350,000, with the increase since 1952 concentrating upon collective farms. However, he complained, out of a current total of 80,015 primary party organizations on collectives, there are still 7,356 farms on which no party organizations exist and 10,850 with no more than three to five communists.<sup>19</sup> The party's avowed efforts to secure a firmer footing in rural areas is directly related to the comprehensive plan to raise farm output sharply in the next few years. Khrushchev pointed out that the "biggest defect" in party organization is at the local level, but especially in the countryside. Evidently hoping to stimulate more efficient use of local resources and to reduce "bureaucratism" at the center, he also called upon the "weak" rayon (district) organizations of both the party and the government to improve their work, taking particular care to implement directives from above more conscientiously. In a move designed to invigorate the local party organs, the party statute was amended on February 24 to regularize the convening of krai (territorial), oblast (regional), and rayon conferences and committee sessions. The concern for party performance at the lower echelons coincides with the recent "decentralization" policies instituted by the Soviet government. More than 11,000 industrial enterprises in the past two years have been turned over to the ministries of the union-republics by the all-union ministries. For example, the Azerbaijan SSR now has its own Ministry for Oil; the Kazakh SSR, a new Ministry for Metallurgy; and so on. Decentralization has also been proceeding on an unprecedented scale in other sectors. Theaters may select their own repertoires without detailed supervision by the Ministry of Culture of the USSR. State and collective farms are now allowed to recommend, and in some cases to decide for themselves, the types of crops they are best equipped to grow. Whether decentralization of initiative and authority can be more than nominal in a political system presided over by a totalitarian oligarchy, however, is open to question. For many years the union-republics have had the formal "right" of secession, while foreign and military affairs have been their constitutional prerogatives; but in practice these apparent concessions to "decentralization" have been meaningless. On the other hand, not all recent moves in the direction of "decentralization" should be equally evaluated as entirely shadow and no substance. Certainly some secondary technical decision-making might be and has been surrendered to local initiative, and in the process the relative importance of certain government and party organs has increased accordingly. Yet the comprehensive system of planning, as well as other monolithic features of the Soviet environment, make a large degree of centralized policy-making mandatory. Besides, in any system, decentralization of authority is not necessarily identical with decentralization of power.

<sup>17</sup> Resolution of 20th CPSU Congress (Feb. 24, 1956), ibid., Part III, p. I-16.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., Part I, p. A-98.

<sup>19</sup> Figures ibid., Part II, pp. D-8 and D-9.

A dictatorship may be expected to make life more bearable when it is asking its people to exert maximum effort to fulfill the goals of an ambitious five-year plan as well as to forget the "mistakes" of a painful past. Here is much of the rationale for the plea for "socialist legality," gestures toward individual and local "initiative," and condemnation of the harsher features of the Stalin era. Though Stalin's basic emphasis on heavy industry and collectivized agriculture has not been discarded, the present leaders seem more disposed than Stalin was to grant substantial concessions to the Soviet people at the same time. The "collective leadership" needs demonstrable "proof" that it is not a draconian régime callous toward human requirements like that of the predecessor from whom it strives to dissociate itself. The specific incentives announced at the congress and the provisions of the Sixth Five-Year Plan<sup>20</sup> embrace, among other things: (1) transition to the seven-hour day (42 hour week) in some branches of the economy, beginning in 1957, and in other branches to the five-day week with an eight-hour working day; (2) introduction of the six-hour day for adolescent workers between sixteen and eighteen and reinstitution of the same hours for all persons employed in underground mining; (3) reduction of the work-day on the eves of holidays by two hours; (4) "radical" improvement of old-age and disability pensions, and extension of paid maternity leave; (5) abolition in the fall of 1956 of tuition fees now charged for attendance at any existing educational institution; and (6) an increase in real wages and salaries during the plan period of thirty per cent above the level attained in 1955 (forty per cent in the case of collective farmers).<sup>21</sup> With comparative ease, a dictatorship swiftly shifts back and forth between the stick and the carrot. If actually consumed, the carrot is temporarily nutritious, but it may be withdrawn as suddenly as it was bestowed. Simply because the Soviet régime is a dictatorship, "collective leadership," "decentralization," and conciliation are just as compulsory as hero-worship, centralization, and immoderation once were.

<sup>20</sup> Only the major "calculated moderation" aspects of Soviet policy as reflected in the Sixth Five-Year Plan are relevant to the purposes of this article. Much of the discussion at the congress dealt with specialized economic subjects too technical or detailed for adequate analysis here.

Soviet Foreign Policy and World Communism. The major premise of the Kremlin's current foreign policy orientation is "peaceful coexistence." The official attitude of relatively calm assurance that means and conditions exist for realization of impressive economic and social objectives at home while Soviet influence is prudently augmented abroad pervades both the internal and the external approaches. Policies of calculated moderation in both spheres are designed to complement each other. The USSR no doubt wants "peace" in the immediate future to gain a breathing spell for further development of physical and moral prowess, while domestic policy must simultaneously "prove" that the party has the needs of its citizens at heart and validate the "superiority" of the Soviet system.

In reality, the official creed of "peace" is not a Khrushchevist invention. During the revolution and civil war period, Lenin emphasized that the then shaky Soviets should seek peace at any cost, in deference to the imperative need for consolidation of internal control and economic construction. To Lenin, "peaceful coexistence" was a short-run tactic applicable only until the Bolsheviks had digested their victory in Russia; hence he did not foresee any possibility of permanent or even long-range accommodation between the capitalist world and the USSR: "As long as capitalism and socialism exist, we cannot live in peace; in the end one or the other will triumph—a funeral dirge will be sung either over the Soviet Republic or over world capitalism."<sup>22</sup> Stalin, too, often stated that the USSR and "capitalism" could not long avoid a violent clash. But in the 1930's, when Moscow backed "popular front" governments in Western Europe as counterpoise against resurgent Germany, Stalin also enunciated the "peaceful coexistence" line. Indeed, whenever the leaders assigned the country tasks involving "sacrifice" for national security or drastic social measures likely to be temporarily debilitating, they have talked about "peaceful coexistence." With the need to repair extensive war damage after 1944 and to solidify wartime gains in face of increasing counterpressure by the Western powers, the leaders again expressed the formula, as this comment in an official publication appearing in 1952 typically illustrates: "The Lenin-Stalin foreign policy of the USSR proceeds from recognition of the fact that the two social systems . . . will inevitably coexist for a considerable historical period, and that coöperation between them is both possible and desirable."<sup>23</sup> Thus circumstances putting the USSR at a disadvantage literally forced "peace" upon Moscow, in a large sense whether the leaders liked it or not. "Peace" out of regard for self-preservation is evidence of a "basic principle" of policy only so long as the need continues.

<sup>21</sup> Nikolai A. Bulganin, Report on the Draft Directives of the Sixth Five-Year Plan to the 20th CPSU Congress (Feb. 21, 1956), 20th CPSU Congress Proceedings, Part I, pp. J-43, J-44; Khrushchev, ibid., Part I, p. A-75.

<sup>22</sup> V. I. Lenin, Selected Works, vol. 8 (New York, 1943), p. 297.

There is a major difference, however, between the Twentieth Congress' formulation of "peaceful coexistence" and previous versions of the subject. The congress set forth in unusually concrete detail what the concept means under "present conditions." For example, Stalin never fully retreated from the view that in every capitalist society, there comes a time when the "inexorable" historical process gives way to sheer violence. "The spontaneous process of development yields place to the conscious actions of men, peaceful development to violent upheaval, evolution to revolution."<sup>24</sup> But the congress took a much broader view of "peaceful coexistence." It related its words to a whole chain of conciliatory actions, disavowed revolutionary violence as a universal phenomenon, and reserved force for certain capitalist countries under given conditions only. "It is not true," said Khrushchev, "that we regard violence and civil war as the only way to remake society."<sup>25</sup> Whether violence occurs or not will depend on what the most recalcitrant "exploiters," supported by the "repressive organs" of the bourgeois state apparatus, themselves do in a particular country, rather than on the deliberate provocation of the "proletariat." This modified stand may pose a question for the American courts. In prosecuting communists, the United States government has based its case largely upon the fact that communists, by their whole ideological outlook, inalterably seek the "violent overthrow" of existing governmental institutions. Is it possible that the prosecution's quotations from Marx, Lenin, or Stalin in the future will be countered by the defense with quotations from Khrushchev and Bulganin? Conceivably, the Kremlin may have some such thing in mind.

The reformulation of the credo of violence rests squarely on the notion that "tension" in contemporary international relations has lately been replaced by a "certain relaxation." The decisive reason for this is said to be the emergence of "a group of peace-loving European and Asian states which have proclaimed non-participation in blocs as a principle of their foreign policy."<sup>26</sup> The final Resolution of the congress grouped these states in the "peace-loving" category: India, Burma, Afghanistan, Egypt, Syria, Indonesia, Finland, Austria, and

<sup>23</sup> I. Kirilin, "Lenin and Stalin on the Coexistence of the Two Systems," USSR Information Bulletin, vol. 12 (Feb. 11, 1952), p. 82.

<sup>24</sup> J. V. Stalin, Dialectical and Historical Materialism (New York, 1940), p. 44.

<sup>25</sup> 80th CPSU Congress Proceedings, Part I, p. A-31. Italics added.

<sup>26</sup> Khrushchev, ibid., Part I, p. A-13.

Sweden, all of which are either former Asian colonial areas or else so-called "neutralist" states of Europe. The "zone of peace" consists of both "socialist" and "nonsocialist" states. By "socialist" states, the Soviet leaders mean those belonging to the Soviet bloc, including China, North Korea, North Vietnam, Mongolia and East Germany, with which "fraternal" relations are to be "strengthened." Yugoslavia was not called "fraternal," though it was classified as a "socialist" state populated by "fraternal peoples" with whom "friendship and coöperation" should be "developed."<sup>27</sup>

In addition to the ever widening "zone of peace" geographically speaking, there are "many other sections of society," chiefly Socialists and other "workers parties" in several countries, which also belong to the "forces upholding peace." The First Secretary discovered "increasing real opportunities" for collaboration between communists and "other segments of the working class" in the interests of forming a united front against war. When "fighting" for peace, said he, doctrinal disagreement within the "working class movement" should be shelved. Cordial references were made to the Socialist parties abroad, invariably labeled in the past decade as "lackeys of American imperialism" and typically for decades as "jabbering reformists." The Kremlin has invited the Socialist parties in Western Europe to dispatch visiting delegations to the USSR. After the French Socialists consented during the winter to pay their respects in May, 1956, the French communists initiated a campaign for a "popular front" government.

Therefore, while "socialism" became a truly "world system," the aggregate "forces for peace" have been expanding too. Such a concept required reinterpretation of the Leninist precept that wars are inevitable as long as "imperialism" exists. Khrushchev theorized that the "inevitability" principle was valid when "imperialism was an all-embracing world system" and the "social and political forces which did not want war were weak," but that presently the "world camp of socialism" is a powerful bastion possessing "not only the moral but also the material means to prevent aggression."<sup>28</sup> In assuming this position, Khrushchev relegated Stalin's already diluted theses of "capitalist encirclement" and "socialism in one country" to historical significance only, to a time when the USSR was a beleaguered island in a hostile capitalist sea. Especially since World War II, Stalinism tended to mean that any state outside the "socialist camp," no matter how weak it was or how vocal against insidious "Western imperialism," represented a "threat" to Soviet security. With few exceptions, any state not directly responsive to Soviet control was simply consigned to "the other side." Hence postwar Stalinism generally saw a dichotomous split between the "imperialist camp" and its "lackeys" on the one hand and the "socialist camp" on the other. The latter camp was awarded a monopoly on "upholding peace." Clearly, Stalin's approach is currently considered outmoded, too rigid and too crude to fit "conditions." Mikoyan described the

<sup>27</sup> See summary of basic foreign policy tasks in Resolution of 20th CPSU Congress, ibid., Part III, pp. I-7 and I-8.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., Part I, p. A-29.

"new" outlook as "a fresh course, . . . a policy of high principles, active and elastic, maintained on a calm level, without abuse. . . ."<sup>29</sup> Though Stalin himself had virtually reached some of the same conclusions by the time of the Nineteenth Congress in 1952, naturally he is not going to be credited with acumen.

During the months following the congress, the technique of trying to win the sympathy and coöperation of the Socialists became the Kremlin's dominant policy in Western Europe. On March 31, Pravda issued a glowing appeal to the Socialists for "friendly collaboration" on all questions bearing upon relaxation of world tension, prohibition of atomic weapons, and establishment of a "genuine" all-European collective security system. The CPSU previously encouraged "popular fronts," not only in Western Europe in the 1930's but also in Eastern Europe at the close of World War II for the purpose of building the satellite empire which ultimately resulted.

Nowadays, however, a more ramified strategy underlies Moscow's coöperative bids. Khrushchev indicated that former colonial areas would be safe in investing their economic future with the USSR rather than relying on the assistance of their erstwhile "exploiters." Following the argument used when Soviet delegations appealed on the spot to India, Burma, and Afghanistan, Khrushchev told the congress: "These countries, although they do not belong to the socialist world system, can draw on its achievements to build up an independent national economy and to raise the living standards of their peoples. Today they need not go begging . . . to their former oppressors."<sup>30</sup> Khrushchev has astutely manipulated, to Soviet advantage, the almost obsessive introversion of many newly independent peoples who fear foreign exploitation and suspect that outright gifts are always given with ulterior motives. He assured and reassured them that Soviet offers are not contingent upon participation in "military blocs," that the USSR does not intend to turn underdeveloped countries into "agrarian raw material appendages," and that Soviet aid would not stimulate a feverish arms race nor burdensome taxation.<sup>31</sup> The Kremlin's economic counter-offensive, designed in part to show American assistance in its "true light," and incessant hammering on the "peace" theme have had an adverse effect on American relations with some Asian governments. John Sherman Cooper, United States ambassador in New Delhi, admitted in February that relations with India had deteriorated. Though they have subsequently improved somewhat, public opinion polls have revealed that many Indians believe the United States threatens peace, while few think the real danger lies in Moscow. Before the congress, the Soviet leaders reversed the Stalinist refusal to give anything to anyone and contributed for the first time to the United Nations technical assistance program. They then offered aid in the form of loans or barter trade to India, Indonesia, Burma, Afghanistan, Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Liberia, Latin America, Iran and Pakistan (with the implicit proviso that the last-named state give up its affiliation with the Baghdad pact powers). Egypt and Burma have made it clear that Soviet agreement to take cotton or rice in payment is much better than accepting the political and military "strings" dangling from direct grants extended by the United States. At this point in economic warfare, for that is precisely what it amounts to, a dictatorship has a marked advantage. Khrushchev can open the purse at psychological moments, for he does not have to account for reasons or amounts to a critical press, an openly probing legislature, nor a demanding public opinion. Many of the states upon which Moscow is concentrating its economic efforts are impressed by the fact that the USSR does not appear to be inveigling them to join anything, while the United States utilizes money as a weapon of diplomacy, to enclose all uncommitted countries in the network of anti-Soviet alliances. To adamant neutralists like India, which has categorically refused to be a party to any military coalition and has shown great reluctance to accept grants, the Soviet style is very appealing.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., Part I, p. D-8.

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., Part I, p. A-17.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., Part I, pp. A-17 and A-18.

To the non-neutralist, "capitalist" states, Moscow proposes coöperation in the arena of trade, more cultural and scientific interchange, and "friendship pacts" with the USSR in order to improve relations and strengthen "mutual confidence." Khrushchev suggested: "In contrast to the 'Let's Arm!' slogan of the North Atlantic bloc, we put forward the slogan, 'Let's Trade!'"<sup>32</sup> As if it were somehow possible to separate ideological warfare from the other ingredients of world politics, Khrushchev underlined the fact that "peaceful coexistence" does not apply to the realm of ideas:

The fact that we support peaceful coexistence and economic competition with capitalism certainly does not mean that one can relax in the struggle against bourgeois ideology and against the remnants of capitalism in the minds of people. It is our task constantly to unmask bourgeois ideology, reveal its character, inimical to the people, and its reactionary nature.<sup>33</sup>

Perhaps the widest departure from the traditional communist position forthcoming from the congress was the dictum that in certain countries "a stable majority in parliament" backed by "a mass revolutionary movement of the proletariat" might transform the institution from "an organ of Bourgeois democracy into a genuine instrument of the people's will." Such a majority in control of a bourgeois parliament "in a number of capitalist and former colonial countries" might actually bring about "the conditions needed to secure fundamental social changes."<sup>34</sup> Such "creative Marxism," as the communists call their theorizing when they wish to overhaul their intellectual equipment for expedient reasons, comes perilously close to the legalistic "social opportunism" or "right Socialism" that Bolsheviks have always abominated. The speakers at the congress advanced some rather specious arguments concerning the difference between evolution and revolution to deny the resemblance. Almost equally surprising was the degree to which the leaders developed the notion that the transition from capitalism to socialism might proceed along different paths in different countries. In 1948, an article in Bolshevik stated the traditional view that the "general laws" of transition, "first revealed by Marx and Engels and verified, systematized, and developed by Lenin and Stalin on the basis of the experience of the Bolshevik party and of the Soviet State, are mandatory for all countries."<sup>35</sup> But Khrushchev insisted that the Soviet model need not be copied by countries in other circumstances. He cited "people's democracy" as one "peaceful" way to effect "transition," while Chinese experience reveals "much that is unique." Though civil war is not uniformly associated with the "transition" process, Khrushchev did recognize an old maxim sine qua non: "Whatever the form of transition to socialism, the decisive and indispensable factor is the political leadership of the working class, headed by its vanguard. Without this there can be no transition to socialism."<sup>36</sup> Here, at the heart of the matter, is old wine in new jugs. Unless the communists afford leadership in every country, no social transformation satisfactory to Moscow can occur under any conditions; and if the remarkably swift adaptation of the various parties abroad to Khrushchev's "creative Marxism" at the congress is any indication, communists around the world are just as susceptible to Soviet ideological shifts and "fraternal" guidance as in the past.

<sup>32</sup> Ibid., Part I, p. A-26.

<sup>33</sup> Ibid., Part I, p. A-112.

<sup>34</sup> Both quotations from Khrushchev, ibid., Part I, p. A-32.

The Soviet leaders say they believe that any international problem can be solved by diplomatic bargaining among the great powers. Khrushchev denoted negotiation as the "sole method" of resolving controversies.<sup>37</sup> However, from Moscow's viewpoint, negotiation must be based on the so-called Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence: mutual respect for territorial integrity and sovereignty (not only does the USSR define "sovereignty" more rigidly than most states, but this presumably means also that the West must take official cognizance of the entire Soviet realm as it now exists); nonaggression (by being the navigator on the "inevitable" tide of history, the USSR cannot, by its own definition, be guilty of "aggression," while in any case both sides are already committed to "nonaggression" by the United Nations Charter); noninterference in each other's internal affairs (the USSR takes an extremely broad view of the scope of its own "internal affairs," while the traditional Western contention that communist parties abroad are agents of Soviet foreign policy still cannot be answered credibly by the Kremlin, despite Khrushchev's declaration that "it is ridiculous to think that revolutions are made to order")<sup>38</sup>; equality and mutual advantage (apparently meaning reciprocal concessions yielding place to gradual Soviet expansion); and peaceful coexistence buttressed with active economic coöperation (the Soviet bilateral barter concept is bound to attract some Western countries with chronic dollar shortages, one-commodity export countries, and governments allergic to "dollar diplomacy"). There are so

<sup>35</sup> Bolshevik, No. 17 (Sept., 1948).

<sup>36</sup> 20th CPSU Congress Proceedings, Part I, p. A-33. Italics added. "Vanguard" of course refers to the Communist party.

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., Part I, p. A-21.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., Part I, p. A-27.

many semantical pitfalls and one-sided advantages for the USSR inherent in these unilaterally promulgated bases for "negotiation" that this conclusion seems inescapable: Moscow has no real intention of negotiating major world problems except on its own terms. This interpretation is further substantiated by Soviet behavior at the Geneva conference in the fall of 1955. At that time, the Kremlin was presented with an unusually favorable opportunity to negotiate three outstanding matters—disarmament, extension of cultural and economic contacts between East and West, and unification of Germany as a first step in creating conditions for European security. But Molotov made it clear that the USSR would not bargain on any of these subjects, despite the relaxed but deceptive joviality of the "summit conference" in Geneva four months before. It is now plain enough that the "Geneva spirit" was a tactical curtain behind which the Soviet Union maneuvered a diplomatic victory. In the Machiavellian credo, there is no necessary connection between smiles and deeds, and still less between words and conscious objectives.

Since "communist morality" admittedly allows any means whatsoever which (the leaders say) serve the end of world transformation,<sup>39</sup> the self-image of a "new" USSR devoted to peace, friendship, and restraint for their own sake demands close scrutiny. First of all, the Twentieth Congress clearly did not subscribe to peaceful coexistence, parliamentary transition, nor renunciation of force under all conditions not involving direct attack on the Soviet Union. The leaders were careful to modify the tempering of violence with such relative phrases as "in the present world situation" or "in certain capitalist countries." And even more fundamental is the fact that a few men in a totalitarian oligarchy decree in given instances whether the "situation" is or is not amenable to "peaceful coexistence." Only the élite may "develop" ideology, and there is no guarantee against sudden, diametric reversal. Soviet history yields many precedents for the recent turn of events in foreign policy. "Peace" has long been utilized as a stratagem to cloud the direction and tempo of longer-range objectives and as a soporific for the "bourgeoisie" while strength is being mustered. The First Secretary, as if in anticipation that this interpretation might be placed on Soviet deportment, commented somewhat defensively at the congress that "peaceful coexistence . . . is not a tactical move, but a fundamental principle of Soviet foreign policy."<sup>40</sup> Undoubtedly Moscow is sincere about wanting peace "under present circumstances," but this says nothing about the future when other leaders might "re-create Marxism," merely by quoting Lenin's "inevitability" maxim. Moreover, "peaceful coexistence" does not seem to preclude opportunistic exploitation of the more acute existing international animosities. For example, Soviet diplomacy arranged to have satellite Czechoslovakia ship arms to Egypt in September, 1955, and to offer to train Egyptian officers. By diverting the combustible Arab-Israeli situation to its own immediate profit, Moscow obtained a foothold in the heart of the Arab lands, drew several Arab governments closer to its orbit, and precariously tilted the scales of power in the ultrasensitive Middle East. That the Israelis and the Arabs hovered on the edge of full-scale war as a result demonstrates that the Soviet olive branch blooms and withers quickly with the political climate of the moment in different areas of the world. The Kremlin, having little to lose and much to gain, was quick to exploit the ensuing differences between Egypt and the western powers, and the olive branch was scarcely the symbol to characterize its political collaboration with Nasser in the events preceding and following the nationalization of the Suez Canal in July 1956.

<sup>39</sup> Kratkii Filosoficheskii Slovar (Gospolitizdat, Moscow, 1941), p. 177.

<sup>40</sup> 20th CPSU Congress Proceedings, Part I, p. A-26.

Though the propaganda of "peace" is now just as basic a tool as ever, the idea is presently connected with an unprecedented variety of overt behavior calculated to convince the world, in ways selectively adjusted to the tastes of different countries or social elements, that the USSR is bursting with good intentions. This is precisely what the Department of State has been insisting the Kremlin do ever since the "cold war" began. As a consequence, Moscow has taken the diplomatic edge off the official American argument that the Soviets merely utter platitudes while doing nothing to make their words ring true. In little more than two years, in addition to other moves previously mentioned, the Soviet régime opened its borders to visiting agricultural, educational, parliamentary, cultural, and even religious delegations from the West ("We smote to smithereens the stupid invention alleging that we fear contact with foreigners," said Mikoyan)<sup>4</sup>; selected its negative adjectives more discreetly (the leaders of the "capitalist" states are now "imperialists" rather than "blood thirsty warmongers" or "fascist beasts"); and simultaneously gravitated in numerous other directions toward an external demeanor far more moderate than has been the case in nearly three decades. After making a literally groveling apology to Tito in 1955, Moscow could hardly do less than "dissolve" the Cominform, as formally announced in April, 1956, because it had become a rabid purveyor of anti-Tito propaganda after Yugoslavia's expulsion in 1948. The Cominform was also closely associated with Stalin's methods of unbending supervision over the East European "people's democracies" and Beria's "traitorous activities," although its disappearance as a functioning body has no basic importance insofar as the relationship between Moscow and communist parties abroad is concerned. The impact of such a sequence of events, including publicized reductions of the armed forces by 640,000 in 1955 and by 1,200,000 in 1956, whether "sincerely" motivated or not, upon the "neutralist" states especially—and indeed upon the balance of critical judgment in all areas and countries—has already begun to coincide with Soviet expectations. In June, the results of parliamentary elections in Iceland indicated that the United States would be asked to give up its air base at Keflavik since the world situation is "no longer tense," and Ceylon gave increasing indications of joining the "neutralist" ranks.

The Soviets have wrested the initiative from the Western powers. The new complex of tactics represents a more flexible and formidable policy than the Kremlin has adopted in at least three decades. In the short run, world relations will not seem so "tense"; but in the long run, calculated moderation will make the Soviet Union a more subtle and therefore a more dangerous opponent, and the international communist movement more versatile than ever. Systems of alliances and armament spending to countervail direct military action may have been decisive in 1948 or 1950; but counteracting possible "popular fronts" and economic aid to the needy call for other responses by the West. The USSR is now meeting the West on its own ground, suggesting that the "revolution" can be consummated in some instances through the very parliamentary processes highly valued in Western political ideology. This is a challenge aimed at the heart of Western political morality. While Stalin abetted force in Greece, Korea, and elsewhere, it was not too difficult to convince most states in Europe and even some in the Middle East and the Far East that the Kremlin might strike in their direction next. But military coalitions and heavy taxes in support of defense programs to keep the wolf away from the door become "unreasonable" or even "warmongering militarism" when the wolf has stopped huffing and puffing. Some Western allies, which could benefit in the short run from expanded East-West trade and from diminished friction to stabilize their own internal political situations, might not prove to be the accommodating American auxiliaries they seemed before the "smiling offensive" commenced.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., Part I, p. D-9.

In a sense, the Kremlin's altered approach attests to the overall success of "containment," yet at the same time renders it obsolete by making it insufficient in itself. Stalin tried "direct action" in Western Europe when the Cominform admittedly attempted to wreck the Marshall Plan through strikes and mass disturbances, but these techniques did not live up to expectations. When Moscow sought to countermand the defensive unification of Western Europe, that failed for the most part also. The West even began to break down the Arab front of resistance to military pacts, and in 1955 the Baghdad pact materialized. Thus the more the USSR pressed the "cold war," the more people lined up on the other side. With its utilitarian outlook, the Soviet oligarchy concluded that if the Western system of alliances could not be thwarted, at least the uncommitted "neutralists" might be prevented from joining the Western camp by offering alternatives of sweet reasonableness. Especially in Asia is the moral gauntlet most profoundly challenging. Most Asian countries are extremely sensitive on the subject of "black" (Western) imperialism. In many cases they hate it more than they fear Soviet aggrandizement. Their peoples appraise Western governments in the light of their experience with European colonial administrations in the past. Hence while the Asian masses take Western achievements for granted and have first-hand knowledge of Western "mistakes," they have no corresponding acquaintance with Soviet realities; and they tend to look upon "Marxism" as if no one had ever "tried" it.

Khrushchevism is doubtless more appealing also to the Chinese comrades than doctrinaire Stalinism was. Mao Tse-tung has long been much more favorably inclined toward "collective leadership" than Stalin ever was, and he must have been pleased to hear the principle that the forms of "transition to socialism" do not depend on mimicry of Soviet experience. In addition, since the Kremlin intends to augment trade with technical aid to China, which might be highly salutary for Peiping's current five-year plan, a more equalitarian Sino-Soviet partnership may well emerge. The other comrades abroad may have been startled by the kaleidoscopic changes in Soviet tactics, and certainly the reputations of certain foreign communist leaders, some posthumously, can scarcely escape re-evaluation—a result of switches in party line with considerable precedent. Already, Klement Gottwald, the deceased Czech leader, and Bulgaria's Vulko Chervenkov have been re-examined and found to be suffering from a new malady called "cult of the individual." Other leaders such as Bela Kun, head of Hungary's short-lived communist régime in 1919, have been officially restored to favor. The foreign communists should be accustomed by this time to dextrous accommodation, and despite outward appearances, there is no real indication that any of the parties are seriously split or otherwise maladjusted. All parties, even the one in Yugoslavia which has predicated its rapprochement with Moscow on the "further development" of anti-Stalinist policies, have fallen into step with the fundamentals of Khrushchevism. Comrades Togliatti of Italy and Thorez of France have criticized the present Soviet leaders for failure to clarify their own roles during the Stalinist era and for downgrading Stalin in a unilateral manner, while the Daily Worker has condemned the "collective leadership" for the way the policy of de-Stalinization has been implemented. But more important than these attacks on the details of Khrushchevism is the fact that even the Italian, French, and American parties have endorsed the assault on the "cult of the individual" in general and on Stalin in particular. The French party, which was the most "Stalinized communist movement in the world outside the USSR . . . has hardly been shaken by the iconoclasts who smashed their god."<sup>42</sup> The principles of Khrushchevism itself invite precisely what Togliatti, Thorez, and the Daily Worker have done. The speakers at the Twentieth Congress said it was no longer necessary to copy Soviet revolutionary experience, that each party should march toward "socialism" using means adapted to its own national environment, that "shortcomings" lingering from the past should be exposed with "Leninist straightforwardness," and that from now on, there would be tolerance, even encouragement, of criticism and dissent by the reformed régime in Moscow.

After all, Thorez and Togliatti did not express their "independence" until the Kremlin itself gave the signal at the Twentieth Congress that it is acceptable to disagree, that one man's opinion imposed on everyone else is a violation of Leninist criticism and self-criticism as well as of "Bolshevik modesty." The fact that these leaders dared to question the Soviet élite is evidence that the foreign parties are responsive to Soviet guidance, not unresponsive. Moscow is trying hard to make the parties abroad, even those in Eastern Europe, appear more like other political parties as far as methods are concerned. In view of the new relaxation of controls in the satellites and the new emphasis on "popular fronts," this should not be surprising. Khrushchev apparently wants to make the foreign comrades appear more "respectable," to get more votes in Western Europe. Just as he is permitting more "deviation" at home to unleash human energies so long pent-up under the rigors of Stalinism, so he has given the parties abroad more room to maneuver politically for the same general reason. For three decades the communists abroad have been correctly regarded in the West, with few exceptions, as servile tools of Moscow. Now the counterpropaganda of Khrushchevism is designed in part to disturb that notion. The reactions of Thorez and Togliatti underline indelibly the profound challenge to Western political morality which Khrushchevism entails. The question is, of course: To what extent can the communist movement be "liberated" and still serve the specific requirements of Soviet foreign policy in the future? But today it is in each party's own local interest to follow the milder, more respectable approach prescribed by the "creative Marxism" of the Twentieth Congress. For years, some parties had to sacrifice themselves on the altar of Soviet foreign policy, when they might have profited in their own countries by behaving differently. Only a patently undedicated communist would ignore current possibilities to move in the direction of "socialism" as local circumstances permit, utilizing a combination of expedient means blessed by the Twentieth Congress. To this extent, some of the resilience and verve of "communism" as a world movement, largely smothered under Stalin, has been deliberately revitalized by the "collective leadership."

<sup>42</sup> Suzanne Labin, "French Communism Shrugs off Stalin," N. Y. Times Magazine, May 27, 1956, p. 22.

Out of the byways of opportunism, certain consistent and traditional elements of the "new" foreign policy are evident. The things that have not changed are far more basic and significant for the future of world politics than those that have. The Kremlin still looks forward to a world "dictatorship of the proletariat," and no one at the congress even implied otherwise. The leading force of the "transition" is still the communist party in each country; and each party is still susceptible to signals and aid from the "fraternal" CPSU which rules one of the two most powerful states on earth. Woven into the fabric of all the "new" policies, which are in reality conscious tactics, is a strong thread that has served Moscow well many times in the past in overcoming crises and adapting to changed conditions—time.

THE GUATEMALAN AFFAIR: A CRITIQUE OF UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY*

PHILIP B. TAYLOR, JR.

University of Michigan

I

Latin views toward the United States are not merely those of the weak toward the strong. They are, by the Latins' own definition, those of the poor toward the rich, the cultured toward the uncultured, the idealist toward the pragmatist.<sup>1</sup> They are those of a people largely inexperienced and misled in the political arena, and without practical criteria for the Anglo-Saxon notion of "democracy," either political or cultural. But they are bitterly experienced in the ways of dictatorship, economic exploitation, and grinding poverty. Born in Iberian feudalism and Catholic fervor, the Latin plainly does not understand the largely Protestant, industrialized, politically and culturally democratic, radical (and yet conservative) United States.<sup>2</sup> It is certainly a slight exaggeration to say that the most important thing the two groups have in common is the hemisphere in which, by geographic accident, they live.<sup>3</sup>

To them we are Yanquis, past and present exploiters, rich because they are poor, slightly drunk with our new postwar power, and verging toward fanaticism in our anti-communism. But their principal current complaint against us is our overflowing generosity toward Europe and Asia and our niggardliness toward themselves. A rather common postwar joke among underdeveloped nations seems to acquire new meaning when applied to Latin America: a presidential adviser, gloomily surveying our massive aid to Germany and Japan, suggests war on the United States, because we are so generous to those we defeat.<sup>4</sup>

* Research for this paper was assisted by a grant from the Penrose fund of the American Philosophical Society of Philadelphia.

<sup>1</sup> This view of the United States is common, not only among Latin Americans, but among nearly all underdeveloped nations. The leaders of India, for example, argue that while the United States may be rich and powerful, India has far greater spiritual values which may be glimpsed only faintly by Americans. The best expression of the corresponding Latin American view is frequently said to be found in the famed and quite powerful work Ariel, written by the Uruguayan José Enrique Rodó, in 1900. For a short synthesis of the Indian view, see F. S. C. Northrop, The Taming of the Nations (New York, 1952), Chs. 3, 4, and 6.

<sup>2</sup> One of the better explanations of the basic characteristics of Latin American society can be found in L. Cecil Jane, Liberty and Despotism in Spanish America (Oxford, England, 1929), Chs. 2-8. See also Frank Tannenbaum, "The Future of Democracy in Latin America," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 33, pp. 429-44 (April, 1955).

<sup>3</sup> The contrary view, although presented without significant documentation, is stated by former Ecuadorian President Galo Plaza Lasso in his little book Problems of Democracy in Latin America (Chapel Hill, North Carolina, 1955), pp. 2-3.

<sup>4</sup> The rejoinder of the adviser's chief is not necessarily apropos; after agreeing that this might hold possibilities, he objects, "Suppose we won?"

The disparity of United States economic aid to the various areas is striking when Guatemala, in its backwardness, general maldistribution of power and wealth, and syncretistic culture and religion, nearly epitomized those nations which sprang from the imposition of the Spanish yoke on a relatively well-populated Indian nation. Independent of external political control in 1823, Guatemala was a member of the United Provinces of Central America until 1838. Caudillo followed caudillo in the presidency, some enlightened but most despotic, some sympathetic to the Catholic Church, some anti-clerical. As in much of Latin America, "elections" were held only when the government felt sure it could win, so revolutions became the more popular way to change governments.<sup>5</sup> The last completely typical caudillo was General Jorge Ubico y Castañeda, who came to power in 1930 and maintained himself until an almost fantastically courageous university student-led strike forced his resignation in July, 1944. A brief but uncertain interim government, taking his orders, was ousted by a real military uprising in October, and in a subsequent election, Juan José Arévalo was elected for the 1945-1951 presidential term.

There is little doubt that communism got its start in Guatemala under Arévalo;<sup>6</sup> Arévalo's successor, Lt. Col. Arbenz, who served from March, 1951, until his ouster in July, 1954, was quite sympathetic to Communist activities, but under the best of contrary circumstances the ouster of Communists from their positions in the government would have been extremely difficult and would have stripped the government of its trained, though not necessarily efficient, bureaucrats.<sup>7</sup> Criticism of the character of the government, centering viewed statistically. Seymour Harris, in "How Good is our Good Neighbor Policy?," New York Times Magazine, Nov. 28, 1954, pp. 17 ff., says that "of about $80,000,000,000 of United States Government foreign aid since 1940, the people to the south of us have received but 1 to 2 per cent." The point is supported by the Report of the Subcommittee to Investigate Communist Aggression in Latin America to the Select Committee on Communist Aggression, House of Representatives, Eighty-Third Congress, Second Session . . . (Washington, 1954), p. 18: "... the fact remains that to this critical area we have devoted less than 1 percent of the billions of dollars of grants that we have appropriated . . . to help friendly nations. . . ."

---

Tom Fitzgibbons, in his article "An Empty Briefcase at Rio," The New Republic, Vol. 131, pp. 12-15 (Dec. 13, 1954), states even more dramatically: "Since the war, the United States has given, outright, to wealthy Belgium and tiny Luxembourg three times more than to all 20 Latin American nations."

<sup>5</sup> See Sol Tax, "The Problems of Democracy in Middle America," The American Sociological Review, Vol. 10, pp. 192-99 (April, 1945). Many of Tax' generalizations are based in part on field study and observation in Guatemala.

<sup>6</sup> See Daniel James, Red Design for the Americas (New York, 1945), an imposing synthesis based, in large part, on 1945-1954 materials. See also the somewhat more authoritative publication by the U. S. Department of State, Intervention of International Communism in Guatemala (Washington, 1954), pp. 35-88.

<sup>7</sup> James, pp. 46-52, 70 ff., cites a few of the Communists who held important positions in the government. The late John E. Peurifoy, who was United States Ambassador to Guatemala from October 3, 1953 to September 15, 1954, told a House of Representatives committee investigating Communist aggression in Latin America that his conversations with Arbenz had convinced him that the man was a Communist. Ninth Interim Report of Hearings before the Subcommittee on Latin America of the Select Committee on Communist Aggression, House of Representatives, Eighty-Third Congress, Second Session (Washington, 1954), pp. 124-26 (hereinafter cited as Hearings).

in the United States, developed during this period. A series of five articles by Fitzhugh Turner of the New York Herald Tribune in February, 1950, was illustrative of the nature of this comment.<sup>8</sup>

Among the exiles forced from Guatemala by the operations of the Arévalo-Arbenz government was Lt. Colonel Carlos Castillo Armas, who had been condemned to death for his implication in an unsuccessful attempt against the government in late 1950. Castillo had escaped in June, 1951, and had established himself in neighboring Honduras. By the end of May, 1954, he was openly active in the preparation of a force designed to invade Guatemala and overthrow its government. The Honduran government seems not to have undertaken to fulfill the customary obligation of nations in international law to prevent one's territory from being employed as a base of operations against a state with which diplomatic relations are currently maintained.<sup>9</sup> On the other hand, the Guatemalan government had not been overly-correct in its relations with Honduras. A general strike had gradually developed in Honduras between February and May, 1954, in a situation in which there had never before been organized unions or even significant labor leadership. At one time 44,000 workers were absent from work, and substantial damage resulted from untended crops and some vandalism. Ambassador Peurifoy later testified that probably at least $750,000 entered the country as aid to the strikers from Guatemala.<sup>10</sup> It is quite likely that Honduras' hospitality to Castillo Armas was a means of redressing the record against Guatemalan intervention.

---

For a brief but authoritative account of the political events prior to 1954, together with a brief description of the structure of Guatemalan government, see Austin F. Macdonald, Latin American Politics and Government, 2nd ed. (New York, 1954), pp. 613-21.

<sup>8</sup> New York Herald Tribune, Feb. 8-13, 1950.

<sup>9</sup> Green H. Hackworth, Digest of International Law, 8 vols. (Washington, 1941), Vol. 2, pp. 291-98, states the general obligations in customary practice, as does Charles G. Fenwick, International Law, 3rd ed. (New York, 1948), pp. 301-2. Honduran action specifically violated numerous provisions of the Charter of the Organization of American States, including articles 5, 7, 11, and 15. See United States Department of State, Ninth International Conference of American States (Washington, 1948), pp. 168 ff.

The New York Times, June 18, 1954, reported: "Foreign correspondents in the Honduran capital were impressed by the numbers of khaki-clad men in the city and gathered at the airport. Wearing no insignia, the men boarded planes without any apparent effort to hide their movements." Honduran failure to check such an obvious gathering of forces can lead only to the conclusion that that nation was in fact performing an act of aggression against Guatemala. Failure of joint inter-American action to develop under the circumstances was further an ignoring of the meaning of article 24 of the O.A.S. Charter, which states that "Every act of aggression by a State against the territorial integrity or the inviolability of the territory or against the sovereignty or political independence of an American State shall be considered an act of aggression against the other American States," and of the resultant article 25: "If the inviolability or the integrity of the territory . . . of any American State should be affected by an armed attack or by an act of aggression . . . , the American States, in furtherance of the principles of continental solidarity or collective self-defense, shall apply the measures and procedures established in the special treaties on the subject."

<sup>10</sup> Hearings (cited in note 7), pp. 119-20. See also the New York Times for this period.

II

The Tenth Inter-American Conference met at Caracas, Venezuela in March, 1954.<sup>11</sup> The United States had previously expressed its desire to have the conference record itself as being anti-Communist. Such a policy declaration had been elicited from the Ninth Conference in Bogotá, Colombia, in 1948,<sup>12</sup> but in view of the increased Communist power in Guatemala it was felt desirable to reassert the compact that communism was unwelcome in this hemisphere. Secretary of State John Foster Dulles led the United States delegation during the opening phases of the Conference, addressed its plenum several times, and was rewarded by the passage of his resolution:

... The ... Conference ... Declares: That the domination or control of the political institutions of any American State by the international communist movement, extending to this Hemisphere the political system of an extracontinental power, would constitute a threat to the sovereignty and political independence of the American States, ... and would call for a Meeting of Consultation to consider the adoption of appropriate action in accordance with existing treaties.<sup>13</sup>

The "existing treaty" referred to is the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, written in 1947 at the Quitandinha, Brazil, Conference of the Foreign Ministers of the American Republics (often referred to as the "Treaty of Rio de Janeiro"). Article 6 of that treaty, referring to acts of aggression which are not armed attacks, seems most appropriate to the Caracas anti-Communist resolution. This article authorizes a meeting of the Organ of Consultation (the Foreign Ministers of the American Republics meeting in special session) for the determination of "measures which should be taken for the common defense. . . ."<sup>14</sup> The Rio Treaty and the Bogotá Charter of the Organization of American States of 1948 are in turn linked; article 19 of that Charter states: "Measures adopted for the maintenance of peace and security in accordance with existing treaties do not constitute a violation of the princi-

<sup>11</sup> These quinquennial Inter-American Conferences are declared to be "the supreme organ of the Organization of American States," by article 33 of the Charter.

<sup>12</sup> See resolution 32 of the Final Act of the Bogotá Conference, entitled "The Preservation and Defense of Democracy in America," U. S. Department of State, Ninth International Conference of American States (Washington, 1948), pp. 266-67.

<sup>13</sup> From section 1, "Declaration of Solidarity for the Preservation of the Political Integrity of the American States against the Intervention of International Communism," adopted as resolution 93 of the Final Act of the Conference on March 28, 1954. See U. S. Department of State, Tenth Inter-American Conference (Washington, 1955), pp. 156-57.

On his return from Caracas, Mr. Dulles held a press conference in which he made an effort to imply that the Monroe Doctrine was the United States' reply to the aggressive designs of Czarist Russia. Intervention of International Communism in Guatemala, cited in note 6, p. 788. This is a mis-emphasis of historical fact which is only slightly removed from rewriting it. For a sounder version of the circumstances, see Samuel F. Bemis, The Latin American Policy of the United States (New York, 1943), pp. 48-72, and Dexter Perkins, Hands Off: A History of the Monroe Doctrine (Boston, 1941), Ch. 2.

<sup>14</sup> "Professor Telders" Study Group, United Nations Textbook, 2nd ed. (Leyden, Netherlands, 1954), p. 365.

ples set forth in articles 15 and 17."<sup>15</sup> It therefore follows that sanctions taken under the Caracas anti-Communist resolution cannot be construed as violative of the provisions of the Charter of Bogotá which state the principles of territorial and political integrity of the signatory states.

It is significant that those who sprang to Dulles' support in the debates following the presentation of the resolution were not the democratic nations but the authoritarians, Venezuela, the Dominican Republic, Cuba, and Peru.<sup>16</sup> Guatemala's Foreign Minister, Guillermo Toriello, denouncing the Dulles proposal as "... the internationalization of McCarthyism, the burning of books, and the imposition of stereotyped thought," received twice the ovation that Dulles did.<sup>17</sup> The New York Times reporter Sydney Gruson later put it succinctly:

Senor Toriello had said many nasty things about the United States that virtually all Latin Americans believe. They were willing to applaud him since it cost them nothing. But not many were willing to vote against the United States when they might have to get up later in the conference and ask for economic aid. In the committee vote, only Mexico, Uruguay, and Argentina sided with Guatemala.<sup>18</sup>

After the final vote Uruguay, frequently a Latin bellwether, said through its delegate: "We contributed our approval without enthusiasm, without optimism, without joy, and without the feeling that we were contributing to a constructive measure."<sup>19</sup>

Having obtained a conclusive 17-1 vote in committee, Mr. Dulles returned to Washington on March 14, 1954. The conference was to run for two weeks longer and, from the Latin viewpoint, had only just gotten to work. The Latins are not unaware of the threat to their security implied by international communism, but they have long felt that they cannot solve effectively their social and economic problems, which are indeed the breeders of communism, without substantial help from one or more of the great industrialized and capital-exporting nations. This was the problem which they had come to Caracas to dis-

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., p. 371.

<sup>16</sup> New York Times, March 3 and 4, 1954.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., March 6, 1954. For the text of Toriello's speech see O.A.S., Tenth Inter-American Conference, Document 95 (English), SP-23, 5 March 1954. Toriello's argument against the United States as an interventionist nation and destroyer of Guatemalan democracy is elaborated in his La Batalla de Guatemala (México, 1955). Toriello here (pp. 65-66) develops his thesis that the Arbenz government was doomed from the moment of the triumph of the Republican party in the 1952 United States presidential elections, by virtue of the fact that Dulles is both stockholder and long-time corporation counsel for the United Fruit Company, and legal adviser to the company in the drawing up of the contracts of 1930 and 1936 with the Ubico government.

<sup>18</sup> New York Times, March 7, 1954. The Latin American view that their votes represented a quid pro quo for securing a hearing for their views regarding United States' economic policy can scarcely be avoided from a literal reading of this quote. Such an interpretation is not far from the truth.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., March 16, 1954. Guatemala voted against the proposal, Mexico and Argentina abstained. Costa Rica did not attend the conference in protest against the government of Venezuela.

cuss, and Mr. Dulles' proposal received their support because the present United States administration has made it reasonably clear that only nations which take approved views of international communism can expect to be recipients of economic aid or technical assistance without much American grumbling. This assistance is of course vital in view of the inability of the private sector of the United States economy to supply sufficient developmental capital to Latin America to meet that area's needs. Further, in view of their support of his proposition, Mr. Dulles' departure was, in their eyes, tantamount to his saying that he was concerned only with that support, and could not take time to discuss Latin American internal problems since they were not sufficiently important. Mr. Dulles attended one meeting of an economic subcommittee of the Conference, but his discussion there, while frank, indicated that the United States was unprepared to discuss meaningfully Latin America's economic preoccupations. This inability of the two sectors of the hemisphere to agree even on the nature and scope of the problems confronting them seems characteristic of inter-American relations. The post-World War II period seems merely to have witnessed a heightening of the lack of mutual understanding.

III

From the viewpoint of the United States, the Caracas meeting's principal significance, therefore, was that it gave us the firmer anti-Communist statement desired from the Latin American nations. Guatemala was not specified in the statement, but it was obvious that it was directed against that nation. Sydney Gruson pointed out the atmosphere of the Conference:

One of the by-products of the political committee's debate [on the resolution], many delegates believe, is the tying of the United States' hands so far as the situation in Guatemala is concerned. The United States has publicly expressed its alarm over the growing influence of Guatemalan Communists on the Government of that country. For some time much of Latin America has been expecting unilateral U. S. action in regard to Guatemala.

But Secretary Dulles repeatedly assured the delegates that his resolution was not aimed at any American country and that the United States was solely concerned with intervention of international communism in this hemisphere. Much of the support given the United States' resolution was given on this understanding, and there would be deeply felt unhappiness in Latin America if, having passed, the resolution were to be turned into a weapon against Guatemala.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>20</sup> New York Times, "Review of the Week" section, March 14, 1954. For many years the Latin American nations tried to achieve United States acceptance of the principle that no nation should intervene in the domestic or international affairs of another. Specific efforts were made at the 1928, 1933, 1936, and 1947 meetings of the American nations. At the 1936 (Buenos Aires) meeting the Special Protocol Relative to Nonintervention was signed by the United States and later ratified. Article 1 of this protocol states in part: "The High Contracting Parties declare inadmissible the intervention of any one of them, directly or indirectly, and for whatever reason, in the internal or external affairs of any other of the Parties. . . ." Bemis, op. cit., pp. 227-89. Article 15 of the O.A.S. Charter probably states the ultimate degree of this principle: "No State or group of States has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State. . . ."

But the declaration was to serve by implication almost immediately as if it were indicative of moral support for United States action inimical to the Arbenz government in Guatemala. The impression that the Caracas resolution might be used against Guatemala was heightened by consultation visits to Washington by the United States' ambassadors to four of the Central American nations. One of them, who was not identified, was reported by Paul P. Kennedy to have told that writer: "Well, we put through our resolution in Caracas, and now we have got to decide what we're going to do about it."<sup>21</sup>

On October 3, 1953, John E. Peurifoy had been appointed United States Ambassador to Guatemala. He had already established a reputation as one of the United States' more accomplished anti-Communist diplomats by his activity in Greece. It seems clear from the circumstantial evidence presented by journalists concerning the period from his arrival to the outbreak of the civil war between Castillo Armas and the Arbenz government that the United States did little to disabuse Arbenz' opponents of the notion that North American aid, moral and/or military, would not be lacking when the need arose. But it is difficult to find evidence which would clearly implicate Peurifoy or other United States' representatives in the plotting which resulted in Castillo's invasion from Honduras.<sup>22</sup>

Events in Guatemala leading to the civil war seem to have commenced with the State Department announcement on May 17, 1954, that a shipment of arms totalling 1,900 tons had arrived at Puerto Barrios, Guatemala. The arms shipment originated in Czechoslovakia, but reached Guatemala by a chartered Swedish ship whose charterer disclaimed any knowledge of the use to which

---

This hard-won principle was, in the eyes of the Latins, endangered by the anti-Communist resolution, as was another article of the O.A.S. Charter, number 13: "Each State has the right to develop its cultural, political and economic life freely and naturally. . . ."

<sup>21</sup> See Kennedy's article in the "News of the Week" section of the New York Times, May 23, 1954.

<sup>22</sup> The lack of publicly-available proof has been noted by many writers. Donald Grant of the St. Louis Post Dispatch writes: ". . . this writer is not in a position to assign precise roles for the events which culminated in the fall of the Arbenz government, although he was, in fact, an eyewitness to many of the decisive events. Exiled Guatemalans, the Governments of Honduras and Nicaragua, the United States Departments of State and Defense, the Central Intelligence Agency, the United States National Security Council and other agencies and individuals were involved." "Guatemala and United States Foreign Policy," Journal of International Affairs, Vol. 9, No. 1, p. 69 (1955).

Flora Lewis, writing for the New York Times Magazine, July 18, 1954, p. 9, says of Peurifoy: "It was perfectly clear that his instructions and his purpose had one simple theme: 'Get rid of the Reds'." In testimony before a special House of Representatives committee investigating Communist aggression in Latin America, Peurifoy denied this charge, however: ". . . I would like to take this opportunity to explode a popular and flattering myth regarding the part I played in the revolution led by Colonel Castillo [Armas]. My role . . . was strictly that of a diplomatic observer. . . . The first and only active role that I played . . . was to lend my good offices to assist in negotiating the truce between the forces of Colonel Castillo and the military junta that was established in Guatemala after President Arbenz resigned. . . ." Hearings (cited in note 7), p. 114.

the ship was put.<sup>23</sup> News stories concerning both content and purpose conjectured unrestrainedly, but the full truth of the shipment probably will never be known. On the one hand, the New York Times writer Sydney Gruson reported from Guatemala City at the time of the shipment's arrival in May that the evidence seemed to indicate that the arms would be almost entirely for the army, and only in slight measure for rural or worker's militia or subversion in neighboring nations.<sup>24</sup> On the other hand, materials written later could not conflict more directly with this version.<sup>25</sup> The contents themselves are the object of equal uncertainty. While Gruson in July wrote that the bulk of the shipment was obsolete, including a great deal of materiel that can only be classed as "white elephants" by any standards relative to the Guatemalan situation, other versions argued that the arms were modern in the extreme and deadly under any circumstances.<sup>26</sup> The reader seems free to accept the version of his choice. The strength of the State Department version seems heightened by the fact that the ship in question, the M/S Alfhem, was known to have been involved in the carrying of newly-manufactured arms from the Skoda Czechoslovakian plant. It had been loading them at the Polish port of Stettin and taking them to other Communist ports throughout the world for some time preceding this incident.<sup>27</sup> The cloak-and-dagger atmosphere of the affair was also heightened by Secretary of State Dulles' statement that the Alfhem had cleared

<sup>23</sup> Reuters dispatch in the Christian Science Monitor, May 22, 1954. The New York Times, May 23, indicates the material was shipped in cases marked "hardware, auto parts, iron rods, optical glass, etc."

<sup>24</sup> New York Times, May 24, 1954. It is ironic to note that Gruson reported in this dispatch that the outcry of the United States against the arms shipment (it had been the United States which had first released the news of the event to the world) had produced a solidarity of Guatemalan opinion behind the government that had been surprising even to government leaders themselves!

The day previous, Guatemalan Foreign Minister Guillermo Toriello had announced to the diplomatic corps at Guatemala City that his nation rejected the protest and action of the United States as "aggression," and that it was considering seriously a plea to the United Nations Security Council under article 35 of the Charter.

<sup>25</sup> See, for example, "Guatemala: What the Reds Left Behind," Harper's Magazine, Vol. 211, pp. 60-65 (July, 1955), by a free-lance writer, Keith Monroe. Monroe's version was substantiated to this writer by a confidential source in Mexico in the summer of 1955.

<sup>26</sup> Gruson's version is found in the New York Times, July 9, 1954. Gruson states that the bulk of the shipment was of World War II or earlier vintage, and that much of it was anti-tank mines and very heavy German artillery built to travel on the autobahns of Hitler's construction. Other equipment, he states, included nonfunctioning Czech, British, and German rifles, and a few useful Czech machine guns. Gruson tells the story that the army spent much of its time after the outbreak of fighting trucking the mines, which had been stored in the army headquarters in the heart of Guatemala City, out of town to prevent a catastrophe from a lucky bomb hit. This version has definite comic-opera overtones.

The contrary version, that much of the shipment was highly modern, is supported by Monroe, op. cit., and the press statement by United States Secretary of State John Foster Dulles on May 25. In the questioning after the presentation of the statement, Dulles even conjectured that the arms might well be intended to develop a Communist strong point dominating the Panama Canal! See New York Times, May 26, 1954.

<sup>27</sup> New York Times, May 20, 1954.

first for Dakar, French West Africa, and that it had been unloaded at Puerto Barrios, Guatemala, "under conditions of extraordinary secrecy and in the personal presence of the Minister of Defense."<sup>28</sup>

Sydney Gruson's version in the New York Times could only lead to the conclusion that the Communist leaders of Guatemala had been made fools of by their own Soviet superiors; it should be added that this is not impossible, granted the apparent manner in which Soviet leaders regard Communist leaders outside of the Soviet Union. On the other hand, the parallel between the shipments to Guatemala in 1954 and those to Egypt in early 1956 is incapable.

The United States employed the shipment to arouse sympathy for its subsequent anti-Arbenz actions. It was also employed as the basis for a nearly unprecedented request to the other members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization that they grant the United States the privilege of searching their merchant ships on the high seas for arms shipments to Guatemala. The request was rejected by all of the nations to which requests were made.<sup>29</sup>

On May 20, the United States concluded a Mutual Security Treaty with Honduras<sup>30</sup> (a similar treaty had been signed with Nicaragua on April 23), and on May 24 it was announced that the United States Air Force was airlifting war materiel to the two nations. On May 25, United States Representative Patrick J. Hillings of California repeated to the House the Dulles charge that "the arms [imported by Guatemala] apparently were to be used to sabotage the Panama Canal." On May 26, the United States searched the French merchant ship Wyoming at the Panama Canal, finding cases of Browning automatic rifles not carried on the ship's manifest.<sup>31</sup> On the 27th, three B-36 bombers paid a "courtesy call" on Managua, the Nicaraguan capital.

Nicaragua had broken diplomatic relations with Guatemala on May 19, and undertook immediately to discuss the Guatemalan situation with the other American republics, with the intention of seeking a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the members of the O.A.S. as an Organ of Consultation. In spite of its obvious concern, the United States indicated it would not try, at that time, to call for such a meeting, but rather would let the Nicaraguan action mature. But on June 7 the New York Times reported that the United States had initiated informal talks for the same purpose, under the terms of articles 39 and 40 of the O.A.S. Charter.

<sup>28</sup> Department of State Bulletin, Vol. 30, pp. 873-74 (June 7, 1954).

<sup>29</sup> See Covey T. Oliver, "International Relations and International Law; Some Problems of Inter-Relationship," a paper read at the 50th meeting of the American Political Science Association, Chicago, September 9-11, 1954, pp. 7-9. Also, New York Times, June 19, 1954. The rumor, previously reported on May 25, that two additional shiploads of arms had departed for Guatemala, undoubtedly was instrumental in causing the United States request.

<sup>30</sup> For text see U. S. Department of State, Publication 5530, May 20, 1954.

<sup>31</sup> The Wyoming carried several cases of sporting guns and ammunition, but these had been indicated in the manifests. The Browning automatic rifles, consigned to a private address in El Salvador, had not been so listed. Evidence indicated that the falsification had been performed by some private person, not by the French Line, which operated the ship. New York Times, May 27 and 28, 1954.

It had been assumed generally that the United States, having by this time received informal support from a majority of the O.A.S. members for such a convocation, would propose formally that this meeting be called at the regular meeting of the O.A.S. Council on June 16. This was not done, although such a call would have made it more possible for the O.A.S. to take immediate action at the highest level when the fighting in Guatemala actually broke out on June 19.<sup>22</sup> United States failure to act is regrettable. Clear information concerning the facts of the situation could have been discerned more easily at that time than later, and it certainly would have given satisfaction to the entire hemisphere that the United States wanted the facts to be known.

Tension mounted within Guatemala. An effort was made to blow up a part of the railroad line to the capital from Puerto Barrios<sup>23</sup> and an unidentified airplane spread anti-government leaflets on Guatemala City. Secret police activity, including arrests, tortures, and murders, stepped up markedly.<sup>24</sup> Spo-

<sup>22</sup> It had been expected that the meeting would be set for either June 28 or July 1 at Montevideo. Under Article 40 of the Charter of Bogotá, support of the United States proposal by an absolute majority of the O.A.S. Council would have resulted in the convocation of the meeting.

It is significant that steady United States pressure had apparently gained the acceptance of the proposal by a majority of O.A.S. members, including Mexico. The State Department's approach was designed to show that the acts of Guatemala had been a threat to the security of her immediate neighbors, and the relative success of the effort showed that the view was taken seriously. State Department spokesmen, including Mr. Dulles, noted that the Guatemalan attitude was persistently that the only real issue was that government's treatment of the United Fruit and other private interests. Accordingly, Guatemala had proposed as early as May 23 that Presidents Eisenhower and Arbenz personally discuss the matter in an effort to improve relations between the two nations. In his press conference of June 8, Mr. Dulles declared in part, "[this] is a totally false presentation of the situation. There is a problem in Guatemala which affects the other American states just as much as it does the United States, and it is not a problem which the United States regards as exclusively a United States-Guatemala problem." New York Times, June 9, 1954.

<sup>23</sup> The confidential source cited in note 25 stated that this destruction was actually an effort by part of the Guatemalan army to prevent the arrival of the arms at a point where they could be distributed to peasant militia units organized for the defense of the Arbenz government and to potential saboteurs in Honduras.

<sup>24</sup> Ambassador Peurifoy, testifying before the special House Committee to Investigate Communist Aggression in Latin America, said in part: "No case of Soviet direction was more clear than what occurred after the return of [José Manuel] Fortuny [Secretary-General of the Communist Party of Guatemala] last January. A press and propaganda campaign, stirring alarm over resistance of anti-Communists to the Arbenz regime, was immediately cranked up in the endeavor to prepare public opinion for the blow to fall. Then, at the end of January, 1954, the dramatic announcement was made of the uncovering of a subversive 'plot,' with the sinister note of foreign intervention, linking the United States by innuendo as 'the country of the North' from which direction and aid was allegedly being furnished the 'plotters.' This set the stage for wholesale arrests of anti-Communist citizens and for subsequent imprisonment, torture, and even murder. Many who were later released, beaten and broken, were pushed across the frontiers into México and Honduras by the vicious truncheon-wielding police. . . . Your committee is well aware that these tactics of brutal suppression and terrorization of the opposition is characteristically the last blow of communism in a country outside of the Soviet Union before complete seizure of power." Hearings, p. 117.

radic outbursts of violence in opposition to government police and troops occurred in outlying settlements, and the departure by air of Arbenz' mother and children on June 15 indicated the real seriousness of the situation.

Col. Castillo Armas' troops entered Guatemalan territory from Honduras on June 19. A period of somewhat desultory fighting followed. Arbenz resigned on June 27 after an all-day conference with his military leaders, and the Army Chief of Staff, Col. Enrique Díaz, established a short-lived provisional government composed of three officers. One of these, Colonel Elfego Monzón, replaced Díaz on the 29th, after the direct intervention of Ambassador Peurifoy. Peurifoy and a Marine bodyguard, both armed, were present in the conference room at the time power changed hands.

Monzón and Castillo Armas met in San Salvador, the capital of the neighboring nation of El Salvador, on June 30, under the good offices of Salvadorian President Oscar Osorio. Initial talks seemed inconclusive, and Peurifoy was notified that his presence would be desirable. He had been holding himself in readiness in Guatemala City, and flew immediately to San Salvador. He was quoted as saying, as he debarked from his plane at the airport, "We will get this straightened out." Monzón and Castillo Armas reached an accommodation on July 2. A June 30 Christian Science Monitor dispatch headed "Red Guatemala Rout Ups U. S. Obligations" seemed to epitomize the intimate role the United States had played in the change of governments, while Milton Bracker of the New York Times wrote in that paper's July 3 issue: "The signing [of the Monzón-Castillo Armas agreement] represented an unmistakable victory for United States policy, and particularly for . . . Peurifoy, . . . who had taken an essential, difficult role in bringing it about."<sup>35</sup>

The conclusion that the United States played an important part in the struggle in Guatemala seems inescapable. It cannot be shown that any of the arms airlifted to Honduras or Nicaragua ultimately appeared in the hands of the Castillo Armas forces. Rather, news reports indicate that the Castillo troops were armed with a hodge-podge of weapons, including even a few muzzle-loading rifles. Jeeps, DC-3, and P-47 aircraft were used by Castillo's men, but the ubiquity of such materiel, ten years after the Second World War, is virtually axiomatic. In fact, the military strength of Castillo was largely symbolic, and casualties and combats were few. The decision of the Guatemalan army not to seek battle with Castillo was really what toppled Arbenz.<sup>36</sup> But it can be shown that the United States played a role in the United Nations which tended to deny to Guatemala the privileges apparently guaranteed it by its membership in that organization. At the same time vacillatory Guatemalan action made it difficult for the U.N. and the O.A.S. to do anything significant to prevent the success of the Castillo movement.

<sup>35</sup> See both New York Times and Christian Science Monitor, May 18 to July 3, 1954, for articles covering the affair. See also James, op. cit., pp. 304-19, and Milton Bracker, "The Lessons of the Guatemalan Struggle," New York Times Magazine, July 11, 1954, p. 11.

<sup>36</sup> See Life, July 12 and July 19, 1954, for illustrations indicative of the arms used in the fighting.

IV

In response to the urgent request of the Guatemalan representative on June 19,<sup>37</sup> the U.N. Security Council met on the call of its president, United States representative Henry Cabot Lodge, on June 20. Guatemalan representative Eduardo Castillo-Arriola asked immediate U.N. investigation of his charge that the fighting had begun with the invasion of his country by forces stationed in Honduras and Nicaragua and backed by "foreign monopolies" with the knowledge of the United States State Department. The two accused nations denied this, and a draft resolution was presented by Brazil and Colombia.<sup>38</sup> The draft pointed to the availability of machinery under the O.A.S. for the possible settlement of the problem, provided that the Security Council would refer the problem to this machinery, and asked for immediate O.A.S. action to bring bloodshed to an end. The vote on the resolution was 10-1, the Soviet representative vetoing. An innocuous French-offered resolution calling for a termination of bloodshed was then adopted, ending five hours of occasionally bitter debate.<sup>39</sup>

The Brazilian delegate remarked that the Soviet veto did not prevent the O.A.S. from taking action in the matter.<sup>40</sup> But the Security Council took no ac-

<sup>37</sup> U.N., Document S/3232, June 20, 1954.

<sup>38</sup> U.N., Document S/3236, June 20, 1954. Sr. Castillo-Arriola's statements obviously referred to the private United States enterprises in Guatemala, the United Fruit Company being not only the best known but the favorite target of the Arbenz regime and its spokesmen. This attitude is explained in greater detail in Toriello, op. cit.

It seems unnecessary to belabor the role of the Fruit Company in the Caribbean area, since this has been done virtually ad nauseam in a number of excellent and well-documented books. See particularly Charles David Kepner, Jr., and Jay Henry Soothill, The Banana Empire (New York, 1935), and J. Fred Rippey, The Capitalists and Colombia (New York, 1931). The company has played a more enlightened role in the area as the result of recent pressures, but its mere size lends credence to the recent emotional outbursts against it by nationalistic leaders. Sydney Gruson, in an article in the New York Times "Review of the Week" section for July 4, 1954, reports its assets at $579,342,000, of which approximately 10 per cent was located in Guatemala.

<sup>39</sup> U.N., Documents S/3237 and S/PV. 675, June 20, 1954.

<sup>40</sup> The U.N. Charter provides (article 12) that the General Assembly may not make "any recommendation" regarding a dispute while the Security Council remains seized of it. But there is no analogous statement regarding regional organizations. The Charter states only (article 52, par. 3) "The Security Council shall encourage the . . . pacific settlement of local disputes through . . . regional agencies. . . ." Article 53, par. 1 reinforces this. In the absence of definitive Charter statement on the matter, it seems quite indefinite. Norman J. Padelford in his "Recent Developments in Regional Organizations," Proceedings of the American Society of International Law, Forty-Ninth Annual Meeting (1955), pp. 23-41, finds only the views of the Colombian delegate who was chairman of Committee III/4 of the U.N. Conference on International Organization at San Francisco (1945), as a basis for conjecture on this point. Padelford states that ". . . it would not have been incompatible with the accord reached at San Francisco if the Security Council had encouraged the parties to go to a regional organization and then had considered under Articles 33 or 34 a request to investigate whether a situation existed likely to disturb international peace and security." (His italics.)

The Council was never seized of the Guatemalan issue. See U.N. Documents S/3253, June 28; S/3261, July 6; and S/3265, July 12, 1954.

tion to insure the enforcement of the resolution, and did not ask the O.A.S. to take action for several days. In the meantime, Guatemala, which on June 19 had asked immediate O.A.S. action (and was accorded a special meeting of the Inter-American Peace Committee within three hours after the delivery of the Guatemalan note), reversed its ground completely on the 20th and told the Peace Committee it would not cooperate with Committee action pending the outcome of the resolution of the Security Council of the 20th. This was in spite of the realization that that resolution was essentially meaningless from the viewpoint of terminating attacks on the Arbenz government.<sup>41</sup> The sudden Guatemalan switch was explained on the nominal ground that Guatemala had never completed its ratification of the Rio Treaty of 1947 and the O.A.S. Charter, documents which provide the legal bases for action on behalf of the O.A.S. by the Peace Committee.<sup>42</sup> The argument presented by the Guatemalan delegation was that the Peace Committee "... is only competent to deal with disputes between the Member States ..."<sup>43</sup> This completely ignored the record of several years' action by Guatemala, which seemed to offer presumptive evidence that Guatemala considered itself a full member of the O.A.S. family of nations.

Guatemalan Foreign Minister Toriello and the Soviet representative combined to bring pressure on Security Council President Lodge for a second Council meeting on June 25. The fighting had continued, and Guatemala had not hesitated to level serious charges against its neighbors, although Castillo-Arriola, the Guatemalan representative, wrote anachronistically in a letter of June 23 that "... certainly Guatemala has no dispute of any kind with the neighboring States of Honduras and Nicaragua."<sup>44</sup>

<sup>41</sup> On June 19, the Guatemalan Chargé in Washington delivered a note to Luis Quintanilla, chairman of the Peace Committee, asking for an immediate meeting of the Committee for the purpose of taking action in regard to Castillo Armas' attack. The note alleged the intimate participation of Honduras and Nicaragua. Quintanilla further received a telephone call direct from Guatemalan Foreign Minister Toriello that midnight, asking that an investigating subcommittee leave for Guatemala on the 20th.

But on the afternoon of the 20th, the Chargé notified Quintanilla by telephone that the Guatemalan request was to be withdrawn, on the ground that the Security Council was considering the matter. This was later confirmed by several notes. See O.A.S., Informe de la Comisión Interamericana de Paz sobre la Controversia entre Guatemala, Honduras, y Nicaragua, Document CIP-131/54, pp. 1-3. Full texts of the notes and other documents mentioned are contained in the appendix of this report.

<sup>42</sup> See United States Department of State, Report of the Delegation of the United States of America to the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Continental Peace and Security (Washington, 1948), pp. 59-65, for the text of the treaty. See also Ninth International Conference of American States (cited in note 12), pp. 170-71, for the text of chapter six of the Charter, which provides for peaceful settlement of disputes among the signatories.

The Peace Committee was extended and accorded a vote of confidence by resolution 102 of the Caracas (Tenth) Inter-American Conference. See Tenth Inter-American Conference (cited in note 13), pp. 101-2.

<sup>43</sup> U.N., Document S/3241, June 23, 1954.

<sup>44</sup> Loc. cit. See also Documents S/3238, S/3240, S/3244, S/3246, and S/3248, June 21-24, 1954.

The Council meeting voted to take no direct action until it had the opportunity to receive a report from the Peace Committee.<sup>45</sup> The Guatemalan government, which prior to the second Council meeting had rejected O.A.S. Peace Committee investigation, now reconsidered and announced it would welcome it. The date was the afternoon of June 26. After confirming the Guatemalan change of attitude, the Committee on the 27th determined that it would send a five-member team to Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua, starting the 28th.<sup>46</sup>

At this juncture, it was announced that ten nations, including the United States, had requested a special meeting of the O.A.S. Council to consider the advisability of calling a meeting of the Organ of Consultation of the Rio Treaty under the terms of articles 6 and 11 of that treaty. The note had been presented to the O.A.S. Council chairman on June 26. Notwithstanding the June 27 resignation of Arbenz in favor of Enrique Díaz, the matter was pressed on the 28th by the United States. The meeting was voted unanimously, for Rio de Janeiro on July 7.<sup>47</sup> The discussion was a lengthy one, and attitudes expressed by some Latin American representatives seem to indicate considerable reserve regarding the statement of United States representative Dreier which conveyed the thesis that had been maintained steadily by his government, that the Guatemalan matter could only be interpreted as an attack on the hemisphere by international communism.<sup>48</sup>

It seems quite tenable to argue that the action was intended as a smoke-screen rather than as a sincere request. Dreier's statement acknowledged that governmental changes were proceeding in Guatemala, but argued that it was yet too early to know if the new government would be free of the Communist taint. Certainly events between June 16, when it had been anticipated generally that the United States would ask such a convocation, and June 28, had not heightened the dangers of Communist profit in Guatemala. If anything, the position of Arbenz would seem to have weakened during this period. Surely there can have been no real suspicion that the government attacked by Castillo Armas could continue to govern Guatemala for any length of time. The question why the United States should have requested the investigation after the horse had fled the stable, rather than before, seems almost rhetorical under the circumstances. Investigation, or the proposal of a real study of the situation, prior to the outbreak of fighting, would have been sincere. The action of the 28th was only an empty gesture. Events, of course, proceeded in the direction of Arbenz' ouster, and with the agreement of July 2 between Castillo Armas and Monzón, all rationale for the meeting disappeared.

The O.A.S. Council met in special session on July 2 to approve 18-1, with one abstention, the motion presented by Honduras and seconded by the United States that the July 7 meeting be postponed sine die. Perhaps the most mean-

<sup>45</sup> U.N., Document S/PV. 676, June 25, 1954.

<sup>46</sup> Informe de la Comisión Interamericana de Paz (cited in note 41), pp. 6-10.

<sup>47</sup> O.A.S., Document C-a-153, Corr., Acta de la Sesión Extraordinaria celebrada el 28 de Junio de 1954 (Washington, 1954).

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., pp. 794-800.

ingful attitude taken in the discussion was that of Argentina. Its representative pointed out that while his country was as anti-Communist as any other, it was also concerned with armed intervention in the affairs of any other American nation, for whatever reason. Argentina further argued that the Guatemalan affair had in reality been only the beginning of such intervention, and as such deserved study. Further, in the light of the accusations against certain nations by the late Guatemalan government, the Argentine representative implied he would assume that they would welcome confirmation of the truth of their denials of complicity.<sup>49</sup> It was not often that one found Perón's Argentina thus on the side of the angels!

But the Argentine point was lost. And, of course, the inspection team of the Peace Committee did not reach its destination either. It was in Mexico City when the Castillo-Monzón negotiations opened, and it remained there. At the urgent request of the Monzón junta, it cancelled its trip at that point on July 2 and returned to Washington.<sup>50</sup> The inaction of the U.N. Security Council and of the Inter-American Peace Committee (as agent for the O.A.S.) had combined with the successful operations of Castillo Armas to overthrow the Arbenz government.

V

The assignment of responsibility for the outcome to any single nation is difficult. The Arbenz government cannot be separated in our thinking from the role of martyr it voluntarily chose to assume. Had it not blocked Peace Committee intervention, it is possible—though not necessarily probable—that we would understand more clearly the maneuverings of both the United States and the Soviet Union. While it was conceivable in theory that the Peace Committee's field investigations might have produced a resolution of the condition in favor of the Arbenz government, it does not necessarily follow that this would in fact have been the outcome. Comparison of the Guatemalan matter's handling by the Peace Committee with the behavior of the O.A.S. Council in the Costa Rican-Nicaraguan dispute in January and February of 1955 seems inescapable. In the latter instance, the Council chairman was Dr. José Mora of Uruguay. His precedent-making action was responsible for immediate Council response to the Costa Rican complaint, and a cessation of hostilities in time to save the established Costa Rican government. This action in itself bears inspection for its implications for meaningful response by international organizations to threats to the peace of the world. It is of more than passing importance, however, to note that in this latter instance the United States accepted the lead of the Council, and that this acceptance made the Council's action significant in the solution of the matter. It seems doubtful that the United States would have supported a similar Council request on behalf of the Arbenz regime.

<sup>49</sup> O.A.S., Document C-a-155, Acta de la Sesión Extraordinaria celebrada el 2 de Julio de 1954 (Washington, 1954), pp. 920-22.

<sup>50</sup> Informe de la Comisión Intramericana de Paz (cited in note 41), pp. 10-14.

The Arbenz government, after first seeking help from the Inter-American Peace Committee, reversed its ground and decided to place its hopes in the U.N. Security Council. It is true that U.N. intervention has, in certain situations, been effective for the restoration of peace. It is also true that the Communist-controlled Arbenz government could receive the moral support of the Soviet Union in the U.N., while it could not in the O.A.S. It seems likely that this latter consideration was of greater significance in Guatemala's decision to present its case to the Security Council than any possible conflict of interest or jurisdiction which might have arisen between the U.N. and the O.A.S. One may wistfully remark that it would be most interesting to see the correspondence, diplomatic or (probably) otherwise that must have passed between Guatemala City and Moscow's agents on June 20, 1954, the day the Arbenz government decided to abandon its request for immediate O.A.S. action and turned completely to the U.N. Security Council.

But the international legal niceties of the jurisdictional question are not the focus of this paper, however interesting they may be. It seems sufficient to note that there has never been any definitive answer to the question: Does action by a regional organization preclude simultaneous remedial action by the United Nations? Closely linked to this question is another: Would not a decisive resolution of this question imply the relegation to political ineffectiveness of one or the other organization?

It is therefore significant that Guatemala chose to go to the Security Council. The Soviet Union, fulfilling expectations, vetoed a resolution calling for meaningful investigation by the O.A.S. The United States delegate denounced this Soviet action in heated words and rejected the alternative to O.A.S. action, the U.N. intervention asked by Guatemala.<sup>51</sup>

While the United States has frequently posed as a defender of the United Nations, at least in its clashes with the Soviet Union, the United States was here placed in the unhappy position of questioning the sincerity of an appeal to the organization. Mr. Lodge's dual position as United States delegate and Security Council President was productive of further embarrassment, for Guatemala's numerous notes stating that the "bloodshed" had not ceased and that outside help was being given the Castillo Armas forces stated also what many did not doubt, that the entire matter was the product of United States support, indirectly if not directly. When, on June 22, Guatemalan Foreign Minister Toriello wrote Lodge, as Council President, asking that the Council take steps to assure that the resolution of June 20 be made effective, Lodge replied:

... the Soviet Union ... has crudely made plain its desire to make as much trouble as possible in the Western Hemisphere. ... But the Government of Guatemala should not lend itself to this very obvious Communist plot, lest they should appear to be a cat's paw of the Soviet conspiracy to meddle in the Western Hemisphere. In fact, as it is, many persons will wonder whether the whole imbroglio in Guatemala was not cooked up precisely for the purpose of making Communist propaganda here in the United Nations. This I am sure Mr. Toriello would not want.<sup>62</sup>

<sup>51</sup> Oliver, op. cit. (note 29), observes cryptically, "... the sensitively attuned representatives of some of the other American republics must have felt [Lodge's 'emotional asides'] were reversions to the older, unilateral version of the Monroe Doctrine, to 'manifest destiny,' Senator Platt and all of that." For the text of the Lodge statement see U.N., Document S/PV. 875, paragraphs 164-172, and 223.

The implication that even Castillo Armas was a part of the "whole imbroglio" is inescapable, and the sarcastic concluding sentence can only be described as tongue-in-cheek. The tone of the reply certainly states that a government which does not trust the impartiality of a regional organization's procedures—as Guatemala's leaders obviously did not, granted the predominant position of the United States in that organization—has no alternative but to use the regional procedure anyway. It can be argued correctly that the resolution calling for referral of the Guatemalan appeal to the Inter-American Peace Committee was introduced jointly by two Latin American nations and not by the United States. But events over a long period both before and after the meeting of June 20 indicate fully that Latin American nations are frequently ready to perform the United States' desires in order to avoid embarrassment to this country. The suspicion that this very thing was occurring on June 20 became valuable capital for Soviet and Guatemalan argumentation in the debate of that day.

Mr. Lodge continued in his reply to Guatemala's request for a second Council meeting, "... it has become increasingly plain that the situation in Guatemala is clearly a civil—and not an international—war . . ." This seemed to fly in the face of all the evidence then available, and certainly caused serious doubts as to the good faith of the United States. But it was an attempt to offer a rationale for O.A.S., rather than U.N., action. Mr. Lodge's statements would not have been so devastatingly a denial of "due process" to Guatemala had he not been Security Council President. Mr. Lodge was placed by Guatemalan-Soviet tactics in the unfortunate dual position of defending politically the reputation of the United States while at the same time behaving correctly as President of the U.N. Security Council. In the latter capacity his functioning and impartiality were impaired by the feeling he apparently had that he must, as United States representative, denounce Guatemala as cynical because of its consistent request for U.N., as opposed to O.A.S., action. His choice of words can only be construed as gratuitous, since Guatemala's appeal to the U.N. was not improper under its position as a member only of the U.N. The Soviet veto of the Brazilian-Colombian resolution calling for inter-American Peace Committee jurisdiction over the civil war also was not improper, although it may well be viewed as cynical. In the Council debate of June 20, both the Soviet and Guatemalan delegates called repeated attention to articles 34, 35, and 52 (par. 4) as substantiation for their contention that the Security Council had both jurisdiction and responsibility. The failure of the Guatemalan delegate to secure the introduction of a resolution in the Council calling for U.N. rather than O.A.S. action may well have been a tactical device (dictated by the Soviet Union?) designed to condemn the United States by implication, rather than directly. If so, it did not fail of its purpose.

<sup>62</sup> Intervention of International Communism in Guatemala (cited in note 6), p. 18.

If a case can be made that the Guatemalan affair was necessary by reason of unbearably imminent Communist danger, there is perhaps a rationale for the behavior of the United States. Secretary Dulles' statement of May 25 and address of June 30 made a serious effort to make such a case.<sup>58</sup> But it must be argued that, if such danger existed, effective and impartial investigation would certainly have shown it, and would have eased the minds of many small nations in both Latin America and elsewhere. Since no investigation was permitted, by an ironic coincidence of United States and Soviet Union policy (the Arbenz government assisted in the development of this coincidence), the answer will forever hang on the statements of Mr. Dulles and the State Department.<sup>59a</sup> In terms of preserving its good reputation, the United States was in the position of having to make out a case for its actions. The Soviet Union, as so often happens, was not. One wonders if the United States would, in fact, have countenanced a full field investigation by an international body. In the absence of generally believable facts, conjecture runs riot. Guatemala's geographic position relative to the United States and to the Panama Canal renders rather unreasonable a statement that even a thoroughgoing Communist government could have been a substantial threat to the security of the United States, and the Mutual Security Treaties of April and May with Nicaragua and Honduras, respectively, served to put them beyond the immediate damage possible from irregular guerrilla troops operating on the basis of the famous 1,900-ton arms shipment. At the time of the shipment, numerous spokesmen for the United States government pointed out that Guatemala is but two hours' flight time from either the Panama Canal or the territorial United States, as modern jet aircraft fly. This is quite true, but such calculation is not equivalent to saying that jet aircraft do fly from Guatemala. The only airfield even scarcely suitable for such air operations, La Aurora at Guatemala City, is open to constant observation from the city itself by all who wish to look to see the planes taking off. Should such aircraft actually have begun to operate there, or should the government have expelled all suspect individuals (including, of course, United States citizens not excepting the United States Military Missions which remained there throughout the civil war), the United States would have had ample warning.

The shocked conscience of the world was probably represented best in the British House of Commons on July 14, 1954, by Clement Attlee, head of the Labor party, in foreign affairs debate:

The fact is that this was a plain act of aggression, and one cannot take one line on aggression in Asia and another line in Central America. I confess that I was rather shocked at the joy and approval of the American Secretary of State on the success of this putsch.

... we cannot pass this off as just a Central American squabble, of which there are so many. There was a principle involved and that principle was the responsibility of the United Nations. I think it was a mistake in these circumstances to try to hand over to a regional body. We might also have talk of handing over to a regional body in other parts of the world [China] and I do not think we would like the results very much. Therefore, I am afraid that Guatemala has left a rather unpleasant taste in one's mouth because, to illustrate the theme I was putting, it seems in some instances that the acceptance of the principles of the United Nations is subordinated to a hatred of Communism.<sup>54</sup>

<sup>58</sup> Ibid., pp. 30-34.

<sup>59a</sup> See the speech by Donald McK. Key, Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs, in United States Department of State, Bulletin, Vol. 31, pp. 115-118 (July 26, 1954) for a most flagrant misrepresentation of the situation.

And William Frye, the Christian Science Monitor's United Nations writer, concludes:

The reputation of the United Nations as the primary resort of victims of aggression . . . has been beclouded. The Soviets, of all people, have been enabled to pose as the U.N.'s champion against attack by the United States. . . . Here at U.N. headquarters, the United States' reputation as stout champion of collective security has been severely tarnished.<sup>55</sup>

Mr. Frye's conclusion makes reference to Sydney Gruson's observations regarding the Caracas anti-Communist resolution almost inescapable (see above, p. 792). It may well be that the United States, in late May and early June, 1954, had been able to present so persuasive a case to its fellow American Republics as to convince them that Guatemala presented a threat of subversion to them all. The comments of Arthur Krock of May 27, 1954, plus the arguments of Mr. Dulles and Mr. Dreier, indicate that such effort was made.<sup>56</sup> Thus the State Department was aware of the views which were reported by Gruson. But the entire situation leads to the conclusion that the United States failed to give evidence of faith in the processes of the United Nations; that it dragged its feet regarding effective O.A.S. action beyond the point of reason; that it was intimately involved in a situation of subversion of a constitutional government; and that it did not at any time undertake to make the record clear to the people either of the United States or of Latin America. However justifiable the circumstances may have been, the United States has not allowed itself to be put in a complimentary light.

VI

Obviously none of this touches on the question of the qualities, democratic or undemocratic, of the Castillo Armas government which became the chosen instrument of the United States. Castillo was confronted with a well-nigh insurmountable problem of government. He found himself with a ruined treasury, a suspect bureaucracy, and a citizenry frightened and mutually suspicious. His career military training had little prepared him for his new role. Yet the consensus has been that he has done well with the raw materials at hand.<sup>57</sup>

<sup>54</sup> H. M. Stationery Office, Parliamentary Debates, Commons, Official Report, 5th Series, Vol. 530 (London, 1954), cols. 489-90.

<sup>55</sup> Christian Science Monitor, June 26, 1954.

<sup>56</sup> See Mr. Krock's column in the New York Times of that date.

<sup>57</sup> See the series of articles by Paul P. Kennedy in the New York Times on Castillo's first anniversary in office, June 30-July 4, 1955.

Perhaps the intervention of the United States has come off better than we had any right to expect!<sup>58</sup>

But the essential point of the experience has not been altered by the relative success of Castillo Armas. Rather, the entire experience seems to indicate the desirability of a stock-taking regarding United States foreign policy vis-à-vis Latin America. From the date of the passage of the anti-Communist resolution at Caracas, Latin America, it has been shown, considered that the days of the Arbenz government were numbered. Few were surprised when the blow fell, although the precise manner and blunt nature of it had not been foreseen. Just after the start of the Guatemalan fighting, Joseph C. Harsch wrote:

... The only question seriously at issue is whether the United States can manipulate an operation of this kind skillfully and successfully. . . . If there were no native revolutionary movement to encourage and support, then some other . . . remedy would have to be found. Fortunately, there was a bona fide native movement; and, fortunately, Honduras was willing to let it be launched from Honduran soil. . . .<sup>59</sup>

Harsch continues:

The best thing, of course, would be to prevent the establishment of communism in the first place. Unless and until more is done in the preventive line than has been done recently there will have to be more operations of this type. Economic aid in Latin America was one of the victims of the 1953 economy wave in Washington.

Mr. Harsch's contention is true, for our record with regard to our overall economic policies (not just economic aid) is far from satisfactory or consistent.<sup>60</sup> But even more urgently needed is some means of demonstrating, in forceful and pragmatic terms, the intimate connection between the security of the United States and that of the other nations of the hemisphere. This will not be accomplished by a contrived revision of history, nor by the imposition of North American standards of political morality on Latin Americans. Rather, it can be accomplished by punctilious compliance with both the spirit and letter of inter-American obligations, a vigorous effort to explain the United States viewpoint and nature to Latin Americans in such terms as will be understandable within their own frames of reference, and a conduct of economic relations such as to give evidence that this country is as concerned with the material advance of Latin America as it is with the advance of areas farther from our own borders.

<sup>58</sup> Instrumental in the survival of the Castillo government has been a series of grants, loans, and technical assistance agreements concluded between Guatemala and the United States. See General Agreement for Technical Cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Guatemala, signed at Guatemala City September 1, 1954, and entered in force on the same day. Department of State, Publication 5698 (Washington, 1955). See also Senate, Committee on Foreign Relations, Hearings . . . on the Mutual Security Program for Fiscal Year 1956 (Washington, 1955), pp. 288, 306-8, 313.

<sup>59</sup> Christian Science Monitor, June 22, 1954.

<sup>60</sup> Perhaps the most comprehensive and critical survey of recent United States economic policy toward Latin America is Simon G. Hanson's article, "The End of the Good-Neighbor Policy," Inter-American Economic Affairs, Vol. 7, pp. 3-49 (Autumn, 1953). Mr. Hanson's writing is very harsh, but his vigorous judgments make far too much sense to be ignored.

DOCTORAL DISSERTATIONS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

IN AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES*

COMPILED BY WILLIAM C. SEYLER†

Deputy Secretary, Department of Internal Affairs, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania

I. DISSERTATIONS IN PREPARATION

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY AND PSYCHOLOGY

- Gilbert Abcarian*, Political Romanticism: Coleridge and Tolstoi. California (Berkeley).
Fred Abtin, George Plekhanov and the "Iskra". Period. Columbia.
Milton C. Abrams, The Political Philosophy of Christopher Saint German. Utah.
Minoo Adenwalla, Political Philosophy of the Indian National Movement. Northwestern.
Albert Alexander, Impact of U. S. on Revolutionary Ideas in Europe, 1830-1848. New School.

* Similar lists have been printed in the Review annually since 1911, except for 1915-19, 1921 and 1923-24; full citations are given in the 1955 list, XLIX, 792.

Items which appeared in the September, 1955, list are in general classified under the same headings in the present list, and new items have been assimilated to the 1955 classifications as far as possible. In cases where classification of an item has been suggested by the institution concerned, the suggestion has been followed. Each item is listed under one classification only.

The lists printed in the Review are based on information from departments giving graduate instruction in political science. Often dissertations are in progress in departments of economics, history, sociology, etc., which overlap or supplement dissertations in preparation in political science. Attention is called especially to the following lists: "Current Research Projects in Public Administration" (reported to Public Administration Service), the most recent edition of which appeared in 1951; "Doctoral Dissertations in Political Economy in Progress in American Colleges and Universities," in the American Economic Review; "List of Doctoral Dissertations in History Now in Progress," published annually by the Division of Historical Research of the Carnegie Institution through 1938, and since then by the American Historical Association,

Robert J. Alperin, Problems of Leninism: The Communist Party, U.S.A., 1930-1958. Northwestern.

Moses J. Aronson, History of Legal Thought in America. New School.

Justin Atkinson, The Political Thought of L. T. Hobhouse. California (Berkeley).

Meyer Auerbach, American Theories of Democratic Politics. Columbia.

Robert D. Barendsen, The Chinese Communist Germ Warfare Propaganda, 1952-1953. Yale.

Charles S. Bednar, Pragmatism: A Projected Metaphysics for a Democratic Society. Columbia.

Stanislaus Belch, Paulus Vladimiri and his Doctrine: A Historical and Political Study ciation, as supplements to the American Historical Review (1940 and 1941), as Vol. III of its Annual Report (1941), and as separate publications (1947, 1949 and 1952); and "Doctoral Dissertations in Sociology," in the American Journal of Sociology. Consult also the "External Research List," published by the Office of Intelligence Research, Department of State. These are in addition to the "List of American Doctoral Dissertations Printed in 1938," the most recent of an annual series published by the Library of Congress; and Arnold H. Trotter and Marian Harman, "Doctoral Dissertations Accepted by American Universities, 1952-53," the twentieth of a series beginning in 1933-34, compiled for the Association of Research Libraries. Consult, for other lists, T. R. Palfrey and H. E. Coleman, Jr., "Guide to Bibliographies of Theses, United States and Canada" (Chicago, American Library Association, 2nd ed., 1940).

Abstracts of some of the theses listed as completed may be found in "Dissertation Abstracts," published bi-monthly by University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

† On leave of absence from the University of Pittsburgh.

- of the 15th Century Polish School of International Law, with Ten Treatises of Vladimiri Critically Edited. Notre Dame.
- Laurence Berns*, The Political Philosophy of Francis Bacon with Special Attention to the Principles of Foreign Policy. Chicago.
- Samuel B. Bloom*, Public Housing and Politics in Richmond, California. California (Berkeley).
- William T. Bluhm*, The Theory and Practice of Social Catholicism. Chicago.
- Robert L. Bock*, The Political Philosophy of Subhas Chandra Bose. American.
- Wilmer L. Bohlmann*, The Legal and Political Theories of Leon Duguit. Washington. (Seattle).
- George F. Brasington, Jr.*, Representative Government in Jacksonian Political Philosophy. Illinois.
- William R. Brown*, Deviations in American Communism: The Influence of American Politics and Economics on Communist Theory. Washington (St. Louis).
- Francis P. Canavan, S.J.*, The Role of Reason in Politics: Burke and 18th Century Rationalism. Duke.
- Vincent Chen*, Mao Tse-tung's Views of the Chinese Communist Revolutionary War: A Critical Study. Yale.
- Yung Ping Chen*, Comparative Study of Dr. Sun Yat-sen's and Mao Tse-tung's Political Theories. Maryland.
- Vincent C. Chrypinski*, The Progressive Catholic Movement in Poland. Michigan.
- Jules Conn*, The Political Theory of Lester Frank Ward. Rutgers.
- Michael R. Curtis*, The Theories of European Syndicalism. Cornell.
- J. Raymond Derrig, S.J.*, Political Thought in American Catholic Newspapers. St. Louis.
- Susan H. Devine*, The Political and Social Philosophy of Herbert Hoover. Pennsylvania.
- Paul M. Downing*, Corporatism or Solidarism in Catholic Social Philosophy. Columbia.
- David M. Earl*, Political Thinking in Maiji Japan. Columbia.
- Harris I. Effross*, The Political Philosophy of Herbert Croly. Rutgers.
- Emily H. Ehle*, The Identification of Local Leadership within an American City (Philadelphia). Pennsylvania.
- Arnett A. Elliot*, Contemporary British Conservative Thought. Columbia.
- Frank Evans, Jr.*, The Political Theory of Richelieu. Georgetown.
- Edward Fishman*, The Political and Social Philosophy of Owen J. Roberts. Pennsylvania.
- Martin Fleisher*, Political Theory of James Harrington. Columbia.
- Theodore B. Fleming, Jr.*, John Stuart Mill's Essay On Liberty and Its Critics. Yale.
- Thomas A. Flinn*, Croce, Collingwood and Cassirer, Their Concept of Method in the Study of Man and Application to Politics. Minnesota.
- Garland Fothergill*, Political Ideology of the New Republic. Minnesota.
- Julian Franklin*, The Theory of Caesarism. Columbia.
- Leonard Freedman*, Group Opposition to Governmental Welfare Activities in the United States. California (Los Angeles).
- Thomas M. Furst*, American "Anti-Intellectualism" and the Left Intelligentsia. California (Los Angeles).
- Stanley T. Gabris*, Secrecy in Politics: A Study in Attitudes. Chicago.
- Alexander L. George*, The Intelligence Value of Content Analysis. Chicago.
- R. Gordon Gilbert*, Description and Prescription in Seventeenth Century Science. California (Berkeley).
- Robert Goldwin*, Property, Money and Justice: A Study of John Locke's Political Teachings. Chicago.
- Peretz Gordon*, The Political Thought and Action of David Ben-Gurion. Chicago.
- Richard B. Gray*, A Study of the Politics and Political Ideology of Jose J. Marti, the National Hero of the Cuban Republic. Wisconsin.
- Gordon B. Greb*, The Political Philosophy of the American Press. Stanford.
- Myron Q. Hale*, American Conservatism: Conventionalism, Historicism, Functionalism. Columbia.
- Joseph B. Hampton*, The Political Theory of Jean-Paul Sartre. Rutgers.
- Edward Handler*, The Political Theory of John Adams: A Study of the Emergence of a Conservative Tradition in American Political Thought. Harvard.
- Heber R. Harper II*, The Political Views of Certain Contemporary Religious Fundamentalists. Michigan.
- William H. Hatcher*, The Political Thought of Westel Woodbury Willoughby. Duke.
- Beresford Hayward*, An Evaluation of the Program of American Labor for a Full Employment Economy as an Efficient Expression of - Its Contemporary Political Philosophy. Chicago.

- Robert S. Hill, The Political Philosophy of David Hume. Chicago.
- Henry J. Hodder, The Political and Social Thought of Thorstein Veblen. Harvard.
- David Holland, The Problematic Situation as a Context for Valuation in the Writings of John Dewey. Harvard.
- Harry Holloway, T. H. Green and the Liberal Tradition. Cornell.
- Richard L. Hough, The Jurisprudence of Learned Hand. California (Los Angeles).
- Thomas A. Israel, The Implications of the Social Contract Theory for International Organization and International Law. Illinois.
- George W. Jaeger, The Political Philosophy of Irving Babbitt. Harvard.
- George Kateb, The Political and Social Thought of Simone Weil (1909-1943). Columbia.
- David Kettler, Adam Ferguson and the Scottish Historical School. Columbia.
- John K. Knaus, The Political Philosophy of John Stuart Mill. Stanford.
- Kwang Il Koh, The Political Theories and Practices of Syngman Rhee. Rutgers.
- Richard P. Kosaki, Majority Rule in the Theory of Democracy: A Critical Analysis. Minnesota.
- Irma Lang, Swiss Federalism: Theory and Structure. Harvard.
- Guenier Levy, The Political Philosophy of Juan de Mariana. Columbia.
- John Logue, The Political Philosophy of Edward Hallatt Carr. Chicago.
- Myron J. Luning, The Question of Censorship: Art and Government in a Democracy. Iowa.
- Adele Haddad McCarus, The Concept of the State in Islamic Thought. Michigan.
- Allen McConnell, Alexander Herzen and the Revolutions of 1848. Brown.
- Thomas McEnros, The Political Theory of American Syndicalism with Particular Reference to the I. W. W. Minnesota.
- Brian A. McGrath, S.J., The Basic Political Philosophy of Woodrow Wilson. Harvard.
- Donald McIntosh, Psychoanalysis and the Theory of Liberal Democracy. Columbia.
- Maan Madina, Ijma: Public Consensus in Islam According to Al-Ghazali. Chicago.
- Cesar A. Majul, The Political Philosophy of the Philippine Revolution, 1896-1899. Cornell.
- Serif A. Mardin, The Influence of Positivism on the Development of Turkish Political Thought in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Stanford.
- Lucian C. Marquis, The Political Thought of Protestant Churches and Sects in the United States, 1928-1955. California (Los Angeles).
- Sylvester Massman, The Family in Twentieth Century Political Thought. Minnesota.
- Robert K. Neary, Some Problems in Contemporary American Liberalism. Southern California.
- Thomas Nedumgottil, Manabendra Nath Roy's Criticism of Marxism and Bolshevism. Noire Dame.
- Dorothy L. Noble, Francis Nicholson. Columbia.
- Hollan P. Odegard, Approaches to a Theory of Administrative Democracy. Wisconsin.
- Anthony J. Pearce, Theories of Imperialism. California (Berkeley).
- Cheryl J. Petersen, Philosophical Anarchism: A Study of European and American Theory. California (Berkeley).
- James H. Popham, Political Ideas in the American Novel, 1870-1910. Princeton.
- Fred Raniele, Theories of Conscientious Objectors Toward War in the 16th and 17th Centuries. Minnesota.
- David Rapoport, Theories of Change. California (Berkeley).
- William O. Reichert, The Mind of William H. Mallock: A Study in Conservative Political Thought. Minnesota.
- William A. Ritchie, A Critique of the Political Theory of Henry Sidgwick. Michigan.
- Norman M. Rosenberg, The Grande Charteuse: Studies in the Literature of Marxist Disenchantment. Columbia.
- Daniel Rossides, Lamennais' Political Thought. Columbia.
- Esther E. Rowland, Political Theory of Ernest Jones. Columbia.
- George Rosos, Development of the Concept of Property before Locke. Columbia.
- Gene W. Selzer, Contemporary American Ideas of Human Equality. Columbia.
- Marciaross Shestack, The Effect of Television on Political Campaigning. Pennsylvania.
- Herbert P. Shyer, The Political Philosophy of David Hume. Harvard.
- Paul A. L. Smith, The Impact of International Events upon Domestic Political Behavior. Princeton.
- Richard C. Spillane, S.J., The Political Theories and Method of Robert A. Taft: A Study of Basic Political Ideas and Operational Techniques. Georgetown.
- Stanislaw Staron, Public and Private Morality:

- A Study and Criticism of Some Selected Theories of their Inter-Relationships. Minnesota.
- Robert F. Stephens, Political Theories Inherent in Selected Psychological Theories. Michigan.
- William A. Stewart, The Political Ideas of L. T. Hobhouse. Minnesota.
- Otto C. E. Stoetzer, The Influence of European Political Thought in Latin America (1789-1954). Georgetown.
- Elaine Strauss, The Beginnings of Realpolitik with Particular Reference to the Ideas of August von Rochau. Rutgers.
- James E. Titus, Left of Center: A Study of American Liberalism in the 1930's. Wisconsin.
- James A. Toomey, An Analysis of Taylor's Inquiry. New School.
- William F. Troutman, Theories of the Relationship between Church and State in America in the Period 1786-1791. Duke.
- Vijayadevaraj Urs, The Problem of Compromise in Political Theory. New School.
- Carlo A. Valentino, The Influence of Catholic Social Doctrine on the American Labor Movement. California (Los Angeles).
- Vincent C. Watson, The Indian Constitution and the Hindu Tradition: Compatibility and Conflict of Basic Political Ideas. Northwestern.
- George Weber, Church and State in France: A Study in the Manipulation of Liens upon Political Obedience. Virginia.
- Nathan Weiss, The Political Theory of General Benjamin F. Butler—Practicing Politician. New York University.
- Norman Welling, The Political Ideas of Bertrand Russell. Minnesota.
- Ruth L. Wishnaff, Charles Peguy and the Crisis of the Third Republic. Cornell.
- Neal N. Wood, Marxist Thought in Contemporary Britain; A Political Study of Six Academicians: J. D. Bernal, Maurice Dobb, Benjamin Farrington, J. B. S. Haldane, R. H. Hilton, and George Thomson. California (Berkeley).
- Marvin Zetterbaum, Natural Law and the Supreme Court: A Study in Theory and Practice. Chicago.
- Noel I. Zinman, Fascist Thought in America. New York University.
- GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS DEPENDENCIES
- Herbert E. Alexander, The Role and Influence of Money in the Political Process. Yale.
- Myer Alpert, Public Policy and the Pulp and Paper Industry. Harvard.
- Cleveland Ansell, Federal Aid for Highways. Harvard.
- Richard E. Baird, Echo Park Dam: A Study of Public Policy Formation. Illinois.
- David W. Barkley, Problems of the Aging Population and the Role of Government. Harvard.
- David Bass, The Veto Power of the President: Its Theory and Practice. Chicago.
- Robert L. Berg, Presidential Power and the Royal Prerogative. Minnesota.
- David Booth, Constitutional and Political Aspects of the Jay Treaty. Virginia.
- Ray Bronez, Interest Groups and Public Housing. Chicago.
- Edmund Brownell, A Study of the Interaction between the Department of the Treasury and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. Michigan.
- Edward M. Caine, The Regulation of Commercial Aviation under the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938. New York University.
- Mark W. Cannon, Political Biography of George Q. Cannon, Political and Religious Leader in Utah from 1872-1901. Harvard.
- King Carr, Collective Bargaining as a Public Campaign: Steel Industry, 1945-1949. Chicago.
- William C. Carr, The Development of the Movement for Statehood in Utah, 1847-1896. California (Berkeley).
- Wesley S. Chumlea, Legislative Reapportionment in Texas. Texas.
- Milton Cikins, BOASI, Federalism, and Public Welfare. Harvard.
- Charles L. Clapp, The Presidential Primary in 1952. California (Berkeley).
- Frank B. Cliffe, Industrial Dispersal and Civil Defense. Chicago.
- Omar A. Coleman, Interstate Trade Barriers. Washington (Seattle).
- Rudolph S. Comstock, The St. Lawrence Seaway Project. Ohio State.
- Edward G. Cook, The Position of the United States Navy on Unification. Kansas.
- Melvin Crain, Some Aspects of Representation in Alaska, 1912-1952. Southern California.
- John A. Crampton, Organization and Development of the National Farmers Union. California (Berkeley).
- Dorothy H. Cronheim, The Relation between the Communication Practices of the Members of Congress and the Status of Party Politics in Selected States. Ohio State.

- Allen Davis*, Conflicts in Land Policy between Federal and State Government. California (Berkeley).
- James W. Davis*, The Use and Effect of the Presidential Primary System. Minnesota.
- Daniel F. DeNauw, O.S.B.*, A Study of Proposals for Home Rule for the District of Columbia. Catholic University.
- William Dial*, Instruments of Party Control in the United States Senate. New York University.
- Norris Ellertson*, A Study of Marginal Political Affiliations. Minnesota.
- David N. Farnsworth*, Bipartisanship in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 1945-1955. Illinois.
- Jason L. Finkle*, Executive Decision-Making in the Dixon-Yates Case. Michigan.
- James Flannery*, Water Pollution Control: Development of Public Policy and Federal-State Relations. Wisconsin.
- Adolfo Fortier-Ortiz*, The Office of the Governor of Puerto Rico: A Study in the Development of Executive Leadership. New York University.
- Roy E. Fossett*, The New Deal Comes to Georgia: The Political Career and Administration of Governor E. D. Rivers. Florida.
- George Foufas*, American Party Platforms: 1940, 1944, 1948. Harvard.
- Paul C. Fowler*, The Formulation of Public Policy for Commercial Broadcasting by the Federal Communications Commission. Indiana.
- Gabriel Gabrelian*, Voting Behavior in the United States. Princeton.
- Franklin J. Gayles*, Treason and "Cold War Treason." New York University.
- William C. Gibbons*, Congress and the International Information Programs since the End of World War II: A Case Study in the Intellectual Role of Congress in Foreign Policy Decision-Making. Princeton.
- Thomas V. Gilpatrick*, The Midwest Farm Vote and Farm Price Support Theory. Chicago.
- Betty Goetz*, The Foreign Affairs Program of the League of Women Voters: Formulation, Mobilization of Public Opinion, Methods of Influencing Government Action, Evaluation of Results. Minnesota.
- Antonio J. Gonzalez*, Constitutional Development in Puerto Rico since 1900. Harvard.
- Lyman J. Gould*, The Government of Puerto Rico: From Territory to Commonwealth. Michigan.
- Gerald Grady*, The St. Lawrence Waterway Controversies: A Study in Policy Formation. Chicago.
- Alice Greene*, The Not So Supreme Court (The Supreme Court Fight of 1937). Harvard.
- Don F. Hadwiger*, Farm Groups and United States Foreign Economic Policy, 1943-1955. Iowa.
- Harry Hall*, Congressional Images of Scientists and Their Conception of Their Political Roles and Responsibilities. Chicago.
- Samuel Halperin*, American Zionism: The Building of an Interest Group. Washington (St. Louis).
- William D. Hatley*, The Dixiecrat Movement. Missouri.
- David Hazel*, The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Legislative Process, 1940-1954. Michigan.
- Marston Headley*, Recent Developments in the Regulation of Railroad Consolidation. Harvard.
- Richard B. Henderson*, The Republican Party and the States' Rights Doctrine. Maryland.
- Jack M. Hertzog*, The Administration of Soldier Voting in the United States Army. American.
- Donald C. Hester*, Development of United States Participation in International Conferences. Maryland.
- Victor K. Heyman*, The Congressional Legislative Process: A Study of Selected Pressure Groups' Power and Influence. Washington (St. Louis).
- Waller Hohenstein*, Federal Control over Local and State Personnel. Minnesota.
- Frank Holloway*, The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act before Congress: A Study in the Legislative Process. Texas.
- Jack E. Holmes*, Politics of National Farmers Union. Chicago.
- James Howe*, The Budget and Foreign Affairs. Harvard.
- Robert J. Huckshorn*, Congressional Reactions to the Second Hoover Commission. Iowa.
- Robert M. Hunsaker*, The Politics of Public Utilities. Minnesota.
- Leigh Hunt*, The "Kerr Bill" and National Regulation of the Independent Natural Gas Producers: A Case Study of the Political Process. Minnesota.
- Slater K. Isenberg*, The Social Characteristics of Selected Areas of Non-Voting Concentration. American.
- Erwin A. Jaffe*, The Immigration and Naturalization Service: A Study in Policy and Practice. Rutgers.

- Malcolm E. Jewell*, The Role of Political Parties in the U. S. Senate regarding Major U. S. Foreign Policies towards Europe, 1947-1955. Pennsylvania State.
- Fridolph Johnson*, Limitations on the Scope of Presidential Power to Conclude International Agreements. Michigan.
- Robert C. Kennedy*, The Development of Labor Legislation in the Eightieth Congress (First Session). American.
- Alan E. Kent*, Wisconsin and Foreign Policy; Wisconsin's Senators and Representatives since World War I. Wisconsin.
- Charles F. Kiefer*, The Secretary of Agriculture. Harvard.
- Kenneth Kofmehl*, Congressional Staffing, with Emphasis on the Professional Staff. Columbia.
- Allen D. Drumm*, A Study of the Political Status of the American Indian. Utah.
- Richard E. Lambert*, INCODEL, an Instrument of Interstate Governmental Cooperation. Rutgers.
- Harry Lease*, William Howard Taft and the Powers of the President. Indiana.
- Milton Levine*, Reorganization Plans Submitted by the President to the 83rd Congress. American.
- James R. Lewis*, The Impact of Television on Political Conventions and Campaigns. American.
- Joseph D. Lubin*, The Item Veto and the Presidency. California (Berkeley).
- Howard R. Ludden*, Informational Activities of the Department of State: Historical Development and Present Organization and Operations. Princeton.
- Thornton McClanahan*, Organization of the Presidency for Fiscal Policy. Harvard.
- David W. McCormick*, Partisan Politics in a Middle-Sized Midwestern City: A Case Study of Rockford, Illinois. Chicago.
- Charles A. McCoy*, James Polk and the American Presidency. Boston University.
- Charles Macklin*, Land Grant Colleges and Public Policy. Chicago.
- William B. Macomber, Jr.*, The Congressional Republicans and Organized Labor; 1928-1948. Chicago.
- James M. Mahoney*, The Irish Americans and Their Attitudes on Foreign Affairs. Clark.
- Lewis Mainzer*, Research Policy Formation Under the Research and Marketing Act of 1946. Chicago.
- Kenneth K. Marcus*, Federal Regulation of the Natural Gas Industry, 1945-1955. Illinois.
- David R. Matthis*, The National Committee in American Organization. Texas.
- James B. G. Maunde*, The Republican Party in the South. Northwestern.
- Frank S. Mellor*, Employment of Civilians by the Department of the Army: Factors in Determining Whether Military or Civilian Personnel Should Be Assigned to Particular Activities or Jobs. Harvard.
- Leno C. Michelin*, Postwar Conceptions of Managerial Responsibility in Labor Relations. Chicago.
- Clifford Miller*, Institutional Considerations in the Formulation of Federal Fiscal Policy. American.
- Lester E. Mosher*, Political Activity Restrictions in the United States. New York University.
- Don Muchmore*, Political Use of the Presidential Appointive Power, 1900-1950. California (Los Angeles).
- Arthur W. Murphy*, Communist Penetration of the United States Maritime Industry. Georgetown.
- Henry Nash*, The Selection of the United States Ambassadors to the Soviet Union. New York University.
- Morris S. Ogul*, Reforming Executive-Congressional Relationships in the Conduct of American Foreign Policy: History and Analysis of the Idea of an Executive-Legislative Council as a Proposed Solution. Michigan.
- Edward R. Padgett*, The Minority Party in Bipartisan Foreign Policy Formulation in the United States. Maryland.
- A. Edward Palmos*, Some Recent Attempts of Non-Political Organizations to Influence Federal Legislation. New York University.
- Stewart M. Patterson*, The Role of Executive Agreements in the Execution of U. S. Foreign Policy. American.
- Arthur Peterson*, McCarthyism: Its Foundation and Ideology. Minnesota.
- Walfred Peterson*, The Foreign Policy of the Socialist Party. Minnesota.
- Hugh D. Price*, Scale Analysis of Senate Voting Patterns, 1949-1956. Harvard.
- John R. Probert*, Staff Arrangements in the Organization for National Security. Pennsylvania.
- Edward Proxmire*, The Limitations and Possibilities of Increasing Public Understanding of National Politics Through the Daily Newspaper. Harvard.

- Michael Reagan*, Congressional Mind and Military Foreign Policy. Princeton.
- Norman F. Reber*, Main Factors that Determine the Editorial Content of Farm Magazines as it Relates to Influence on Public Opinion. Pennsylvania.
- Merton L. Reichler*, Disintegration and Insurgency in the Democratic Party in New York County. Columbia.
- Donald H. Riddle*, The Truman Committee: A Study in Congressional Control of the Military. Princeton.
- James W. Riddlesperger*, Alexander Hamilton and the Modern American Constitution. Texas.
- James M. Roherty*, The Legislative Council as a Legislative Institution. Wisconsin.
- James N. Rosenau*, The Senate and Dean Acheson, 1949-52. Princeton.
- Harold I. Roth*, Collective Bargaining Patterns in the Motion Picture Industry. Chicago.
- Martha L. Saenger*, The 1944 Presidential Campaign: An Analysis of the Forces behind the Pro-Roosevelt CIO Political Action Committee. Ohio State.
- Carl Santoro*, A New Approach to the Problem of Non-Voting. Pennsylvania.
- Peter P. Schaffler*, The History and Potentialities of the Legislative Veto Device in the Federal Government. Harvard.
- Paul J. Scheips*, The Chiriqui Improvement Company: An Experiment in American Economic Expansion. American.
- Seymour Scher*, The National Labor Relations Board and Congress: Study of Legislative Control of Regulatory Activity. Chicago.
- Saul Schindler*, The Townsend Movement in California, 1935-40. New School.
- Harry M. Scoble, Jr.*, Yankeetown: A Study of Community Decision-Making Processes. Yale.
- Kenneth E. Scott*, Marshall Plan and Executive Decision-Making. Princeton.
- Morris Simon*, Woodrow Wilson and the Legislative Process. Cornell.
- Franklin Smallwood*, Advisory Group Activity in the Atomic Energy Program. Harvard.
- John W. Spanier*, Political-Military Strategy in Korea: The Truman-MacArthur Conflict. Yale.
- Stephen Stamatopoulos*, Colonel E. M. House: A Biography. Harvard.
- Isadore Starr*, Proposals for the Reform of the American Anti-Trust Laws. New School.
- Leonard Stein*, Labor and Politics: An Inventory of Research. Chicago.
- Robert C. Stender*, The Defense Budgetary Process. Harvard.
- Oscar Stradinger*, The Bureau of Reclamation: A Study in Administrative Organization and Techniques as These Influence and Are Influenced by Policy Positions. Chicago.
- Anthony Y. S. Szu-tu*, Legal Status of Chinese in the United States. New York University.
- Morton J. Tenzer*, Woodrow Wilson and the Palestine Question: A Study in Influence on American Policy of Minority Groups of Foreign Origin. Yale.
- Paul D. Tillett*, The Cancellation of Air Mail Contracts: 1934. Princeton.
- Henry Tomasek*, The Great Plains Agricultural Council. Chicago.
- Daniel Tuttle*, Intergovernmental Relations in Wyoming Land Policy and Administration. Minnesota.
- Thomas D. Unga*, The Political Theory of the Second Hoover Commission Report. Iowa.
- Herbert Wallzer*, A History and Analysis of Federal Corrupt Practices Legislation. New York University.
- Andrew J. Wann*, Franklin D. Roosevelt: A Study of Leadership. Missouri.
- Leo Weinstein*, The Place of Lobbying in the Legislative Process. Chicago.
- Warren Weston*, A Comparison of the Method of Filling Vacancies in the United States Senate and the U.S. House of Representatives. Minnesota.
- Quentin H. Whybark*, Political Aspects of the Public Power Issue in the Pacific Northwest. Stanford.
- Ralph D. Williams*, The Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. New York University.
- Vytautas S. Zvirzdys*, Select Committees of Congress in Foreign Relations: A Study in Legislative Process. Wisconsin.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN THE UNITED STATES

- Roscoe C. Adkins*, Justice Brandeis and Administrative Law. Texas.
- Karl Andresen*, U.S. Supreme Court Interpretations of State Constitutions. Minnesota.
- Louis A. Antrobus*, The Federal Exclusionary Rule in Relation to the Fourth Amendment as Applied and Interpreted by the U.S. Supreme Court. Missouri.
- George R. Blackburn*, Freedom of Association:

- The Group versus the Individual before the Courts. Harvard.
- Ruth L. Byrd*, Justice Rufus Wheeler Peckham and the Growth of Capitalism in the United States. American.
- Gordon B. Cleveland*, The Role of the Rule of Law in the Administrative State; with Special Emphasis on Civil Liberties. North Carolina.
- Fredryc R. Darby*, The Constitutionality of Antimiscegenation Laws under the 14th Amendment. California (Berkeley).
- Emily Dawson*, The Supreme Court's Conception of Religious Liberty in the Jehovah's Witnesses' Cases. Minnesota.
- Rondal G. Downing*, The Federal Courts and Labor Relations, 1935-1955: A Study in Judicial Decision-Making. Illinois.
- Christopher Dyer-Bennet*, Justice Harlan and the Federal System. California (Berkeley).
- Robert J. Frye*, Civil Rights and United States Immigration and Deportation Policy. Florida.
- Spencer Gervin*, The Development of Executive Rule in the United States. Duke.
- Royal C. Gilkey*, Mr. Justice Frankfurter and Civil Liberties. Minnesota.
- Ernest R. Griffin*, The Full Faith and Credit Clause as Applied to Divorce Decrees. Duke.
- Luther Hagard*, Equality of the States in the United States: Theory, Constitutional Law and Practice. Minnesota.
- Joseph T. Hart*, Secondary Boycotts: The Experience under the Taft-Hartley Act, 1947-1955. Fordham.
- Heins R. Hink*, Aspects of Governmental Liability for Torts of Officers in Anglo-American and Continental Law. Washington (Seattle).
- Charles A. Hollister*, A Judicial Analysis of the Right to Acquire, Possess and Protect Property in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- John W. Hopkirk*, William O. Douglas, Individualist. Princeton.
- James A. Killough*, Federal Regulation of Economic Aspects of Air Carriers: A Study of Civil Aeronautics Board Policies Enforcing the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, as Amended, Emphasizing Certificates of Public Convenience, Permits to Foreign Carriers and Rate-Making Practices. Pennsylvania.
- John T. Kitos*, Coordination of Public Health and Hospital Administration in New York State. Syracuse.
- James R. Klonoski*, The Influence of Government Counsel on Supreme Court Decisions Involving the Commerce Power. Michigan.
- Jacob Kossman*, Constitutional Rights of a Defendant in Federal Criminal Proceedings. Pennsylvania.
- Oscar Kraines*, Ernst Freund's Contribution to American Legal Thought. New York University.
- Roseana Kronick*, The Power of the President to Remove Officials with Emphasis upon Officials Exercising Quasi-Judicial and Quasi-Legislative Functions. California (Berkeley).
- J. T. Law*, The Constitutional Ideas of Mr. Justice Horace Gray. Wisconsin.
- Harold J. Leu*, Some Constitutional Aspects of the Extra-Continental Jurisdiction of the United States. Michigan.
- Eleanor T. Linenthal*, Free Speech and the Power of the Courts and Congress to Punish for Contempt. Cornell.
- Lewis I. Maddocks*, Justice Harlan and the Role of the Supreme Court. Ohio State.
- Ernest Means*, Free Speech v. Fair Trial. Wisconsin.
- Lyndon R. Musolf*, Water Law in the Western States and Federal Control and Development of Water Resources. California (Los Angeles).
- Theodore Norton*, The Right to Leave the United States. Chicago.
- Gordon Patrie*, The Impact of the McCulloch Decision in the State of Illinois. Illinois.
- Eugene S. Powell*, Limits on the King's Prerogative: The Colonial Background to Substantive Due Process of Law. California (Berkeley).
- Earl Radley*, Mr. Justice Frankfurter's Conception of the Role of the Supreme Court in the American Federal System. Harvard.
- Charles M. Rehmus*, Executive Powers in National Emergency Labor Disputes. Stanford.
- Yosal Rogat*, Political Theory and Judicial Review: A Study of the Thought of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. California (Berkeley).
- Eva R. Rubin*, The Supreme Court at Mid-Century: A Study of Judicial Self-Limitation. Johns Hopkins.
- Robert Runo*, Law Making by the Roosevelt Court: A Study in Methods of Statutory Interpretation. Chicago.
- Robert Scigliano*, The Michigan One-Man Grand Jury: A Study of Courts and the Political Process. Chicago.
- Timothy H. Scully*, Federalism and Judicial Review as Reflected in the Supreme Court

- Opinions of Felix Frankfurter. Fordham.
Eugene Sekulow, Congressional Polls and the Legislative Process. Johns Hopkins.
Finn Sollie, A Comparative Study in Judicial Review in Norway and the United States. Johns Hopkins.
L. Dean Sprague, Civil Rights During War. Syracuse.
Richard G. Stevens, Modern Social Science and Mr. Justice Frankfurter. Chicago.
Raymond P. Stone, Separate but Equal: A Study in the Formulation and Modification of a Constitutional Doctrine. Princeton.
Robert P. K. Sturm, The Legal Theory of Associate Justice David J. Brewer. Utah.
Bertrand C. Trautman, Natural Law Concepts Found in Supreme Court Decisions. Harvard.
Kenneth W. Treacy, Collision of the Supreme Court and the States. Utah.
Robert S. Walker, The Right and Writ of Personal Liberty. California (Berkeley).
Harold F. Way, Illegal Searches and Seizures. Cornell.
Paul A. Weidner, Justices Samuel F. Miller and Stephen J. Field: A Comparative Study of Judicial Attitudes and Values. Michigan.
William Welsh, The Local Regulation of Minimum Housing Standards in Selected Cities Throughout the United States. Syracuse.
Warren C. White, Rulemaking Procedures in the Interstate Commerce Commission. Maryland.
Peter Woll, Judicial Control of Administrative Procedure. Cornell.
Stephen B. Wood, Child Labor and the Constitution. Chicago.
- AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS
- Sylvester S. Aichele*, Pressure Groups and the Legislative Process in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
Dee Akers, Procedures of Regulatory Administration in the Commonwealth of Kentucky. Kentucky.
James K. Anderson, Inter-Relation of Governmental Jurisdictions within the State of New York. New School.
Eva Aronfreed, City of Philadelphia Public Relations Department. Pennsylvania.
Richard N. Baisden, Los Angeles Labor and the Los Angeles City Government. Chicago.
John T. Ballard, The Impact of State Controls Upon Financial Procedure: Johnson County, Iowa. Iowa.
Jewel Bellush, Herbert H. Lehman, Lt. Governor and Governor: A Study in State Leadership, 1928-1942. Columbia.
Joseph Bernd, A Study of Primary Elections in Georgia, 1946-1954. Duke.
Lemuel F. Blitz, The Involvement of Local Governments in Metropolitan Problems in the Norfolk, Virginia Area. North Carolina.
William J. Block, The Separation of the Farm Bureau and the Extension Service: A Study of Group Activities. Illinois.
Donald E. Boles, Conservation and the Administrative Process in Wisconsin. Wisconsin.
John A. Bond, Legislative Reapportionment in Minnesota. Minnesota.
Morton Broffman, Executive Office of the Mayor of New York City. Harvard.
William P. Brown, LaGuardia As Administrator. New York University.
Ronald E. Chinn, The History of the Democratic Party in California since 1920. California (Berkeley).
Warren I. Cikens, Case Study of Alabama Power Company and TVA in Power Resource Development. Harvard.
Alexander Cloner, The Role of the Executive in Local Public Housing Authorities in the United States of America. Southern California.
Ralph Conani, Government of Metropolitan Areas. Chicago.
Geoffrey Cornog, An Analysis of Turnover in the Minnesota State Service. Minnesota.
Howard D. Criswell, Urban County Government and Administration: A Study of the Arlington County, Virginia, Government. American.
John A. Crittenden, County Politics: Urban and Rural. North Carolina.
Charles C. Curran, The Health Function on the Local Level: Kansas City, Missouri—An Administrative Case Study. Harvard.
John M. DeGrove, Water Resource Development in Florida: A Study of Resource Administration and Intergovernmental Relations. North Carolina.
Carl E. DeVane, Administrative Problems in the Public Budgetary Process, with Special Reference to the City of Philadelphia. Pennsylvania.
Stanley E. Dewey, The Portsmouth Area of the AEC: Its Impact on Local Government (With Special Reference to Intergovernmental Relations). Ohio State.
Brock Dixon, The Problem of Local Govern- ment in the Metropolitan Area of Portland, Oregon. Southern California.

- Manuel Dobrusin*, Proportional Representation in Massachusetts: The Success of Seven Massachusetts Municipalities with the Proportional Representation Method of Voting. Boston University.
- Douglas J. Doubleday*, Legislative Review of the Budget in California. California (Berkeley).
- Paul M. Douglas*, Administrative Reorganization in New Jersey. Princeton.
- Russell E. Dybdahl*, The Administration of Professional Licenses in Iowa. Iowa.
- George Elcaness*, A History of the Consolidation of the City of New York. New York University.
- Thomas A. Flinn*, Governor and Legislature: A Case Study in Political Decision-Making. Minnesota.
- Floyd O. Flom*, The Minnesota Governmental Conservation Act: A Case Study in the Legislative Process. Minnesota.
- Houston I. Flourney*, The Liberal Party in New York State. Princeton.
- Richard Frost*, Standards for Zoning Agencies with Particular Reference to Use Variances and Conversions in Syracuse, N. Y. Syracuse.
- Herbert Garfinkel*, F.E.P.C. Legislation in Illinois. Chicago.
- Robbins L. Gates*, The Politics of Desegregation in Virginia Schools: May 1954 to May 1956. Columbia.
- Juanita Gibson*, The Office of Governor in Florida. Michigan.
- Marilyn Gittell*, County Government in New York State. New York University.
- Israel Glasser*, An Analysis of Differential Voting Participation in the 1953 Democratic Mayoralty Primary Election in New York City. New York University.
- Gibson Gray*, A Political Education for the New Reformers: A Study of the Evolution of the Movement for Fair Employment Legislation in Pennsylvania from 1945 to 1951. Columbia.
- William M. Griffin*, The Impact of Federal Grants-in-Aid on Certain Aspects of Texas State Government. Texas.
- G. Phillips Hanna*, New Hampshire Politics: A Case Study of the Recruitment of Political Leaders. Princeton.
- Lyle M. Hansen*, A Case Study in Selected Aspects of the Role of City Councilmen. Syracuse.
- Marvin A. Harder*, The Democratic Party in Kansas: A Case Study of the Role of a Minority Party in a One-Party State. Columbia.
- Louise Harned*, Participation in Political Parties: A Study of Party Committeemen. Yale.
- Frederick H. Harris, Jr.*, A Study of Political Activity in Two North Carolina Counties. North Carolina.
- James B. Harrison*, Democratic Party of Oregon. Washington (Seattle).
- Richard B. Harvey*, Earl Warren and Social Progress in California. California (Los Angeles).
- Allan Healey*, An Analytical History of the Power of Political Parties in Illinois, 1928-1948. Chicago.
- Murray Herman*, The Office of Borough President in the City of New York. New York University.
- A. Freeman Holmer*, The Executive Budget in Oregon. Columbia.
- Page L. Ingraham*, Politics of Agriculture in Minnesota, 1930-1950. Chicago.
- Evan A. Iverson*, Organization and Administration of State and Local Law Enforcement. Utah.
- James A. Jarvis*, Intergovernmental Relationships of Louisville, Kentucky, with Special Reference to Public Housing. Illinois.
- James G. Kehew*, Development of Smoke Control Policy in the Pittsburgh Area. Pittsburgh.
- Robert Kelsey*, Southern Neo-Populism of the 1920's Florida.
- John H. Kessel*, The 1956 Gubernatorial Campaign in Ohio. Columbia.
- Gertrude Lamb*, Administration of State Grants-in-Aid. Boston University.
- John A. Larson, Jr.*, Community Participation in Tennessee's Postwar Industrial Development. Northwestern.
- Hugh LeBlanc*, The Political Process in the District of Columbia. Chicago.
- Eugene Lee*, Non-Partisan Local Government in California. California (Berkeley).
- Roy M. McClintock, Jr.*, Pressure Politics in the Missouri General Assembly. Missouri.
- Ellis E. McCune*, Jury Selection in California: A Study in Judicial Administration. California (Los Angeles).
- Hugh MacNiven*, Payments in Lieu of Taxes and Payments to School Districts in Defense Impacted Areas of Minnesota. Minnesota.
- Arthur Mann*, The Role of the Warden in - Modern Correctional Institutions. New York University.

- Arthur C. Marlow, The Executive Budget in Missouri. St. Louis.
- Thomas R. Masterson, The Milwaukee Harbor Board. Chicago.
- Warner Mills, Jr., Ross Sterling, Governor of Texas. Johns Hopkins.
- John C. Murray, The Development of the Executive Branch of Government in Rhode Island. Brown.
- Earl A. Nehring, Local Political Leadership: A Study of Decision Making in a Council-Manager City. California (Los Angeles).
- Walter H. Niehoff, Democratic Trends in the Constitutions of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania State.
- James Nietmann, The Administration of Government in the City of St. Louis, Missouri, 1875-1950. Harvard.
- Benjamin Nispel, The Office of the Lieutenant Governor in the United States. Pennsylvania.
- Sally J. Olen, David L. Lawrence, Mayor of the City of Pittsburgh: Politics and Public Service. Pittsburgh.
- Daisy Parker, The Executive Department of the State of Florida. Virginia.
- William W. Parrott, Municipal Public Relations in New York State's Villages. New York University.
- Dorothy S. Pealy, An Evaluation of the Work of the Ann Arbor Home Rule Charter Commission. Michigan.
- Philip C. Pendleton, A Critical Analysis of the Effectiveness of the Municipal Leagues of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Dwynal B. Pettengill, Financing Political Parties in Maryland. Johns Hopkins.
- Hyrum Plaas, The Administration of the Departments of Roads and Bridges of the 29 Counties in the State of Utah. Utah.
- Theodore Powell, "The Child Benefit Theory"; A Study of Public Services to Non-Public Schools in Connecticut. Columbia.
- Robert J. Quinlan, The Governor of Connecticut: A Study in the Development of Executive Leadership. Yale.
- Leo F. Redfern, Fiscal Control of State Universities. Harvard.
- Ernest C. Reock, The Taxation of Real and Personal Property in New Jersey. Rutgers.
- Samuel J. Resnick, The City Planning Commission and the Department of City Planning of the City of New York. New York University.
- Herbert D. Rosenbaum, The Dynamics of Parties and Politics in the Expanding Suburb: A Case Study of Nassau County, New York. Columbia.
- Leonard C. Rowe, The Problem of Money in Elections in California. California (Berkeley).
- Robert L. Sawyer, Jr., The Regulation and Control of Subversive Activities in Michigan. Michigan.
- Joseph A. Schlesinger, Methods of Ascendancy to the Office of Governor in the United States. Yale.
- Edgar L. Sherbenou, The Structure and Method of Political Power in a Small Town. Kansas.
- Gerald H. Silverburgh, Fusion Reform in New York City, 1933-1934. Columbia.
- Frederick C. Spiegel, The Liability of the American State with Special Reference to Illinois. Illinois.
- Israel Stiefel, Reorganization of the Pennsylvania State Administrative Structure. Pennsylvania.
- John O. Stitely, The Rhode Island General Assembly. Harvard.
- James D. Thomas, Jr., County Government and Administration in Alabama. Ohio State.
- William G. Thomas, Jr., A Study of the Bureau Chiefs of the City of New York. Columbia.
- Donald S. Vaughn, Administrative Responsibility in Alabama. Columbia.
- Nathalie Sher Wald, Water Resource Policies in Northern New Jersey: A Study in Politics and Administration. Columbia.
- Seymour S. Weisman, Disaster: A Study of the Impact upon Administrative Agencies in Norwalk, Connecticut, of the 1955 Floods. New York University.
- John E. Westburg, Constitutional Reforms for Effective Government in Nevada. Southern California.
- John Wheeler, State-Local Relationships in Vermont. Syracuse.
- Dean L. Williams, Inter governmental Relations between Long Beach and the Federal Government: An Analysis of the Harbor Development and the Tidelands Oil Controversy. California (Los Angeles).
- George D. Wilson, The Politics of Governmental Integration in the Atlanta Metropolitan Area. North Carolina.
- William C. Wimberly, The Illinois Primary. Illinois.
- Harold Winson, An Evaluation of the New - York City Career and Salary Plan. New York University.

- S. Joseph Wodka, Factors Related to Homogeneity and Stability of Political Preference in a Hamtramck Polish Precinct. Michigan.
- John W. Wood, A Study of the Iowa Judicial System. Iowa.
- Lloyd Woodruff, County Boards in Wisconsin. Minnesota.
- George D. Young, An Analysis of the Conflict in the House of Representatives of the Missouri General Assembly, 1955. Missouri.
- Norman L. Zucker, Power Factors in the Political Process of Metropolitan Areas: A Study of the Role of Violence, Coercion, and Compulsion. Rutgers.
- PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION IN THE UNITED STATES
- James H. Bahti, The Implementation of the Wriston Committee Report. Michigan.
- John G. Barmby, Utilization of Funds and Personnel for Naval Research. American.
- Norman Beckman, Federal-State Relations in Public Health: A Study of the Non-Fiscal and Non-Regulatory Techniques of the Bureau of State Services. Columbia.
- William J. Bell, A Study of Personnel Practices in a State Administration under a Merit System (The Pennsylvania Employment Security Board). Indiana.
- Eugene K. Bigelow, Role of Advisory Bodies in the Foreign Service. Pennsylvania.
- David A. Bingham, Agriculture Departmental Inspectional Activities: A Comparative Study. Iowa.
- Kenneth P. Borgen, Development of Budget Policy for the Department of Defense. American.
- Calvin G. Brooks, Administration of an Extended Social Security System in the United States. American.
- Fred R. Brown, The Administration of Tax-Supported Indigent Medical Institutional Care Programs. Pennsylvania.
- Milton L. Brown, Personnel Policies and Practices in Federal Administration: A Critique of Personnel Management in Selected Federal Agencies. Pennsylvania.
- Andrew S. Bullis, Jr., Fiscal Administration in Selected Pennsylvania Cities. Syracuse.
- Frederick O. Bundy, The Administration of Rule Making and Licensing Processes under Selected Statutes of the Department of Agriculture. Syracuse.
- Benjamin S. Burton, The Decision-Making Process in Administration. New York University.
- Charles E. Campbell, Current Executive Development Programs in the United States Army and Air Force with an Appraisal of Selected American Industrial Training Procedures. American.
- John M. Capozzola, The New York Regional Office of the N.L.R.B.; Organization, Policies and Procedures. Pennsylvania.
- T. Daniel Carroll, The Development of the Appeals System in the Federal Civil Service. Chicago.
- Edwin L. Cling, Unionisation of the City Government of Milwaukee, with Particular Reference to Unions with Membership Primarily in Private Industry. Northwestern.
- Wallace C. Clopton, The Budget Division of Connecticut as a Staff Agency. Yale.
- Robert J. Courtney, The Manager Plan in Pennsylvania Local Government. Pennsylvania.
- Irving O. Dawson, The Texas State Teachers Association: A Study in Public Employee Organization. Texas.
- Roderick K. deCamp, The Chicago Transit Authority: A Study in Responsibility. Chicago.
- Mabel E. Deutrich, Fred C. Ainsworth: Army Surgeon and Administrator. American.
- Robert E. DeVelbiss, Administration and Philosophy of Consumer Protection by the Federal Government. California (Berkeley).
- Russell E. Dybdahl, The Administration of Professional Licenses in Iowa. Iowa.
- Eugene T. Ferraro, The Aircraft Spare Parts Industry in the United States: A Case Study in New Administrative Problems of Big Government. New School.
- Max Fiks, Equal Pay for Equal Work: An Inquiry into Compensation Standards in the Civil Service of New York City. New York University.
- Thomas S. Francis, An Analysis of the Organization and Operation of Privately Sponsored Commissions of Inquiry. Columbia.
- Emmanuel R. Fuchs, Federal-State Relations in River Basin Development: A Case Study of the Missouri Valley. Harvard.
- Albert M. Gaddy, Study of the Operations of the Bureau of Land Management, Department of Interior. Iowa.
- Albert Z. Gammage, The California Highway Patrol: A Study in Administration. Texas.
- David R. Gardner, The Coordination of Federal, Regional, State and Local Agencies in the - Preparation of Detailed Soil Survey Reports. Harvard.

- Reverdy T. Gliddon*, Regulation of the Air Route Pattern by the Civil Aeronautics Board. Texas.
- Paul Gordon*, Evaluation of Top Management and Organization in Hospitals. Syracuse.
- Clifford R. Gross*, The Budgetary Administration of the Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance. Syracuse.
- Donald E. Habbe*, Pearl Harbor: A Case Study in Administration. Wisconsin.
- Mordecai Hacohen*, The Administrative Aspects of the Jordan Valley Administration. New School.
- John M. Hale*, The Administration of State Highway Authorities in Selected Mid-western States. Michigan.
- Harriet Hanellin*, Administration of Aid to the Aged in the United States. New York University.
- Fred J. Harsaghy, Jr.*, Administrative Aspects of American Cultural Influences in Japan. New York University.
- Alden D. Hayes*, The Wisconsin Income Tax System: A Case Study in Administrative Effectiveness. Wisconsin.
- John Hebal*, Field Administration of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in Minnesota and Wisconsin. Minnesota.
- Robert S. Herman*, Revenue Estimating in New York State Government. New York University.
- Donald S. Hiller*, The Commission Plan of City Government in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Victor C. Hobday*, Tennessee Municipalities and TVA Electric Power. Syracuse.
- Walter W. Hodgson*, Health Administration in the Philadelphia Metropolitan Area. Pennsylvania.
- Barrett Hollister*, Natural Resources Administration in Ohio. Syracuse.
- Brin Hubbert*, William Ashby Jump, Public Administrator. Syracuse.
- Clyde W. Humphrey*, Organizing and Administering Vocational Business Training in Public Educational Agencies. American.
- Albert P. Ingraham*, Situational Factors in Federal Government Executive Positions and Their Relation to Executive Selection and Development. American.
- Penrose Jackson*, Personnel of Selected Federal Regulatory Commissions. Texas.
- Judith N. Jamison*, Administrative Reforms of the Hiram Johnson Era in California. California (Los Angeles).
- Holman W. Jenkins*, The American Philosophy of War: An Inquiry into the Sources and Principles Governing the Strategic Concepts of the Armed Forces of the United States since World War II. Pennsylvania.
- Harvey N. Johnson, Jr.*, The Administration of Federal Public Housing Legislation by Local Authority Personnel in the United States. New York University.
- Walbert W. Kaempfer*, West Virginia's Board of Public Works: A Study of the Utility of the Plural Executive at the Highest State Level. Alabama.
- Robert W. Kaufman*, An Examination of the Organization of Selected Non-Governmental Associations which Attempt to Influence the Formation of Federal Public Policy in the United States. American.
- Robert L. Kliner*, The Administration of Federal Migratory Waterfowl Legislation. Iowa.
- Anna Knoll*, The Problem of Training Career Administrators. American.
- Gerhard J. Kruger*, Position Classification and Employment Policies in the Department of Agriculture from 1914 to the Present Time. American.
- Walter Kurylo*, A Study of the Federal-Aid Highway Program with Special Emphasis on Its Budgetary and Planning Aspects. American.
- Ezra Lander*, Performance Budgeting and Accounting Policy in the Department of the Army. American.
- William Larsen*, The Field Service of the United States Bureau of the Budget. California (Berkeley).
- Robert S. Lorch*, Career Development in the Air Force. Wisconsin.
- John M. Lowe*, Authority Without Sovereignty: An Inquiry into Public Authorities. New York University.
- William H. Ludlow*, Government Control of Urban Population Densities. Chicago.
- Conrad L. McBride*, The Upper Colorado River Basin Compact: An Analysis of the Compact as a Basis for Regional Administration. California (Los Angeles).
- John P. McCarthy*, Legislative-Executive Relations: Federal Organization. Chicago.
- Gordon McLean*, Relative Power of the United States Treasury and the Federal Reserve System in Monetary Management and some Controversial Proposals for Changes. New York University.

- Robert J. McNeill, The Administration of Natural Resources in California. California (Berkeley).
- Donal E. J. MacNamara, The Administrative Organization and Operation of Provost Marshal General Activities in World War II. Columbia.
- Donald R. MacQuivey, Frequency Assignment in Administrative Control. American.
- Dean E. Mann, The Administration of Natural Resources in the State of Arizona. California (Berkeley).
- Byron S. Martin, Planning for Total Mobilization for War in the United States: 1920-1940. Chicago.
- Gunther Marx, Federal Highway Policies, 1916 to 1956. New York University.
- Martin A. Mendelson, A Factor Analysis of the Personality and Interest Patterns of USAF Master Sergeants. New York University.
- Charles Miller II, The Administrative Feasibility of Including Domestic Servants under the Federal Old Age and Survivors Insurance Program. Pennsylvania.
- William B. Monat, A Critical Analysis of the Merit System in Minnesota. Minnesota.
- Chester Morrill, Jr., Organizational Principles: Applied to the Lower Echelons of the United States Army. American.
- Harry F. Mullaly, The Refugee Relief Act of 1953: Its Effects upon United States Society, Foreign and Intergovernmental Relations and Economy. New York University.
- Dennis E. Mulvihill, An Appraisal of the Army Ordnance Management Improvement Program. Pittsburgh.
- Mildred B. Negus, A Study of the Unit Cost of a Tax-Supported Public Health Nursing Service, with Special Reference to the District of Columbia. American.
- Ken Nishimoto, The Committees of the Department of the Interior with Special Reference to Intra-Departmental Committees. American.
- James E. Nix, The Admission of Negroes to State Universities in the South. Syracuse.
- William C. Nolan, Organization for the Regulation of Trade—The Federal Trade Commission from Humphrey to the Basing Point Decisions. New York University.
- Robert M. Northrop, Administrative Doctrine and Administrative Behavior: The AEC Experience. Michigan.
- Ben Posner, Accounting Data as Related to Performance-Budgeting in the Federal Government. American.
- Robert W. Powers, Interagency Cooperation in Foreign Technical Assistance Programs. Minnesota.
- Nathaniel S. Preston, The Use and Control of Public Authorities in the United States: A Study of the Public Corporation on the State, Local and Regional Levels. Princeton.
- Lee B. Reifel, Limitations and Potentialities of Democratic Administration in Colleges and Universities in the United States. American.
- Vorley Rezroad, The Administration of the Los Alamos Atomic Energy Project. New York University.
- Leo Richards, Budgeting in the National Housing Agency. American.
- G. Franklin Roberts, The National Production Authority: Administrative Organization and Operation—1950 to 1953. American.
- Herbert Rosenberg, Office of Defense Mobilization: A Study of Civil-Military Relations During the Korean Mobilization. Chicago.
- Arthur H. Rosien, The Administrative Relationship between the Army and the Territory of Alaska. Syracuse.
- Harold H. Roth, The Executive Office of the President: Its Development as an Administrative Instrument. American.
- Liberata B. Ruscigno, Organization for Personnel Management in California. Stanford.
- Lillian V. Salsman, Functional Roles of Nursing Personnel of the New York State Department of Hygiene. New York University.
- Harry Seymour, Organization and Administration of the Bureau of Naval Personnel. Syracuse.
- William Shore, Doctrine of Governmental Liability and Its Impact upon Public Administration. Syracuse.
- Cyril O. Shuler, Logistics Systems Research with Special Reference to United States Air Force Problems. American.
- Bernard E. Shultz, The Federal Occupational Classification Structure under the Classification Act of 1949. American.
- William J. Siffin, Government and the Cotton Problem. Harvard.
- Elizabeth B. Smith, Intergovernmental Relations in Public Health Administration: A Study of the Adaptation and Execution of Public Policy. Virginia.
- Sidney Spector, Public Administration Among Primitive Societies. Chicago.
- Richard Stuart, Financing Capital Improvements in Maine. Pennsylvania.
- Frank W. Suggitt, Area Analysis—The Educa-

- tional Function in Program Adaptation. Harvard.
- Arnold E. Sukrow, Qualifications of Federal Personnel Techniques. American.
- George A. Tapper, Public Unionism in New Jersey. Pennsylvania.
- Nelson E. Taylor, Jr., The Association of American Railroads—Its Role as a Pressure Group. Harvard.
- T. F. Thompson, Responsibility of School Teachers as Public Servants. Indiana.
- William Thorkelson, Planning and Programming in the Armed Forces. Syracuse.
- James D. Tschirgi, Administration of the Federal Mining Laws. Chicago.
- Simon Tucker, The Development of the Employment Activities of the United States Civil Service Commission. American.
- Martin K. Tytell, Determining the Make, Model and Approximate Age of a Type-written Document from Its Write. New York University.
- A. Donald Urquhart, The Conduct of Administrative Hearings in Metropolitan Los Angeles. California (Los Angeles).
- Jess H. Walters, Planning for Rurban Areas: A Survey and Analysis of Approaches to the Problem, with Special Reference to the Los Angeles Area. California (Los Angeles).
- Troy Westmeyer, Administration of Municipal Income and Payroll Taxes. New York University.
- J. Lee Westrate, The Administrative Theories and Practices of Herbert Hoover. Chicago.
- Waller Wilmot, Administration of Air Pollution Control. Harvard.
- Richard D. Winans, Institutional Administration. New York University.
- John L. Withers, The Administrative Theory and Practice of William Howard Taft. Chicago.
- Arthur Wolfe, American Civil Service Examinations. Chicago.
- Laurence N. Woodworth, Taxation of American Individuals and Corporations Earning Income Abroad. New York University.
- Deil S. Wright, The Prestige of Public Employment in a Metropolitan Community. Michigan.
- John D. Young, Regional Administration in the Federal Government. American.
- FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS
- Bruce Adkinson, British Commonwealth in Southeast Asia. Princeton.
- Bilquis Ali, The Pakistan Reform Movement. New York University.
- Eduardo D. C. Austin, The First Democratic Revolution in the Far East: Philippine 1895–1905. Georgetown.
- Kemdi Asoma, Development of Federalism in Nigeria. New York University.
- Hans H. Baerwald, Problems of Developing Democratic Leadership in Japan. California (Berkeley).
- Samuel Barnes, The Political Role and Ideology of Organized Labor in Canada. Duke.
- Robert W. Barrie, The Council of Europe. Minnesota.
- Paul Barringer, Soviet Policy Toward Scientific Research: A Case Study. Harvard.
- Robert O. Berdahl, British Universities and Government Grants. California (Berkeley).
- William Berry, Problems in the Economic Development of British African Territories. Harvard.
- P. V. Bhambal, Social Security in India and the United States. Syracuse.
- Brij Bhushan, The Fundamental Rights in India: Indian Philosophic and Anglo-American Legal Concepts. American.
- Byron E. Blankinship, Spain and World War I: A Study of Foreign Policy, 1910–1920. Columbia.
- Robert C. Bone, Jr., West Irian, New Guinea, Microcosm of Conflict, 1949–1955. Cornell.
- Louis C. Boochever, Jr., The Development of the Soviet Coal Industry. Harvard.
- George Brinkley, The Volunteer Army and Allied Intervention in South Russia, 1918–1921. Columbia.
- Simon Broder, A Comparative Study of the U. S. Patent Office and the German Patent Office. American.
- Lyle C. Brown, The Cardenas Administration in Mexico, 1934–40. Texas.
- Fred Burke, Local Government in Uganda. Princeton.
- Leo D. Cagan, Civil Service Unions: A Comparative Study of American and British Commonwealth Experience. Chicago.
- Charles Carroll, Australia and Argentina: A Study of the Bases of Federal Government. Harvard.
- Jay H. Cerf, A Study of Attitude Controls in the Membership State: The Sanction-Appling Process of the Freie Deutsche Jugend in the School and University System of the German Democratic Republic. Yale.
- Sudershan Chawla, India and Communism. Ohio State.
- Romeo A. Cherot, Kazakh Customary Law

- under the Russian Empire, 1824-1917. Columbia.
- G. W. Choudhury, The First Constituent Assembly of Pakistan (1947-1954): A Study in the Failure of its Mission. Columbia.
- Cathie L. Clark, The Development of Government and Administration in Brazil since 1889. American.
- John M. Clarke, The Budget in the Central Government of the Commonwealth of Australia. American.
- Guillermo B. Corpus, National-Local Government Relationships in the Philippines. New York University.
- Alvin J. Cottrell, The Evolution of the Government of Malta in the Twentieth Century with the Primary Emphasis on the Proposal to Give Malta Three Representatives in the House of Commons. Pennsylvania.
- George R. Crossman, Codetermination. Columbia.
- Ralph E. Crow, Personnel Organization and Practice in Syria. Michigan.
- Chauncey R. Crutcher, The Federal District of the United Mexican States. North Carolina.
- Francis D. DeTarr, The French Radical Party, 1944-1956. The Problem of Doctrinal Coherence. Yale.
- Kurt DeWitt, The Relation between Civil and Military Power in a Totalitarian Dictatorship: The Wehrmacht and the Nazi Party 1933-1945. George Washington.
- Alfred Diamant, The Course of Political Catholicism in Austria. Yale.
- P. Allan Dionisopoulos, The Conduct of Foreign Policy Under Shigeru Yoshida. California (Los Angeles).
- Warren H. Donnelly, Organization for Atomic Energy in the United Kingdom, Canada, and the United States. New York University.
- Jack D. Dowell, The Parliament of West Germany. Stanford.
- Horst Duhnke, Politics and Society in the Soviet Zone of Germany, 1945-1956. California (Berkeley).
- Demetrius P. Economou, The Judicial Control of Administrative Discretion: The Greek Experience. Yale.
- Rudolph Eilers, Foreign Policy Problems of the West German Government, 1949-1952. American.
- Harold T. Ellis, The Development of the Constitution of Ireland, 1911-1923. Stanford.
- John G. Eriksen, Church and State Relations in Germany, 1930-1945. Minnesota.
- Phoebe Everett, Land Tenure in Burma. Syracuse.
- Alejandro Fernandez, The Philippine Presidency: Powers and Functions. Cornell.
- Francesco G. Ferraroli, The Italian Managerial Elite. Chicago.
- Cary O. Fisher, Revolution by Coup d'Etat: A Study of Modern Revolutionary Strategy and Tactics. Stanford.
- William Fleming, Judicial Review of Chancellor von Papen's Coup d'Etat in 1932. Columbia.
- Harold A. Fletcher, Jr., The Nationalization of Industry in France: A Study of the Political and Administrative Aspects of the Problem. Harvard.
- Edwin Fogelman, British Constitutionalism and the Welfare State. Princeton.
- Charles R. Foster, Postwar Changes in Structure and Ideology of the German Social Democratic Party. Ohio State.
- Evan Fotos, Land Tenure and Rural Organization in Turkey since 1923. American.
- Lloyd Freese, The United States and the Birth of the States. Chicago.
- Julian R. Friedman, The Impact of Democracy on Imperialism: A Study of the British Colonial Administrative Service. California (Berkeley).
- J. Richard Gaechter, Government Liability in Tort: A Comparative Study of the French and Anglo-American Systems. Cornell.
- Khalil A. Ghalayini, Organization and Administration of the Arab States: Selected Problems and the Problem of Arab Unity. American.
- I. Paul Giardina, The Economic Effects of the Disposition of the Italian Colonies upon the Economy of Italy. New York University.
- George Gondicas, Problems of Ecuadorian Economic Development Policy. Harvard.
- Jack Gourman, Germany: The Hitler State, 1933-1945. California (Los Angeles).
- Norman D. Greenwald, The Soviet Union in British Labour Party Politics, 1933-1941. Columbia.
- Gene Gregory, Local Administration and Organization in Vietnam. Cornell.
- John G. Grumm, Electoral Systems and Voting Behavior in Western Europe: A Quantitative Approach. California (Berkeley).
- Joel Guin, Labor Conditions in the Belgian Congo. Columbia.

- John R. Habicht*, Executive Legislation and Its Control in Switzerland. Ohio State.
- Darrell P. Hammer*, Russian Jurisprudence and Legal Reform before the 1917 Revolution. Columbia.
- Norman B. Hannah*, The Government of Thailand. Minnesota.
- Robert W. Harper*, Indonesia: The First Ten Years. American.
- Tetsuichi Hashimoto*, The Developments in Japanese Bureaucracy since World War II. Duke.
- John Hauptert*, The Swedish Foreign Policy During the Second World War. Syracuse.
- Laurin L. Henry*, International Technical Assistance in Public Administration. Chicago.
- Paul H. Hepper*, The Ideology of the Canadian Liberal Party, 1921-1951. Wisconsin.
- Alfred O. Hero*, The Contribution of Social Psychology and Cultural Anthropology to the Analysis of Nationality Characteristics. George Washington.
- James K. Herold*, The Role of the Trade Unions in Nationalized Industries—A Case Study: The National Union of Mine-workers. Harvard.
- H. Grant Hicks*, Chinese Nationalist Administration and Reform in Formosa. Columbia.
- Karl A. Hochschwender*, The Politics of Civil Service Reform in Western Germany. Yale.
- H. M. Holland*, Japanese Political Parties in the 1920's and 1930's. George Washington.
- Ernest V. Hollis, Jr.*, Police Systems of Imperial and Soviet Russia, 1700-1938. Columbia.
- Leonard J. Horwitz*, United States-Argentine Relations, 1943-1947, with Special Reference to the Braden-Peron Affair. Pennsylvania.
- John F. Hostie*, The Rise and Fall of the Rally of the French People. Stanford.
- George Howatt*, An Evaluation of Australian Experience with Preferential Voting and Proportional Representation. Pennsylvania.
- Kyaw Htun*, Problems of Industrial Development in Postwar Burma. Chicago.
- Earl Huyck*, Population Growth in South Asia: A Study in Differential Fertility in India and Ceylon. American.
- W. Carter Ide*, The Politics of French Labor. Harvard.
- Aroh Ifekwunigwe*, Problems of Federal Regionalism in Nigeria. New School.
- Conrad Joyner*, The Referenda Campaigns Over Extension of Australian Commonwealth Powers, 1911-1919. Florida.
- T. M. Joshi*, Economics of Public Finance in Bombay. Pennsylvania.
- Peter H. Juviler*, The Function of the Deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR, 1937-1955. Columbia.
- Wadie Jwaideh*, The Contemporary Kurdish Problem. Syracuse.
- Misha N. Kadick*, Soviet Use of Manpower. Princeton.
- Eli Kaminsky*, The French Government and the Communists since 1947. Harvard.
- Melville T. Kennedy, Jr.*, The Role of the Kuomintang in the Effort at Chinese Unification, 1928-1930. Harvard.
- Mehdi Kianfar*, Greater Syria. American.
- Robert A. Kilmarx*, History of the Soviet Air Force through World War II. Georgetown.
- Jerome B. King*, Agencies for the Coordination of the Ministries of the Fourth Republic. Stanford.
- Stephen P. Koff*, Pacifism and the British Labour Party. Columbia.
- Roy D. Laird*, The Evolution of Soviet Agrarian Policy in Theory and Practice. Washington (Seattle).
- Walter E. Langway*, The Public Service of Sweden. New York University.
- Harry Lazer*, Balfourian Conservatism: A Study in Political Ideas and Political Leadership. Columbia.
- Daniel C. Lazorchick*, The Issue of Nationalization within the British Labour Party. Stanford.
- Thomas J. Leonard*, The Reorganization of States in India. Southern California.
- Edgar Love*, British East Africa Colonial Policy: A Study of British Policy in Relation to Internal Political Tensions. Southern California.
- Ruth H. Lutz*, The Political Parties of Mexico. Pittsburgh.
- Charlie Lyons, Jr.*, The Political Impact of American Assistance in India. Ohio State.
- Thomas H. McLeod*, Dominion-Provincial Conferences as a Technique in Intergovernment Coordination. Harvard.
- Ruth T. McVey*, History of the Communist Party in Indonesia. Cornell.
- Ram C. Malhotra*, Administrative Reorganization of the Government of Nepal. American.
- Joseph F. Marsh*, British Departmental Decentralization: A Study of National Departmental Organization in the Southern (#6) Standard Region for the Administration of - Public Health and Welfare Services. Harvard.

- David K. Marvin, Development of Conceptual Analysis for Study of African Political Systems in Transition. Northwestern.
- Gordon P. Means, The Evolution of Self-Government in Malaya. Washington (Seattle).
- Frank A. Mesple, The Native Political Parties of French North Africa. Stanford.
- Edmund C. Mester, The Road to Political Democracy in Turkey. Maryland.
- Frank O. Miller, Minobe Tatsukichi—Exponent of Liberal Constitutionalism under the Meiji Constitution. California (Berkeley).
- Anie Mlikotin, The Political Development of Yugoslavia after 1945. Indiana.
- George R. Monsen, De Gaulle and the R.P.F.: Man, Movement and Mystique. Stanford.
- Glenn G. Morgan, The Soviet Procuracy. Virginia.
- Henry W. Morton, The Political Character of Soviet Sports. Columbia.
- Carl C. Moses, Judicial Control of the Constitutionality of the Laws in Cuba: A Study of Development in Theory and Practice. North Carolina.
- Steven Muller, The Prime Ministership in Canada. Cornell.
- Mirza Shikoh Muzaffar, The Constitutional Development in Pakistan: Its Problems and Its Prospects. New York University.
- P. N. Narayanan Nair, The Office of the District Collector in the Government of India. Cornell.
- V. K. S. Navar, An Analysis of the Major Influences in the Drafting of the Constitution of India. Yale.
- Robert Nave, Local Government in the United Provinces: India. Minnesota.
- Joe W. Neal, The State Governments of Northeastern Mexico: Coahuila, Nuevo Leon and Tamaulipas. Texas.
- Elechukwu N. Njaka, Igbo Political Institutions in Transition. California (Los Angeles).
- Stelios Papadakis, An Introduction to the Constitutional History of Modern Greece. Pennsylvania.
- H. Carroll Parish, Jr., The Development of Democratic Institutions in Thailand. California (Los Angeles).
- Amos Perlmutter, A Study of the Socialist Zionist Parties in Israel, 1897-1955. California (Berkeley).
- Lawrence L. Petersen, The Swedish Cooperatives and Politics. Notre Dame.
- Ivan M. Ponedel, The Development of English Labor Law: The Legal Position of the Laborer from 1849 to the Present. California (Berkeley).
- Robert W. Quick, French Political Attitudes toward European Integration, 1950-1954. California (Los Angeles).
- Herbert F. Quinn, The Nationalist Movement in Quebec since 1930: The Impact of Industrialization on Party Politics. Columbia.
- Gabriel Racs, Changes in the Economic Structure of Hungary under Communist Rule (1948-53) and their Sociological Implications. New York University.
- G. V. Sudhaker Rao, Public Personnel Management in Hyderabad State. Columbia.
- Alfred Rath, A Study of the Trust Territories in Africa Administered by the United Kingdom. Southern California.
- Gholam Hossein Razi, Religion and Politics in Iran: A Study of Social Dynamics. California (Berkeley).
- Enuga S. Reddy, Village Government in South India. Columbia.
- Ralph Retzlaff, The Praja Socialist Party. Cornell.
- Edward Richards, Soviet Control over International Communism. Iowa.
- Linford D. Riley, Jr., The Associated State Concept in Vietnam. California (Los Angeles).
- Leslie G. Rofo, The French Economic Council. Columbia.
- William L. Rofes, A Study of the Prime Minister in Great Britain. Columbia.
- Leo E. Rose, The Effect of Occupation Policy upon the Labor Movement in Japan. California (Berkeley).
- Judith Rosenberg, Role of the Malay Group in Postwar Political Development in Malaya. Cornell.
- Ernest E. Rossi, Italy and the Political Integration of Europe. Pittsburgh.
- Stanley Rothman, Conflict and Consensus in British Politics: The Interwar Years. Harvard.
- I. Milton Sacks, Communism and Nationalism in Vietnam. Yale.
- Salim Salim, Labor Problems in Four Arab Countries (Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan). Southern California.
- Will J. Selzer, The Trusteeship Council of the United Nations and Self-Government, with Particular Reference to British Administration in Africa. Pennsylvania.
- George A. Shanker, Constitutional Techniques to Avoid Undemocratic Majorities in Democratic Legislatures. New School.
- Mirsa M. Shikoh, The Constitutional Develop-

- ment in Pakistan: Its Problems and Prospects. New York University.
- Koji Shimatsu*, Methods of Communist Penetration in Japanese Labor Unions. Notre Dame.
- Charles E. Shumaker*, The Malayan Chinese Association. Ohio State.
- Josef Silverstein*, Asian Socialism. Cornell.
- Seymour Slessinger*, Nationality Doctrine as an Instrument of Soviet Foreign Policy. Boston University.
- Elmer W. Smith*, British Political Parties: The Role of the Annual Party Conference. Harvard.
- Olga C. Sonder*, Political Processes and Electoral Procedures under the Indian Republican Constitution put into Effect on January 26, 1950. Stanford.
- Herbert G. Sonthoff*, Robert von Mohl and the Problem of German Federalism. Harvard.
- James E. Soukup*, A Study of the Political Activities of Selected Japanese Labor Unions. Michigan.
- Frances L. Starmer*, The Philippine Agrarian Problem and Its Political Implications. California (Berkeley).
- Charles I. Stasny*, The Hungarian Communist Party: A Study of Ideology and Operational Development. Harvard.
- Richard G. Staveley*, Commerce Clause: Australia. Chicago.
- Hans Steinils*, Native Participation in Colonial Government in the French Territories in Africa. New School.
- Elonore Sterling*, Anti-Semitism in Germany (1800-1848). New School.
- Herbert Storing*, The British Ministry of Agriculture: A Study of Public Administration and Private Interests. Chicago.
- Melvin P. Straus*, The Control of Subversive Activities in Canada. Illinois.
- Ulrich A. Straus*, The Japanese House of Councillors: An Analytical Study. Michigan.
- Robert S. Sullivan*, The Ukraine and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—A Study in Soviet Policy and Ukrainian Nationalism. Chicago.
- John O. Sutter*, Indonesianisasi: Political Motivation in a Metamorphosing Economy. Cornell.
- Zoltan M. Szasz*, The Principal Foreign Policy Problems of the Federal Republic of Germany, 1949-55. Catholic University.
- Harold M. Thewlis*, Authoritarian Tendencies in the French Right, 1924-1940. Columbia.
- Jack E. Thomas*, The Organizational Structure and Administration of SHAPE. California (Berkeley).
- Robert F. Thompson*, The Retention and Rejection of Occupation Reforms in Japan after the Signing of the Peace Treaty. Minnesota.
- Hugh G. Thorburn*, The Politics of New Brunswick: A Study of the Growing Importance of the Acadian Population in the Political Life of the Province. Columbia.
- Thomas W. Thorsen*, The Administration of Medical and Health Services in Scandinavia. Utah.
- Roy Tollefson*, Political Thought in the Norwegian Labor Party (1917-1928). Chicago.
- Lois E. Torrence*, The Canadian Party System. American.
- Frank Untermeyer*, The Problem of Federation in the British Central African Colonies. Chicago.
- Margaret D. Urist*, Nationalism in Guatemala. Southern California.
- George Vlasak*, The Czech Political Tradition: A Study in the Formative Period. New York University.
- Fred von der Mehden*, The Influence of Islam on Politics in Indonesia, 1910-1941. California (Berkeley).
- Melvin Wachs*, Public Administration and Government in Thailand. Cornell.
- Harold Webb*, The Liberal Party in England: Theory and Practice. Brown.
- David Wilson*, Political Changes in Thailand. Cornell.
- Ernst F. Winter*, Austrian Agrarian Policy, 1945-1953. Columbia.
- Ernest Wohlgenuth*, The Politics of Labor in West Germany. Chicago.
- John Wortman*, The Socialist Unity Party in Soviet Germany: Problems of a Satellite Party. Minnesota.
- Manoog S. Young*, Russia and the Armenian Question since 1917. Clark.
- Phoebe Yu*, A Comparison of the British and American Personnel Systems. Chicago.
- Drago C. Zalar*, A Critical Study of Yugoslav Communism with Special Regard to the Present Stage. Georgetown.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION, POLITICS AND LAW

- Robert L. Abbey*, The World Health Organization: A Case Study in the Functional Approach toward International Organization. Harvard.
- Rajai Abou-Khadra*, UNESCO and the Arab Community. Indiana.

- Kenneth P. Adler, Can Adult Education Affect Foreign Policy? Chicago.
- Costas Alexandrides, United Nations Collective Action in Korea. New York University.
- Iwuoha E. Aligwekwe, American Policy towards Colonial Areas in Africa, 1933-1952. Ohio State.
- Nouri Al-Kadhim, Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities of International Organizations and Their Personnel. Southern California.
- Charles E. Allen, The Development and Significance of International Health Collaboration, 1792-1950. Stanford.
- Brent Allison, The Teaching of History for International Understanding. Chicago.
- Clovis Alice, The State of Israel in International Law. Catholic University.
- A. Aiman Altroggen, Power Politics in Sinkiang since 1860. Chicago.
- Abdul-Malik S. Al-Zaibag, Iraq Oil Politics in the Interwar Period. Columbia.
- Charles D. Ameringer, Never Abandon Panama! The Story of Philippe Bunau-Varilla and the Panama Canal. Fletcher School.
- Nan Louise G. Amstutz, The Establishment of an Indonesian Importing Class, 1950-53. Fletcher School.
- John A. Anderegg, The Marshall Plan: A Historic Reversal of United States Foreign Policy. Rutgers.
- Albert Androsky, Indian Policy in the United Nations. Chicago.
- Tranquílano B. Aquino, Philippine-American Trade Relations with Particular Reference to the Postwar Period. American.
- Arne Arnesen, The Scope and Practice of the Domestic Jurisdiction Clause in the United Nations Charter. Minnesota.
- Henry Austin, India's Position in and Policies with Respect to Asia during the Period 1947-1954. American.
- Hager W. Bach, The Position of the United States in the United Nations in Regard to Political Developments in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Chicago.
- William Baier, Concepts of National Interest in the 1840's. Brown.
- Bettie J. Baker, Toward an Understanding of International Regionalism. Michigan.
- Marjorie Murphy Baldwin, The Sterling Area and the European Payments Union, 1950-1953. Fletcher School.
- Edward Barber, The Evaluation of National Power. Georgetown.
- Sidney N. Barnett, Judicial Interpretations of the United Nations Charter in International and National Courts. Columbia.
- George Basich, The Effect of Russian Expansion on British Political Opinion, 1763-1856. Chicago.
- Victor Basiuk, Steel and the Changing Strengths of the Great Powers. Columbia.
- Leisl G. Baum, Preparation of the Agenda of the United Nations General Assembly. Columbia.
- Frederick O. Beattie III, The Utility of Theories of Aggression to the Understanding of International Relations. Chicago.
- Anne B. Beeler, The International Labour Organization: Important Developments in Its Structure, Function and Constitution since 1953. Cornell.
- M. Anwer Beg, The Attitude of United Nations Members towards the Use of Advisory Opinion Procedure. Columbia.
- John A. Bekker, The Soviet Union and World Organization. Chicago.
- Aaron Bell, The United States' Doctrine of the Just War. Chicago.
- Mary M. Benjamin, Fluctuations in the Prestige of the United States in France between 1950 and 1955. Columbia.
- Leonard Berkove, The Fund and GATT as Instruments for the Prevention of Economic Conflict in the Postwar World. Columbia.
- Sylvan Berman, Nazi-Soviet Relations, 1938-1941: A Study in Conflicts of Ideology and Expediency in International Relations. American.
- Stanislaw K. Bilinski, The Pattern of Soviet Russian Maritime Expansion after the Second World War: European "Satellite" Shipping (1945-1955). Georgetown.
- Helen A. Blackway, Ideas and Opinion Determinants in Foreign Policy Issues. Pennsylvania.
- Helen Bonnell, The International Economic Position of Iran. American.
- Robert J. Bower, The Russians in North America up to 1824. Chicago.
- James E. Boyce, The United States and the Integrity of China, 1898-1908. Fletcher School.
- Henderson B. Braddick, Italy and the United States: International Politics, 1937-1941. Washington (Seattle).
- Jan J. Brazda, The Korean Peace Negotiations. Florida.
- J. Cudd Brown, The United Nations Trust Territory in Tanganyika. American.
- Weldon J. Brown, The Political Aspects of Commercial Trade Controls in Central and South America. American.
- Jean E. Buckens, Land Tenure and Labor Con- ditions among Indigenous Peoples. Fletcher School.

- Philip H. Burch*, Pakistan's Policy in the United Nations. Rutgers.
- William S. Caldwell*, The Organization and Operation of American Informational and Propaganda Activities in Postwar Italy. Minnesota.
- Russell B. Capelle*, The M.R.P. and French Foreign Policy. Boston University.
- George A. Carroll*, American Policy Concerning Control of Atomic Energy. Fletcher School.
- Webster C. Cash*, A Comparative Study of the Specialized Agencies in the United Nations: The Relation of Their Organizational Forms. Chicago.
- Alphonso Castagno*, Regional Influences in Italian Foreign Policy. Columbia.
- Nancy G. Cattell*, Soviet Policy and the German Revolution of 1918-19. Columbia.
- Mangalam E. Chacko*, Visiting Missions of the United Nations Trusteeship System. New York University.
- Harry M. Chase*, Anglo-American Relations, 1945-Present. Syracuse.
- Chu Pei Chen*, The Diplomatic Services of Major Powers. New York University.
- Shin-chai Chen*, Study of the Agenda of the Security Council. New York University.
- Yu-Ching Chen*, American Policy and the Collapse of the Nationalist China. New York University.
- Tao Cheng*, The Protection of Persons and Property: Evolution of Clauses in Bilateral Treaties. Columbia.
- H. Dicken Cherry*, Mainsprings of Nationalism in Southeast Asia. Chicago.
- Jack Chia*, The Secretary-General of the United Nations: Office and Powers. Fordham.
- Chieh Yue Chiang*, The Concept and Development of International Responsibility for Colonial Administration. Washington (Seattle).
- Chia-Mour Chung*, Personnel Management in the Secretariat of the United Nations. New York University.
- Isaac Ciechanowicz*, Soviet Views of International Law as Reflected in Their United Nations Pronouncements. New York University.
- William H. Clark*, The Work of the United Nations Commissions for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes. New York University.
- Robert E. Clute*, The International Legal Status of Austria, 1938-1955. Duke.
- George C. Constantinides*, The United States and Greece, 1940-47: A Study in Foreign Policy. Harvard.
- Ralph E. Cook*, The United States and the Armenian Question, 1895-1925. Fletcher School.
- Brownlee S. Corrin*, The United Nations, the United States and the U.S.S.R. from Dumbarton Oaks to Korea: A Study in Controversy and Cooperation. Stanford.
- Morton H. Cowden*, Soviet and Comintern Policy toward the British Labor Movement, 1917-26. Columbia.
- Richard F. Crabbs*, Administrative Aspects of Technical Assistance. Stanford.
- Martin G. Cramer*, T.C.A. Program in India. Fletcher School.
- Jackson H. Crowell*, Central American Relations of the United States, 1869-1877. Fletcher School.
- Dorothy Culbertson*, A Supra-National Authority to Deal with Aggression: Critical Analysis of Private Proposals since 1945. Columbia.
- Frank J. Curtis, Jr.*, The Role of Argentina in the United Nations. Pennsylvania.
- Zein Dabbagh*, Method and Procedure of Concluding Treaties in Saudi Arabia in the Light of the Rules of International Law. Cornell.
- William B. Dale*, The Balance of Payments of the Principal Middle East Countries: Recent Developments and Prospects. Fletcher School.
- William M. David, Jr.*, U. S. Policy toward the Baltic States, 1917-1922. Columbia.
- Margaret M. Davics*, The Role of the American Trade Union Representatives in the Aid-to-Greece Program. Washington (Seattle).
- Grant R. Davy*, Canadian Policy on Disarmament, 1945-55. Fletcher School.
- Brewster C. Denny*, Analysis of Official Soviet Domestic Interpretation of U.S. Foreign Policy, 1952-1956, with Emphasis on U.S. Foreign Policy in the United Nations. Fletcher School.
- Anton DePorte*, The European Policy of France, 1944-1947. Chicago.
- Elmer A. DeShazo*, The Pacific Settlement of Disputes in the Organization of American States. Indiana.
- Francois M. Dickman*, The Economic Foreign Policy of the United States in Western Europe from 1945 to 1948. Fletcher School.
- Winston Dindial*, The Making of New Inter-

- national Law in the United Nations. New York University.
- Joseph J. R. Dobrich, The European Political Community: A Political-Legal Study. New School.
- Joseph F. Dolecki, Polish Foreign Policy, 1932-1945. New York University.
- Arthur E. Dowell, Appeasement and Conciliation in Global Crises, 1938-1948. Chicago.
- Margaret W. Dower, The International Thinking of George Bernard Shaw. Boston University.
- Edward Drake, The Soviet Alliance System. New York University.
- Martin Dubin, The Development of the Concept of Collective Security in the American Peace Movement 1899-1916. Indiana.
- William B. Dunn, Franco-British Relations in Southeast Asia, 1863-1904. Chicago.
- Marvin L. Durham, The American Expansionist Movement in Mexico, 1848-1862. Fletcher School.
- Maria Perry Eaves, Prelude to War in Eastern Europe: Rumania and the Powers, 1931-1941. Columbia.
- Morris O. Edwards, An Administrative Evaluation of Military Government in Germany during and after World War II. Georgetown.
- John Eldridge, American Public Opinion and the Korean War. Johns Hopkins.
- Harold E. Engle, The Place of International Administration in the Structure of International Politics: A Critical Study of "Functionalism". Columbia.
- Elieser Erel, Truce Supervision by the United Nations. Fletcher School.
- Mohsen S. Esfandiary, The Role of the General Assembly in Dealing with Threats to the Peace, Breaches of the Peace and Acts of Aggression. Columbia.
- Milton Feder, Great Power Relations in the Origin and Development of the Kingdom of Lybia. Michigan.
- Oleh S. Fedyshyn, German Plans in the East, 1917-1918, with Special Attention to Ukraine and the Crimea. Columbia.
- Edmund S. Finegold, The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations. Harvard.
- Lawrence S. Finkelstein, Indonesia and the United States. Columbia.
- Marina Salvin Finkelstein, The Soviet Challenge in the Balkans. Columbia.
- Henry W. Forbes, Disarmament in the Twentieth Century: A Study of Proposed Methods. Georgetown.
- Arthur Frank, The Wool-Growers and Their Struggle for Political and Economic Security. Utah.
- Robert W. Frase, Proposals for the International Control of Atomic Energy. Harvard.
- C. Dale Fuller, The Soviet Union's Concept of the League of Nations as an Instrumentality for the Maintenance of Peace, 1934-1939. Columbia.
- Richard F. Gardner, The Relations of the United States and Spain from 1898 to 1948. Fletcher School.
- Frederick Gareau, American Policy toward German Industrial Disarmament, 1943-1950. American.
- Leslie M. Gellert, Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy as a Problem of International Organization. Columbia.
- Charles Gendreau, Agricultural Settlement and Colonization in Latin American National Development Programs. Minnesota.
- Eggert W. Giere, The Separation of Powers and the Making of Foreign Policy: Germany, A Case Study 1942-1947. Washington (Seattle).
- Shirley Gifford, United States' Relations with Morocco from 1778 to 1956. Fletcher School.
- Joan Gillespie, The Balance of Power Concept in American Far Eastern Policy, 1900-1955. Fletcher School.
- Meredith Gilpatrick, Strategy of the Western Front, 1871-1914. Chicago.
- Alvin B. Glaser, The Development of Regionalism within the United Nations. New York University.
- David Golding, The United States Foreign Policy in Palestine-Israel under the Truman Administration. New York University.
- Elliott R. Goodman, The Soviet Design for a World State. Columbia.
- Leon Gordenker, The United Nations Commission in Korea, 1947-1950. Columbia.
- Marjorie H. Gordon, Development of American Policy for the Occupation of Japan, 1941-1945. Indiana.
- Robert C. Gordon, The North Atlantic Treaty Organization: A Study in Comparative International Organization. California (Berkeley).
- Budda V. Govindaraj, The Role of India in the Settlement of Disputes within the United Nations. Michigan.
- Angelina Grammatico, The United Nations and the Development of Human Rights. New York University.
- Morris A. Greene, The Transfer of a Func- tioning International Organization from One Site to Another. American.

- Robert W. Gregg, International Narcotics Control under the Aegis of the United Nations. Cornell.
- Frances A. Gulick, Agrarian Problems in Indonesia. Fletcher School.
- Jamal Haddad, The Soviet-Iranian Treaty of 1921. New York University.
- Ahmad Haffar, The Middle East as an Area of International Conflict. Utah.
- Thomas H. Handy, Russia and Postwar Anglo-American Relations. Texas.
- John Hanessian, Jr., The Question of Western European Integration. Syracuse.
- Maurice Harari, Boundaries in the Near and Middle East: A Political Analysis. Columbia.
- Jane W. Harbaugh, Origins and Early Implementation of the Balfour Declaration: An Analysis of Development of British and American Policy towards the Establishment of a Jewish Homeland in Palestine, 1914-1919. Fletcher School.
- Bruce B. Harlow, Determinants in International Relations: An Inquiry into Fundamentals. Columbia.
- Takeshi Haruki, Japanese Foreign Policy under Matsuoka. Southern California.
- Bartlett Harvey, Foreign Policy and Public Opinion: The Shift in Policy toward the German Economy, 1945-48. Harvard.
- Malcolm Hay, Jr., British Opinion of Nazi Germany, 1933-1939. American.
- Joseph A. Hearst, American Policy in Occupied Italy. Columbia.
- Charles H. Heimsath, India's Participation in the Korean War and Its Settlement. Yale.
- William A. Helseth, The Turkish Aid Program, 1947: A Study in United States Foreign Policy. Fletcher School.
- Maurice Héroux, Canadian Outlooks on Foreign Policy Matters, 1914-1923. Georgetown.
- Robert W. Herrick, Russia's Strategy at the Turkish Straits, 1907-1917. Columbia.
- Wilhelm G. Hertz, The Swiss Conception of International Law. Columbia.
- Abraham M. Hirsch, International Rivers in the Middle East: A Legal and Political Analysis. Columbia.
- Wilbur W. Hitchcock, Defense of National Honor as Justification for Military Measures. Pennsylvania.
- Conrad P. Homberger, A Theory of International Relations. Columbia.
- Robert D. Hopkirk, Toward More Effective Coordination of United Nations Economic and Social Activity. New York University.
- Joseph E. Hoskins, The United Nations and World Disarmament. Pennsylvania State.
- Stephen T. Hosmer, The 1955 Indonesian General Elections in Java. Yale.
- Thomas Hovet, Jr., The General Assembly of the United Nations: An Analysis of the Establishment and Development of Its Organization and Procedures. New York University.
- Edwin C. Hoyt, Jr., The Unanimity Rule in the Revision of Treaties: A Reexamination. Columbia.
- Chuntu Hsueh, Huang Hsing and the Chinese Revolution. Columbia.
- Robert P. Huff, Diplomatic Relations between Spain and the United States, 1945-1953. Stanford.
- Richard Jaffe, Japanese Aggression in Southeast Asia, 1938-1941. Chicago.
- Louis C. James, Relations of the North American Railroads: A Study in International Cooperation of the Railroads of Canada, Mexico and the United States. Columbia.
- Abdulfattah Jandali, U. N. Efforts to Set Standards for National Independence. Wisconsin.
- Michael Jaworskyj, Soviet Critique of Western Legal Philosophy. Johns Hopkins.
- Barbara G. Johnson, French Foreign Policy and International Organization. Johns Hopkins.
- Raymond Van Kirk Johnson, Development and Administration of the International Broadcasting Program of the United States. Stanford.
- Doris W. Jones, The First Moroccan Crisis and the Foreign Policy of Theodore Roosevelt. Fletcher School.
- Catherine S. Kadragic, Role of the League of Nations in the Pacific Settlement of Political Disputes in the Balkans. Columbia.
- Ihor Kamenetsky, German Lebensraum Policy in Eastern Europe during World War II. Illinois.
- Subbiah Kannappan, The Indian Trade Union Movement: An Account and an Analysis. Fletcher School.
- Mark Karp, The Economic Development of Somaliland under the Trusteeship. Fletcher School.
- Harry R. Keller, Soviet Doctrine and Practice Concerning the Law of Territorial Waters. American.

- Pierre B. Keller*, American Defense Policy in Europe, 1947-1951: Official Views and Congressional Attitudes. Yale.
- William B. Kelly, Jr.*, The 1927 Convention on the Abolition of Import and Export Prohibitions and Restrictions: Its Significance in United States Commercial Policy. Fletcher School.
- Richard J. Kempe*, United States Diplomacy in East-West Trade: A Study in Economic-Political Strategy. New York University.
- Jesse C. Kennedy*, American Foreign Policy in China, 1937-1950: An Analysis of Why It Failed. Chicago.
- Nancy Jane Kenney*, The Economic Ideas of Gandhi and Indian Economic Planning. Fletcher School.
- Cyrus H. Khabiri*, Position of Iran in Contemporary World Affairs. American.
- Amir K. Khodayar*, Iranian Participation in the Specialized Agencies. New York University.
- Chonghan Kim*, Konoye Fumimaro and Japanese Foreign Policy: 1937-1941. Indiana.
- Gottfried-Karl Kindermann*, Chiang Kai-Shek and the Causes for the Disintegration of the First Sino-Soviet Entente. Chicago.
- John W. Kizler*, Non-Self-Executing Treaties and Congressional Action. George Washington.
- Mary Klachko*, Anglo-American Naval Competition, 1918-1921. Columbia.
- George Kline*, United States Relations with Yugoslavia since World War II. Illinois.
- Robert F. Kobee*, The Personnel Problems of the United Nations Secretariat: The Study of a Career Service. Fletcher School.
- Ross Y. Koen*, The China Lobby and the Formulation of American Foreign Policy, 1945-1951. Florida.
- Seldon M. Kruger*, Major British Foreign Policies in the United Nations, 1945-1955. Rutgers.
- Shiwaram Kshirsager*, Development of Relations between India and the United States since 1947. American.
- Vukan Kuic*, The Deviations of Titoism from Orthodox Bolshevik Doctrine. Chicago.
- Theodore Kyriak*, Austria, 1945-1955: Soviet Interferences. Southern California.
- Max Landau*, Political and Legal Aspects of Discrimination with Special Reference to North American Investments in some Latin American Countries. New York University.
- Peter W. Lande*, The Serious Injury Concept in Recent United States Tariff Policy. Fletcher School.
- Ernest D. Lehman*, Business Attitudes toward American Foreign Policy: 1943-1955. Chicago.
- Bruce LeMessurier*, The United States Senate and America's Latin American Policy, 1938-50. Chicago.
- Sigrid Leube*, The Position of Non-Member States with Regard to International Organizations: The League of Nations and the United Nations. New York University.
- Jonathan Levin*, A Theory of Export Economies: Case Studies of Peruvian Guano and Burmese Rice. Fletcher School.
- Georgia B. Levy*, The Northern Council. Washington (Seattle).
- Jung-shun Lin*, Popular Movement of Taisho Era Japan, 1912-1926. Pennsylvania.
- Paul Ta-Kuang Lin*, Problems in the Policy of the British Commonwealth toward the Japanese Empire, 1921-1941. Harvard.
- Arthur W. Lindsley*, The Problem of Control over Current Methods of Conflict between Nations. New York University.
- Eugene E. Lindstrom*, The Nordic Council. Stanford.
- Seward Ling*, The Administrative Tribunal at the United Nations. New York University.
- Helen C. Low*, The Changed Role of Foreign Capital in India. Fletcher School.
- Stephen Low*, Population Redistribution under Colonial Government: American Experience in the Philippine Islands. Fletcher School.
- Kun-hsi Lu*, From the Marco Polo Bridge to Pearl Harbor, 1937-1941: Japan's Entry into the Second World War. Columbia.
- Eugene M. Lyons*, The Politics of Korean Reconstruction: A Case Study of the Impact of American Politics on the Operations of an International Agency. Columbia.
- Stuart H. McIntyre*, Legal Effect of War on Treaties. Columbia.
- Joseph C. McKenna, S. J.*, Diplomatic Protest as an Instrument of United States Foreign Policy. Yale.
- Charles B. McLane*, Soviet Policy towards the Chinese Communists, 1935-1949. Columbia.
- Charles H. McLaughlin*, Principles of Treaty Interpretation. Columbia.
- Robert L. McNeill*, United States Policy toward Self-Government for Puerto Rico, 1898-1952. Fletcher School.
- John MacDonald*, Reservations to Multilateral Treaties. Cornell.
- Ronald S. MacLean*, British Top-Level Personal Diplomacy in Two Wartime Coalitions: A Comparison. Fletcher School.

- Raymond D. Mack*, The Development of the Inter-American Regional System: The Contribution of the Jurists. Indiana.
- Norman Mackie, Jr.*, France's Security Policy toward Germany, 1944-1947. Columbia.
- James W. Mahoney*, India in the Commonwealth. Fletcher School.
- Hans Mair*, The Position of the Austrian Republic in International Law. Johns Hopkins.
- George Malley*, The Legal Effects of General Assembly Resolutions. Cornell.
- Alfredo Manat*, The Relations of the United States and the Philippines since the Coming into Effect of the Commonwealth Act, 1935-1950. Chicago.
- Melvin M. Marcus*, Voting Procedure in the Practice of the Security Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations. Michigan.
- D. Bruce Marshall*, The Role of the Assembly of the French Union. Yale.
- Gerald Maryanov*, Domestic Jurisdiction in the United Nations. Indiana.
- A. Warren Metzner*, Provisional Measures in United Nations Practice. New York University.
- Everett K. Melby*, The Refugees in Western Germany. Chicago.
- Stanley Millet*, The Principles of Majority Rule and International Organization. New School.
- Carol C. Moor*, Positions of Governments at the United Nations Conference on International Organization on Problems Inherent in an International Security Organization. New York University.
- Andrew J. Morse*, An Analysis of British Opinion in Reaction to the American Initiative during the Postwar Years. Chicago.
- Leo J. Moser*, The Human Rights Program of the United Nations, 1945-1955. Southern California.
- Norman W. Mosher*, State Trading and Great Britain: A Case Study of State Trading, Methods of Its Implementation, the Effects on the National Economy and Its Relation to Multilateral Trade. Fletcher School.
- Ezzeldin Moustafa*, British Participation in European Organizations. Minnesota.
- A. Glenn Mower*, The Committee System of the United Nations General Assembly. Pennsylvania State.
- Daniel P. Moynihan*, United States and the International Labor Organization. Fletcher School.
- Robert J. Myers*, The Political Philosophy of Japan's Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere. Chicago.
- Charles W. Naas*, The Development of a Constitution for Pakistan. Fletcher School.
- Robert I. Neiman*, The Anschluss: A Study of Austrian-German Relations. New York University.
- Harold I. Nelson*, The Making of the German Territorial Settlement, 1919. Columbia.
- Inez Nelson*, The Security of Small States. Chicago.
- Norman W. Nelson*, Subsidies to Producers as a Substitute for Tariffs. Fletcher School.
- Albert Nestel*, International Administration of the Korean Aid Program. American.
- Joseph L. Nogee*, The Soviet Union, the United Nations and Disarmament. Yale.
- Khalil A. Norsir*, The Foreign Policy of Pakistan and Pan-Islamism. American.
- Bernard Norwood*, United States Government Procurement Abroad. Fletcher School.
- Leon Novar*, Great Power Conflicts in Iran, 1920-21 and 1943-47: A Comparison. Chicago.
- Donald E. Nuechterlein*, The Foreign Policy of Iceland, 1939-1951. Michigan.
- Grady Nunn*, Coordination of U.N. and other American Agencies. New York University.
- James F. O'Brien*, The London Economic Conference of 1933. Georgetown.
- Irwin Oder*, The United States and the Palestine Mandate, 1920-1948. Columbia.
- Eric H. Olson*, The New Colonial Administration of West Africa. Syracuse.
- Gene D. Overstreet*, The Soviet View of India and Communist Policy in India: A Study of Strategy and Tactics. Columbia.
- Richard Owen*, Western European Federation: A Study of the Efforts, Problems, and Prospects in Economic, Political and Social Integration. Southern California.
- Robert von Pagenhardt*, The Executive Office and Powers of the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Stanford.
- Alexander A. Palamiotis*, The Legal Status of Greece in Post-War International Relations. Utah.
- Frank Parrella*, European Recovery Program vs. Communism in Italy, 1948-1950. Georgetown.
- R. V. Patwardhan*, Possible Development of a Regional System in South East Asia. New York University.
- DeVere E. Pentony*, The Marshall Plan: Declared Objectives and Apparent Results. Iowa.
- Oscar Perlmutter*, The Foreign Policy of Dean Acheson: A Case Study in the Conduct of Foreign Relations in a Democracy. Chicago.

- Joseph A. Peters*, Nationality Policy in Soviet Central Asia, 1928-1941. Pennsylvania.
- Robert J. Peterson*, The Status of Manchuria since 1931. Chicago.
- Tobias R. Philbin*, The Soviet Citizens' Picture of International Affairs—1953: A Study of the Official Soviet View of International Affairs as Presented to the Soviet Citizen by the Soviet Press. Georgetown.
- Harry E. Pierson*, The Significance of Sea Power in the Politico-Economic Affairs of the Countries of the Western Pacific Areas. American.
- Emil R. Platig*, The Philosophy of International Relations of John Foster Dulles. Chicago.
- Adamantia Pollis*, The Effects of Great Power Policy on Greek Nationalism. Johns Hopkins.
- John A. Power*, Financing of the United Nations and Its Specialized Agencies. Catholic University.
- John W. Price*, Anglo-French Attitudes in the Council of Europe. Michigan.
- Fahim I. Qubain*, The Impact of the Petroleum Industry in Iraq, Bahrain, and Kuwait: A Case Study. Wisconsin.
- Willard Range*, Franklin Roosevelt's Theory of International Relations. North Carolina.
- Charles A. Raith*, The United Nations as Viewed by American Isolationists and Internationalists. Pennsylvania.
- Abdul J. Rawi*, The Termination of the Lebanese Mandate and its Aftermath. American.
- Beulah B. Reifel*, Recent Developments in International Law Regarding Territorial Waters. American.
- Vladimir Reisky-Dubnic*, A Study of Propaganda Methods in Czechoslovakia Aiming for Closer Integration with the Soviet Union. Chicago.
- Arthur H. Rice*, Some International Legal Aspects of European Integration. American.
- George H. Ried*, Administration of an International Police Force. Syracuse.
- Najmuddin Rifai*, Libya—Road to Independence. Columbia.
- Alfred S. Rigsbee*, A Study of Functional International Organization in Its Administrative Aspect. Indiana.
- Walter L. Riley*, An Analysis of the Law of the International Military Tribunal of the Far East. Washington (Seattle).
- Dorothy Roberts*, The Role of Partisanship in the Conduct of the Foreign Relations of the United States. Chicago.
- Dorothy Robins*, The Work of Non-governmental organizations between Dumbarton Oaks and San Francisco. New York University.
- Leonard I. Robock*, The Influence of the American Federation of Labor on American Foreign Policy, 1948-1955. Columbia.
- Berta Rodriguez*, International Criminal Jurisdiction and Genocide. Cornell.
- John M. Rogers*, The International Authority for the Ruhr, 1948-1952. American.
- George K. Romoser*, Theories of Political Resistance: Germany, 1933-1945. Chicago.
- Neale Ronning*, Contribution of the Organization of American States to Peaceful Settlement of Disputes in the Western Hemisphere. Minnesota.
- Donald Rothchild*, Federalism in British Tropical Africa: The Struggle for Regional Integration. Johns Hopkins.
- H. S. Royce, Jr.*, The British Withdrawal from Malaya. Columbia.
- Paul Rupprecht*, The International Position of Hungary in the U.S. Foreign Policy, 1933-1947. Minnesota.
- Donald E. Russell*, Revolution in China: A Study in American Reactions. Chicago.
- Edwin H. Rutkowski*, The Governmental Process Providing for the National Defense, as Observed in Pre-World War II Defense Aviation Politics. Columbia.
- Frank W. Ryan*, Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy: Political, Economic and Social Implications. New York University.
- Wallace Safford*, Psychological Operations in International Relations. American.
- Ralph Sanders*, Nuclear Electrification in Latin-America—Its Political, Social and International Implications. Georgetown.
- Isamu Sato*, The Impact of International Relations upon the Government and Politics of Japan. Chicago.
- Charles E. Savage*, A Study into the Obligatory Character of Resolutions Passed by the Principal Organs of the League of Nations and the United Nations. Florida.
- Theresa Schmats*, The Status of Dependent Areas in International Organizations in the Field of Communications. Columbia.
- Andrew J. Schwartz*, American Foreign Policy and the Russo-Finnish War, 1939-1944. Fletcher School.
- Donald H. Scott*, The Cultural Relations Program of the United States in Mexico. Southern California.
- Rosa A. Segarra*, South American Attitude toward the Continental Shelf. Cornell.

- Charles B. Selak, Jr., Reservations to Multilateral Treaties. Columbia.
- Otis Shao, American China Policy in 1937. Brown.
- Ursula H. Shears, The Social Democratic Party of Germany: Friend or Foe of European Unity. Fletcher School.
- Valentine Sherring, A Critical Study of India's Participation in the U.N. Operations. American.
- Barbara J. Shockley, The Creation of a European Nationality. Pennsylvania.
- Melvin Silverman, Records Management for an International Organization. New York University.
- William Simonson, Nazi Infiltration in South America, 1933-1945. Fletcher School.
- Herman T. Skofield, Private Foreign Investment. Fletcher School.
- Glenn Snyder, Civil-Military Perspectives on Raw Materials Security Policy. Columbia.
- James L. Snyder, Japanese Organization in Manchuria, 1931-1937. Yale.
- James W. Spain, The Northwest Frontier: Political Problems of a Borderland. Columbia.
- Gordon L. Spangler, Conflicts in United States Agricultural and Trade Policies, 1933-1955. Fletcher School.
- George S. Springsteen, The British Navigation Laws: The Influence of Foreign Nations upon Their Modification and Repeal, 1783-1849: A Study in Commercial Policy. Fletcher School.
- George Stambuk, American Bases Abroad: A New Pattern in International Relations. Indiana.
- Emil Starr, The British Labour Party and the Soviet Union. Chicago.
- Edward W. Steele, Military Images of International Politics. Princeton.
- David J. Steinberg, British Policies and Administration Relating to the Economic Development of the Sterling Area 1945 to 1955. Harvard.
- David B. Stenzel, Nazi Foreign Policy from Munich to War (Sept. 1938-Sept. 1939). California (Berkeley).
- Peter Stercho, The Carpatho-Ukraine in World Affairs, 1938-1940. Notre Dame.
- Elizabeth I. Sterenberg, The Role of Forced Labor in Economic Development. Chicago.
- Charles Stermer, Early Relations between the Spanish Philippines and China. Chicago.
- Herman A. Stern, The Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization. New York University.
- Albert C. Stillson, The Use of Military Force in Peace by the United States Government: Civilian and Military Attitudes toward the Use of Military Force in Peace and Their Application. Columbia.
- Jonathan D. Stoddart, The Influence of Immigrant Groups on United States Foreign Policy. Fletcher School.
- George S. Sugden, Influence of the Submarine on United States Foreign Policy. Fletcher School.
- Frank Tachau, The Kemalist Revolution. Chicago.
- Howard J. Taubenfeld, Economic Sanctions: An Appraisal and Case Study. Columbia.
- Loren E. Tesdell, The Middle East and Technical Cooperation. Stanford.
- Joseph M. Thom, The International Legal Status of the Refugee. Washington (St. Louis).
- William W. Thomas, Francis Lieber and the International Law of Land Warfare. North Carolina.
- Donal Thomson, The Geneva Convention of 1949 Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. American.
- Clarence E. Thurber, Contributions of the State of California to the Point Four Program. Stanford.
- Leif Tobiasson, Access to United Nations. New York University.
- Donald R. Toussaint, The French Contribution to the Political Unification of Europe, 1944-1953. Stanford.
- William J. Trainor, Public Opinion and Foreign Policy. Harvard.
- Jan F. Triska, Totalitarians in International Organization: A Developmental Construct. Harvard.
- Erwin W. Umbach, A Study of the Foreign Relations of the United States with Austria. Fletcher School.
- Carlos A. Urrutia, The Right of Diplomatic Asylum. American.
- Juliane von K. Valentin, German-Japanese Relations in the Period between the Two World Wars. Pennsylvania.
- Teimoor Vaziri, The Economic Relations of Iran and America since World War II. New York University.
- G. Hans Voelkel, Discrimination Against Aliens in International Law. Columbia.
- Walter E. Volkmer, The Postwar Structure and Policies of the German Christian Democratic Party. Rutgers.
- Kalman Von Voros, The Origins of the Munich Pact of 1938. Georgetown.

- David Warren*, Munitions, Production and Export in Relation to American Foreign Policy, 1914-1936. Fletcher School.
- Maurice Waters*, The Special Foreign Policy Agent. Chicago.
- Paul Weaver*, Soviet Interference in the Government of Iran, 1941-1951. American.
- James L. Weber*, The Development of the Foreign Policy Objectives of the British Labor Party, 1919-1939. Fletcher School.
- Melvin A. Weightman*, The Present Status of the Concept of Self-Defense in International Law. Pennsylvania.
- Guenter Weissberg*, The International Personality of Entities other than Independent States. Columbia.
- Alan F. Westin*, American Diplomatic Relations with the Vatican. Harvard.
- Harold B. Whiteman*, Norman H. Davis and the Functional Approach to Collective Security. Yale.
- Donald J. Whitney*, Developments in the Field of International Law in the U. N. American.
- Robert Wilfong*, UNRRA and Displaced Persons. Harvard.
- Eric Willens*, The American Conduct of the War in Indochina, 1953-1954: A Study of Coalition Warfare Problems. Georgetown.
- Haydn Williams*, Air Power and American Foreign Policy: The Berlin Air Lift. Fletcher School.
- Maurice J. Williams*, The Problem of Economic Integration in Western Europe. Chicago.
- Martin W. Wilmington*, Regional Cooperation for Supply and Development in the Middle East during World War II (The Middle East Supply Center). New York University.
- Ann R. Wilner*, Labor and Culture in Indonesia. Chicago.
- Kurt Wimer*, United States Executive-Legislative Tensions in Relation to the League of Nations Covenant and the United Nations Charter. New York University.
- Harry Winkler*, The Political Orientation of Israel in the Struggle between East and West. Chicago.
- Gregory B. Wolfe*, The Montevideo Conference, 1933: Reactions of the North and South American Press to Foreign Policy of the United States. Fletcher School.
- Klaus Wolff*, Pioneer Entrepreneurs in Industry: A Study in the Sociology of Industrialization. Chicago.
- Claude Wolts*, Bloc Action in the United Nations. New York University.
- Wah Wong*, The Problem of "Self-Determination" in the United Nations. New York University.
- Philip M. Woo*, Korean Reconstruction: A Comparative Case Study of United Nations Efforts in Korea and Thailand. New York University.
- Herbert H. Wood, Jr.*, International Supervision of Colonial Administrative Unions. Columbia.
- Theodore P. Wright, Jr.*, American Support of Free Elections Abroad. Yale.
- David Wurfel*, Relationship between Political Power and Landlordism in the Philippines. Cornell.
- Laurence Wyatt*, Theory and Practice of the World Health Organization. Minnesota.
- Agnes Hwun-giat Yao*, Comparison of Mandates and Trusteeship. Chicago.
- Takehito Yoshihashi*, The Background of the Manchurian Crisis: A Study of the Rise of the Japanese Military. Yale.
- Tien-Cheng Young*, International Civil Service: Principles and Problems. New York University.
- Bahman Zand*, The British and Russian Policies in Persia between 1907 and 1927. Fordham.
- Feraidoon Zandford*, International River Problems of Iran. New York University.
- Rev. Irwin W. Zinger*, Korea as a Test of the Effectiveness and Validity of the Concept of Collective Security. Pennsylvania.

II. DISSERTATIONS COMPLETED SINCE THE LAST LISTING

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY AND PSYCHOLOGY

- Murray Abend*; B.A., Alabama, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Syracuse, 1955. Hitler's Racial Theory and Practice. Syracuse.
- Eugene Brien*; M.A., Fordham, 1948; Ph.D. ibid., 1956. An Ethical and Juridical Approach to the Suarezian Notion of Sovereignty. Fordham.
- Francis M. Carney*; A.B., Southern California, 1948; M.A., Stanford, 1950; Ph.D., California (Los Angeles), 1956. Concepts of - Political Representation in the United States Today. California (Los Angeles).

- Richard H. Cox; B.S., Northwestern, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., Chicago, 1955. Locke's Theory of International Relations. Chicago.
- Robert L. Gaudino; B.A., California (Los Angeles), 1950; M.A., Chicago, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Public Rights and the Private Duty of Higher Education: An Inquiry Based on Contemporary Understandings of Academic Freedom. Chicago.
- Andrew Hacker; B.A., Amherst, 1951; B.A., Oxford, 1953; Ph.D., Princeton, 1955. The Politics of Psychotherapy: A Reappraisal of the Liberal View of Man. Princeton.
- Yorguy Hakim; Law Degree, Faculty of Law, Damascus, 1941; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1956. Background and Development of the Qadrite Doctrine until the Fall of the Umayyad Dynasty. Georgetown.
- Terry Hoy; A.B., South Dakota, 1948; M.A., Washington, 1950; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1956. Theories of the Exercise of Suffrage in the United States: A Critical Analysis. California (Berkeley).
- Dollena Joy Humes; A.B., California (Berkeley), 1950; M.A., Nebraska, 1951; Ph.D., Syracuse, 1956. Oswald Garrison Villard: A Study in American Liberalism. Syracuse.
- James R. Jensen; B.A., Iowa, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Conservatism in Transition: The Socio-Economic Theories of Fortune and Its Editors (1930-1952). Iowa.
- Nick A. Masters; B.A., Southern Illinois, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Wisconsin, 1955. Father Coughlin and Social Justice: A Case Study of a Social Movement. Wisconsin.
- J. Keith Melville; B.A., Utah, 1947; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1949; Ph.D., Utah, 1956. The Political Ideas of Brigham Young. Utah.
- David W. Minar; A.B., Reed College, 1949; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Knowledge, Opinion, and Politics: Public Opinion as an Ingredient in Political Theory. California (Berkeley).
- Simon Noveck; A.B., Yeshiva, 1936; Ph.D., Columbia, 1955. History of the Democratic Idea in the United States, 1774-1801. Columbia.
- F. Oladipo Onipede; A.B., Syracuse, 1950; A.M., Columbia, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Nigerian Plural Society: Political and Constitutional Development, 1870-1954. Columbia.
- Ivan W. Parkins; B.S., United States Naval Academy, 1943; M.A., Chicago, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. John Dewey: Freedom as Intellectual Participation. Chicago.
- John C. Rensenbrink; B.A., Calvin College, 1950; M.A., Michigan, 1951; Ph.D., Chicago, 1956. Technology and Utopia: Political Claims of Moral Freedom. Chicago.
- Vance L. Shiflett; A.B., George Washington, 1938; M.A., ibid., 1940; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1956. Jeremy Bentham: An Appraisal of his Political Ideas and Contributions to Legal Development. Georgetown.
- Donald E. Smith; B.A., Th.B., Eastern Baptist Seminary, 1951; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1953; B.D., Eastern Baptist Seminary, 1953; Ph.D., Pennsylvania, 1956. Jawaharlal Nehru's Thought on the Democratic State. Pennsylvania.
- Nathan M. Talbott; B.A., Western State Teachers College (now Western Michigan College of Education), 1939; M.A., Michigan, 1941; Ph.D., Washington (Seattle), 1956. Intellectual Origins and Aspects of Political Thought in the Jen Hsteh of T'an Ssu-t'ung, Martyr of the 1898 Reform. Washington (Seattle).
- James Tierney; A.B., Brown, 1948; A.M., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Political Theory of Bolingbroke and Halifax: A Comparative Study. Brown.
- Charles W. VanCleve; B.A., Chicago, 1947; B.S., in Ed., Ball State, 1949; M.A., Chicago, 1951; Ph.D., Texas, 1955. The Doctrine of Church and State in Roman Catholic Thought in the Twentieth Century with Primary Emphasis upon the United States. Texas.
- David B. Walker; A.B., Boston U., 1949; A.M., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., Brown, 1956. The Political Ideas of Rufus Choate. Brown.
- Lloyd M. Wells; B.S., Southwestern Missouri, 1948; M.S., Missouri, 1951; Ph.D., Princeton, 1955. The Defense of "Big Business" 1933-1953: A Study in the Development of an Ideology. Princeton.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS DEPENDENCIES

- Charles H. Backstrom; B.A., Moorhead State Teachers College (Minnesota), 1949; M.A., Wisconsin, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Progressive Party in Wisconsin, 1934-1946:

- An Analysis of a Modern American Third Party. Wisconsin.
- Marion C. Brewer; B.A., Lynchburg, 1949; M.P.A., Harvard, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Science and Defense: Military Research and Development in the United States. Harvard.
- John T. Dempsey; Ph.B., Detroit, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Michigan, 1956. Control by Congress over the Seating and Disciplining of Members. Michigan.
- Martin Diamond; M.A., Chicago, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Socialism and the Decline of the American Socialist Party. Chicago.
- Don W. Driggs; B.S., Brigham Young, 1950; Ph.D., Harvard, 1956. Executive-Legislative Relationships and the Control of American Foreign Policy with Respect to Collective Security. Harvard.
- George S. Duggar; A.B., Wisconsin, 1936; A.M., ibid., 1937; A.M., Harvard, 1944; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Tax Structure in a Responsible Program for Housing. Harvard.
- Aurie N. Dunlap; A.B., Union, 1929; A.M., Columbia, 1931; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Political Career of Arthur H. Vandenberg. Columbia.
- Nancy Ann Edwards; A.B., Vassar, 1950; A.M., Columbia, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Congress and Administrative Reorganization. Columbia.
- William C. Ellet, Jr.; A.B., Michigan, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Atomic Cities: The Atomic Energy Act and the States. Michigan.
- Richard F. Fenno; B.A., Amherst, 1948; A.M., Harvard, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The President's Cabinet: An Analysis in the Period from Wilson to Truman. Harvard.
- Jenniellen W. Ferguson; A.B., California (Los Angeles), 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Presidential Election Trends in the United States, 1900-1948, A County Analysis. California (Los Angeles).
- Lewis P. Fickett; A.B., Bowdoin, 1949; L.L.B., Harvard, 1952; M.P.A., ibid., 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Eisenhower Security Program: A Study in Public Policy. Harvard.
- Charles E. Gilbert; A.B., Haverford, 1950; Ph.D., Northwestern, 1955. Problems of a Senator: A Study of Legislative Behavior. Northwestern.
- Charles J. Graham; A.B., Illinois, 1950; A.M., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Republican Foreign Policy, 1939-1952. Illinois.
- Donald E. Hayhurst; A.B., Pittsburgh, 1950; M.L., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Development of Consumer Welfare as a Function of the National Government in the Food and Drug Administration. Pittsburgh.
- Edward J. Heubel; B.A., Yale, 1948; M.A., Minnesota, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Organization and Conduct of Congressional Investigations since 1946. Minnesota.
- Stanley Kelly; A.B., Kansas, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Johns Hopkins, 1955. The Public Relations Counsel as Campaign Manager. Johns Hopkins.
- Joseph L. Krieger; B.B.A., City College of New York, 1936; M.B.A., ibid., 1939; Ph.D., American, 1956. Executive Performance and Executive Success in Government. American.
- Norman Meller; L.L.B., Hastings College, 1936; B.A., California, 1942; M.A., Chicago, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Hawaii: A Study of Centralization. Chicago.
- Karl E. Meyer; B.S., Wisconsin, 1951; M.P.A., Princeton, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Politics of Loyalty. Princeton.
- Robert H. Myers; M.A., Chicago, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Politics of American Banking: The Dual System, 1929-1939. Chicago.
- John H. Michener; B.A., Kansas, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1956. The United States Cabinet: A Study of Proposed Modification, with Especial Reference to Cabinet-Congressional Relations. California (Berkeley).
- Robert L. Munkres; A.B., Nebraska Wesleyan, 1952; M.A., Nebraska, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Use of Congressional Resolutions to Influence Foreign Policy. Nebraska.
- John R. Owens; B.A., Syracuse, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Party Campaign Funds in Connecticut, 1950-1954. Syracuse.
- Denis S. Philipps; A.B., New York University, 1940; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Americans and Compulsory Military Service: A Study of Changing Public Policy, with Particular Reference to the Period 1940-1951. New York University.
- Robert J. Pitchell; A.B., Fordham, 1939; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1955. Twentieth Century California Voting Behavior. California (Berkeley).
- Ross R. Rice; M.A., Chicago, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Politics of Missouri Basin Development. Chicago.
- Robert M. Rosensweig; B.A., Michigan, 1952; M.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., Yale, 1956. The - Meaning and Significance of Involvement in a Political Campaign. Yale.

- Lloyd I. Rudolph; A.B., Harvard, 1948; M.P.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Meaning of Party from the Politics of Status to the Politics of Opinion in Eighteenth Century England and America. Harvard.
- Warren D. St. James; B. Ed., Southern Illinois, 1943; A.B., ibid., 1947; M.S. in Ed., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., St. Louis, 1956. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People: A Case Study in Pressure Groups. St. Louis.
- Harris E. Thurber; B.A., Vermont, 1943; M.A., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., Princeton, 1955. The Vermont Judiciary: A Study in Cultural Adaptation. Princeton.
- Robert A. Wallace; B.A., Washington (Seattle), 1945; Ph.D., Chicago, 1956. Congressional Control of Federal Expenditures. Chicago.
- Oliver P. Williams; B.A., Reed College, 1951; M.A., Chicago, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Politics of Grain Storage: The Commodity Credit Corporation Issue in the 1948 Presidential Election. Chicago.
- William W. Young; A.B., California, 1947; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Congressional Investigations of the Federal Administration. California (Berkeley).
- CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN THE UNITED STATES
- Raymond L. Carol; A.B., Johns Hopkins, 1947; M.A., Syracuse, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Science in the Courts: A Survey of Scientific Evidence and Its Impact upon the Judicial Process. Syracuse.
- Samuel Krislov; B.A., New York University, 1951; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., Princeton, 1955. The Supreme Court since 1937—Nine Judges in Search of a Role. Princeton.
- Eugene A. Mawhinney; B.S., Maine, 1947; A.M., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Illinois, 1955. The Development of the Concept of Liberty in the Fourteenth Amendment. Illinois.
- Harding C. Noblitt; B.A., Berea College, 1942; M.A., Chicago, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Supreme Court and the Progressive Era, 1902-1921. Chicago.
- William O'Brien, S.J.; B.A., Gonzaga, 1940; M.A., ibid., 1941; S.T.L., Alma College (California), 1949; M.A., Boston College, 1952; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1956. Justice Reed and the First Amendment Liberties. Georgetown.
- Ruth L. Roettinger; A.B., Ashbury College, 1926; M.A., Kentucky, 1927; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1956. The Supreme Court and the Police Power of the States, 1930-1956: A Study in Federalism. North Carolina.
- Jackson W. Selman; B.S., Alabama, 1942; LL. B., ibid., 1947; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1955. Proposals to Amend the Constitution of the United States Regarding the Mode of Electing the President, 1789-1955. North Carolina.
- Robert J. Steamer; A.B., Bucknell, 1947; Ph.D., Cornell, 1954. The Constitutional Doctrine of Mr. Justice Robert H. Jackson. Cornell.
- Shirley S. Ulmer; A.B., Furman, 1952; M.A., Duke, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The South Carolina Delegates to the Constitutional Convention of 1787: An Analytical Study. Duke.
- AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS
- Frank C. Abbott; A.B., Cornell, 1942; M.P.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Harvard, 1956. Public Policy-Making in Higher Education: A Study of the Regents of the University of the State of New York. Harvard.
- Chester W. Bain; B.A., Virginia, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Annexation in Virginia: The Use of the Judicial Process for Readjusting City-County Boundaries. Virginia.
- Donald G. Balmer; B.A., Washington (Seattle), 1947; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Interest Groups in Action: A Case Study of Oregon Milk Control, 1933-54. Washington (Seattle).
- Emmett W. Bashful; A.B., Southern, 1940; A.M., Illinois, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Florida Supreme Court: A Study in Judicial Selection. Illinois.
- Kenneth E. Beasley; A.B., Kansas, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Municipal Debt Limitations and Control in Kansas. Kansas.
- James R. Bell; B.S., California (Berkeley), 1938; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Administrative Role of the California Governor, 1943-1953. California (Berkeley).
- Wallace H. Best; A.B., Occidental, 1950; A.M., Southern California, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Initiative and Referendum Politics in California, 1912-1952. Southern California.
- William E. Biggs; B.A., Louisville, 1938; LL.B., ibid., 1940; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D.,

- Ohio State, 1956. The Handling of Workmen's Compensation Claims by the Ohio Industrial Commission. Ohio State.
- Norman Blume*; B.A., Connecticut, 1948; M.A., Boston, 1951; Ph.D., Ohio State, 1956. Municipal Home Rule in Ohio. Ohio State.
- Gilbert L. Brown*; A.B., Redlands, 1938; A.M., ibid., 1939; Ph.D., Southern California, 1956. The Relationship of Elective Political Office in the City of Redlands, California, to the Status Concept. Southern California.
- Claude J. Burtenshaw*; B.S., Utah, 1947; M.S., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The State: Cooperation or Conquest; A Case Study of the State of Idaho. Utah.
- James G. Coke*; B.A., Harvard, 1948; M.A., Minnesota, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. State Imposition on the Local Governments of Minnesota of Personnel Standards for Aided Functions. Minnesota.
- James T. Crown*; A.B., Florida, 1949; A.M., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., New York University, 1956. The Development of Democratic Government in New York State Through the Growth of the Power of the Executive since 1920. New York University.
- Ira R. Davis*; B.A., Yale, 1949; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1951; Ph.D., Ohio State, 1956. Party and Voting Behavior in the Portsmouth Atomic Energy Establishment Area. Ohio State.
- Thomas J. Davy*; B.S., Seton Hall, 1943; M.G.A., Pennsylvania, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Pennsylvania Public Service Institute—A Study of State Administered In-Service Training for Local and State Government. Pennsylvania.
- David E. Derge*; A.B., Missouri, 1950; M.A., Northwestern, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Power Position of the Chicago Legislative Delegation in the Illinois General Assembly. Northwestern.
- John H. Duke*; B.J., Texas, 1935; A.M., Southern California, 1942; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The County Committeeman and His Role in Politics. Southern California.
- John H. Fenton*; A.B., Kentucky, 1948; A.M., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Harvard, 1956. Political Dynamics in the Border States. Harvard.
- Leroy C. Hardy*; A.B., California (Santa Barbara College), 1949; Ph.D., California (Los Angeles), 1955. The California Reapportionment of 1951. California (Los Angeles).
- Clarence J. Hein*; B.A., Minnesota, 1941; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Operation of the Direct Primary in Minnesota. Minnesota.
- McCown E. Hunt*; B.S., Utah, 1952; M.S., ibid., 1953; Graduate Certificate in Public Administration, ibid., 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Political and Technical Aspects of the Utilization of Ground Water in the State of Utah. Utah.
- William P. Irwin*; A.B., Hiram, 1947; A.M., Western Reserve, 1950; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1955. The Rocky Mountain Ballot: A Study of the Politics of the State of Colorado. California (Berkeley).
- Eugene W. Jones*; A.B., Akron, 1942; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1955. The Employment Security Commission in North Carolina. North Carolina.
- Lois B. Merk*; A.B., Smith College, 1924; A.M., Clark, 1927; Ph.D., Harvard, 1956. Massachusetts and the Woman-Suffrage Movement. Harvard.
- Lester W. Milbrath*; B.A., Minnesota, 1951; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1956. Motivations and Characteristics of Political Contributors: North Carolina General Election, 1952. North Carolina.
- Donald C. Munding*; B.S., Concordia, 1951; A.M., Northwestern, 1952; Ph.D., Washington (St. Louis), 1956. The St. Louis City Earnings Tax. Washington (St. Louis).
- Frank J. Munger*; S.B., Northwestern, 1951; Ph.D., Harvard, 1956. Two-Party Politics in the State of Indiana. Harvard.
- Isham G. Newton*; A.B., Lincoln, 1939; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Minor Judiciary in North Carolina with Special Emphasis on the Justices of the Peace. Pennsylvania.
- G. Sieber Pancoast*; B.S., Ursinus, 1937; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1940; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Second Class Townships in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Wesley A. St. John*; B.S., Drake, 1948; M.A., State University of Iowa, 1949; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1956. The Issuance, Suspension, and Revocation of Occupational and Professional Licenses: A Study of California Administrative Procedure. California (Berkeley).
- Jesse Winzenreid*; B.S., Wyoming, 1945; M.S., Denver, 1946; Ph.D., New York University, 1955. State Financial Administration in Wyoming. New York University.
- Frederick M. Wirt*; B.A., DePauw, 1948; M.A., Ohio State, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. State

Motion Picture Censorship, with Special Reference to Ohio. Ohio State.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION IN THE UNITED STATES

- Sidney Baldwin*; B.A., Wesleyan, 1949; M.P.A., Syracuse, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Farm Security Administration: A Study in Politics and Administration. Syracuse.
- Lowell R. Eklund*; B.S., Michigan State, 1939; M.S., Syracuse, 1948; D.P.A., ibid., 1956. A Century of Service: An Historical Analysis of the Service Function of a State University. Syracuse.
- Harold E. Finnegan*; B.A., Nebraska, 1943; Ph.D., American, 1956. Selected Indices of Manpower Management and an Interpretation of Their Statistical Application in Portions of a Large Federal Mental Hospital, 1948-1951. American.
- Edward L. Henry*; B.A., St. John's University, 1943; M.B.A., Harvard, 1944; Ph.D., Chicago, 1955. A Politico-Administrative Appraisal of Government Organization for Monetary Policy Formation. Chicago.
- Clyde T. Hardwick*; B.B.Ad., Detroit, 1940; M.P.A., Wayne, 1948; Ph.D., Michigan, 1956. Cooperative Purchasing Techniques for Municipalities. Michigan.
- George A. Holmes*; D.D.S., Loyola University Dental School, 1933; B.S., Y.M.C.A. College of Chicago, 1936; M.A., Chicago, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Dental Licensing Administration in the United States. Chicago.
- Robert V. Kirch*; B.A., Indiana, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Administrative Regulation of a Public Utility: A Case Study. Indiana.
- Richard H. McCleery*; B.A., Hawaii, 1950; M.A., Syracuse, 1953; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1956. Institutional Change: A Case Study of Prison Management in Transition, 1945-1955. North Carolina.
- Carroll F. Miles*; A.B., Seton Hall, 1938; A.M., Catholic, 1940; M.P.A., Harvard, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Office of the Secretary of Defense, 1947-1953: A Study in Administrative Theory. Harvard.
- Leary Oliver*; B.A., Miles College, 1942; M.A., Indiana, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. A Historical Survey and Analysis of the Progress of Negroes in Public Service (1932-1952). Indiana.
- Benjamin L. Olsen*; A.B., Stanford, 1943; A.M., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Administration of Water Resource Programs. Stanford.

Arthur S. Patrick; B.Ed., State Teachers College (Wisconsin), 1931; M.A., Iowa, 1940; Ph.D., American, 1956. An Analysis of the Duties and Responsibilities of the First-Line Office Supervisor in Government. American.

Robert H. Pealy; B.S., Akron, 1937; M.P.A., Michigan, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. A Comparative Study of Property Tax Administration in Illinois and Michigan with Emphasis on State Administration of Inter-County Equalization. Michigan.

William M. Ransom; B.A., Iowa, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Reorganization of Public Health Administration in the State of Iowa. Iowa.

Alfred M. Skolnik; B.A., New York University, 1941; M.A., Columbia, 1948; Ph.D., American, 1956. The Role of the Government in Providing Cash Benefits for Temporary Disability. American.

Richard Stillman; B.S., Southern California, 1938; M.P.A., Syracuse, 1950; D.P.A., ibid., 1955. A Critical Review of Modern Administrative Practices Related to the Cadet Store at West Point. Syracuse.

Russell P. Strange; B.A., Maryland, 1952; M.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Personnel Administration in the Department of Defense: Theory and Practice. Maryland.

David L. Stratmon; B.A., Howard, 1947; M.P.A., Michigan, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. An Administrative Appraisal of the United States Public Health Mission in Liberia. Michigan.

James R. Woodworth; A.B., Western Reserve, 1940; A.M., Harvard, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Forces Influencing the Legislative Process in the Area of Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Law, 1933-1954. Harvard.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Basher A. Aridi; B.A., Utah State Agriculture College, 1952; M.S., Utah, 1953; Ph.D., American, 1956. Parties and Politics in Lebanon. American.

Eme G. Awa; B.A., Lincoln University, 1951; M.P.A., New York University, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Regionalism in Nigeria: A Study in Federalism. New York University.

Richard Barron; B.A., Knox, 1932; Ph.D., Virginia, 1956. Government and Politics of

- the Fourth Republic in France, 1944-1948. Virginia.
- Leonard Binder*; A.B., Harvard, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Islamic Constitutional Theory and Politics in Pakistan. Harvard.
- Conrad Brandt*; A.B., Harvard, 1941; A.M., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Soviet Failure in China, 1920-7. Harvard.
- Cecil C. Brett*; B.A., U. of British Columbia, 1948; M.A., Washington (Seattle); Ph.D., Michigan, 1956. The Government of Okayama Prefecture: A Case Study of Local Autonomy in Japan. Michigan.
- Theodore Bullockus*; A.B., George Washington, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., American, 1956. Transportation in Thailand and its Relationship to the Economic Progress of the Nation. American.
- Ronald F. Bunn*; A.B., Southwestern at Memphis, 1951; M.A., Duke, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Organization and Political Theory of the Postwar German Employers' Federation. Duke.
- James B. Christoph*; B.A., Wisconsin, 1950; M.A., Minnesota, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Political Rights of State Workers in Great Britain. Minnesota.
- Onofre D. Corpus*; A.B., University of the Philippines, 1950; A.M., Illinois, 1953; M.P.A., Harvard, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Bureaucracy in the Philippines: A Civil Service in Evolution. Harvard.
- Jesus de Galindes*; License in Law (Spain), 1936; Ph.D., Columbia, 1956. Trujillo's Dominican Republic. Columbia.
- Eugene P. Dvorin*; A.B., California (Los Angeles), 1948; B.S., U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, (Kings Point, N.Y.), 1950; M.A., California (Los Angeles), 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Central African Federation: A Political Analysis. California (Los Angeles).
- Marie A. Edwards*; A.B., Indiana, 1938; M.A., Northwestern, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Political Activities of Japanese Postwar Labor Unions. Northwestern.
- Augusto Espiritu*; A.B., Silliman, 1951; LL.B., University of the Philippines, 1952; LL.M., Harvard, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Freedom and National Security. Harvard.
- Vernon L. Fluharty*; A.B., Ohio State, 1935; B.S., in Ed., ibid., 1936; M.A., Pittsburgh, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Latin American Military Caesar and the Social Revolution: A Case Study of Colombia, 1946-1955. Pittsburgh.
- Dante Lee Germino*; A.B., Duke, 1952; Ph.D., Harvard, 1956. The Italian Fascist Party, 1925-1939. Harvard.
- Waller I. Giles*; B.S.F.S., Georgetown, 1943; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. British Colonial Policy and the Political Development of Jamaica, 1944-1954. Georgetown.
- Werner Grunbaum*; B.A., Rice Institute, 1951; M.A., Chicago, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Civil Liberties and the Cold War in Great Britain. Chicago.
- Merlin D. Gustafson*; B.S., Kansas State College, 1943; M.S., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., Nebraska, 1956. Problems of British Agricultural Administrative Law. Nebraska.
- Louis K. Harris*; A.B., Ohio State, 1945; M.A., ibid., 1946; Ph.D., California (Los Angeles), 1956. Metropolitan Mexico City. California (Los Angeles).
- Dan F. Henderson*; A.B., Whitmore, 1944; A.B., Michigan, 1945; LL.B., Harvard, 1949; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1955. The Pattern and Persistence of Traditional Procedures in Japanese Law. California (Berkeley).
- Rense L. Hoeksema*; B.A., Hope, 1948; A.M., Harvard, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Communism in the Philippines. Harvard.
- Eric G. James*; B.A., McGill, 1951; M.P.A., New York University, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Administrative Institutions and Social Change in Jamaica, British West Indies. New York University.
- Chien-Kuen Kiang*; B. of Law, National University (Hunan, China), 1935; M.A., Nebraska, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Conditions for Federation. Nebraska.
- Gikonyo J. Kiano*; A.B., Antioch, 1952; M.A., Stanford, 1953; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1956. The Federation Issue in "Multi-Racial" East and Central Africa. California (Berkeley).
- Dimitrios Kousoulas*; Law Diploma, University of Athens, 1948; Ph.D., Syracuse, 1956. The Greek Communist Party since 1918. Syracuse.
- Jean A. Laponce*; Diplome, Institut d'Etudes Politiques, 1947; Ph.D., California (Los Angeles), 1956. The Protection of Minorities. California (Los Angeles).
- Frank M. Lewis*; A.B., Indiana, 1943; M.A., Northwestern, 1949; Ph.D., Texas, 1955. The Political Effects of a Multi-Party System upon the Presidential Form of Government in Chile. Texas.
- J. Gus Liebenow, Jr.*; A.B., Illinois, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Northwestern, 1955. Chieftainship and Local Government in Tanganyika: A Study of Institutional Adaptation. Northwestern.

- Sidney Mallick*; M.A., Chicago, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Establishment of a System of Personnel Administration in Israel. Chicago.
- Josephine F. Milburn*; A.B., North Carolina, 1948; M.A., Louisiana State, 1949; Ph.D., Duke, 1956. The Fabian Society and the British Labour Party. Duke.
- Fred W. Neal*; B.A., Michigan, 1937; M.A., Harvard, 1949; Ph.D., Michigan, 1956. The Reforms in Yugoslavia, 1948-1954: Titoism in Action. Michigan.
- Amon Nikoi*; A.B., Amherst, 1953; M.P.A., Harvard, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Indirect Rule and Government in Gold Coast Colony 1844-1954: A Study in History, Ecology and Politics of Administration in a Changing Society. Harvard.
- Eze A. Ogueri*; B.A., Adelphi College, 1950; M.P.A., Harvard, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Indirect Rule and the Growth of Representative Government in Nigeria. Harvard.
- Don Peretz*; A.B., Minnesota, 1944; A.M., Columbia, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Israel and the Arab Refugees. Columbia.
- Arian L. Plotkin*; B.Sc., London, 1951; M.P.A., Princeton, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Israel's Role in the United Nations: An Analytical Study. Princeton.
- Allen M. Potter*; A.B., Wesleyan, 1947; A.M., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., Columbia, 1955. British Party Politics: A Study of Party Discipline. Columbia.
- Thomas A. Rusch*; B.S., Milwaukee State Teachers College, 1941; M.A., California (Los Angeles), 1948; Ph.D., Chicago, 1955. Role of the Congress Socialist Party in the Indian National Congress, 1931-1942. Chicago.
- F. Burke Sheeran*; A.B., Montana State, 1940; A.M., Southern California, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Federalism in the United States, Canada, and Australia, with Particular Reference to Selected Institutional and Functional Aspects. Southern California.
- Wilhelmus Van Eekeren*; B.L., Amsterdam, 1951; M.A., Oregon, 1952; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1956. The Catholic People's Party in the Netherlands—A Study of its Origin, Theory, Policy, and Political Significance. Georgetown.
- Karl Von Vorys*; A.B., College of Steubenville (Ohio), 1951; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1956. The Foundations of the French Third Republic: A Socio-Political Analysis of its First Twenty-five Years, 1870-1895. Georgetown.
- Nicholas A. Wahl*; A.B., Wisconsin, 1949; A.M., Harvard, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. DeGaulle and the Resistance: The Rise of Reform Politics in France. Harvard.
- Eric Waldman*; A.B., George Washington, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Spartacist Uprising of 1919 and the Crisis of the German Socialist Movement: A Study of the Relation between Political Theory and Party Practice. George Washington.
- Myron Weiner*; B.S., City College, 1951; Ph.D., Princeton, 1955. Indian Political Behavior: A Study of the Development of a Multi-Party System. Princeton.
- George E. Wolff*; A.B., Florida, 1947; M.A., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1956. Executive-Legislative Relations in the Third French Republic, 1920-1940. North Carolina.
- Willard R. Yates*; B.A., Oregon, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Yale, 1956. An Examination of the Leading Constitutional and Social Ideas of the Mouvement Republicain Populaire. Yale.
- Janusz Zawodny*; B.S., Iowa, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Stanford, 1955. Workers' Settlement of Grievances in Soviet Factories. Stanford.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION, POLITICS AND LAW

- Abdel Raouf Abu Alam*; B.Sc., Fouad I.U., Egypt, 1946; M.A., American, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Analysis of Egyptian-Sudanese Relations since 1936 with Special Emphasis on the 1953 Anglo-Egyptian Sudan Agreement. American.
- Walter Adamson*; A.B., New York University, 1939; A.M., ibid., 1940; Ph.D., Fletcher School, 1956. Ecuador in Transition: An Analysis of Persistent Problems and Current Progress. Fletcher School.
- Luther A. Allen*; B.A., Williams College, 1941; M.A., Iowa, 1942; Ph.D., Chicago, 1955. The French Left and Soviet Russia to 1936. Chicago.
- Fenton Babcock*; B.A., Yale, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Issues of China Policy before Congress, September 1945 to September 1949. Yale.
- Arthur C. Banks, Jr.*; B.S., St. John's, 1939;

- A.M., New York University, 1945; Ph.D., Johns Hopkins, 1955. International Law and the Second World War. Johns Hopkins.
- Irving Barnett*; A.B., Yale, 1938; LL.B., Columbia, 1941; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. UNRRA in China: A Case Study in Financial Assistance for Economic Development with Emphasis on Agricultural Programs. Columbia.
- Lincoln P. Bloomfield*; S.B., Harvard, 1941; M.P.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The United Nations, the Status Quo, and the Process of Peaceful Change. Harvard.
- John J. Boyne*; A.B., Alabama, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1956. United States Responsibilities for Colonial Territories under the United Nations Charter. North Carolina.
- Edwin C. Buell*; B.S., North Texas, 1941; M.A., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1956. The Institute of Inter-American Affairs: A Study of Inter-Governmental Cooperation. North Carolina.
- Robert O. Byrd*; B.A., College of Puget Sound, 1938; M.A., American, 1939; M.A., Columbia, 1945; Ph.D., Chicago, 1955. Quaker Ways in Foreign Policy. Chicago.
- Charles K. Chu*; B.A., National Central University (Nanking, China), 1943; M.A., Wisconsin, 1949; Ph.D., Chicago, 1956. The China Policy of the Taft-Knox Administration, 1909-1913. Chicago.
- William G. Cornclius*; A.B., Vanderbilt, 1934; A.M., ibid., 1935; Ph.D., Columbia, 1956. Latin American Patterns of Voting in the United Nations. Columbia.
- Omar Dajany*; B.A., American University of Beirut, Lebanon, 1942; Ph.D., American, 1956. The World Bank and the International Finance Corporation. American.
- Dorothy Dodge*; B.A., Minnesota, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Recognition of Communist China: Legal and Political Aspects. Minnesota.
- Bernard Fall*; M.A., Syracuse, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Post-War Problem of Indo-China. Syracuse.
- Richard Forster*; B.A., Denver, 1949; M.A., Yale, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The British Political Image of the United States. Yale.
- Elizabeth R. Fraser*; A.B., Southern California, 1949; A.M., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Korean Conflict with Special Reference to the Theory and Dynamics of Collective Security. Southern California.
- Harry J. Friedman*; B. Litt., Rutgers, 1948; M.A., Wisconsin, 1949; Ph.D., Pittsburgh, 1956. Consolidation of India since Independence: A Comparison and Analysis of Four Indian Territorial Problems—Kashmir, Hyderabad, Portuguese Possessions and French Possessions. Pittsburgh.
- Geraldine S. Garlick*; B.A., Iowa, 1952; M.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Communistic Interpretations of the Causes of War. Iowa.
- Richard A. Geisler*; A.B., North Carolina, 1946; M.F.S., Southern California, 1949; Ph.D., New York University, 1955. Military Collaboration in the Western Hemisphere. New York University.
- John S. Gibson*; A.B., Oberlin, 1948; A.M., Western Reserve, 1950; Ph.D., Columbia, 1956. The Development of Mutual Security Arrangements and their Impact upon the UN in the Maintenance of International Peace and Security. Columbia.
- Bryant W. Giles*; B.A.: Utah, 1946; M.A., Stanford, 1948; Ph.D., Yale, 1956. The "Belize" Question: A Problem of Anti-Colonialism in the New World. Yale.
- John S. Gillespie*; A.B., Oberlin, 1933; A.M., ibid., 1939; Ph.D., Columbia, 1956. The Role of the Director in the Development of the International Labour Organization. Columbia.
- Mehmet Gonkubol*; Graduate, Izmir School of Business (Turkey), 1947; A.M., Denver, 1952; Ph.D., New York University, 1955. Turkish Participation in the United Nations. New York University.
- Robert C. Good*; B.A., Haverford, 1945; B.D., Yale, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Contribution of Reinhold Niebuhr to the Theory of International Relations. Yale.
- Sania Hamady*; B.A., American University of Beirut, 1946; M.A., Michigan State, 1950; Ph.D., Chicago, 1956. The Character and Temperament of the Arabs. Chicago.
- Milan E. Hapala*; A.B., Beloit, 1940; M.A., Nebraska, 1941; Ph.D., Duke, 1956. The Evolution of Czechoslovak Political Parties and the Russian Question, 1918-1921. Duke.
- Charles W. Hostler*; A.B., California (Los Angeles), 1942; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1956. The Turks of the Soviet and Western Orbits and their Unifying Ideals. Georgetown.
- Lawrence C. Howard*; A.B., Drake, 1949; A.M., Wayne, 1950; Ph.D., Harvard, 1956. American Involvement in Africa South of the Sahara, 1800-1860. Harvard.
- Albert J. Hoyt*; A.B., California (Los Angeles), 1941; A.M., ibid., 1943; Ph.D., Southern - California, 1954. Regionalism and the United Nations. Southern California.

- Dunning Idle IV*; B.A., Princeton, 1949; M.A., Yale, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Indonesia's Independent and Active Foreign Policy. Yale.
- Hoyt M. Jackson*; A.B., Chico State College (California), 1948; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1950; Ph.D., Nebraska, 1955. Aggression as Defined by the United Nations. Nebraska.
- Howard W. Johnston*; A.B., Coe, 1935; A.M., Columbia, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. United States Public Affairs Activities in Germany, 1945-1955. Columbia.
- George H. Kelly*; A.B., California, 1937; A.M., Stanford, 1940; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Political Development of the French Overseas Empire. Stanford.
- Chase Kimball*; A.B., Yale, 1925; LL.B., ibid., 1928; A.M., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., Fletcher School, 1955. A Commentary on the Civil Liberties Provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Fletcher School.
- Leon Korusiewicz*; LL.M., Warsaw, 1930; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1955. Polish-German Diplomatic Relations, 1934-1939. California (Berkeley).
- Hua-Wei Li*; A.B., St. John's University (China), 1947; A.M., Maryland, 1949; Ph.D., New York University, 1956. The Development of Economic and Social Rights by the United Nations. New York University.
- Pichon P. Y. Loh*; B.A., Phillips University, 1950; M.A., Chicago, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. China: Its Westernization and Nationalism, 1919-1926. Chicago.
- Virginia H. MacLean*; A.B., Linfield College, 1942; A.M., Fletcher School, 1946; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Domestic and Foreign Factors in Egyptian Foreign Policy, 1919-1939. Fletcher School.
- Yunan Mao*; M.A., University of Ottawa, 1943; M.A., Harvard, 1947; Ph.D., Chicago, 1956. The Principle of Sovereign Equality in the United Nations. Chicago.
- Randall H. Nelson*; A.B., Michigan, 1950; A.M., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Recent Developments in the Law and Practice of the United States Respecting the Negotiation and Conclusion of International Agreements and Commentary on Proposed Changes. Michigan.
- Mark Neuvel*; Ph.B., Northwestern, 1949; A.M., Harvard, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Central Organization of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union: Its Structure, Leadership and Dynamics of Development, 1917-1930. Harvard.
- Eiichi Okajima*; A.B., Stetson, 1952; Ph.D., New York University, 1956. The Japanese Peace Treaty and Its Implications on Japan's Post-War Foreign Policy. New York University.
- Ross J. Pritchard*; A.B., Arkansas, 1951; A.M., ibid., 1951; A.M., Fletcher School, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Will Clayton, A Study of Business Statesmanship in the Formulation of United States Economic Foreign Policy. Fletcher School.
- Milton Rakove*; B.A., Roosevelt College, 1948; M.A., Chicago, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. American Attitudes toward Negotiations with the Soviet Union. Chicago.
- Peter P. Remec*; Doctor of Jurisprudence, University of Graz (Austria), 1948; Dr. R. P., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Chicago, 1956. The Position of the Individual in International Law According to Grotius and Vattel. Chicago.
- Robert E. Riggs*; A.B., Arizona, 1952; A.M., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., Illinois, 1955. The Policy of the United States in the General Assembly of the United Nations. Illinois.
- Edward J. Rosek*; A.B., Harvard, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Soviet-Polish Relations 1939-1947: A Case Study of Soviet Foreign Policy. Harvard.
- Hassan Saab*; Licence es Lettres, Fuad University (Cairo), 1943; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1956. The Arab Approach to Federalism. Georgetown.
- Bert P. Schloss*; B.A., Roosevelt College, 1951; M.A., Chicago, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The American Occupation of Germany, 1945-1952: An Appraisal. Chicago.
- John C. Sherry*; B.S., Fordham, 1936; M.A., ibid., 1938; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Aspects of American Policy Regarding the Unification of the Chinese National Government, 1944-1948. Fordham.
- Joel D. Singer*; A.B., Duke, 1946; Ph.D., New York University, 1955. The Fiscal Process in the United Nations. New York University.
- Robert F. Smith*; B.A., Maryville College, 1948; M.A., Tennessee, 1951; Ph.D., Chicago, 1955. The Policy of the United States toward Political Unity in Germany, 1945-1953. Chicago.
- Robert S. Smith*; A.B., Yale, 1947; A.M., Harvard, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Cultural and

- Information Programs of Newly Independent Nations as Instruments of Foreign Policy. Harvard.
- Richard W. Sterling*; B.A., Yale, 1942; M.A., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. Ego and Ethic in International Politics: Friedrich Meinecke and the Idea of Raison d'Etat. Yale.
- Virgil H. Stevens*; A.B., Texas, 1941; A.M., Southern California, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Personnel Problems Peculiar to International Agencies: A Study in International Administration. Southern California.
- Lois J. Stone*; A.B., Barnard, 1948; A.M., Columbia, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Anglo-Russian Relations in Central Asia, 1885-1892. Columbia.
- Owari Suthiwart-Narueput*; B.L., University of Moral and Political Sciences, Bangkok, 1946; A.M., Fletcher School, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Evolution of Thailand's Foreign Relations since 1855; from Extra-territoriality to Equality. Fletcher School.
- Barbara J. Teters*; B.A., Michigan, 1946; M.A., Washington (Seattle), 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. The Conservative Opposition in Japanese Politics from 1877 to 1894. Washington, (Seattle).
- Margaret D. Urist*; B.F.S., Southern California, 1942; A.M., ibid., 1946; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. An Analysis of the Participation of Guatemala in the Pan American Conferences, 1889-1933. Southern California.
- Charles W. Vear*; A.B., Indiana, 1952; A.M., ibid., 1952; A.M., Fletcher School, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1955. Organized Labor and the Tariff. Fletcher School.
- Lawrence W. Wadsworth, Jr.*; B.S., Centenary, 1947; M.A., Tulane, 1948; Ph.D., American, 1955. A Short History of the Tokyo War Crimes Trials with Special Reference to some Aspects of Procedure. American.
- Ponnambalam Wignaraja*; B.A., Ceylon University, 1948; M.A., Yale, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The Demand for Foreign Capital in Indian Planning, 1951-52 to 1960-61. Yale.
- Thomas W. Wolfe*; B.A., Hiram College (Ohio), 1949; M.A., Columbia, 1950; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1956. Soviet Leadership. Georgetown.
- Stephen Xydis*; A.B., Athens University, 1935; M.F.A., Princeton, 1941; Ph.D., Columbia, 1956. The American Naval Visits to Greece and Eastern Mediterranean, 1946: Their Impact on American-Soviet Relations. Columbia.
- Ronald J. Yalem*; A.B., Washington, 1950; M.A., American, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1956. The East-West Trade Control Program: A Case Study in United States Foreign Economic Policy. American.
- Abraham Yesselson*; A.B., Rutgers, 1947; A.M., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., Brown, 1954. American-Persian Relations, 1883-1918. Brown.
- Ira W. Zartman*; B.A., Johns Hopkins, 1951; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., Yale, 1956. De La Resistance a la Revolution: Postwar French Neutralism. Yale.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

REVIEWS OF BOOKS

- Smithies*, The Budgetary Process in the United States; Tickton, The Budget in Transition; The Need for Further Budget Reform: A Joint NPA Statement, and Colm, The Federal Budget and the National Economy. DWIGHT WALDO..... 847
- Lattimore*, Nationalism and Revolution in Mongolia. MAX BELOFF... 851
- Khadduri and Liebesny* (eds.), Law in the Middle East, Volume I: Origin and Development of Islamic Law; Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam. DANKWART A. RUSTOW..... 854
- Wilcox and Marcy*, Proposals for Changes in the United Nations. DANIEL S. CHEEVER..... 856
- Development towards Self-Government in the Caribbean: A Symposium Held under the Auspices of the Netherlands Universities Foundation for International Cooperation. FELIX A. NIGRO..... 858
- Smithies, Spengler, Knight, Jewkes, Viner, and Robbins*, Economics and Public Policy. ROBERT A. DAHL..... 860
- Hofstadter*, The Age of Reform: From Bryan to F.D.R. JOHN P. ROCHE..... 862
- Rossiter*, Conservatism in America. O. DOUGLAS WEEKS..... 864
- Ekirch*, The Decline of American Liberalism. CECELIA M. KENYON 866
- Acheson*, A Democrat Looks at His Party. OLIVER GARCEAU..... 867
- D'Addio*, L'Idea del Contratto Sociale dai Sofisti alla Riforma: E il "De Principatu" di Mario Salamonio. MARIO EINAUDI..... 869
- Rowe*, Voltaire and the State. SHELDON S. WOLIN..... 870
- Brzezinski*, The Permanent Purge: Politics in Soviet Totalitarianism. EDWARD TABORSKY..... 872
- Papers Prepared for the Eighth American Assembly*, The Forty-Eight States: Their Tasks as Policy Makers and Administrators. WILLIAM H. YOUNG..... 873
- Gladden*, The Essentials of Public Administration. HERBERT KAUFMAN 874
- Quigley and Turner*, The New Japan: Government and Politics. RALPH BRAIBANTI..... 876
- Beisel*, Control over Illegal Enforcement of the Criminal Law: Role of the Supreme Court. ROBERT FAIRCHILD CUSHMAN..... 877
- Kaufmann* (ed.), Craig, Hilsman, Kaufmann, and Knorr, Military Policy and National Security. SAMUEL P. HUNTINGTON..... 878

Corwin and Koenig , The Presidency Today; Rossiter , The American Presidency. JOSEPH E. KALLENBACH.....	880
Thomson , Television and Presidential Politics: The Experience in 1952 and the Problems Ahead. DONALD S. STRONG.....	882
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY.....	884
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....	884
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....	897
INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS.....	905
POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY.....	916
OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED.....	925

BOOK REVIEWS

The Budgetary Process in the United States: Committee for Economic Development Research Study. BY ARTHUR SMITHIES. (New York, Toronto, and London: McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc. 1955. Pp. xxi, 486. $6.50.)

The Budget in Transition. BY SIDNEY G. TICKTON. (Washington, D. C., National Planning Association, Planning Pamphlets, No. 89. A Staff Study prepared for the Business Committee. 1955. Pp. ix, 50. $1.00.)

The Need for Further Budget Reform. A JOINT NPA STATEMENT. The Federal Budget and the National Economy: How to Make the Federal Budget a Better Tool of Fiscal Policy. BY GERHARD COLM WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF MARILYN YOUNG. (Washington, D. C.: National Planning Association. Planning Pamphlets, No. 90. 1955. Pp. vi, 101. $1.50.)

The Budgetary Process in the United States was written by Arthur Smithies, Professor of Economics at Harvard, as an "aid" to the Research and Policy Committee of CED in developing recommendations for national policy. It bears some of the marks of a commissioned work; there are suggestions that a goal of formal coverage rather than intellectual élan moved the author. Nevertheless, there is no reason to doubt the essential freedom of the author to form and express his own opinions within the broad outlines of the commission. And he has produced a sometimes good and always useful—though misleadingly titled—book.

The title raises the expectation that here, at last, is a successor to A. E. Buck's Public Budgeting. But, in the first place, attention is limited to the national scene, and while there are some references to British practice there is no treatment at all of state and local budgeting. And in the second place, there is no attempt to treat all the aspects of budgeting seriatim and equally; the author states, for example, that "it has not been feasible to consider the accounting and reporting systems that are needed except in a very general way" (p. 18). This is not to criticize, but only to help in describing Smithies' book. Perhaps a generation of increasing data but diversifying theories and approaches makes another Public Budgeting a senseless, if not impossible, goal. We "know" more than Buck did in 1929, but few of us are as sure of it.

In the fore part of the book, in parts titled "Introductory Background" and "The Setting of the Problem," the author has provided a useful summary of much historical and institutional data. Part Three moves on to "Improvement of Congressional and Executive Procedures," and Part Four is given to "The Defense Budget." (Frederick Mosher was associated with the author in the summer of 1952, and his Program Budgeting: Theory and Practice is a much more extensive treatment of many of the same themes.) Part Five is a review of five of the most important "Non-Defense Programs"—e.g., "Veterans Benefits." Part Six consists of a single chapter on "The Economic Impact of the Budget."

In its review and summary of data alone the book makes a useful contribution. Though less than encyclopedic, it covers much more ground than any other recent book on national budgeting. Nor is it limited to the mechanics of budgeting. There is a review of areas of public policy, and even discussion of the economic impact of national budgeting and financial policy. The author has listened intelligently and sympathetically to many points of view; he has examined a great mass of documents, personally observed the processes he discusses, and brought to a reasonably sharp focus a multitude of data.

Nor is the book limited to description and analysis. There are many prescriptions for improvement, most of them set forth in precise, concrete form, and some of them of major importance. Indeed, improvement of the budgetary process is the major theme of, or reason for, the book. In the case of appropriations procedures, for example, nine recommendations are made (pp. 183-184), including one that "The Congress should require that the President's budget be submitted during March each year"—omitting green-sheet detail but containing more program information; and one that "Appropriations should be recommended and enacted in an omnibus appropriations act, subject to veto by the President of legislative riders and other extraneous items."

Perhaps the most significant recommendation—certainly the most interesting to the reviewer—is that there be a separation between "program" review and authorization and "operations" review and improvement, on both the Executive and the Legislative side of the budgeting process. Present procedures, it is argued, attempt to do both simultaneously, with the result that they do neither well. The task as presently institutionalized is "unmanageable" and must be split. "The detail that is needed for a review of the past complicates and obscures the programs for the future. On the other hand, the review that is conducted does not get to the heart of the question of economy and efficiency which is its main purpose" (p. 171). Two "budgetary" cycles a year are projected, utilizing somewhat different personnel and institutions. The review of performance is to be completed before the review of program is far advanced, and to be taken account of in making program determinations.

Except for one note of caution or suspicion below, there is no attempt here to evaluate this scheme. Indeed, space does not permit presentation of the scheme in enough detail for its essential understanding, much less for its thorough discussion. Suffice it to note that the proposal is closely related to the issue of program budgeting versus traditional line-item budgeting. It attempts to obtain the objectives of the former while retaining the advantages of the latter. Sober second thoughts about (and continuing "political" dissatisfaction with) program budgeting make the inquiry a relevant and important one.

The argument of the book follows a wavering and obscure path between economics on the one hand and political science and public administration on the other. This is not said in special criticism of the book. Budgeting is naturally of interest to economists, political scientists, and specialists in administration. And indeed the phenomena involved are, could be, or should be of interest to other disciplines. But phenomena bounded and criss-crossed by two or more disciplines are perhaps especially subject to distorted or incomplete treatment. And I believe that this can be illustrated in the present book.

The book, writes Smithies in his Preface, is "the work of an economist. Budgeting is essentially an economic problem, involving as it does the allocation of scarce resources among almost insatiable and competing demands. The economist's creed compels him to maintain that decisions that result from deliberate choice among alternatives yield more satisfactory results than those made by less rational methods" (p. xv). Few would disagree with this creed, and the analysis given may well help us on the way to more rational decision-making in national budgeting. But there is substantially nothing in the analysis that is peculiar to economics as a discipline—no special tools of analysis, no conceptual apparatuses. If economics has a contribution to make to public budgeting (as apart from economic or fiscal policy) it would appear to be only in a strong "bent" toward organization for rational decision-making. The procedural refinements of economic theory have little or no relevance to choices among alternatives of public policy. This Smithies acknowledges (p. 27) in discussing the great difference between the "firm" of economic theory (with its hypothesized profit-maximization objective) and a university, with its diffuse and controversial objectives.

But the author does not limit himself to procedural refinements. (We will put aside here the question whether even these are not policy matters.) He is certainly, if not inevitably, addressing himself to questions of public policy. There is a disclaimer, no doubt honestly entered, in the first page of the Preface, that "I must take policy objectives as givens," but attitudes, generally "intelligent" from the reviewer's point of view, are struck on one issue of public policy after another throughout the book. Incidentally, it is also stated (p. 9) that a distinction between budgeting and policy-making is not feasible. It is possible, of course, to argue that organization for rational decision-making can be separated as a problem from specific decisions on public policy, whether these decisions are purely "financial," purely "policy," or both combined. The reviewer happens to regard such argument as specious. Yet economics as a discipline has for some time been busily engaged in "dealing itself out" so far as most policy questions are concerned.

These observations are related, I think, to the author's treatment of "efficiency and economy." This phrase is for the most part taken "on faith," and the analytical and critical literature of the past fifteen years has not been examined. It is assumed or asserted (p. 14) that there is a "practical" if not "logical" distinction between a "programing" question and an "efficiency" question. Upon this assumption or assertion the two types of budget review have been built. Now the "practical" distinction may be enough to justify new institutional arrangements. But for some time administrative students have been aware that questions of mechanics (say of organization) are inseparable from program decisions, and the desirability of the split review must be considered in the light of considerations which Professor Smithies has ignored (except occasionally—see p. 367, n.).

Sidney G. Tickton's The Budget in Transition was designed, according to the preface, "to be entirely factual and take no policy positions." In this it is highly successful. Though the matter discussed is highly charged with partisan politics there is not even a shading of a word to suggest that Mr. Tickton himself has a partisan opinion.

The booklet deals with the "major policy decisions during recent years" which have "changed the treatment, form and method of reporting some U. S. Government expenditures and the timing of some U. S. tax receipts" (p. viii). These decisions have been made variously by Congress, President, and Budget Director. The effect of the changes has been to reduce the accounting totals reported for Federal expenditures for the fiscal years 1951-1956 by not less than $2.5 billion and to increase the accounting total of receipts by at least $6.8 billion. As a result the budget, on a consolidated cash basis, will show for the six years combined a $400 million surplus instead of a $7.6 billion deficit. While the budget changes discussed began before the present Administration, they touch the issue of a "balanced budget" and will no doubt be heard of in the coming campaigns.

These changes in proceedings are generally thought to affect accounting totals only (an example was the decision to treat tax refunds as deductions from taxes received instead of an expenditure item, which had the effect of reducing both receipt and expenditure totals by more than $2 billion). But it is relevantly pointed out that there is a psychological effect of any report of a government deficit or surplus. On the basis of whether or not there is a reported deficit or surplus—or even of the reported over-all size of the government's financial operation—decisions are likely to be made which affect the "real" financial position: functions may be curtailed or added, taxes lowered or raised.

Appendix Tables illustrate the effects of the budgetary changes, and there are a series of "Historical Notes" appended—extracts from various sources "not readily available to the public." In the reviewer's opinion, these serve no function and should have been omitted. How payment for Florida was financed might interest an historian, but it sheds no light on present problems.

The third item under review consists of two documents, plus appendixes. The first document, a brief five pages, titled "The Need for Further Budget Reform," is a joint statement of policy by NPA committees. The statement urges increasing use of "economic projection" in national budgeting and economic management and longer-range perspectives in budget formulation and authorization—with appropriate institutional changes. In this connection, it is urged that the Joint Committee on the Economic Report (appropriately renamed) be given the assignment of taking the long and broad view, since at the present time, "no congressional committee gives specific consideration to the budget as a whole."

The monograph by Gerhard Colm, with the assistance of Marilyn Young, titled "The Federal Budget and the National Economy" is a gem. Here in fifty-six pages is a useful summary of much past and contemporary budgetary practice, a lucid exposition of various alternative "budget rules," and a well-presented argument for a "rule" proposed by the authors.

The problem as it is presented is one of "finding a way by which economically sound and politically sound rules of budget policy can be reconciled" (p. 40). The "political rule" is that of a "balanced budget." This sentiment cannot be ignored; it is an important political fact. Moreover, it is solidly rooted in the fact that some sort of "discipline" is needed when the market discipline of private-enterprise budgeting is not present. On the other hand, public events during recent decades have produced a situation in which government fiscal policy and national economic life are intimately related; and economic theory that justifies government fiscal and economic policies in the interests of stability or high productivity is now widely accepted.

Colm and Young examine seriatim "The Balanced Budget Rule," "Balancing the Budget over the Cycle," "Balancing the Consolidated Cash Budget," "Balancing the Budget under Conditions of High Employment," and "Balancing the Budget of Current Expenditures." All are found inadequate for the task. The authors take "full employment" as the keystone of good budget policy, but they seek to avoid what they regard as rigidities and inadequacies of past schemes. What they envisage depends upon a "sanguine opinion of the possibilities of economic analysis." They urge that the economic projections now used intramurally be published and that budgeting, fiscal and economic policy be based thereupon. This means institutional adjustments, for example the bringing together with greater flexibility in policy execution of "full employment" and "budgeting" apparatuses and longer time-spans in policy making. The argument is cogent. But obviously the scheme implies a degree of trust in economists and in politicians and bureaucrats which, as a nation, we are a long distance from having.

The two appendixes, "Four Concepts of Federal Receipts and Expenditures" and "Federal Capital Assets and the U. S. Budget," are recommended for anyone who wants a good twenty-minute course on these subjects.

DWIGHT WALDO.

University of California (Berkeley).

Nationalism and Revolution in Mongolia. BY OWEN LATTIMORE. With a translation from the Mongol of Sh. Nachukdorji's Life. BY OWEN LATTIMORE AND URGUNGGE ONON. (New York: Oxford University Press. Issued under the auspices of The International Secretariat, Institute of Pacific Relations. 1955. Pp. x, 186. $4.75.)

The posthumous demotion of Stalin from his place in the Communist pantheon has aroused natural speculation as to the fate of its minor deities. Such a one is undoubtedly the Mongol Sukebatur who, before his death in 1923 at the age of thirty, had played a dominant role in the series of events by which Outer Mongolia secured Soviet aid in order to free itself from Chinese and "White" Russian invasion, and by so doing slid itself firmly into the orbit of a Soviet satellite from which it has never since been shifted. In 1943 a brief life of Sukebatur was published in Outer Mongolia by Sh. Nachukdorji, and it is a translation of this work by Professor Lattimore and one of his Mongol collaborators, Urgungge Onon, that forms Part II of the present volume. The work, which is, incidentally, probably the first modern Mongol work to be made available in a western translation, is interesting as an example of Communist hagiography among a still comparatively primitive people and also for the light it throws on the way in which the ruling circles in Outer Mongolia saw the early history of their régime at the time of writing.

Professor Lattimore's introduction, which takes up the first half of the volume, deals with the whole question of historical reputations in countries where historical writing is a conscious part of political indoctrination, with particular reference to the changes in the role ascribed to Sukebatur himself and to his successor Choibalsang. It also contains an account of the historical relationships of the Mongols with the Chinese and with the Manchu Empire, and the repercussions on Mongolia's economy and society of the increasing nineteenth-century involvement of China with the world market. In the light of these developments Professor Lattimore is able to give a convincing explanation of how Mongolia became first a satellite of Tsarist Russia, which was interested in creating a buffer-State here, and subsequently of Soviet Russia. The latter development, which was essentially a seeking-out of Soviet aid for the purposes of assisting both in keeping the country's independence of China and in fulfilling the aspirations of a revolutionary segment of the population, leads Professor Lattimore on to a general discussion of the nature of the "satellite" relationship. So far, certainly, Mongolia has been the best working-model of such a relationship; though one may wonder how the opening of direct railroad connections between Russia and China across its territory (announced in January, 1956) may affect its role in the future. The question is whether the model is of general application.

It may be worth quoting Professor Lattimore's definition (p. 41):

The unmistakable satellite may be defined as the country whose domestic policies, as well as its international relations, simply cannot be discussed with candor and realism without reference to the domestic policies, social and economic character, or "way of life" of the protecting or controlling country in whose orbit it moves. There are also, however, countries that have much less effective sovereignty than the satellite, such as the protectorate and finally the colony, whose sovereignty is institutionally vested in the possessing country. An essential difference between these classes of countries with abated sovereignty or no sovereignty at all is that the satellite is under strong pressure, sometimes amounting to coercion, to remodel its internal life, social structure, political institutions, and economic methods on those of the country in whose orbit it moves, while normally the protectorate and the colony are prevented, by the policies of the protecting or owning country, from doing these very things.

It may be remarked that Professor Lattimore's view of the "colony" or "protectorate" is a somewhat one-sided one; Professor Lattimore's principal weakness has always been an unreasoning prejudice against the "Colonial" Powers; and it may well be that there are other reasons besides their objections why their protectorates and colonies, or some of them, do not move towards assimilation of the Colonial Power's political or economic institutions in every respect.

With this warning it is worth quoting Professor Lattimore's own list of the satellite characteristics (p. 42):

1. The régime in the satellite country came to power with the aid of the régime in the country in whose orbit it moves.
2. The régime in the satellite country does not merely accept, but actively wants the satellite relationship.
3. It could not survive without the support and protection of the dominating power.
4. The individuals, social classes, or groups within classes who are the core of the régime identify their interests with those of the dominating country (and those of the régime in the dominating country) more unequivocally and more consciously than does the population at large.
5. Outside of the régime there exists in the satellite country either an actual or a potential, latent opposition which is as hostile to the protector of the régime as it is to the régime itself.
6. If the opposition were to overthrow the régime, the result would probably not be full independence but gravitation into the orbit of some country other than, and probably hostile to, the country protecting the actual régime.
7. The régime in the satellite state therefore must, and wants to, model itself on the régime in the protecting country; its aim is to develop the satellite state under policies that will eventually make it homogeneous in social composition, economic characteristics, and political institutions with the state in whose orbit it moves. It regards the fulfillment of such policies as a desirable process of catching up.
8. Because of all the foregoing characteristics, any variations within the dominant state are promptly reflected within the satellite state.

In the light of this analysis, Professor Lattimore is able to develop a theory of the nature of Soviet expansionism and its peculiar features, which is certainly a considerable advance on the well-worn and fruitless theme of "parallels" between it and Tsarist "imperialism." For one thing, it enables one to look for differences where they exist; and these differences may still prove to have their importance. China is clearly an ally, not a satellite; and North Korea is thus the only other Asian nation to "enjoy" satellite status; in Europe we have Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania and Bulgaria on Professor Lattimore's list, to which presumably we should add Albania. Elsewhere, Professor Lattimore's concept of the "irreversible minimum" (i.e., the friendly buffer-State) as the basis of Soviet policy pending further periods of Communist expansion enables him to explain the fact that Finland, for instance, has escaped this role. On the other hand, in one way the Mongolian example may be misleading, because in the case of all the European satellites with the exception of Czechoslovakia, it is difficult to see that the initial impetus to create a satellite régime came from within. The nearest parallel to Outer Mongolia would actually be Yugoslavia, which is for the moment not a satellite at all.

It is the fact that the Soviet Union so clearly intended to overstep, for instance in the case of Poland, the "irreversible minimum" that makes it hard to agree with Professor Lattimore's view that "there is evidence that the Russian leadership . . . hoped towards the end of the war and for a while after it that there was going to be 'peaceful co-existence' " (p. 65), unless what he has in mind is the very special meaning of "peaceful co-existence" from which the Soviet Union has never in fact departed at any stage. Nevertheless the Mongolian story is worth having for the light it throws on Asia if not on Europe; and the present volume is one more of the many services which Professor Latti-more's particular knowledge of the Inner Asian frontiers of China over the centuries has enabled him to render to students of contemporary affairs.

MAX BELOFF.

Nuffield College, Oxford.

Law in the Middle East. Volume 1: Origin and Development of Islamic Law.

EDITED BY MAJID KHADDURI AND HERBERT J. LIEBESNY. (Washington, D.C.: The Middle East Institute. 1955. Pp. ix, 395. $7.50.)

War and Peace in the Law of Islam. BY MAJID KHADDURI. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1955. Pp. x, 321. $5.50.)

Islam is the religion of one sixth of mankind—the faith of overwhelming majorities in some sixteen nations from Morocco to Indonesia and of substantial minorities in a wide belt from the Gold Coast to the Philippines. The Middle Eastern core of this Islamic region has received a good deal of attention from Western students of history and politics ever since the rise of European power and the decline of the Ottoman Empire created what our ancestors called the Eastern Question. Quite recently, moreover, political scientists have proceeded from the traditional study of Middle Eastern diplomatic entanglements to a more systematic exploration of the domestic political forces that determine the region's response to its international environment. Among these forces the religious, intellectual, and legal tradition of Islam, holds without a doubt a crucial place; yet it is safe to say that Islam in its legal aspects has remained terra incognita for all but a small circle of experts.

The Middle East Institute, by inviting a select group of such experts to undertake a concise and authoritative survey of the major facets of Muslim law, has gone a long way toward charting this territory for the layman. The result has been a collective work on Law in the Middle East, of which the first volume, subtitled Origins and Development of Islamic Law, has just been published. The fifteen chapters have been contributed by fourteen specialists, nine of them prominent Middle Eastern teachers or practitioners of law and five of them scholars of Western Europe and this country. In content they range from historical studies of the development of Muslim constitutional doctrine and of the origin and sources of the shari'a (or sacred law) to a systematic analysis of family law, penal law, the law of contract and of pious foundations, and judicial organization and procedure. A chapter on "Shi'i Legal Theories" touches on an important topic generally overlooked by those who equate Islam with sunni (or orthodox) Islam. The evolution of Islamic law after the fifteenth century is highlighted in a chapter on "The Development of the Shari'a in the Ottoman Empire," and European influences are reflected in chapters on "The Development of Western Judicial Privileges" and on "The Majalla," a nineteenth-century Ottoman codification of the law of contracts and torts. Professor Khadduri, whose chapter on "International Law" concludes the volume, has treated the same matter more fully in his War and Peace in the Law of Islam, an expanded and revised version of a book first published in London in 1941.

In his preface to the volume on Law in the Middle East the late Justice Robert H. Jackson strikingly observes that "in its source, its scope, and its sanctions, the law of the Middle East is the antithesis of Western law." Law in the West has long been a secular concern, whereas Islamic law rests in large part on the divine revelation of the Koran. Yet the gap, for a variety of reasons, is perhaps not so wide as it might seem. Muhammad was the founder of a commonwealth as well as of a religion—to a Muslim indeed the two aspects of his work are all but indistinguishable. Partly as a result, Islam has never developed a priesthood as a distinct class interceding between the believer and the Deity, so that the sway of Islamic law does not necessarily imply priestly rule over worldly affairs. The Koran itself is only one, albeit the most revered and least changeable, of the four recognized sources of the shari'a. Muslim legal doctrine thus does not conform to the rigid patterns that a Westerner might expect to find in a body of religious law. Two other sources—consensus and analogy—provided much room for flexibility, even though their use was frowned upon in later centuries. The most important non-Koranic source was the sunna, or practice of the Prophet and his companions as attested by verbal tradition from generation to generation in early Islam. As Professor Joseph Schacht demonstrates in his two chapters on the subject, these traditions became a favorite device in the hands of early Muslim jurists for expanding the Koranic legal doctrine, as revealed in the Arabian trading centers of Mecca and Medina, and adapting it to the needs and customs of conquered populations in Syria, Iraq, and elsewhere. The later coexistence of four different schools of law, each adhering to its own interpretation of basic doctrines yet all alike recognized as "orthodox," is vivid testimony to the flexibility and pragmatism of early Muslim jurisprudence. In some of the large urban centers, we learn, the defendant in a suit brought before one judge even was given the choice of having it transferred to another judge of his own school. At all times, moreover the shari'a was supplemented with the edicts of rulers and the customs of communities.

In its careful attention to precedent, in its slow accretion and steady amalgamation of disparate elements, Muslim law would seem to display a certain affinity to the Anglo-American tradition of common law. One contributor even suggests that the Muslim law of pious endowments may have directly influenced the much later development of the concept of use or trust in English law. This affinity between Muslim and Western law would probably have emerged with even greater clarity if, in a text intended primarily for the layman, the editors had checked the tendency of some of the contributors to overuse Arabic technical terms. Some two hundred such terms are explained in a four-page glossary. A good half of these, nevertheless, have close English equivalents which could conveniently have been substituted in the text; and surely the reader could have been spared the trouble of having to digest, without benefit of glossary entry or parenthetical translation, such Arabic phrases as "ahlu-l 'adl wa'l-tawhīd" ("People of Justice and Monotheism," a name given by Shī'īs to their own group) or "ikhtilāf uṣūl al-madhāhib" ("conflict among the sources of the schools of law").

In a prefatory note to Law in the Middle East, the late Mr. George Camp

Keiser, Chairman of the Middle East Institute's Board of Governors, indicates that a survey of "the modern legal systems of the Middle Eastern countries" is planned as a second volume. One hopes that Mr. Keiser's successors will make it possible for the editors to proceed to the completion of the work without undue delay, and that the active cooperation of leading scholars both in the West and in the Middle East itself will again be enlisted. The first volume accurately reflects the present state of scholarship in the field by dealing largely with the theories and doctrines which Muslim jurisprudence has developed since the early centuries of Islam. Similarly, Professor Khadduri's work on War and Peace gives a lucid exposition of the development of legal relations between Islam and non-Islamic communities. A suitable topic for the forthcoming second volume, on the other hand, might be "Law and Society in the Middle East." In it the reader would expect to find a discussion of such topics as the relationship of law as dispensed by the qāḍī in the city to the autonomous legal usage of villages and nomadic tribes; the changing patterns of recruitment and training for the legal profession; and the effect of the Islamic prohibition of usury on modern commerce and banking. And no one would be better qualified than Professor Khadduri to supplement his present work with a systematic examination of legal relations among nations within the Islamic community—from the peace treaty of 1555 between Sultan Sulayman and Shah Tahmasp to the Arab League of our own day. By helping in some such fashion to bridge the historic gap between legal doctrine and legal practice in the Middle East Professor Khadduri and Dr. Liebesny will greatly augment the debt of gratitude that students of comparative law and comparative politics already owe them.

DANKWART A. RUSTOW.

Princeton University.

Proposals for Changes in the United Nations. BY FRANCIS O. WILCOX AND CARL M. MARCY. (Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution. 1955. Pp. xiv, 537. $5.00.)

The Tenth General Assembly has secured at least a two-year breathing period during which the Members of the United Nations may consider what changes in the Charter are desirable in the light of experience since 1945. The study under review should be required reading for both officials and non-officials confronting the general and specific problems of revising the United Nations system. Wilcox and Marcy have written a scholarly work that analyzes in close, discriminating detail the various proposals for change that have been advanced by governments, interest groups, and individuals. Furthermore, they cite the experience of the United Nations to date that has given rise to the various proposals. Developments in the United States receive particular attention principally because this government has been more interested than most in Charter review, and because many Americans, for widely varying reasons, want to revise the Charter. Students of international affairs will wish to examine also the studies prepared by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace for the views of governments other than the United States, and the specific proposals of the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace.

The authors are admirably qualified for their task. Both have served in the State Department and on the staff of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate. Indeed, their work is essentially a staff paper although its style and readability will commend themselves to the interested lay reader. The work furnishes evidence of the careful policy planning that, since the Dumbarton Oaks Conference, has characterized the definition of American interests with respect to international organization. Policy planning of such calibre and involving cooperation at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue can exploit in a positive way the division of foreign policy control between two independent branches of government. It also accepts as a major premise ultimate control by public opinion. Such care in the formulation of foreign policy under the separation of powers is not a guarantee against error, but it has gone a long way to chart the shoals on which foreign policy can founder. The reader may be forgiven for speculating how foreign affairs might have been conducted in 1919-20, or 1935-39, if the Federal Government had had such able staff work at the fingertips of both Presidents and Congressional leaders shaping our foreign policy.

Changes in the United Nations by Charter amendment will probably be few and far between in the foreseeable future, however, for, as the authors point out, agreement sufficient to command the necessary two-thirds support is not likely. Should such agreement be forthcoming, there remains the well-nigh insuperable obstacle of big-power unanimity which is required for all amendments. For example, some member governments as well as pressure groups within governments seek to restrict the organization's authority, while others wish to expand it. Attitudes, of course, vary with the changes proposed.

Both expectations and interest in Charter amendment procedure have dwindled markedly since the bitter struggles at San Francisco in which the small powers exacted the assurance of Charter "review" at the end of ten years as part of their pound of flesh for the big-power "veto." But the lack of amendments has not resulted in a dearth of changes. The organization has grown quite differently from what was expected of the fledgling hatched at the San Francisco Conference. "The Charter, like the Constitution, has proven flexible enough to be adapted to many new situations without the need for formal amendment" (p. 9). Yet, the authors hasten to add, "the amending process set forth in the Charter is a comparatively flexible one," since many treaties cannot be amended without the support of all the signatories (p. 26).

The methods used to effect changes in the United Nations without amendment are set forth in considerable detail. Certain articles of the Charter have never been applied; others have been interpreted by custom and usage to mean something quite different from what the framers at San Francisco first said they meant; supplementary agreements like the Headquarters Agreement have been concluded; subsidiary organs have been created, some of them in spite of bitter disagreement among the Security Council's permanent members, as in the case of the Interim Committee and the Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea. One need only recall how the balance in security matters has shifted from the Security Council to the General Assembly—a shift that was unmistakably plain even prior to the Uniting for Peace Resolution during the United Nations action in Korea—to gain some idea of the flexibility inherent in a system that is more political than legal. With the shift in emphasis from cold war to competitive co-existence, one should add, the pendulum may be shifting part way back to the Security Council as suggested by the Hammarskjöld mission to the Middle East. We are reminded, for example, that the role of the International Court of Justice in Charter interpretation is only implied and that the implication is not necessarily firm at that, since the Court's advisory opinions, permitted "on any legal question," have no binding legal effect. Consequently, the Charter may be interpreted pretty much as a majority of the Members wish on any specific issue. To date, the General Assembly, the only United Nations organ to request advisory opinions, has limited itself to seven such requests. Some governments, however, have urged a greater role for the Court in interpreting the Charter.

Although the authors argue that flexibility has been an important means of survival for the United Nations, they warn that "it is necessary to strike a balance somewhere between the extreme positions of loose and strict construction" (p. 461). If unwise attempts are made to seek changes that cannot be achieved by the formal amendment process, the recommendations of United Nations bodies may be ignored and its influence weakened as a consequence.

The authors have made an important contribution both to the study of international organization and to the decision-making process in foreign affairs. The other six volumes in the Brookings series will have to be very good indeed to match the standards set by Wilcox and Marcy.

DANIEL S. CHEEVER.

Harvard University.

Development towards Self-Government in the Caribbean: A Symposium Held under the Auspices of the Netherlands Universities Foundation for International Cooperation at The Hague, September, 1954. (The Hague, Bandung: W. van Hoeve, Ltd. 1955. Pp. xi, 285).

These papers, published by the Netherlands Universities Foundation for International Cooperation, were originally delivered by French, Dutch, British, and American scholars who participated in a series of discussions at The Hague in September of 1954. Apart from the excellence of the individual contributions the outstanding impression one draws from these essays is the excellence of the Caribbean as a laboratory for the study of constitutional and economic development against the background of the forces of nationalism, the struggle of small economic units for survival, and the factors promoting federation as a solution. Few areas in the world present such interesting facets for study by the political scientist.

What emerges is the striking similarity of approach, both on the part of the peoples of the different Caribbean areas discussed and of the outside powers involved. As Dr. Henry Wells, a mainland American and Professor of Political Science at the University of Puerto Rico, points out in one of his papers, dependent peoples face the three choices of assimilation, association, and independence. With the exception of Martinique and Guadeloupe, which in 1946 achieved the status of French departments, assimilation has been rejected. Independence has followers in Puerto Rico but, in the general election of November of 1952, this group polled only 19 per cent of the votes cast. In the British West Indies, the desire for federation has won a clear victory, independence being conceived in terms of ultimate dominion status. In the case of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, the new Kingdom of the Netherlands is based on association and the desire to maintain ties with the Netherlands instead of completely rupturing the relationships. As to the powers involved, since World War II each has moved rapidly to satisfy the aspiration for self-government and, although the particular measures taken have varied, the same core of realism and intelligent adaptation to postwar pressures has prevailed.

That the solution chosen for the French West Indies was assimilation need cause no surprise, since as the authors of the papers concerned (Eugene Revert, George Spitz, and Luc Fauvel) make clear, little nationalist sentiment exists in these islands, where cultural and economic ties with France have always been strong. The British West Indies present perhaps the most fascinating complex of problems. Consisting of eight separate governments, with marked differences in historical background and constitutional and economic development, stretching over a wide area, their evolution towards federation and the now near goal of dominion status evidences what clear-headed statemanship can achieve. C. M. MacInnes and E. W. Evans present an excellent analysis of the political evolution of these governments, showing how as late as 1939 the principles of Crown Colony government were re-affirmed and responsible government was not considered appropriate for the West Indian Colonies, although sympathy was given to the principle of increasing popular representation in the local legislatures. But, with World War II and a new declaration of the aims of British colonial policy, there is a break with the past, and efforts are directed towards promoting the transition to responsible government. The fruits of this new policy are seen in the new Jamaica Constitution of 1944 which, as modified in 1953, fixed the leadership in a policy-determining Executive Committee, consisting of ministers selected by the lower house, the latter itself elected entirely on the basis of universal adult suffrage. With this new Jamaica Constitution as a model, semi-responsible government was also introduced in Trinidad and other territories of the British Caribbean. However, in a penetrating analysis of power factors, Colin A. Hughes stresses that West Indian political parties, in the past weak and prone to fragmentation, now face the necessity of organizing a "stable party system," which is "the only basis on which the responsible government towards which they are advancing can be worked."

Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles now also enjoy autonomy. The Netherlands, influenced by its experience in Indonesia and in fulfillment of war-time pledges by Queen Wilhelmina, had made their autonomy complete by 1950. J. H. A. Logemann analyzes the legal characteristics of the new Kingdom of the Netherlands which came into being at the end of 1954. Surinam, the Netherlands Antilles, and the Netherlands participate on the basis of equality in the new Kingdom but, since "equality in status" could not be "reconciled with a disparity in function," the leadership of the Netherlands is accepted in those fields where the "small Caribbean territories can hardly rely on their own strength." Logemann shows how both negative and positive forces explain the desire for association. Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles have no desire to associate with any other country in their area and, at the same time, they do "bear a clear Dutch cultural imprint." Furthermore, the present arrangement does not prevent possible independence for either in the future, since the Kingdom can be dissolved by agreement of all three partners.

If economic motives and reasoned self-interest give the clue to both the emerging British Federation of the West Indies and the Kingdom of the Netherlands, they also explain the new Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. Cultural differences and political realities make statehood only a remote possibility; poverty in resources and economic dependence on the United States cause most Puerto Ricans not only to spurn but also to fear independence. As Wells shows, with its new constitution the island is no longer to be considered non-self-governing, and it has possibilities of even a wider measure of freedom in the future. Thus, the picture for all these small units in the Caribbean—whether British, Dutch, or Americans are involved—presents striking similarities, above all in the flexible nature of the agreements reached.

This is an area of the globe from which much will undoubtedly be heard in the future. These papers, which also include a summary of the discussions and an excellent bibliography, constitute a valuable contribution to the literature.

FELIX A. NIGRO.

Advanced School of Public Administration, San José, Costa Rica.

Economics and Public Policy: Brookings Lectures, 1954. BY ARTHUR SMITHIES, JOSEPH J. SPENGLER, FRANK H. KNIGHT, JOHN JEWKES, JACOB VINER, AND LIONEL ROBBINS. (Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution. 1955. Pp. vii, 157. $2.00.)

As nuclear physicists have lately learned, the road from science to policy is hard. It is (or should be) a road more familiar, perhaps, to the economist than to other social scientists; for the economist has—historically and even today—been relied on much more heavily for policy advice than have his colleagues in the other social sciences. It is all the more interesting, then, that familiarity seems, in this case, to breed respect rather than contempt for the difficulties involved.

This, at any rate, seems to be true of the six distinguished economists—four from the United States (one via Canada), two from England—who in 1954 delivered at the Brookings Institution the six lectures that form the essays in the volume under review.

It would be tedious to review each essay, even if that were possible in this short space. As one might expect, not all the essays are of equal quality; but this is the usual fault of such a series. One kind of unevenness is worth mentioning: one is struck particularly by the variations in style. The Englishmen, of course, write much more fluent prose than the Americans, who sometimes seem to have composed with pens tipped in tar—or typewriters stuffed with cold oatmeal.

Equally striking is the familiarity of the problems, of the alternatives posed, and of the answers proposed, a fact that suggests two observations. First, the essential problems of translating theoretical knowledge into policy are about the same, irrespective of content. And second, economists do not have any solutions to these problems noticeably more sophisticated than those bandied about for some time among political scientists. The first is encouraging, for it indicates that the problems can be fruitfully studied independent of content—at least in part. The second is depressing, for one is entitled to the hope that economists, with their relatively more powerful tools for theoretical analysis, might plumb the depths a little more deeply.

What then are these problems? There is, to begin with, the old familiar question of the limitations of “science” in determining policy. As Arthur Smithies points out in the opening essay, it was not so long ago that welfare economists under the influence of Pigou were extraordinarily (one is tempted to say naively) optimistic about the possibilities of determining unequivocally the “social optimum” by means of theorems deduced from a small number of apparently acceptable postulates. By now, most economists seem to have rejected this view in favor of what is surely the more sensible position that economic theory can, at most, throw some light on some of the probable consequences of some of the alternatives—some of the time.

There is also, of course, the closely related and equally ancient, if steadfastly difficult, problem of the interplay of fact and value in social theory. Smithies comes out unequivocally for the argument that since policymaking presupposes standards by which to evaluate alternatives, in his policy functions the economist must necessarily make some value commitments, and he had better do so quite openly and consciously. One might have hoped that in his concluding essay Lionel Robbins would have provided the counterargument, for which he is perhaps best known among political scientists, that the economist, qua economist, has no business, competence, or right to mix his own value judgments with his predictions about the probable economic consequences of different alternatives. But, as usually happens in collections of this kind, Robbins takes up a different topic (freedom and order) and so Robbins and Smithies talk right past one another. Even Frank Knight, to whom this territory is an old battleground, refuses to be tempted into this particular battle. Knight’s essay, by the way, is only remotely related to the alleged subject of the book; it is characteristically Knight-ian, and rather delightful. Reading Knight is a little like climbing a mountain with no trail; the labor required is prodigious and the underbrush is often overwhelming, but from time to time you do break out on some quite dazzling perspectives.

A third problem might be called the dilemma of rigor versus relevance. To use a fanciful analogue, there seems to be a kind of Heisenberg Uncertainty Relation between the rigor of a social theory and its relevance to policy making. Beyond a certain level, an increase in rigor seems to be accompanied by a decrease in relevance, and conversely. In his essay, Jacob Viner has some words on this point that strike me as exceedingly wise, and I find myself wishing that economists would read and ponder his advice. Viner is in a peculiarly strategic position to comment intelligently on the issues involved, for he has made his mark as a theorist and at the same time he has had to deal responsibly with hard questions of policy. No one is more acutely aware than he that much of the most rigorous, elegant, and internally consistent theory in contemporary economics has slight relevance to questions of public policy.

There are other problems, but space permits mention of only one more. This is the question whether the economists can "without stepping outside their discipline, predict in the sense of telling us what will happen in the future." John Jewkes, who poses the question, argues with great force that they cannot, a view that is bound to make him unpopular with a great many of his colleagues. Political scientists, who are notoriously incapable of forecasting anything whatsoever that might not have been equally well or even more successfully predicted by a good newspaper reporter, may derive some wry satisfaction from the hard blows that Jewkes rains down on his fellow economists. For my part, any temporary elation arising out of the belief that we are all equally ignorant is quickly dispelled by the realization that if what Jewkes says is true, then we are still pretty much at the mercy of impalpable and uncontrollable economic forces.

In sum, then, one should look upon this volume as a well-tempered, somewhat meandering, and sometimes rewarding discussion of problems that have been of central concern to political scientists, and for which the economists also seem to have no new answers.

ROBERT A. DAHL.

Yale University.

The Age of Reform: From Bryan to F. D. R. By RICHARD HOFSTADTER. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1955. Pp. viii, 328. $4.00.)

If, as Hegel observed, "the owl of Minerva flies only at dusk," the reform epoch in American history must now be officially over, for the scholarly owls are in full and vigorous feather. Howard Quint in The Forging of American Socialism, David Shannon in The Socialist Party of America, and Daniel Bell in "Marxian Socialism in the United States" (in Egbert and Persons, Eds., Socialism and American Life) have performed the burial service for American Socialism; Robert Morlan has given the last rites to the Non-Partisan League in Political Prairie Fire; and Hofstadter's Age of Reform now joins Eric Goldman's Rendezvous with Destiny as an over-all interpretation of the relatively brief, but hectic and tumultuous, span of years which saw the transformation of the United States from a predominantly agrarian society to an industrial colossus.

Professor Hofstadter has written a superb book. Some Professional Scholars may cavil that the work is "not original" since the author has profited from and cited the work of others, and a few may complain of "journalism", for the style is lucid and stimulating. But, in my estimation, The Age of Reform entitles Hofstadter to rank with C. Vann Woodward as a master of creative synthesis, as an interpreter of the past who can add to cold data an empathetic insight that transforms history from a book of the dead into a chronicle of life.

Hofstadter has presented an essentially "revisionist" treatment of the reform era. Liberal historians, following the great trail blazed by the Beards, have generally dealt with the reformers in a most uncritical fashion. In nuce, they described a struggle between the Powers of Light and the Powers of Darkness for the salvation of the American Soul. Assumed implicitly by this school was the inherent nobility of the Common Man: once mobilized, the People would instinctively rally to the righteous flag of reform. Thus the key to analysis of the period became the slogan, "The People against the Interests." True, there have been dissents registered against this Manicheism: studies such as Woodward's Tom Watson and Albert Kirwan's Revolt of the Rednecks suggested that there was much more ambivalence in the reform tradition than the Beards and their following had recognized. But it was left for Hofstadter, perhaps as the spokesman for a generation that has seen the Common Man rallied as often against the cause of freedom as for it, to destroy once and for all the myth of the Golden Age of reform when, in true western movie style, the Goods rode forth against the Bads and the issue was joined with no complexities to trouble the consciences of the sensitive.

Some corybantic liberals have seen Hofstadter's approach as another sell-out to the "New Conservatism," but such a charge is as childish as it is inaccurate. Hofstadter is a liberal historian and, unless one believes that illusions about his ancestors are mandatory equipment for the liberal, he has strengthened rather than weakened the liberal tradition. In fact, a frank recognition of the liabilities of the reform tradition is symptomatic of a new maturity of the liberal viewpoint and a willingness to face the unpleasant reality that the Good Crusade must be launched most frequently on behalf of a partial truth.

Since a review is not an abridgment, suffice it here to say that Hofstadter has demonstrated effectively that the reformers were a mixed bag. He has subdivided the tradition into rural and urban wings—the Populists and the Progressives—and indicated the strengths and weaknesses of each. His discussion of the Populists is particularly suggestive, for he points out that the pseudo-radicalism of the agrarian reformers was actually founded on a militant devotion to the capitalism of Adam Smith which found itself frustrated at every turn by the subversive, anti-capitalist activities of big business. Similarly, he suggests, the seeming radicalism of the Progressives was based primarily on a nostalgic conviction that the United States should remain a nation of small businessmen. The unity that existed between the urban and rural reformers was thus built around the politics of nostalgia rather than an ideology—a fact that was both its immediate strength and its long-run weakness.

I have three criticisms to register, or perhaps two criticisms and one semantic quibble. First, Professor Hofstadter has neglected entirely the Socialists, and the latter group, in my opinion, deserves inclusion in his "Progressive" category. While the Socialist Party had its quota of ideologists and Marx-choppers, its great success in the period 1900-1914 must be understood in terms of its reformist characteristics. When the Socialists elected mayors, it was no tribute to the power of doctrine, but rather was explicable only as triumphs of local, municipal reform programs. Boss control of both old parties led reform elements to adopt the Socialist label, and the success of "gas and water socialism" should be added in with the reform victories achieved on the non-Socialist line. It was when the American Socialist Party tried to be Socialist in the dogmatic sense that it lost its rank and file. This loss is not apparent in the membership totals because as the "gas and water socialists" departed from the organization their places were taken by an influx of members, largely in the foreign language federations, attracted by the Russian Revolution. As Morlan has pointed out, the Non-Partisan League was inspired by ex-socialists alienated by the doctrinaire position of the Party on agriculture.

Second, I disagree with Hofstadter's attempt to disengage the New Deal from the reform tradition. His thesis, in brief, is that the impetus and direction of the New Deal marked a break with the main currents of reform, and that the Roosevelt administration abandoned the decentralist, laissez-faire goals of past reforms for a new set of quasi-Hamiltonian objectives. Here I have the feeling that Hofstadter over-exerted his talents in order to disagree with Goldman. As James MacGregor Burns's recently published analysis of Roosevelt's political leadership demonstrates, the roots of the New Deal were inextricably lodged in the reform tradition, notably that of the Wilson administration.

Third, Hofstadter attacks the central thesis of Eric Goldman's book, namely, that the reform movement was spiritually vitiated by its own pragmatism. What began as a moral crusade for Good ended up with cold ethical relativism and a willingness among New Dealers to employ any means to achieve their goals. Here, in what seems to me a factitious effort to disagree with Goldman, Hofstadter has wandered off into a semantic cul de sac. When he asserts that the reformers suffered, if anything, from moral imperialism rather than amoral relativism, he is actually describing the other side of Goldman's coin. For who can be more ruthless and amoral as to means than the moral imperialist? As the instance of Roosevelt suggests, a man with sublime faith in his own good motives and political telos is capable of almost any variety of chicanery without even becoming aware of the objective contradictions. Absent a sense of humility such as Lincoln's, the actions of the Moral Man are by definition moral actions and the reform tradition has never been conspicuous in its humility.

JOHN P. ROCHE.

Brandeis University.

Conservatism in America. BY CLINTON ROSSITER. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1955. Pp. 325. $4.00.)

After noting the apparent advance during the last few years of a "creeping conservatism" in the United States which has brought to power leaders who know little about the nature, logic, and principles of a consistent Conservative philosophy, Professor Rossiter proceeds in Conservatism in America to attempt to define such a philosophy in general, to review the history of conservative thought in the United States, and to make a try at formulating a working doctrine of conservatism for the America of the immediate future. This he does as well as it can be done for a country which lacks a feudal tradition and a dominant conservative church, which has hitherto had a fluid class structure, which has always believed in change and progress, which has long pinned its faith to democracy and individualism and to an essentially restraining and power-dispersing constitutionalism, and which in general has abhorred logical ideologies whether of the right or left and has preferred to pursue a pragmatic course and to avoid the neat formulations of political philosophy in the European sense of that term.

In his rapid review of conservative ideas in the American past, the writer demonstrates that, except for some fixed fundamental ideas accepted for the most part by liberals as well as conservatives, there has been little consistency or logic in the evolution of a body of conservative thought in this country. Perhaps the nearest approach may be found in the systematic thinking of men like John Adams and John C. Calhoun and the basic attitudes of Alexander Hamilton and the Federalists. These thinkers owed little, however, to European Conservatism as propounded by men like Edmund Burke.

In the course of the 19th and 20th centuries American conservatism was forced to make compromises with the overwhelming flood of democracy and the rapid momentum of industrial and population growth and social change. This is exemplified in the thought of Daniel Webster and many other leaders. Moreover, basically, the liberalism of such leaders as Jackson, Lincoln, the Roosevelts, and Wilson was grounded upon an essentially conservative base. Even Franklin D. Roosevelt provided no new deck or different set of rules for the game but only a "New Deal." The same may be said of the Populists and progressives in general since the Civil War. In short, American conservatism, such as it has been for a century or more, has stood squarely on a liberal foundation, and liberalism, so-called, has never deserted its essentially conservative moorings. Therefore, neither American conservatism nor American liberalism fits into the European conceptions of such terms, and no extreme ideological right or left in the European sense can be found in America.

How, then, can an American philosophy of Conservatism (with a capital "C") be formulated? Professor Rossiter has his doubts and is modest in his suggestions. His "program" for conservatives he characterizes as "at most a series of tentative, hopeful suggestions," and he prays that "no one will mistake them for the Conservative Manifesto of 1955." At best, one wonders if what he suggests is no more than a program which can be agreed upon by moderates who can be described either as "liberal conservatives" or "conservative liberals."

O. DOUGLAS WEEKS.

The University of Texas.

The Decline of American Liberalism. BY ARTHUR A. EKKIRCH, JR. (New York, London, Toronto: Longmans, Green and Company. 1955. Pp. xiii, 401. $7.50.)

It is the author's belief that the classic age of liberalism in America was the period of approximately thirteen years between the Revolution and the adoption of the Constitution. Since then liberalism has been steadily declining.

In order to understand and evaluate Professor Ekirch's interpretation of the fate of liberalism, one must first understand the meaning he attaches to the term. His explicit definition is general. Liberalism is best thought of "not as a well-defined political or economic system, but as a collection of ideas or principles which go to make up an attitude or 'habit of mind'." It must include "the concept of limited representative government and the widest possible freedom of the individual—both intellectually and economically" (p. 2). This is a very flexible definition, but it is not the one used by the author throughout the remainder of the book. His liberalism includes virtually absolute laissez-faire, at least with respect to the national government. The development of a spirit of American nationalism and the increased exercise of its delegated powers by the national government are regarded, with almost no exceptions, as sharply antithetical to liberalism.

Given this meaning for the central concept, the interpretation of American history that follows is obvious if not logical. The author recounts the familiar record of past and present abrogations of intellectual liberty from the Alien and Sedition Acts to the Loyalty-Security programs. Few liberals of any persuasion will dissent from the judgment that these policies did and do represent departures from the tradition of liberalism. Professor Ekirch's interpretation of other policies of the national government is quite another matter. He believes that the trend away from liberalism began with the adoption of the Constitution, for the economic and financial powers which it transferred from the states to the Congress set the stage "for the abandonment of laissez-faire liberalism and the substitution of a policy of economic nationalism or government paternalism" (p. 43). And so the decline of liberalism began and proceeded from Hamilton's financial policies to Jefferson's purchase of Louisiana, to the use of federal funds for internal improvements, to government subsidies for railroad building, to continued high protective tariffs, to Progressive proposals for national regulation of business, to the New Deal and the welfare state, to war and cold war economy.

This is certainly a gloomy interpretation of American history, and except for the author's failure to analyze with precision his central concept, it would be a deeply disturbing one. One example of the resultant confusion is Professor Ekirch's position with respect to the relationship between liberty and equality. He states quite flatly that "Freedom of the individual, for example, conflicts with such democratic principles as equality and majority rule" (p. 1). This may be true, of course, but since it can also be argued that freedom is interrelated to the point of interdependency with these principles, the author's failure to explore this problem reflects the superficiality of his analysis. There is also the unexplained exception of public education from the general principles of laissez-faire, and the similarly unexplained assumption that departures from laissez-faire policy by the national government are more illiberal than those by the states.

These are secondary aspects of Professor Ekirch's failure to explore and define carefully the essence of liberalism. His conception of this philosophy is static, doctrinaire, deterministic, and unrealistic. If liberalism was operative in this country for only thirteen years, then one can hardly escape the conclusion that it was not a viable system of belief. It was a doctrine suited to one segment of the population only, and only as long as agriculture remained primarily a subsistence and not a commercial pursuit. It would therefore appear to be a doctrine more or less environmentally determined, and unrealistic once its parent environment had ceased to exist. It was doubtless an interesting intellectual exercise to judge the history of America from 1789 to the present by this kind of criterion, but I do not think it has added much to our understanding of that history or of liberalism, or to the attempt to preserve and extend freedom for the individual in an age far removed from that of Thomas Jefferson and Daniel Boone.

CECELIA M. KENYON.

Smith College.

A Democrat Looks at His Party. BY DEAN ACHESON. (New York: Harper and Brothers. 1955. Pp. 199. $3.00.)

This is a lively and thoughtful little book which can delight and profit Republicans and Democrats. For much of the discussion is partisan; and when the former Secretary of State writes as a partisan, he is so outrageously, egregiously, and unforgivably partisan that no one needs fear that he will subvert a Republican.

The strongest dose of Democratic adulation is concentrated in early chapters where the author explains his own party identification and his perceptions of the two parties. He became a Democrat in response to the "bugle call" of the progressives. He remained a Democrat because he saw the party as one of youth and vitality. He sees the Democrats as a party of many interests, no one of which can dominate. The Republicans are a party of one interest and are doomed to build solely on the business base. He finds comfort even in the conservatism of the South, an "invaluable asset" to the party. He winds up with a Democratic party so diverse and pluralistic that it thrashes out within itself the consensus that is needed by the general welfare, and the thrashing is so energetic that the party throws up strong, dynamic individuals, "equipped to exercise national leadership." In contrast, the Republicans are a "babel of local voices" who "divorce power from responsibility," "subordinate the Executive to the Congress . . . and the real authors of the mischief are lost in the crowd." Throughout these passages, Mr. Acheson is contributing to what he has felicitously called "the drama and gaiety of the democratic march." He does not attempt to contribute to an understanding of political behavior nor to resolving the strategic quandaries of the Democratic party, the interesting and tough problems of rebuilding a winning majority out of the disparate interests, sections, and minorities.

When he turns to substantive issues of the domestic economy, he is temperate and constructive. He describes the New Deal as a "clinic in the use of innovation to conserve and strengthen fundamental institutions." He frankly judges that there were errors. The N.R.A. was one. The Supreme Court fight he condemns as a "tragic mistake" which "obscured for years . . . the underlying conservatism of the innovations of the New Deal." Of more present interest, he is critical of the confusion of means and ends which has characterized the vested interest in fixed parity prices. He reminds Democrats that empiricism has got to remain empirical. In the era of the "moderates" it is not surprising that the author sets out no agenda for further policy experiments.

On foreign policy, however, Mr. Acheson has positive and firm advice. Rejecting on the one hand preventive war, and on the other a too easy hope of abolishing nuclear weapons, he speaks earnestly and clearly for sustained effort appropriate to the true and terrible dimensions of Communist designs. He calls for a nuclear striking power as a deterrent, for a defensive armament against nuclear attack, and for a military establishment which can deal with threats which do not involve nuclear weapons. As a good partisan, he gets into a verbal row with Republicans over the "new" policy of retaliation "instantly by means and at places of our choosing." The difference between the policy of deterrence and of retaliation has never had great potential for a political campaign. But the plea Mr. Acheson makes for recognizing in our present dilemmas the importance of limited wars is central to the issue being drawn between the parties. It is a debate that needs to be pursued vigorously if the democratic process is to fashion a durable foreign policy. It is not necessarily a contribution to clear and constructive thought for Democrats to focus on the alleged parsimony of the business interests. The Republicans, we are told, are "based so exclusively upon business interests and the business point of view" that they cannot easily pursue a sound military and economic foreign policy because it costs too much. The argument may tickle the fancy of confirmed Democrats. It is not much help in illuminating for the citizen the character of the difficult choices that confront us.

Finally, the author spells out his profound concern over the consequences of the loyalty investigations. He accepts for the Democratic administration responsibility for a policy which he is "now convinced was a grave mistake and a failure to foresee consequences which were inevitable." The mistake lay in seeking the illusion of complete security. The consequences have been a bogging down in thought control, hindrances to scientific endeavor, badly weakened morale in the foreign service, and potentially a dangerous weighting in favor of the state in the relationship between individual and government. The author has little to say about the social tensions and frustrations which culminated in our recent debates, and indeed he never mentions even so recent a background as the Dies committee and other precursors. But he ends on a note of optimism and calls on the Democrats for a revised fundamental point of view, which he stoutly defends as politically practicable. And so it will be if enough Democrats as well as Republicans have faith in democratic processes.

This is a book filled with much hope and enthusiasm. It has strong partisanship and occasional flashes of pique. But the argument is kept on a level which will serve the development of a consensus between the parties on the major issues, which the author confronts honestly and with a long experience. This is, therefore, an exemplar of fruitful democratic politics, and not an analysis of politics.

OLIVER GARCEAU

The Ford Foundation.

L'Idea del Contratto Sociale dai Sofisti alla Riforma: E il "De Principatu" di Mario Salamonio. BY MARIO D'ADDIO. (Milano, Italy: Giuffrè—Editore. 1954. Pp. xxix, 556.)

It is always fascinating to see an important figure in the history of ideas emerge from the shadows which have hitherto surrounded it and become a recognizable person, clearly related to his times. The author of this important book has achieved this feat for Salamonius. There are two parts in d'Addio's work: a history of the development of the social contract doctrine from the Sophists to the Reformation, and a careful, original inquiry into the life, works, and historical significance of Salamonius, the author of the De Principatu. Scholars will be particularly attracted by d'Addio's discussion of Salamonius, for much that is new and important is to be found in it.

Salamonius's position among the Monarchomachs has been well known, as has been his influence on Althusius. Gierke gave him an important role in the history of political thought, and Barker included his work among the classics of the sixteenth century. Gough in his The Social Contract pointed to Salamonius "as a writer of the first importance in the history of the social contract, as important in the history of the social contract proper as Manegold of Lautenbach is in the history of the contract of government." But much that was essential about Salamonius remained shrouded in uncertainty. Following Gierke's tentative identification of him as a Spaniard, both Allen and Gough thought of him as a Spanish Jesuit. Since Salamonius's main work was reissued in Paris in 1578, he has been widely believed to belong to the same historical epoch that produced the Vindiciae Contra Tyrannos and Buchanan's De Jure Regni Apud Scotos. And Gierke puts him, as a Spaniard, in the "Catholic" column in his classification of the Monarchomachs.

The record that d'Addio develops with skill and scholarship is quite a different one. The discovery of two manuscripts of the De Principatu, one in the Vatican Library and the other in the National Library in Rome, made possible a precise dating of its composition. The year was 1513, and the work was dedicated to Pope Leo X. In the same year Machiavelli completed his Prince, dedicated to a grandson of the same pope. As d'Addio points out, "a 'juridical' political theory and a 'realistic' political theory were born at the same time, within the framework of the same tradition of political thought, formulated by two men who had worked together in the government of Florence."

Salamonius was a member of one of the more important aristocratic Roman families, the Salamoni Alberteschi. He was born in 1450 and died in 1534. He occupied positions of notable importance in the governments of the Commune of Rome and of Florence as well as at the Papal Court. He was in Florence from 1498 to 1499 as a colleague of Machiavelli, who had been elected Secretary of the Second Chancellery on June 15, 1498. Later, Salamonius became adviser to Pope Julius II and as such faced Machiavelli no longer as a colleague but as his opponent, during Machiavelli's mission to Rome in 1503. His historical role appears to d'Addio to have been essentially that of the defender of the autonomy of the Commune of Rome against the centralizing tendencies of the Papal curia, and his De Principatu must, therefore, be seen in this light. It was because of the daring of Salamonius's position against the doctrine of papal supremacy that his book, even though dedicated to the pope, was not published during his lifetime and appeared for the first time in Rome in 1544, ten years after the author's death. A friend of both the popes and the Medici, Salamonius was not ready himself to publish a revolutionary book, based on republican and individualistic doctrines.

Thus, Salamonius's theories were fully developed sixty-five years before the appearance of the Vindiciae, and even before the beginnings of the Reformation. His inquiry, aimed at the identification of the sources of sovereignty, is significant for the shift it provides from the notion of a pactum subiectionis as the foundation of government to that of a pactum societatis, itself fruit of the decision of separate individuals to come together and by contract establish the common rules of their political life. Historically the De Principatu is part of the history of the rise and struggles of the city state, and of the tradition which had produced Bartolus and Coluccio Salutati. But Salamonius succeeds in giving to municipal issues a broad theoretical treatment that places his work at the foundation of seventeenth-century contractualist theories.

MARIO EINAUDI.

Cornell University.

Voltaire and the State. BY CONSTANCE ROWE. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 254. $4.00.)

In most discussions of the history of political thought Voltaire has been used as a convenient symbol of the eighteenth century Enlightenment, the moving spirit behind the intellectual assault on the ancien régime. The individuality of Voltaire's political theory has been lost, however, and most students tend to the suspicion that he was really not a person but a collection of witty epigrams. Like Shakespeare, he is full of quotations. Dr. Rowe's volume seeks to correct this by approaching Voltaire as a serious political theorist who deserves to be considered in his own right. She has performed a useful service by sifting through his voluminous writings and organizing his social and political ideas around certain important themes. She discusses his conception of la patrie and makes the persuasive case that it represented a new notion of national loyalty. The discussion then centers on the relationship between the state and the claims of the individual. The conclusion here is that Voltaire held many of the essential postulates of liberal democracy, and that his ideas were more than an apology for the aspirations of the bourgeoisie. The volume closes with an extended analysis of his views on international relations, which tries to show that, despite occasional lapses, Voltaire remained strongly sceptical of the motives and ambitions of rulers and distrustful of imperialist adventures. The book is lucidly written throughout and supported by ample references.

The major difficulty in evaluating this work is that it is not clear what kind of audience the author had in mind. If the volume was meant solely to be a literary study which would systematize and clarify a wide variety of scattered insights and opinions, then it is to be commended as a competent and thorough piece of work. But if, as is evidently the case, the author aimed at a serious discussion of political philosophy, then the volume has certain shortcomings which ought to be pointed out. This is true whether one measures it by historical or analytical standards. On the historical side, the author has failed to indicate, except in the most general way, the relationship between Voltaire's political ideas and those of his predecessors. One result of this is to leave the impression that Voltaire was being original when, in fact, he was not. For example, an obvious relationship appears between Voltaire's ideas and those of Locke—and this is strikingly apparent in Dr. Rowe's discussion of property—yet Locke is not, according to my reading, mentioned in the book. Again, this work would have been more valuable had some attempt been made to examine the impressive criticisms directed at Voltaire by the writers of the counter-revolution, like de Maistre and de Bonald. This lack of perspective, fore and aft, has the effect of producing a somewhat foreshortened picture.

At the analytical level the author follows Voltaire's own habit of using assertion in the place of systematic argument. Democracy, we are told, "rests on the belief that the primitive equality of men as members of the human species should find the fullest possible social expression" (p. 99). Precisely how this particular conclusion flows from this premise is not made clear. Again, the author does not explore the incompatibilities among Voltaire's ideas: how, for example, to reconcile nationally derived rights and natural rights, benevolent despotism and natural rights, the belief that the pursuit of the common good is morally obligatory and the belief that the common good is identifiable with rational self-interest. These omissions have had the effect of allowing the full implications of some of Voltaire's assertions to go unnoticed. Thus the author places Voltaire among the champions of the separation of church and state, whereas he was advancing the more serious argument that the church ought to be converted into a department of state in charge of policing the morals of the masses. The whole matter can be summed up by saying that Voltaire has been treated as a political philosopher whereas in reality he was essentially an ideologist.

Having said this, however, it would be unfair to criticize Dr. Rowe on the basis of a book she had not intended to write. Moreover, she has nicely drawn for us the bourgeois character of Voltaire's outlook and in this way illumined the lines which a future study of Voltaire might take. Voltaire could provide the subject of a fascinating study of the eighteenth-century middle-class intellectual, for he voiced not only the aspirations of the bourgeoisie, but also those of a highly self-conscious group of men whose stock-in-trade was ideas. In Voltaire we have the intellectual, struggling for social approval and recognition, venting his frustration when repelled by the haut monde of nobility and king, and yet never failing to be mesmerized by the attractions of power. It was not accidental that Voltaire was drawn to seek out the "enlightened" despots of his day or that he held an unconcealed admiration for Louis XIV's pursuit of la gloire. He was a classical case of the "political intellectual" beset with a desire for exerting power or, failing that, for being close to the seat of power. While the present book does not explore these lines, it does provide an indispensable starting point.

SHELDON S. WOLIN.

University of California (Berkeley).

The Permanent Purge: Politics in Soviet Totalitarianism. BY ZBIGNIEW K. BRZEZINSKI. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. 256. $4.75.)

Liquidation of political opponents and their cliques has been a concomitant of dictatorial regimes of all brands from the ancient times to the present. And the annals of ecclesiastical history are replete with glaring examples of purges of heretics who had "deviated" from prescribed dogmas. To that extent the modern totalitarian purge, including the bolshevik chistka, is by no means original. However, Lenin and his disciples certainly must be given the odious credit of having greatly improved its techniques, put it to additional uses, and, in fact, institutionalized it by making it a permanent multi-purpose feature of their system.

It is this permanence of the purge and its inherence in the totalitarian process of government which constitute the ideological pivot of Mr. Brzezinski's book. "Totalitarianism is the system of the permanent purge," he asserts. The more totalitarian the regime grows the more isolated it becomes from the masses. Such isolation breeds constant suspicion which in turn induces the leaders to seek out and eliminate foes, real, imaginary, and potential. Also, since the Soviet totalitarianism, pushed by its own ideology, must always march forward towards an unattainable millenium, the initial enthusiasm gradually spends itself. Hence, there is a continuous need to replace weary followers, doubters, and opportunists by fresh and more vigorous cadres. An excellent opportunity is thus offered to advance one's personal career at the expense of others in every echelon of the Soviet hierarchy. Moreover, the organs of control and repression, in particular the indispensable secret police, have an urge to prove their usefulness by turning up with more enemies rather than less.

Having shown the various causes and purposes of the Soviet purge, the author studies its effects. His conclusion is that, while the purge sometimes disrupts the enforced unity of the Soviet state, it nevertheless performs a number of positive functions: it supplies an element of security for the leadership and keeps the foes of the regime in a state of permanent insecurity; it eliminates any source of potential alternative to the regime; it provides an outlet for accumulated tension; it renews and stimulates internal activity and eliminates stagnation; it "channels pent-up aggression and dissatisfaction away from the regime."

As for the future, Mr. Brzezinski concludes that the need of the purge will not diminish in the Soviet Union, even though it may assume somewhat milder forms. "The purge and totalitarianism have been linked in an indissoluble union." Thus only the death of totalitarianism itself can bring an end of the permanent purge.

In probing into the nature of the Soviet purge, the author subjects to scrutiny its main developmental stages from the Leninist era to the liquidation of Beria and the demotion of Malenkov. In doing so he has culled a good amount of pertinent data from original Soviet sources as well as from the interviews with Russian émigrés done under the Harvard Interview Project.

While this reviewer finds himself in agreement with the author's main conclusions, a few of his statements give rise to serious doubt. Can one really say that the "hostility among the immediate supporters of the totalitarian dictator seems to increase in direct ratio to the distance from the dictator" (p. 22)? Are purges "less likely to develop within totalitarianisms ruled by collective forms of leadership" (p. 32)? Or is it not pushing the argument too far to assert that the purge satisfies "the need of the totalitarian masses for expression" (p. 34)?

Yet, in spite of these few rather sweeping statements, for which one can find little or no substantiating evidence in the book, Mr. Brzezinski's study rests on solid foundations of carefully selected and properly analyzed facts. Coming out at a time when the Soviet rulers attempt heels over head to prove that they are not what they are, this dispassionate scholarly study is a timely and sobering warning.

EDWARD TABORSKY.

The University of Texas.

The Forty-Eight States: Their Tasks as Policy Makers and Administrators. (New York: Columbia University, Graduate School of Business, The American Assembly. 1955. Pp. 147.)

This volume contains the background papers prepared for the consideration of a distinguished panel of participants in the Eighth American Assembly held in October of 1955 under the auspices of the Graduate School of Business of Columbia University. It contains a brief introduction, prepared by Professor James W. Fesler, Technical Director of the Assembly, delineating the major questions to be considered in the volume and at the conference. The introduction sets the tone and scope of the conference in these terms: "The principal concern of this volume . . . is how well the states are doing their job, not what their job should be." Subsequently, the author admits that it is very nearly impossible to say, in particular, how well states are performing the functions entrusted to them, and that the conference elected rather to consider the states as wholes viewed from the point of how well they are equipped, politically and administratively, to make and enforce sound decisions. To put it another way, what the conference and the writers of the volume really considered was how state governments compare in practice with certain academic and professional theories about how they ought to behave.

Professor Harvey C. Mansfield in "The States in the American System" sets forth with clarity and skill the major twentieth-century trends in state government. He places heavy emphasis on the changing financial relations among nation, state, and local governments. He finds state government expanding rapidly vis à vis local governments and largely because of functions scarcely considered a half century ago.

"The Tradition of Government in the States," prepared by Professor Allan R. Richards, is a succinct survey of the major historical forces shaping the constitutions, law, and customs of the states today. Professor Dayton McKean addresses his remarks to "The Politics of the States" and exhorts his audience to consider the necessity of increasing public interest in and concern with state politics. Responsible parties competing for electoral support with broad and conflicting programs of governmental action and state governmental structures which allow victory to be consummated in legislation and administration are the ways to do this.

Professor Karl Bosworth in "Law Making in State Governments" in general follows the McKean lead and comes down heavily for effective two-party competition and strong, political leadership from the executive office. In "Administration in State Governments," York Wilbern generally supports the menu of administrative reforms offered this century by the experts in public administration, and generally proposed—usually unsuccessfully—by numerous "Little Hoover Commissions" in the last decade. Wilbern, however, dissents from the gospel in several particulars. He is somewhat skeptical of the civil service merit system as commonly conceived and administered. He is not for integration of all functions under all conditions.

The volume concludes with a press release which represents the consensus of the conference on what needs to be done to equip the states to perform their tasks in the modern federal system. Few of their exhortations will invite strong dissent.

WILLIAM H. YOUNG.

University of Wisconsin.

The Essentials of Public Administration. BY E. N. GLADDEN. (London and New York: Staples Press. Distributed in the United States by John de Graff, Inc., New York. 1955. Pp. 237. $4.00.)

In 1947, Dr. E. N. Gladden, who was already known to American as well as to British students of administration for his two volumes on the British Civil Service, undertook "the provision of a general survey of public administration to meet the needs of the student and the general reader," a survey that would, among other things, "enable the novice to obtain a general picture of his subject." The first fruit of that project was the publication, in 1949, of Dr. Gladden's An Introduction to Public Administration; the task has now been completed with the appearance of the present volume, which must be treated as a companion piece to the first.

The earlier book, the Introduction, is most accurately characterized as a description of the administrative institutions of Great Britain—a kind of handbook of government organization covering the central departments, local government administration, public corporations, etc. The Essentials, on the other hand, concentrates on the problems and processes and relationships encountered in operating these large-scale institutions. Accordingly, there are chapters on bureaucracy, on the modes of controlling public officials, on hierarchy, on regionalization and centralization, on personnel management, internal communications, public relations, and training for the public service, and a few other topics of this nature that are standard fare in general treatments of administration.

Unfortunately, the book never conveys the "flavor" of administrative situations, never gives the reader that "feel" for the dynamics of organization that makes it seem alive, animated. Consequently, one may surmise, many of the matters with which the book is concerned are likely to seem purely academic at best, and obscure or perhaps even unintelligible at worst, to the novice and the general reader to whom it is addressed. Readers with long experience with public administration, acquired through either direct participation in it or study, will appreciate the significance of the issues explored in this little volume, but they are apt to find the analysis elementary, and occasionally even elaborately obvious; since it was not prepared for their use, this is certainly understandable, but it means the book falls between two stools. It is not likely to satisfy fully either the lay or the professional audience.

In part, this difficulty may have developed because the author apparently takes a great deal for granted about the interest and background of the uninformed reader seeking a general survey of the field; even to have read Dr. Gladden's able Introduction would not seem by itself adequate preparation for the later volume. Probably more important, however, is the fact that the Essentials shows some signs of having been assembled rather than written all of a piece; there is a certain lack of unity that may account for the failure of the subject-matter really to come to life. This may account, too, for the unevenness of style, and for occasional seeming contradictions and repetitions.

All this means that this book is not likely, at least in this country, to displace the introductory works that preceded it. But American students of administration will not want to ignore it, by any means, for they will find interesting the views of an eminent British civil servant on politics and administration (he comes very close to the politics-administration dichotomy which American administrative thought in recent years has emphatically rejected); on the need to study comparative administration ("There is a crying need for an Institute of Administrative History," he observes in two short but provocative chapters comparing the public services of Greece and Rome and ancient China with those of Modern Europe); on the proper training of civil servants (he proposes the development of a National School of Administration); and on other issues of current concern. Students of administration on both sides of the Atlantic, as they review the bibliographies that follow each chapter, will also discover that the exchange of information on public administration, in both directions, still leaves ample room for expansion. It is useful indeed to have these things called to our attention once again.

HERBERT KAUFMAN.

Yale University.

The New Japan: Government and Politics. By HAROLD S. QUIGLEY AND JOHN E. TURNER. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1956. Pp. viii, 456. $5.00).

This is the first full length book on Japanese government to appear since Professor Quigley's earlier volume (Japanese Government and Politics) published in 1932. For this reason it is a welcome as well as needed work.

Organized presumably for classroom use, it has the merits of a good text: clarity, succinctness, and suggestive documentation. To these virtues might have been added balance, except that some aspects of government (party politics, especially) are given more attention than others. No doubt the student beginning Japanese studies will get a clear, overall impression of the structure of modern Japanese government from reading this book. The unusually perceptive student would be able also to get an inkling of some of the fundamental problems in adjusting the ancient apparatus of the Japanese administrative state to the demands of western constitutionalism.

Three introductory chapters are succinct yet pithy summaries of some of the characteristics of Japanese government. The authors have labeled these dynasticism, dualism, bureaucracy, and the struggle between militarism and party government. The demands of textbook organization probably require such compression of the development of Japanese government from the seventh century to 1941. The authors' selection of salient characteristics would probably be debated by students of Japanese government. Each analyst would have his own list. This reviewer regrets the omission of the following three factors which might be regarded as essential characteristics: (1) the intense race consciousness of Japan, sustained by Shinto myth and genealogical fact. The absence of large scale immigration and intermarriage in Japan for many centuries has resulted in a nation remarkably inbred. The result has been a mystical notion of superiority and quasi-divinity which explain the arrogance of Japan's conquests as well as her clearly superior achievements in organization. (2) Japan's unparalleled capacity to adapt both Chinese and western culture to her own needs and inclinations. Only this characteristic can explain her unique position as the matrix of Asian constitutionalism. (3) The trefoil of social values: harmony, hierarchy, and obligations. These concepts explain the difficulties encountered by the impact of an incompatible constitutionalism based on party differences, political equality, and an articulated law of property rights.

Wartime government and the period immediately after surrender are dealt with in three brief chapters. Emphasis is placed on the role of the Imperial Rule Assistance Association as a force in mobilizing the nation and on the rigid organization of society through the revived tonari-gumi system to the individual family. Perhaps more emphasis might have been placed on the peculiar status of the Ministries of War and Navy, with their right of direct access to the emperor and their tight, fanatic control of the machinery of government.

The authors have limited their discussion of occupation policy to a brief chapter. Two of the most illuminating sections of the book are those dealing with the purge of Japanese government officials and the drafting of the 1946 Constitution. The latter chapter summarizes the debates in the House of Peers and House of Representatives. In dealing with constitutional pacifism (Article Nine of the Constitution), no mention is made of the assertion of former Prime Minister Dr. Hitoshi Ashida that the first clause of the second paragraph of Article Nine was inserted by him to allow for the maintenance of armed forces for self-defense. The authors' comment (pp. 169, 228) that "'all types' of military forces will never be maintained" is at variance with the Ashida interpretation, which may (if the Supreme Court adopts the Ashida view) become the official view of the government of Japan.

Somewhat more than a quarter of the book is devoted to party politics and legislative organization. These chapters are fuller and more analytical and the documentation is more extensive than for other topics.

The last two chapters dealing with the courts and local government are more descriptive than analytical. In appraising local government, appropriate consideration is given to neighborhood associations, the boss system of oyabun-kobun, and local tax problems.

An appendix which includes the old and new constitutions, a few key laws, and the Imperial Rescript on "False Conceptions" concerning the Imperial institution, help make this a convenient source of basic information on modern Japanese government.

RALPH BRAIBANTI.

Duke University.

Control over Illegal Enforcement of the Criminal Law: Role of the Supreme Court.

By ALBERT R. BEISEL, JR. (Boston, Mass.: Boston University Press. 1955. Pp. 112, $2.75.)

This little volume deals with the legal and constitutional problems surrounding illegal law enforcement practices, particularly unreasonable searches and forced confessions. It is the publication of the Bacon Lectures delivered by the author at Boston University in 1954, and certainly the first two chapters are in fact this. Being directed at a general audience, they provide a very readable review of the problems without being objectionably superficial.

The first lecture outlines the scope of the illegal enforcement problem, its causes, social costs, and suggested methods of control. The author concludes, as others have before him, that excluding from the courts evidence got by illegal action is the only effective method of preventing the evil. The second lecture deals with another method of abolishing illegal practices—namely, by declaring them to be legal. The author illustrates this technique with a useful, if critical, account of the way the Supreme Court has handled the important problems of searches without warrant and wiretapping.

The third lecture, which forms two-thirds of the book, deals with the admission in court of confessions or other evidence which has been forced from an accused. It develops historically the law of confessions and the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination. But, unlike the first two lectures, this is a highly sophisticated search for a rational answer to why the Supreme Court will forbid the use in court of evidence got under some circumstances but not others. Why, for example, will the Court forbid the use of evidence obtained by violence but not that obtained by an illegal search? Why does psychological pressure of a certain degree render a confession inadmissible, while pressure of a slightly less degree does not? Why will the Supreme Court, invoking the self-incrimination clause, forbid the questioning of an accused against his will in the protective atmosphere of a federal courtroom, while permitting such questioning by the police in the privacy of the police station? His analysis leads him to conclude that the Supreme Court has no basic philosophy, with the result that its opinions are necessarily confused and its decisions inconsistent. This will not, of course, come as a surprise to those students of the Court who have reached this conclusion by mere inspection. But the importance of such careful rational documentation lies in the peculiar vulnerability of the judiciary, including the Supreme Court, to the charge that it is behaving irrationally. Until the intuitive market-place justice of Harun-al-Rashid has been publicly accepted in place of a system of law the search for a rationale will go on. The author does suggest answers to some of these problems which, even though not supported by the Court, will commend themselves to those who believe with Mr. Justice Holmes that it is "less evil that some criminals should escape than that the government should play an ignoble part." The student of constitutional law who traditionally views these civil rights problems from the standpoint of particular constitutional guarantees will find this a useful and stimulating treatment.

ROBERT FAIRCHILD CUSHMAN.

New York University.

Military Policy and National Security. EDITED BY WILLIAM W. KAUFMANN WITH CONTRIBUTIONS BY GORDON A. CRAIG, ROGER HILSMAN, WILLIAM W. KAUFMANN, AND KLAUS KNORR. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1956. Pp. viii, 274. $5.00.)

The eighteenth and nineteenth century worldly philosophers gave us "economic man"—a model of human behavior based on the assumption that man's most important activity was the rational pursuit of economic wealth. Subsequent political scientists and political sociologists constructed a comparable model of "political man" based on the assumption of the rational pursuit of political power. Military Policy and National Security introduces still a third model of human behavior: "strategic man" dedicated to the rational pursuit of military security. The eight essays of this volume deal with a variety of topics, and the four authors have differing views on defense needs and strategic concepts. None the less, underlying the contributions of all four (although this is less true of Gordon Craig than of the others) is a common methodology resting upon the implicit and inarticulate premise of "strategic man." The authors accept his ends. They deal with his problems. They think in his terms. They write in his language: a lingo of costs and risks, incentives and deterrents, capabilities and intentions, contingencies and alternatives, assumptions and working models. With understanding, insight, and balanced judgment, the authors coolly and rationally analyse the alternatives of American defense policy. Their discussion is based, to quote William W. Kaufmann, on "the assumption of a calculating individual with a multiplicity of values, aware of cost and risk as well as of advantage, and capable of drawing significant inferences from symbolic acts." Analysis of this sort is long overdue on the part of American social scientists. It performs the essential function of illuminating the likely consequences of possible actions, thus permitting a rational choice among them. If he could, "strategic man" would reduce all issues down to problems in the theory of games. At the level of overall national policy at which this book is written, however, necessarily he is less precise.

In any symposium agreement on method is essential and agreement on substance is boring. The participants must speak the same language but they must not say the same thing. Military Policy and National Security meets both criteria. Their consensus on method precludes the authors from extreme conclusions, but it does not prevent disagreement on significant issues. Dr. Hilsman challenges Professor Knorr on the importance of military potential in this day and age. Professor Knorr disagrees with Dr. Kaufmann on the role of the Strategic Air Command and on the possibility of limited war in Europe. Dr. Kaufmann urges the desirability of flexible forces organized and armed for brush fire wars. Dr. Hilsman suggests that the western powers may have unduly minimized their ground strength vis-a-vis the Communist bloc. Professor Knorr warns of the danger of "gross concentration" on offensive air power. Professor Craig urges a reevaluation of NATO strategy to ease the inclusion of a German Army in the western defense force. With the possible exception of Professor Knorr, all the authors appear to accept deterrent-retaliatory nuclear air power as the prime element of American military strength.

In their essays each author urges the expansion of that segment of the defense program with which he is particularly concerned. The adoption of all their recommendations would probably increase the defense budget by fifty per cent. And it is here that the limitations of their method affect the usefulness of their conclusions. The danger in their method is that its users may confuse the wholly rational world of strategic man with the partly irrational world of actual rulers, governments, and public opinions. Unfortunately, this is a danger from which the authors of Military Policy and National Security do not entirely escape. Dr. Kaufmann, for instance, declares that his assumption of "a calculating individual" is "one that appears to correspond accurately with reality under existing conditions. . . ." In another essay, Professor Knorr persuasively analyzes the need for a more effective passive air defense system and then comments sadly that: "If the above analysis is reasonable on the basis of the assumptions that have been set forth, then it is curious and astonishing that passive air defense has been neglected in the United States." Professor Knorr does suggest reasons for this situation. But it can only be described as "astonishing" if one assumes that the world of strategic man is the world of reality. In a similar vein, the authors frequently put great faith in man's ability to foresee future contingencies and to plan for catastrophe. Throughout, the book is permeated by a quiet but desperate rationality. The rational path to military security, however, is something which social scientists may analyze acutely, but it is something which no government can pursue consistently. Economic man and political man were individuals: only their behavior after they had made their decision was social in nature. The decision itself was as rational as the individual mind which made it. Strategic man, however, is concerned with the military security not of individuals but of nation states. The decision making process itself is a social rather than a mental fact, susceptible to all the irrationalities, ambiguities, and complexities of institutional and collective behavior. The analysis of national security policy must look both to the external danger and to the internal environment. The authors of Military Policy and National Security have dealt with the question: "What is the most rational military policy for the United States?" They have not, with a few exceptions, tackled the question: "What is the most rational military policy feasible for the United States given its decision making institutions (particularly the separation of powers), its liberal ideology, its nationality groups, and its tradition of isolation?" Their obvious dissatisfaction with recent American defense policy is a measure of the difference between the conduct of the American government and the conduct of strategic man. Avoiding the politics of defense, however, they never have to face up to the hard problem of priorities. Instead, they issue a vague and prayerful call for leadership. The reason and logic which the authors value so highly and use so penetratingly would become more rather than less effective if they accepted the bounds of practicality. Their method is legitimate but limited. What they have done, they have done brilliantly. But, starting from their model, they make a valid criticism of American policy without making a constructive one.

SAMUEL P. HUNTINGTON.

Harvard University.

The Presidency Today. BY EDWARD S. CORWIN AND LOUIS W. KOENIG. (New York: New York University Press. 1956. Pp. ix, 138. $3.00.)

The American Presidency. BY CLINTON ROSSITER. (New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company. 1956. Pp. 175. $2.95.)

No feature of our governmental system is more distinctively American than the office of the President. This daring and ingenious creation of the Founding Fathers, viewed with so much doubt and misgiving by many of them, reshaped and adapted to the nation's needs under the impact of crisis, personality, and economic and political forces, has indeed become, as the subtitle of Professor Rossiter's book suggests, "the most important constitutional office on earth." These two short volumes are worthy additions to the rapidly expanding literature of recent decades on this fascinating subject.

The book by Corwin and Koenig is essentially an abridged, updated, and somewhat popularized version of Professor Corwin's earlier authoritative study, The President: Office and Powers. It repeats most of the basic themes and points of view of that work. It advances again Professor Corwin's judicious warning against placing undue reliance upon the Presidency as the primary agency through which recurring crises, both national and international, are met; and it restates his view that a closer collaboration between the two policy-making branches of the national government should be brought about by the institution of a new type of joint Executive-Legislative Cabinet.

Professor Rossiter's book, which is a revised version of six Walgreen Foundation lectures given in 1956 at the University of Chicago, presents a generally more complacent and optimistic view of the state of the nation as it concerns the Presidency. While he characterizes his work as "an impressionistic rendering of the main dimensions" of the office, rather than a "detailed or definitive portrait," he leaves untouched few currently controversial questions concerning it. Lively in style, with many a deftly turned phrase, his discourse abounds in highly quotable phrases and often challenging evaluations. His essay at the game of ranking the Presidents by application of eight "tests of greatness" to their performances certainly produces results with which many observers will take issue.

On the whole, Professor Rossiter apparently finds the idea of a "strong" President more tolerable and palatable than do Professors Corwin and Koenig, although in neither work are there fundamental changes suggested in the mode of selection, powers, and roles of the President to counteract the trend in this direction. Far from seeing in executive power something inherently undemocratic, Professor Rossiter maintains it has been "more responsive to the needs and dreams of giant democracy than any other office or institution in the whole mosaic of American life." And he observes, with respect to the controversy over the expanding powers of the office, that it is in fact "only a secondary campaign over the future of America," for, he maintains, the strength of the Presidency has been in the past, and will be in the future, the "measure of the strength of the nation." This generalization is one that comes easily and naturally; yet one cannot but pause to question deeply its full implications.

These two books, modest in size and sketchy as to some details, are obviously designed to serve as interpretative treatments of the subject for the general reader yet profound thought and scholarly insight are by no means lacking. No one can read them without acquiring a truer perspective on the Presidency and a fuller appreciation of its dizzying sweep of responsibilities, its burdens, and its promise.

JOSEPH E. KALLENBACH.

University of Michigan.

Television and Presidential Politics: The Experience in 1952 and the Problems Ahead. BY CHARLES A. H. THOMSON. (Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution. 1956. Pp. viii, 173. $1.50.)

The preface advises that "This small book is a pioneering effort . . . to see what television has meant to date in presidential politics, to consider what its future may be, and to encourage further examination of the problems that it presents." To these ends the volume deals with the role of television prior to the 1952 nominating conventions, at these conventions, and during the campaign. Then the author turns to speculations about television's role in 1956 and later and finally addresses himself to certain questions of public policy relative to this medium.

The study draws heavily on materials from the trade journals of the broadcasting industry and so brings to the attention of political scientists material that would not ordinarily come to their attention. Thus, we learn that the conventions themselves attracted more viewers than did the addresses of either candidate during the campaign. The Democrats' peak audience exceeded 10,161,000 homes during one half-hour period of their convention; the Republican peak was 8,655,000 homes. The high spot of listening during the campaign was Nixon's explanation of his financial affairs, which was viewed in more than 9,000,000 homes. The tremendous amount of attention given to the conventions can be explained in part by the fact that none of the regular network programs were available. Viewers could not choose between "I Love Lucy" and a presidential nominating convention.

The perplexing problems of public policy raised by television in politics receive considerable attention. Is it desirable to have commercial sponsors for the convention telecast? How great is the danger of sponsor bias? Shall television be admitted to any gathering at the convention to which pencil-and-paper newspaper men have access? Being televised may alter the behavior of those on whom the camera is focused. Finally, if major parties are to have their conventions televised in their entirety, how shall we treat minor parties?

No serious attempt is made at original research into the questions of chief importance to students of political behavior. These questions relate to the importance of television in contrast to any other mass medium in making citizens decide whether to vote and for whom to vote. Does it help the undecided to get off the fence? Does it convert people from one party to another, or does it merely enable people to view in their own homes the candidate for whom they would have voted had television never been invented? The author merely refers to some already published studies of political behavior in the 1952 election and offers no help to future campaign managers on what proportion of their funds to allot to television rather than to some other mass medium.

A number of highly intelligent questions are raised throughout the book; definite answers are given to almost none. In fact, on the last page, we are told that: "Scientifically speaking, very little is known about the true nature of its [television's] impact on political nominations or elections." More characteristic answers to the questions raised are: "Opinions of experts differ by 180 degrees on this issue" (p. 138), "Probable viewer interest in the conventions of 1956 and beyond remains imponderable" (p. 154), "Some observers rated the event a stirring one. Others . . ." (pp. 160-161). Although such caution in the absence of complete data is in the best scholarly tradition, some readers may consider this book less satisfying than the type of study which suggests some concluding thesis or generalization. Of course, such inconclusiveness may be inevitable in "a pioneering effort" and may very likely "encourage further examination of the problem. . . ."

DONALD S. STRONG.

University of Alabama.

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Government and Health: The Alabama Experience. BY ROBERT T. DALAND. (University, Alabama: Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1955. Pp. xi, 218.)

In his study of the Alabama public health program and its administration, Professor Daland has made an interesting and valuable addition to the slowly growing list of studies of those public functions which are cooperatively administered by national, state, and local governments.

As the author states, intergovernmental relations in the field of public health are very complex. Professor Daland here offers a painstakingly careful description of the anatomy of these relationships, having in mind always the importance of locating, in the flow of the governmental process, the actual points at which decisions, both large and small, about both policy and administration are being made. The study contains valuable material concerning the impact of federal grant-in-aid requirements upon state health department organization; upon the forces working for integration of the executive branch under the Governor; upon programming and budgeting; upon recruitment of personnel; and upon the state-local relationship. The author has attempted to trace out not only the obvious, but also the indirect and occasionally well-hidden effects of the intergovernmental process upon the public health program and upon the vitality of state and local governments in Alabama.

In sum, one of the two major foci of the study is the real nature of the current federal relationship in the field of public health in Alabama, and the probable future course of that relationship.

The second and equally interesting major focus of the study is the medical profession in Alabama and its iron grip upon the public health program. By statute, the Medical Association is the State Board of Health; this, in fact, means that the Association's Board of Censors, its governing body, is also the governing body for the state's public health program. Although the Governor is ex officio chairman of the State Board of Health, he almost never attends its meetings and, in general, treats the State Health Department as an independent agency.

The chapters describing the organization of the Medical Association, its efforts at maintaining a stringent discipline among the membership, and its views, as shown in statements of the leadership, as to the proper scope of public health activities and the primacy of the medical profession's interests in these activities, provide remarkable and highly interesting reading.

While Professor Daland recognizes that dominance of the public health program by the medical profession secures for that program some immunity from "politics" and assures the support of a group whose active cooperation is essential to the success of any health program, he concludes that on balance the public health program stands to lose from this narrow-based, single-specialization control.

In the final chapter, the assertion is made that federal restraints in the form of conditions attached to grants-in-aid have contributed to the development of stresses within the public health program in Alabama, most notably with respect to the overall problem of effective executive control at the state level, and with respect to state-local relationships. "Removal of the restraints must precede administrative improvement." Assuming removal of these restraints, the author believes that effective exploitation by Alabama's state government of its opportunity to direct the health program would depend upon its ability to wrest from the medical profession control of the program. Thus Professor Daland argues that freedom from federal restraints must precede reform in the direction of broadening control of the health program within the state.

It seems to this reviewer that it is possible to argue that federal restraints continue to serve useful purposes; that the major portion of the problems in Alabama's health program can be traced to the medical profession's monopoly of control, and to the existence of a kind of political system in which so deep an entrenchment of a single-interest group is possible; and that this monopoly can be broken only through fundamental change in the political system. Were such change to come about, the need for federal restraints might very well largely disappear.

In any case, it is to be hoped that additional studies of the kind made by Professor Daland will be forthcoming. Such studies show what really occurs in the areas of inter-governmental relationships, and are therefore essential if we are to have meaningful discussion of the problems in these areas.—VALERIE A. EARLE, Georgetown University.

The Great Plains in Transition. BY CARL FREDERICK KRAENZEL. (Norman, Oklahoma: University of Oklahoma Press. 1955. Pp. xiv, 428. $5.00.)

This book is the personal interpretation of a man who has lived intimately with his subject. It is more a literary essay than a research monograph, covering some of the same ground presented twenty-five years ago in Walter Prescott Webb's The Great Plains, and containing many of the same premises and biases. Where Webb saw the Great Plains largely through the eyes of Texas, Kraenzel's vantage point is Montana and North Dakota. Webb was a historian, while Kraenzel is a sociologist, yet this has resulted primarily in a difference in emphasis.

As a research study the book has its shortcomings. It lacks precision and analytical rigor. But this is perhaps inevitable since the sweep of the author's attention is so wide and his range of subject so broad. The approach tends to be polemic and partisan with considerable special pleading. And the dogmatic assertions, unsupported generalizations (there are no footnotes), unstated premises, and loose argument leave the careful reader uneasy. Yet Professor Kraenzel brings together many interesting facts about the Great Plains and proposes some novel ideas and concepts. Hence the book is not without value, especially since the literature of the Great Plains, like its population, is sparse.

"The Need to Adapt or Get Out," as Chapter 21 is entitled, is a major theme of the book, and the author presents much natural and social history in support of his premise that failure to adapt has been the cause of many of the problems of the area. From this record he concludes that the "Keys for Survival" (Chapter 24) are reserves, mobility, and flexibility. His treatment of these survival traits is suggestive rather than specific, so the reader gets only a general impression of what adjustments are desirable and how they are to be achieved.

Kraenzel's major prescription is "regionalism" which he feels will cure all the ills of the Great Plains. But he fails to indicate how regionalism and regional consciousness are to be brought about, and seldom gets beyond a mystical vision of a unifying force which will somehow be the salvation of the area. One might, of course, question whether the Great Plains constitute a meaningful region. But curiously, Kraenzel avoids this problem by insisting that his region, like the church invisible of Protestant theology, must have no boundaries. Yet it is to have political and administrative structure, the details of which would strike most political scientists as unworkable.

The usefulness of this book to the political scientist lies in its emphasis on the relation between governmental institutions and environmental forces: space and climate, particularly. Kraenzel's concepts of "Sutland and Yonland" (Chapter 15) might be usefully adapted to political analysis, and his discussion of Great Plains "minority-group conduct" (Chapters 17, 18, 19, and 20) contributes to a better understanding of the patterns of politics in the area.—NORMAN WENGERT, University of Maryland.

One River—Seven States: TVA-State Relations in the Development of the Tennessee River. BY ELLIOTT ROBERTS. (Knoxville, Tennessee: The Bureau of Public Administration, The University of Tennessee. 1955. Pp. vii, 100. $1.50.)

Many of the most enthusiastic supporters of the Tennessee Valley Authority count as one of its major accomplishments a new quality of federal-state cooperation, in which the states and local units have been helped to perform many portions of the tasks assigned by law to the TVA. Mr. Roberts examines the actual operation of these relationships with regard to navigation, flood control, and electric power, primarily through the technique of specific case studies of decisions.

His conclusions are summed up in a chapter entitled "The Myth of Partnership." The pattern, he says, "is not one of partnership, nor of continuing interaction, [but] of firm federal control of basic programs . . . with intermittent attempt to make common cause with state agencies concerning fringe issues."

It should be noted that in two of the three functions which he chooses to examine, the tradition of almost exclusive federal operation was already firmly rooted before TVA entered the field. He leaves out many functions, admittedly not as central to TVA as the three he discusses, such as recreation, forestry, agriculture, and city planning, in which the patterns of partnership were easier and more effective. Furthermore, in his discussion of relationships in power, the most interesting of these three fields, he largely directs his attention to relationships with the states per se without much focus on the relationships with the municipalities which are frequently the marketing units. But the conclusion he reaches is certainly solidly buttressed by the data he produces.

The book includes many succinct summaries of TVA programs and policies, and many penetrating analyses and comments. These were even more interesting to this reviewer than the development of the main thesis. Mr. Roberts, a former staff member, knows his TVA very well.—YORK WILBERN, University of Alabama.

Water for the Cities: A History of the Urban Water Supply Problem in the United States.

By NELSON MANFRED BLAKE. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, Maxwell School Series III. 1956. Pp. x, 341. $4.00.)

The chairman of Syracuse University's history department has provided another valuable study which will help fill the great void in U. S. municipal history. In contrast with Bridenbaugh's recent volumes, Blake confines himself—almost too closely—to the single function of water supply. Primary emphasis is placed on the story of the water supply problem in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York from 1790 to 1860. There are occasional references to developments in other cities. Two final chapters bring the story down to the present, emphasizing public health developments since 1860.

In the earlier years the ability to evaluate the effect of a particular water source on the human body did not exist. With this exception, the story of the urban water supply regularly reveals success in solving the technical problems and failure in long-range planning. New York's great Delaware aqueduct, just completed, will remain adequate only until 1965.

One might divide the efforts of cities to obtain water into two periods. The first, lasting roughly until 1920, was characterized by a city-by-city approach. During this period the policy of public rather than private operation of water supply systems became virtually universal after many a battle in city council and state legislature. The period into which we are now moving shows signs of requiring regional cooperation in water supply, both to conserve an increasingly precious resource and to allocate water among competing cities and competing uses. The great plans of the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California and of the four states participating in the Interstate Compact on the Delaware River Basin may proscribe complex regional water systems in some sense similar to our electric power grids.

One wishes the author had devoted more attention to the problems of administrative organization and management. For example, the question of independent water boards versus departmental organization is not treated. The development of metering and of rate structures is not discussed. Relationships of water and sewer systems would be of interest. The neglected subject of extraterritorial jurisdiction, including watershed protection, pollution control, and intergovernmental relations, is only casually covered. Yet the policy and politics of water supply are fully reported and the book will prove useful to most students of municipal affairs.—ROBERT T. DALAND, University of Connecticut.

The Municipal Income Tax: Its History and Problems. By ROBERT A. SIGAFOOS. (Chicago, Ill.; Public Administration Service. 1955. Pp. xiii, 169. $5.00.)

This little volume bids well to become a standard reference work on the municipal income tax. Its main contribution is in the direction of making available to those interested in this field basic data on the present status and developments in the municipal income tax area. Entire chapters are devoted to such topics as municipal income tax ordinances, administration, revenues, and the fate of municipal income tax provisions in the courts. Most of the data presented were collected as a result of extensive mail questionnaires, the review of statutory provisions and official reports and over forty personal visits to various municipalities and school districts administering income tax laws. One result is a series of basic tables showing the exact status of and results obtained from the municipal income tax in the United States today. Some material is also included on municipal income taxes in other countries such as Scandinavia and Canada, but the main effort is to focus upon relevant American experience.

The presentation, while reasonably objective, is none the less put forward in a context of a desire to see that the municipal income tax grows and is more widely adopted. The author believes that the exigencies of municipal financial problems are such that only by going in another direction than the property tax will it be possible to solve local financial problems. The available alternatives are the local sales tax, increased state grants, or the municipal income tax. Among these, the author sees a number of advantages to the latter course of action. He points out that existing municipal income taxes are rather crude in their nature since they are largely gross earnings and net profits taxes of an unrefined nature. To overcome such crudeness, the author suggests certain possibilities for refining the tax. One of the suggestions is that the income tax in metropolitan areas apply to the entire area concerned rather than just the central city. The author is convinced of the theoretical as well as the practical soundness of it. "Throughout the United States, personal incomes are now possibly as reasonable and equitable a local tax base as property. However, the instability of income tax yield in certain communities suggests that it is important to strike a balance between the relative weight to be given the income tax and the property tax." Nor does he believe that the tax constitutes a severe or unusual tax burden.

In short, this is a useful volume and a basic reference work in its field while at the same time it argues for the wider adoption and refinement of the municipal income tax.—EDWARD W. WEIDNER, Michigan State University.

Republished Articles on Economics, Volume VII: Readings in Fiscal Policy. SELECTED BY ARTHUR SMITHIES AND J. KEITH BUTTERS. (Homewood, Illinois: Richard D. Irwin, Inc., 1955. Pp. x, 596. $5.00.)

The primary purpose of this seventh volume of readings sponsored by the American Economic Association is to make more readily accessible to students some of the principal items from the literature in the rather new but increasingly significant field of fiscal policy, which the editors describe as the area dealing with "the aggregative effects of government expenditures and taxation on income, production and employment." A secondary purpose is that of including selections to show how thought in this area has evolved over the past quarter-century or so. Since numerous articles relevant to fiscal policy have already been included in earlier volumes of this series (especially those on monetary theory and business cycles) or are readily available elsewhere, this volume should not be interpreted as representing the editor's judgment as to the thirty-four most significant contributions in this area of economics. Students will undoubtedly find the extensive classified bibliography of articles on fiscal policy as compiled by Wilbur A. Steger to be one of the most worthwhile features of the volume.

The Torment of Secrecy: The Background and Consequences of American Security Policies. BY EDWARD A. SHILS. (Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press, 1956. Pp. 238. $3.50.)

For one seeking a brief and lucid explanation of America today it would be hard to find a better tract than the sections of Professor Shils' book entitled "The Deeper Sources" and "The Strain of Politics." This brilliant sketch of the immediate background of the starts and alarms of the past ten years is, however, delivered in support of a thesis which involves the author in an emotional predicament from which he cannot escape. He divides the nation into two—just two—camps: "The really crucial dividing line in politics is between pluralistic moderation and monomaniac extremism" (p. 227). Then he proceeds to denounce the bad camp of wrong-headed, fantasy-obsessed extremists, lunatics, and paranoiacs for the unpardonable sin of thinking that the world is divided into just two camps—"the state of mind which sees only black and white" (p. 226). The "nativist tradition," he tells us, should be "confined to alleys and bars and back streets and to the hate-filled hearts of the miserable creatures who espouse it" (p. 15). Hate-filled the creatures may be, but in Professor Shils they have found their match.

One wishes he would not rant so against the ranters, or become so emotional in denouncing emotionalism, or so passionately censure the attitude of those who censure others for their attitudes, or indulge so often in those absolute statements against which he clamors: e.g., "No society has ever been so extensively exposed to public scrutiny as the United States in the twentieth century" (p. 39). Has he ever considered the Greek or Latin zest for living private lives in public, or the complete publicity of European peasant and court communities? This regrettable lack of wider historical perspective is reflected in a loose use of terminology, as in his identification of "the national 'spirit'" with the Spirit of God in "revivalist" thinking (p. 207), or in his way of describing the opposition as "mad."

For Professor Shils "the scientific community is the epitome of the free society" (p. 190). Now no one needs to be told that science at its best should not take orders from the populist mob at its worst; but never in this book is there the slightest indication that science is ever at anything but its best. For Professor Shils it is all black and white.

Having given a first-rate description of the disease, Professor Shils can think of no better cure than Good Health. "More reasonableness and common sense" are indicated in a pluralistic system in which everyone tolerates everyone else. Professor Shils is against any strong feeling—except where it is desirable; secrecy and publicity are alike vicious—except when "properly practiced"; extremism is the root of all evil—except "in a small quantity" (p. 237). The small quantity is everything; "respectable" is a favorite word; Professor Shils yearns for a tepid academic world based on "the belief . . . that there is a sacred element in law"—only that belief must never be carried to the point of enthusiasm or passion (pp. 160 f). Like Bottom, Professor Shils will "roar you as gently as any sucking dove," and the result is neither a good roar nor a convincing plea for moderation.—HUGH NIBLEY, Brigham Young University.

The Right to Read: The Battle Against Censorship. By PAUL BLANSHARD. (Boston: The Beacon Press. 1955. Pp. 339. $3.50.)

An examination of literary censorship in all its forms and for all types of printed matter, with conclusions that the picture in this country though "not altogether pleasing . . . is far from helpless," is "gratifying" when looked at in the perspective of history, and is cause for being "cautiously cheerful" when comparison is made with other countries. It is a plea for an open society but with moderate conclusions on removal of existing legal restraints.

Case Studies in Personnel Security. COLLECTED UNDER THE DIRECTION OF ADAM YARMOLINSKY. (Washington, D. C.: The Bureau of National Affairs, Inc. 1955. Pp. x<sub>2</sub> 310.)

A collection of fifty personnel security cases based on information from the files of lawyers who advised or represented the employees involved. In each case the following information is given: the employment status of the individual concerned, the charges against the employee, the employee's response, a summary of the hearing or hearings, and the result. Thirty-one of the fifty cases involve government civilian employees; fifteen, industrial employees; two, military personnel; one, a seaman; and one, an employee of a United Nations agency abroad.

Merchants, Farmers, and Railroads: Railroad Regulation and New York Politics, 1850-1887. By LEE BENSON. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. x, 310. $5.50.)

This is a significant addition to the literature on the movement for railroad regulation in this country. It traces from the so-called Free Railroad Law of 1850 to the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 the influence of New York interests toward railroad regulation. Its theme is that the merchants and farmers of the Empire State, rather than the agrarians of the West, took the lead in this important movement. It argues incidentally that the theoretical bases for American railroad reform came from abroad (pp. 204-207) and that leading railroad officials had come to favor regulation (though not the long-short haul and anti-pooling provisions) by the middle eighties (pp. 242-246). And behind the movement from laissez faire to national regulation was a "Communications [Transportation] Revolution." The account is thoroughly documented and spiced with plentiful references to the individuals and events of the period.

Natural Resources and the Political Struggle. By NORMAN WENGBERT. (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday & Co., Inc. 1955. Pp. 71. $.95.)

This little study sketches the problem of decision-making by government in one field. Its theses are that the political process is pluralistic, that "policy itself is pluralistic" (p. 13), that struggle by groups must be accepted as an ingredient of the political process, that "operational goals and functional definitions may be most useful as criteria for social policy and action" (p. 65). "But what is important, even indispensable, is the constant, unrelenting search for the public interest and a dedication to furthering programs and policies which on the basis of the best judgments at the time of decision will advance the public good" (p. 66, author's italics). There is thoughtful, refreshing discussion of the roots of resource policy, of factors and alternatives in future resource policy development, of intergovernmental relations, and of the search for criteria for resource policy.

Monopoly in America: The Government as Promoter. BY WALTER ADAMS AND HORACE M. GRAY. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1955. Pp. xv, 221. $2.75.)

Through chapters on "Regulation and Public Utilities," "Tax and Expenditure Policies," "Procurement for Defense," "Disposal of Surplus Property," and "Legislation and Atomic Energy," a friend of competition as the regulator in the economy shows the effects of government policy toward growth of "monopoly" and how a "subtle transformation in the power structure of society" has been accepted as "natural" and "inevitable."

Congress and Parliament: Their Organization and Operation in the U.S. and the U.K. BY GEORGE B. GALLOWAY. (Washington, D.C.: National Planning Association. 1955. Pp. ix, 105. $1.50.)

A brief but excellent comparative survey of the American and British parliamentary practices made by the well-known Senior Specialist in American Government of the Library of Congress, financed by a grant from the Ford Foundation, and published under the auspices of the NPA Special Project Committee for the Study of Congress and Parliament.

The Political Process: Executive Bureau-Legislative Committee Relations. BY J. LEIFER FREEMAN. (Garden City, New York: Doubleday & Company, Inc. 1955. Pp. vii, 72. 95¢.)

An analysis of the interactions of the three key participants—congressional committees, executive bureaus, and interest groups—in the making of policy in the "crucial sub-systems of the larger political system." Reference is made particularly to an illustrative case, that of policy-making on Indian affairs.

Rural Versus Urban Political Power: The Nature and Consequences of Unbalanced Representation. BY GORDON E. BAKER. (Garden City, New York: Doubleday & Company Inc. 1955. Pp. viii, 70. 95¢.)

A concise discussion of the growth and effects of unbalanced representation of urban and rural areas in American government.

Report of The Commission on Inter-Governmental Relations: Federal-State Relations. SUB-

MITTED TO THE GOVERNOR AND TO THE LEGISLATURE. (Trenton, N.J.: State of New Jersey. 1955. Pp. vi, 200.)

A statement of policy with recommendations concerning Federal grants-in-aid and certain related tax matters with particular reference to the State of New Jersey.

Federal Control of Public Education: A Critical Appraisal. BY DAWSON HALES. (New York: Columbia University, Teachers College, Bureau of Publications. 1954. Pp. xiii, 144. $3.75.)

A critical appraisal of the traditional principle of local control of public education in the United States in the light of vast changes in our society, with recommendations for joint federal, state, and local action "to meet the demands of contemporary conditions."

Western Massachusetts in the Revolution. BY ROBERT J. TAYLOR. (Providence: Brown University Press. 1954. Pp. viii, 227. $4.00.)

A study of the significance of Western Massachusetts, politically and economically, in the history of that state during and after the American Revolution. The account ends with the ratification of the Federal Constitution by the Massachusetts ratifying convention.

The Founding Fathers. BY NATHAN SCHACHNER. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1954. Pp. x, 630. $6.00.)

A readable account of the men and the events that shaped the course of American history during the administrations of George Washington and John Adams.

County Court Records of Accomack-Northampton, Virginia: 1632-1640. BY SUSIE M. AMES WITH A PREFATORY NOTE BY FRANCIS S. PHILBRICK. (Washington: The American Historical Association. 1954. Pp. lxix, 189.)

This collection of the "oldest continuous county court records in America" should be of great interest to students of early American legal and local government institutions. An informative introduction by the editor supplies the necessary background for an understanding of the early settlement that produced these records.

Ogg and Ray's Introduction to American Government. BY WILLIAM H. YOUNG. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. 1956. 11th Ed. Pp. x, 953. $6.30.)

The new revised edition of a standard text.

The organization and comprehensive character of the earlier work are retained. Emphasis is on institutional and legal description, but a chapter on public opinion and interest groups is included. Footnote references to documentary sources are valuable. Extensive bibliography.

Ogg and Ray's Introduction to American Government. The National Government. By WILLIAM H. YOUNG. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. 1956. 11th Ed. Pp. x, 719. $6.00.)

This book is identical with the complete eleventh edition of Ogg and Ray with the exception that the chapters dealing with state and local government are omitted.

Government in the United States. By CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 1956. Pp. viii, 999. $6.50.)

A new edition of this text. The style and general plan of presentation are like those of earlier editions. Recent material is added, and some sections have been revised.

The American System of Government. By JOHN H. FERGUSON AND DEAN E. MCHEENRY. (New York, Toronto, and London: McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc. 1956. Pp. x, 757. $6.75.)

A new edition of this text. Manner of presentation and organization are similar to earlier editions. Numerous illustrations, review questions, topics for discussion, and lists of graphic aids are included. A workbook is available for use with this text.

The American Social System: Social Control,

Personal Choice, and Public Decision. By STUART A. QUEEN, WILLIAM N. CHAMBERS AND CHARLES M. WINSTON. UNDER THE EDITORSHIP OF M. F. NIMKOFF. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. 1956. Pp. x, 494. $5.75.)

A new social science text. Material from anthropology, economics, political science, and sociology organized around the themes stated in the sub-title.

American Government Under the Constitution. By PAUL C. BARTHOLOMEW. (Dubuque, Iowa: Wm. C. Brown Company. 1956. Pp. xii, 342. $3.75.)

A new edition of this text. Provisions of the Constitution annotated by reference to judicial decisions, law, and practice.

A Preface to the Social Sciences. By RAYMOND F. BELLAMY, HARRISON V. CHASE, VINCENT V. THURSBY, AND SADIE G. YOUNG. (New York, Toronto, London: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 1956. Pp. vi, 532. $6.50.)

A new social science text. Successive sections deal with geography, economics, society, and government.

State Government and Administration: A Bibliography. By DOROTHY C. TOMPKINS. (Berkeley, Cal.: University of California, Bureau of Public Administration. 1954. Pp. vii, 269. $6.00.)

A well arranged and carefully prepared bibliography of primary sources of information, issued primarily since 1930, on state government and administration. Annotations where deemed necessary and an excellent index are most helpful in using this bibliography.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE

University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

deFuria, Guy G. The McCarthy Censure Case: Some Legal Aspects. American Bar Association Journal. April, 1956.

Martin, John M., Jr. Proposed Federal Highway Legislation in 1955: A Case Study in the Legislative Process. Georgetown Law Journal. January, 1956.

Maslow, Will. Recasting Our Deportation Law: Proposals for Reform. Columbia Law Review. March, 1956.

Morris, Richard B. The Confederation Period and the American Historian. William and Mary Quarterly. April, 1956.

Private Bills and the Immigration Law. Harvard Law Review. April, 1956.

Rossiter, Clinton. The Presidents and the Presidency. American Heritage. April, 1956.

State Government

Bebout, John E. Charter for Last Frontier [Alaska]. National Municipal Review. April, 1956.

Dishman, Robert B. A New Constitution for New Hampshire? Public Administration Service, Department of Government, University of New Hampshire. 1956.

Krebs, William A. W., Jr. What Are You Doing About Atomic Development? State Government. May, 1956.

Planning Services for State Government. State Government. April, 1956.

State Tax Rates and Collections, 1950 and 1955. The Tax Foundation. 1956.

Local Government

Bogue, Donald J. Metropolitan Growth and the Conversion of Land to Nonagricultural Uses. Scripps Foundation for Research in Population Problems, Miami University, and Population Research and Training Center, University of Chicago. 1956.

Bollens, John C. Metropolitan Areas: Puzzle and Challenge. Public Management. May, 1956.

Cohn, Rubin G. Municipal Revenue Powers in the Context of Constitutional Home Rule. Northwestern University Law Review. March-April, 1956.

Fitch, Lyle C. Fiscal and Political Problems of Increasing Urbanization. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1956.

Gazzolo, Dorothy. Municipal Housing Codes. Public Management. May, 1956.

Kyle, Lyle C. County Problems in Woodbury County, Iowa—A Case Study. County Officer. April, 1956.

Mers, Robert C. Current Practices of Waste Water Reclamation and Utilization. Western City. April, 1956.

Municipal Housing Codes. Harvard Law Review. April, 1956.

Ross, Russell M. The Ultimate Salvation of the County. County Officer. April, 1956.

Wessel, Robert H. Cincinnati's Income Tax—An Emergency Financing Device. National Tax Journal. March, 1956.

Zuchelli, Hazel B. Tax Rates in Virginia Cities. League of Virginia Municipalities, and Bureau of Public Administration, University of Virginia. 1956.

Intergovernmental Relations

Farb, Peter. A Flood Prevention Plan. National Municipal Review. May, 1956.

Kaempfer, W. W. Federal Aid in West Virginia: Its Impact on State Government. Bureau for Government Research, West Virginia University. 1956.

Kamins, Robert M. Federally-Based State Income Taxes. National Tax Journal. March, 1956.

Mason, Paul. Interstate Taxation of Commercial Vehicles in the West. State Government. April, 1956.

Maxwell, James A. The Report of the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. National Tax Journal. March, 1956.

Scheffer, Walter F. Reciprocity in the Taxation of Interstate Trucks. National Tax Journal. March, 1956.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Advisory Opinions on the Constitutionality of Statutes. Harvard Law Review. May, 1956.

Aikin, Charles. Stare Decisis, Precedent, and the Constitution. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Berns, Walter. Freedom and Loyalty. Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

Byrnes, James F. "The Supreme Court Must Be Curbed." U. S. News & World Report. May 18, 1956.

Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. The Encroachments on Freedom. The Atlantic. May, 1956.

Chase, Harold W. The Libertarian Case for Making It a Crime to Be a Communist. Temple Law Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Cook, Eugene, and William I. Potter. The School Segregation Cases: Opposing the Opinion of the Supreme Court. American Bar Association Journal. April, 1956.

Dickinson, Edwin D. The Law of Nations as National Law: "Political Questions." University of Pennsylvania Law Review. January, 1956.

Harris, Robert J. The Impact of the Cold War upon Civil Liberties. Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

Interim Hearings under Immunity Act—Congressional Power vs. Individual Rights. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Jaffe, Louis L. Judicial Review: Question of Fact. Harvard Law Review. April, 1956.

Kadish, Sanford H. A Case Study in the Signification of Procedural Due Process—Institutionalizing the Mentally Ill. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Mankiewicz, Frank F., John K. Mangum, and Graham B. Moody, Jr. The Federal Loyalty-Security Program: A Proposed Statute. California Law Review. March, 1956.

Mason, Alpheus Thomas. The Core of Free Government, 1938-40: Mr. Justice Stone and "Preferred Freedoms." Yale Law Journal. April, 1956.

———. Inter Arma Silent Leges: Chief Justice Stone's Views. Harvard Law Review. March, 1956.

Mr. Justice Black. [Symposium.] Yale Law Journal. February, 1956.

Race Relations Law Reporter. [Source Materials, May, 1954, to December, 1955.] Vanderbilt University School of Law. Vol. 1, No. 1. February, 1956.

The Rights of Aliens in Deportation Proceedings. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Roberts, W. Lewis. The Citizen's Obligations Under the Constitution. Kentucky Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Segregation in Transportation: Substantive and Remedial Problems. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

The Sovereign Immunity of the States: The Doctrine and Some of Its Recent Developments. Minnesota Law Review. February, 1956.

State Sedition Laws: Their Scope and Misapplication. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Studies on Privilege Against Self-Incrimination. [Symposium.] Kentucky Law Journal. Spring, 1956.

Stumberg, George W. The School Segregation Cases: Supporting the Opinion of the Supreme Court. American Bar Association Journal. April, 1956.

Swisher, Carl Brent. The Delineation of Personal and Civil Rights. Georgetown Law Journal. March, 1956.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Cerny, Joe H. Court Reporting: Facts for Public Officials. American Bar Association Journal. May, 1956.

Coburn, Frank E., and Samuel M. Fahr. Amnesia and the Law. Iowa Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Currie, F. A. Small Claims Courts. University of Florida Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Doing Business as a Test of Venue and Jurisdiction over Foreign Corporations in the Federal Courts. Columbia Law Review. March, 1956.

Hall, Jerome. Psychiatry and Criminal Responsibility. Yale Law Journal. May, 1956.

Holme, Peter H., Jr. The System for Administration of Justice in Colorado. Rocky Mountain Law Review. April, 1956.

Jury Trial for Criminal Contempts: Restoring Criminal Contempt Power and Protecting Defendants' Rights. Yale Law Journal. May, 1956.

Larson, Robert L. The Importance and Value of Attorney General Opinions. Iowa Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Leeper, Towner S. Proving Tax Evasion by the Net Worth Method. Texas Law Review. April, 1956.

Lipton, Paul P. The Taxpayer's Rights: Investigation of Tax Fraud Cases. American Bar Association Journal. April, 1956.

Millar, Robert Wyness. Judicial Sequestration in Louisiana: Some Account of Its Sources. Tulane Law Review. February, 1956.

Newman, Donald J. Pleading Guilty for Considerations: A Study of Bargain Justice. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. March-April, 1956.

The Philadelphia Constable. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. January, 1956.

Prosser, William L. Insult and Outrage. California Law Review. March, 1956.

Psychological Tests and Standards of Competence for Selecting Jurors. Yale Law Journal. February, 1956.

Rose, Arnold M. The Social Scientist as an Expert Witness. Minnesota Law Review. February, 1956.

Sink, John M. The Unused Power of a Federal Judge to Call His Own Expert Witness. Southern California Law Review. February, 1956.

Slough, M. C., and J. William Knightly. Other Vices, Other Crimes. Iowa Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Smith, Margaret Chase. Fair Trial and Free Press: Pressures Exerted on Courts and Jurors. American Bar Association Journal. April, 1956.

Spingarn, Jerome H. Arthur T. Vanderbilt: Order in the Courtroom. Harper's Magazine. May, 1956.

Stayton, Robert W., Richard A. Hall, and Mary Joe Carroll. The Proposed Reorganization of the Supreme Court of Texas—Jurisdiction. Texas Law Review. April, 1956.

Steinhaus, Richard Z. Treason, A Brief History with Some Modern Applications. Brooklyn Law Review. April, 1956.

Sutherland, Arthur E. Crimes, Courts and Newspapers. Nieman Reports. April, 1956.

The Uniform Post-Conviction Procedure Act. Harvard Law Review. May, 1956.

Vitalization of the Indiana Coroner System—Channeling Medico-Legal Duties to the Technically Trained. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Weinstein, Jack B. Recognition in the United States of the Privileges of Another Jurisdiction. Columbia Law Review. April, 1956.

Westley, William A. Secrecy and the Police. Social Forces. March, 1956.

Wright, Charles Alan. Rule 56(e): A Case Study on the Need for Amending the Federal Rules. Harvard Law Review. March, 1956.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Adkins, Dorothy C. A Flexible "Rule of Three" for Public Personnel Selection. Public Personnel Review. April, 1956.

Bart, Peter, and Milton Cummings, Jr. The Transfer of the Kansas State Civil Service Department. Inter-University Case Program. University of Alabama Press. 1956.

Birnbaum, Owen. Government Contracts: The Role of the Comptroller General. American Bar Association Journal. May, 1956.

Campbell, Ernest H. Franchises in the State of Washington. Bureau of Governmental Research and Services, University of Washington. 1956.

Charlesworth, James C. Pennsylvania's High-Level Seminars in Administration. State Government. April, 1956.

The Federal False Claims Act: The Informer as Plaintiff. Harvard Law Review. April, 1956.

Federal Habeas Corpus Review of "Final" Administrative Decisions. Columbia Law Review. April, 1956.

Mark, Max. Social Determinants of the Role of a Civil Service. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. March, 1956.

Mitchell, James M., William F. Danielson, and Lida S. Stark. The Michigan Municipal Personnel Service. Public Personnel Review. April, 1956.

Moasher, Frederick C. The Reorganization of the California State Personnel Board. Inter-University Case Program. University of Alabama Press. 1956.

Postal Sanctions: A Study of the Summary Use of Administrative Power. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Recovery of Contingent Fees for the Procurement of Federal Government Contracts. Harvard Law Review. May, 1956.

Richardson, Ivor L. M. Incidents of the Government-Servant Relationship. Michigan Law Review. March, 1956.

The Role of Employer Practices in the Federal Industrial Personnel Security Program—A Field Study. Stanford Law Review. March, 1956.

Waldby, H. O. The Public Officer-Public Employee Distinction in Florida. University of Florida Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Whelan, John W. A Government Contractor's Remedies: Claims and Counterclaims. Virginia Law Review. April, 1956.

Youmans, E. Grant. Federal Management Intern Career Patterns. Public Personnel Review. April, 1956.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Beth, Loren P. McCarthyism. South Atlantic Quarterly. April, 1956.

Blake, Robert R., Jane S. Mouton, and Jack D. Hain. Social Forces in Petition-Signing. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. March, 1956.

Bone, Hugh A. Some Notes on the Congressional Campaign Committees. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

David, Paul T. Specifications for a Model State Presidential Primary Law. Brookings Institution. 1956.

Developments in the Law—Defamation. Harvard Law Review. March, 1956.

Electoral Revision. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. April, 1956.

Epstein, Leon D. Size of Place and the Division of the Two-Party Vote in Wisconsin. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Farris, Charles D. "Authoritarianism" as a Political Behavior Variable. Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

Friedman, Leonard M. Reflections Upon the Law of Political Parties. California Law Review. March, 1956.

Lubell, Samuel. The Politics of Revenge. Harper's Magazine. April, 1956.

Mather, George B. Voting in Iowa. Institute of Public Affairs, State University of Iowa. 1956.

McKenna, William J. The Changing Pattern of Philadelphia Politics, 1914-1955. Economics and Business Bulletin. Temple University. March, 1956.

Morgan, Robert J. Pressure Politics and Resources Administration. Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

Neuberger, Richard L. Who Should Pay for Political Campaigns? New York Times Magazine. June 3, 1956.

Norton-Taylor, Duncan. How to Give Money to Politicians. Fortune. May, 1956.

Rieff, Philip. The Origins of Freud's Political Psychology. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1956.

Strong, Donald S. Registration of Voters in Alabama. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1956.

White, John P. The Role of Public Opinion Polls in the Study of Political Parties. Bureau of Government, Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1956.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Haim, Peggy. Financing the Federal Reclamation Program: Reimbursement Arrangements and Cost Allocations. National Tax Journal. March, 1956.

Kemp, Arthur. The Role of Government in Developing Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy. American Enterprise Association, Washington. 1956.

Lynn, Robert J. Legal and Economic Implications of the Emergence of Quasi-Public Wealth. Yale Law Journal. May, 1956.

Miller, Helen Hill. The Economic Consequences of an Election Year. Virginia Quarterly Review. Spring, 1956.

The O. T. C. Controversy. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. May, 1956.

Tariff Policy for the U. S. A., A Strong, Rich Country. [Symposium.] Journal of Farm Economics. May, 1956.

Business and Labor

The AFL-CIO Merger. [Symposium.] Industrial and Labor Relations Review. April, 1956.

Allen, Layman E. Games Bargaining: A Proposed Application of the Theory of Games to Collective Bargaining. Yale Law Journal. April, 1956.

Aranow, Edward Ross, and Herbert A. Einhorn. Corporate Proxy Contests: Enforcement of SEC Proxy Rules by the Commission and Private Parties. New York University Law Review. May, 1956.

Bickel, Alexander M. Strathearn S. S. Co. v. Dillon—An Unpublished Opinion by Mr. Justice Brandeis. Harvard Law Review. May, 1956.

A Consideration of Legislative Problems in Automobile Dealer Franchises. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Constitutionality of Permissive Legislation: The Union Shop Provision of the Railway

Labor Act v. State "Right to Work" Laws. Yale Law Journal. April, 1956.

Dailey, Richard R. Robinson-Patman Act—A Further Look at Functional Discounts. Michigan Law Review. March, 1956.

The Effect on Public Utility Rate Making of Liberalized Tax Depreciation Under Section 167. Harvard Law Review. April, 1956.

Feldman, Eddy S. Conformity in Unemployment Compensation Insurance Litigation. Labor Law Journal. April, 1956.

Frost, George E. Patent Office Performance in Perspective. Michigan Law Review. March, 1956.

Gilbert, Robert W. The International Union—A New Legal Entity. Labor Law Journal. May, 1956.

Hersog, Donald R. Labor Relations in the Maritime Industry. Labor Law Journal. May, 1956.

Isaacson, William J. Labor Relations Law: Federal versus State Jurisdiction. American Bar Association Journal. May, 1956.

———. A Partial Defense of the Uniform Arbitration Act. Labor Law Journal. May, 1956.

Jones, Francis E., Jr. Free Speech: Pickets on the Grass, Alas! Amidst Confusion, a Consistent Principle. Southern California Law Review. February, 1956.

Judicially Protected Secondary Pressures Under the Taft-Hartley Act. Virginia Law Review. April, 1956.

Kovarsky, Irving. A Social and Legal Analysis of the Secondary Boycott. Oregon Law Review. February, 1956.

Linowitz, Sol M. The International Businessman Meets the Anti-Trust Laws. Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Marcus, Philip. An Antitrust Legislative Program. Georgetown Law Journal. March, 1956.

Meringolo, Louis M. Rent Control: What Remains and Its Future. Brooklyn Law Review. April, 1956.

Mitchell, Robert E. Increased Control Over Proxy Contests: The Proposed Amendment to Regulation X-14 of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Georgetown Law Journal. January, 1956.

Modification of Litigated Antitrust Decrees by the Supreme Court. Columbia Law Review. March, 1956.

Naumoff, Benjamin B. An Analysis of the Contract Bar Doctrine. Labor Law Journal. April, 1956.

Palfrey, John Gorham. Atomic Energy: A

New Experiment in Government-Industry Relations. Columbia Law Review. March, 1956.

Sammond, John S. A Study of the Wisconsin Blue Sky Law and Its Administration. Wisconsin Law Review. March, 1956.

A Symposium on Sales Taxation. Vanderbilt Law Review. February, 1956.

Upton, Arvin E. Licensing and Services to Licensees and Others Under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. George Washington Law Review. April, 1956.

Validity of Minimum Wage Determinations and a Consideration of the Need for the Walsh-Healy Act. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Wickersham, Edward D. Legislative Implications of Recent Unemployment Benefits Agreements. Labor Law Journal. May, 1956.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Anderson, Oscar E., Jr. The Pure-Food Issue: A Republican Dilemma, 1906-1912. American Historical Review. April, 1956.

Freeman, Roger A. Crisis in School Finance. Part I: Rising School Needs. National Tax Journal. March, 1956.

Legal Sanctions to Enforce Desegregation in the Public Schools: The Contempt Power and the Civil Rights Acts. Yale Law Journal. April, 1956.

Mandelker, Daniel R. Family Responsibility Under the American Poor Laws: I. Michigan Law Review. February, 1956. II. Ibid. March, 1956.

State Governments and Educational Television. Illinois Legislative Council. 1956.

Military Affairs and National Security

Cates, Richard L. Relationship of the Military System of Justice to the Problem of Adjustment. Wisconsin Law Review. March, 1956.

Cutler, Robert. The Development of the National Security Council. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

Farrell, D. Ted. Trial of Civilians by Military Tribunal. Southern California Law Review. February, 1956.

Gardner, Edith Rose. Coerced Confessions of Prisoners of War. George Washington Law Review. April, 1956.

Huard, Leo Albert. The Status of National Internal Security during 1955. Georgetown Law Journal. January, 1956.

Orfield, Lester B. Jurisdiction of Foreign Courts over Crimes Committed Abroad by American Military Personnel. South Carolina Law Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. General Farm Legislation. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. 1956 Farm Bill. House Reports Nos. 2077 and 2197. Also House Doc. No. 380. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Defense Production Act—1956. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2067. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Minimum Wages in Certain Territories, Possessions, and Oversea Areas of the United States. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mutual Security Act of 1956. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Availability of Information from Federal Departments and Agencies. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Civil Defense for National Survival. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Water Rights Settlement Act of 1956. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Advertising of Alcoholic Beverages. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Alcoholic Beverages on Airlines. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Newsprint Study. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Non-Federal Health Research Facilities. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2184. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Railroad Retirement Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Civil Rights. House Report No. 2187. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Establishing Rules of Interpretation Governing Questions of the Effect of Acts of Congress on State Laws. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Federal Construction Contract Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Presidential Inability. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Rules of Civil Procedure for the United States District Courts. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. To Amend Sections 2 and 3 of the Clayton Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Wildlife Refuge Disposal Policy. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Code of Ethics for Government Service. Hearing. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Postal Rate Revision. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Public Works. National Highway Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2022. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Water Pollution Control Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2190. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Un-American Activities. Investigation of Communist Activities in the North Carolina Area. Hearing. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Benefit Levels in Veterans' Programs. House Committee Print No. 243. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. The Historical Development of Veterans' Benefits in the United States. House Committee Print No. 244. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. State Veterans' Laws. House Committee Print No. 246. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Survivor Benefits for Service-Connected Deaths and Veterans' Insurance. House Committee Print No. 247. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. The Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation. House Report No. 2007. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Public Assistance Titles of the Social Security Act. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Traffic in, and Control of, Narcotics, Barbiturates, and Amphetamines. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1956.

———. Report Concerning the Nation's Rubber Requirements and Resources. House Doc. No. 391. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

House and Senate. Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. Development, Growth, and State of the Atomic Energy Industry. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

Senate. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Agricultural Act of 1956. Senate Report No. 1966. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Armed Services. Dependent Medical Care. Hearings. Also Senate Report No. 1878. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Medical and Dental Officer Career Incentive Act. Hearing. Also Senate Report No. 1756. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Study of Airpower. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Defense Production Act Amendments of 1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Extension of Export Control Act of 1949. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Federal Flood Insurance Act of 1956. Senate Report No. 1864. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Housing Amendments of 1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 2005. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Finance. Highway Revenue Act. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Foreign Service Act Amendments of 1956. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1726. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. United States Information and Educational Exchange Act Amendments of 1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1959. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Communist Ownership of GI Schools. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. East-West Trade. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Organization of Federal Ex-

Executive Departments and Agencies. Senate Report No. 1715. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Proposal to Create an Administrative Vice President. Senate Report No. 1960. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Alaska Mental Health. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Water Rights Settlement Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Alaska and West Coast Transportation Problems. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Fisheries Legislation. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Freight Forwarder Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Amendment to Refugee Relief Act of 1953. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Constitutional Amendment Relative to Treaties and Executive Agreements. Senate Report No. 1716. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Motion Pictures and Juvenile Delinquency. Senate Report No. 2055. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Narcotic Control Act of 1956. Senate Report No. 1997. Also Senate Doc. No. 120. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Treatment and Rehabilitation of Narcotic Addicts. Senate Report No. 1850. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. A National Library of Medicine. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Welfare and Pension Plans Investigation. Senate Report No. 1734. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Civil Service Retirement. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1787. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Public Works. Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956. Senate Report No. 1965. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Emergency Flood Control. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Power Rates—Southwestern Power Administration. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Election Law Guidebook, 1956. Senate Doc. No. 116. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Secretary of the Senate. Factual Campaign Information. 1956.

———. Select Committee for Contribution Investigation. Hearings Relative to Senate Resolution 205. Also Senate Report No. 1724. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

Other Federal

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Office of Education. The State and Publicly Supported Libraries. By Fred F. Beach, Ralph M. Dunbar, and Robert F. Will. 1956.

[Department of Justice.] Jurisdiction over Federal Areas within the States. Report of the Interdepartmental Committee: Part I. April, 1956.

National Science Foundation. Scientific Research Expenditures by the Larger Private Foundations. By F. Emerson Andrews. 1956.

Small Business Administration. Management Aids for Small Business. Annual No. 2. Edited by Edward L. Anthony. 1956.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

Unrepentant Tory: The Life and Times of Andrew Bonar Law, 1858-1923, Prime Minister of The United Kingdom. By ROBERT BLAKE. (New York: St. Martin's Press, Inc. 1956. Pp. 556. $9.00.)

My Father: The True Story. By A. W. BALDWIN. (London: George Allen & Unwin Ltd.; Fair Lawn, N. J.: Essential Books, Inc. 1955. Pp. 360. $4.00.)

The appearance of a first-class biography of a British Prime Minister is always an important event; the near simultaneous appearance of two such volumes is an occasion indeed. All the more so because neither of the subjects of these biographies has been sufficiently understood by the general public, Baldwin because his career and character have been so much debated, Bonar Law because his have been so little discussed.

Mr. Blake's Unrepentant Tory appears to be a definitive work. It is the first biography to draw upon the Bonar Law papers and is based wherever possible upon other such papers and on information supplied by personal recollections of various contemporaries. His picture of the Conservative leader will make it impossible henceforth to describe him, as Asquith did, as the "unknown Prime Minister." Bonar Law was above all the leader of his party, perhaps to a fault. His achievement lay in the fact that it was his leadership that held the party together in the dark days from 1906 to 1922; his tragedy lay in the fact that death took him so quickly from the prime ministry after it had been at such pain achieved. Indeed one may attribute to his skill, character, and statesmanship the fact that, of the two war- and faction-torn parties, it was the Conservatives rather than the Liberals that were able to reconcile their differences and face united the post-war onslaught of Labour.

Bonar Law was neither brilliant nor personally ambitious. In Mr. Blake's words "he was the ordinary man writ large," and when the time came to pass on the leadership of the party—and with it the prime ministry—he was torn with indecision. One of the most important parts of the book is the author's new interpretation of those events that gave the succession to Baldwin instead of Curzon.

Which brings us to Mr. Baldwin's biography of his father—a very different sort of book. It is intended as a corrective rather than a full biography, which is a reasonable exercise in view of the far more ample treatment that historians have accorded his father. Stanley Baldwin, too, was a party man; he led the Conservatives, in a very different way, from Bonar Law's death to his own retirement fourteen years later. In his own time he was considered uncommunicative and stuffy; in later days he was denounced as inept and culpable. Thanks to Mr. Churchill and to Mr. G. M. Young, the authorized biographer, there are many even yet who believe that Baldwin put party above nation and concealed the facts of Hitler's aims to win the 1935 election.

His son has sought to correct this distorted image and has done a highly competent job of it. This is an ably argued, ably written book. It does not offer itself as a complete biography—there are important gaps in it—but it does remarkably well what it is intended to do: namely, to provide a clear picture of Baldwin the man and to supply an answer to his more extravagant critics. The definitive biography of Stanley Baldwin has yet to be written, but when it appears it will clearly depend to an important extent on the significant contribution here made by his son.

There exists no systematic study of the British Prime Ministry; even Mr. Byrum Carter's recent and useful volume makes no pretense at providing this. Our understanding of the office, and of the system that embraces it, must therefore depend in a large measure on the study of the prime ministers themselves. These two books offer valuable assistance in this task.—WILLIAM S. LIVINGSTON, The University of Texas.

Die Verbände in der Bundesrepublik: Ihre Arten und ihre politische Wirkungsweise. By RUPERT BREITLING. (Meisenheim am Glan: Verlag Anton Hain K.G. 1955. Pp. 303).

Except for some desultory or denunciatory treatment, scant attention had been paid in the German literature until recent years to the role of interest groups in German government and politics. This neglect has been mainly due to the near monopoly in governmental studies held so long by academic students of public law in Germany, with their primarily formal and ideological concerns. The postwar years have seen a marked growth of interest in these problems, both on the part of political scientists and sociologists, a development in which the stimulus of the newly discovered American literature may well claim some share.

As far as the reviewer is aware, the present study by Breitling, the latest volume in the important series edited by D. Sternberger in behalf of the new German Association for Political Science, is the first systematic inquiry into the forms and roles of interest groups on the Western German political scene. In this sense it may be considered the German counterpart of Pendleton Herring's pioneer study on Group Representation Before Congress. Like Herring's investigation of the American pattern, it is a deliberately factual, closely documented introduction to the structure and activities of the German Verbände, supported by useful charts and statistics. The emphasis is upon the ways of interest groups with and within the Bundestag and its parties. There is a suggestive scrutiny of committee composition and an appendix contains special studies of selected pressure groups, ranging from taxpayers to the Catholic labor movement. The author's classification of these groups may be questioned by some readers; he divides lobbying organizations into interest groups proper (with a dominantly economic interest), vocational, religious, and "political" organizations (such as states, municipalities—but also citizens' and public officials' associations).

Students of German politics will find in Breitling's work a valuable tool for understanding the dynamics of the Bonn democracy and a robust testimony to the developing German pragmatism in political science. The author's concluding observation provides food for thought: "In effect, the presence of fewer interest group-connected politicians in parliament means the increase of career officials or party functionaries in that body and vice versa. Yet a large-scale membership of career officials or party functionaries constitutes a greater threat to a balanced house than the presence of [a substantial number of] interest group specialists" (p. 138). May we hope that the author or his associates will in future studies delve into pressures upon German public administration and thus put us further into their debt?—WOLFGANG H. KRAUS, George Washington University.

Freedom of the Press in the German Republic, 1918-1933. By PETER J. FLIESS. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 1955. Pp. 147. $2.50.)

Brief and penetrating, this study of the German press under the Weimar Republic is also instructive and foreboding. Weaving together an acute analysis of Weimar political institutions and social dynamics with a perceptive study of the role of the mass media, Professor Fliess depicts the conflict of liberty and authority in a concrete and provocative setting. The perspective suggested is chilling to liberal optimism.

The German community—geographically balkanized, lacking firm libertarian traditions, fragmented by factional warfare, and beset by recurrent crisis—was not only a natural prey for mass radical movements, but inevitably generated them. The press, as mediator between power-hungry cliques and the masses, was a major variable in the political equation; and control of the press was a condition of survival for the Republic. Failures and blunders in this vital task, the author contends, reveal not so much official ineptitude, as the suicidal dangers of clinging to outmoded liberal instrumentalities when threatened by modern revolutionary tactics of propaganda, disruption, and "creeping revolution." Potent against Communists, traditional legal and administrative restrictions were largely ineffective against the more subtle techniques of the Right, were often as damaging to liberalism's friends as to its foes, and conspired to hasten ultimate disaster.

Although the Bonn government has demonstrated that democracy may learn much and learn effectively from its failures and that liberty can work for unity as well as division, Professor Fliess's contention that uniformity and cohesion rather than liberty are the necessary social cement of modern emerging democracies merits thoughtful consideration. His study of Weimar is a solid argument for that thesis.—DAVID G. SMITH, Swarthmore College.

Documents on Germany under Occupation, 1945-1954. SELECTED AND EDITED BY BEATE RUHM VON OPPEN. (London, New York, and Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. xxvii, 660. $10.00.)

A collection of documents illustrative of the implementation of occupation policy in the four zones of Germany during the period 1945-1954. Many of the documents, especially those issued by the Russians, have been inaccessible to Western students and their publication at this time will be widely welcomed. An attractive feature of the collection is the publication at some length of the selected documents rather than the presentation of a collection of short excerpts. The work will be an important reference for all persons interested in the German problem and the relations between the USSR and the other occupying powers.

Race and Reich: The Story of an Epoch. By JOSEPH TENENBAUM. (New York: Twayne Publishers. 1956. Pp. xvi, 554. $7.50.)

In this work the Nazi racial theory and its implementation are indicted by a scholar whose previous publications on Hitler's regime have received favorable attention. The relation between Hitler's racial policies and the Nazi economy, concentration camps, deportation policies, and genocide are discussed. The work is concerned primarily with the Jewish Question and has made use of generally inaccessible German documents and sources. It should prove a useful reference work to be added to the growing literature devoted to the revelation of the bestial and cynical character of the Third Reich and those who carried out its fanatical policies.

Das Bundeshaus. Aus der Arbeit des Bundestages und des Bundesrates, mit einem Vorwort von Dr. Eugen Gerstenmaier, Präsident des Deutschen Bundestages. 3. Auflage. By

FRIEDRICH KARL SCHRAMM. (Bonn: E. Beinhauer. 1955. Pp. 32.)

A brief, illustrated description of the Bundeshaus at Bonn, of the West German Federal Parliament, of the deputies, of the legislative process, of the commissions, and of the sessions such as this would, if more generally available or available in English, have considerable interest as a factual statement about a new and rather important parliamentary body. It is published in connection with the Federal agency Bundessentrale für Heimatdienst, and was first issued under the title Der Bundestag.—J.B.C.

Der Bundesrat. BY HANS SCHÄFER. (Köln, Berlin: Carl Heymanns Verlag K.-G. 1955. Pp. 137. DM 14.80.)

The treatment of the Bundesrat, the body representing the Länder in the legislation and administration of the Federal Government in the Bundesrepublik, is by one who has been closely connected with its work. It treats briefly of the predecessor bodies. In the bibliography, some reference to the debates and documents of the Bundesrat and those of the predecessor bodies would have been helpful to the non-German reader, to whom these are not always available.—J.B.C.

Merkbuch für die Mitarbeiter der staatlichen Organe, 1956. (Berlin: VEB Deutscher Zentralverlag. 1956. Pp. 118. Schriftenreihe Demokratischer Aufbau, Heft 16.)

The fourth annual edition of what appears to be an official manual for state employees in the Deutsche Demokratische Republik contains some brief unsigned articles on recent developments in governmental matters such as the Abgeordnetengruppen, or formal organization of deputies in the Volkskammer by Bezirke, for dealing with the local problems of the Bezirke, the Ständige Kommissionen in local governments, official travel regulations, etc. In addition, there is a 4-page directory of central state agencies, a list of political parties and Massenorganisationen, a listing of the principal central newspapers and magazines from the point of view of the government, a classified table of the principal laws and ordinances, a chronology of the main governmental events of the previous year, etc. The work, put out by the Central State Publishing House, seems intended mainly for official circulation, and is revealing as regards governmental attitudes and practices in the Deutsche Demokratische Republik.—J.B.C.

English Politics in the Early Eighteenth Century. BY ROBERT WALCOTT, JR. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. 291. $3.50.)

This is a carefully documented analysis of parliamentary politics in the last days of William and the first days of Anne. The study is directed towards the election and composition of Parliament and its party composition; it draws primarily upon the parliamentary records themselves and upon the available biographical data on the members. The thesis is that Britain had no two-party system during this period (as Trevelyan and others have suggested) but had rather a multi-factional system in which government could be sustained only by a frequently shifting and always unstable coalition of factions. Thus Walcott tries to do for the early part of the 18th century what Namier has done for the later part. And he does it well; this is a piece of very competent research.

Ulster under Home Rule: A Study of the Political and Economic Problems of Northern Ireland. EDITED BY THOMAS WILSON. (London, New York, and Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1955. Pp. xxiv, 229. $3.40.)

An important effort to provide a general description of the political and economic structure of Northern Ireland. Half a dozen contributors, mostly Ulstermen, provide data and comment on the constitutional system, the economy, defense, finance, party politics, and other matters. A major theme of the book is that Northern Ireland is a unique "nation," sharply distinct from the rest of Ireland as well as from the rest of the United Kingdom. The authors, while differing in particulars, agree that devolution has worked well in Northern Ireland, perhaps because it was really never needed there. This is a useful and important book, probably the most important general study since Mansergh.

The Rebuilding of Italy: Politics and Economics, 1946-1956. BY MURIEL GRINDROD. (London and New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1955. Pp. vii, 269. $4.00.)

The first English-language effort to deal comprehensively with Italian government since the war. Miss Grindrod, who is now editor of The World Today, published in 1947 an excellent short survey of The New Italy. The present volume is far more ambitious; it contains a brief history of political and constitutional development since 1945, a lengthy analysis of elections and party controversy, and a perceptive discussion of the problems of postwar Italian policy: foreign affairs, economic recovery and development, social welfare, land reform, etc. The able work of a competent student, this book is the best thing now available on postwar Italy.

La Regione Friuli-Venezia Giulia. Parte prima. Cenni sul problema regionale e proposta di statuto. BY DIEGO DE CASTRO. (Bologna: Cappelli. 1955. Pp. 165.)

The brief study of one of the autonomous regions of Italy under the 1946 Constitution is by one who has been closely associated with its problems. The second part is to take up the history and ethnic and economic considerations.—J.B.C.

The Struggle For Asia. BY SIR FRANCIS LOW. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. ix, 239. $3.50.)

The Struggle for Asia is a thoughtful and informative book, "for the average western citizen," by a journalist with long experience in Asia. After surveying the internal situations in various countries of Asia, the author considers the "struggle for Asia." This struggle is "not Asian nationalism versus the West; it is Asian nationalism versus Communism." While the author is able to discuss SEATO with admirable fairness, he is, nevertheless, more impressed with the contribution of the Colombo powers, whose most important spokesman is Nehru, to the nationalist, democratic cause.

The Control of Teachers in Communist China: A Socio-Political Study and Reactions in Communist China: An Analysis of Letters of Newspaper Editors. BY CHARLES K. S. WANG; Chinese Communist Anti-Americanism and the Resist-America Aid Korea Campaign and The Family Revolution in Communist China. BY WEN-HUI C. CHEN, CHIEF CONTRIBUTOR. (Lackland Air Force Base, Texas: Air Force Personnel and Training Research Center, Air Research and Development Command, Technical Research Reports No. 36 and No. 33, Memoranda No. 36 and No. 35. 1955. Pp. x, 61; xi, 115; xiii, 22; xii, 65.)

Four volumes in the U. S. Air Force "Chinese Documents Project." The general project was under the direction of Professor T. H. E. Chen of the University of Southern California, and the reports are based primarily on research in Chinese sources.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

HIRAM M. STOUT

Naval War College

General

Riggs, F. W. Public Administration: A Neglected Factor in Economic Development. The Annals. May, 1956.

Thayer, J. R. The Contribution of Public Opinion Polls to the Understanding of the 1953 Elections in Italy, West Germany, and Japan. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Tickner, F. J. Public Service Training in the Past Decade. Public Administration. Spring, 1956.

Ward R. E., and others. Village Government in Eastern and Southern Asia: Symposium. Far Eastern Quarterly. February, 1956.

Specific Areas

United Kingdom

Best, R. D. The United Kingdom Atomic

Energy Authority. Public Administration. Spring, 1956.

Brady, A. The British Two-Party System. Political Science. March, 1956.

Chester, D. N. The Select Committee on the Nationalised Industries. Public Administration. Spring, 1956.

Curran, C. Liberty, Equality and Mr. Gaitskell. Spectator. April 6, 1956.

Epstein, L. D. British Mass Parties in Comparison with American Parties. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1956.

Finer, S. E. The Federation of British Industries. Political Studies. February, 1956.

Gaitskell, H. Socialism's Way: Gaitskell Defines It. The New York Times Magazine. April 8, 1956.

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. The British Civil Service. London, 1955.

Green, F. H. W. Community of Interest and Local Government Areas. Public Administration. Spring, 1956.

Hacker, A. Original Sin vs. Utopia in British Socialism. The Review of Politics. April, 1956.

Lawrence, R. J. Devolution Reconsidered. Political Studies. February, 1956.

Lucas, K. B. Government of the County in England. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Marshall, G. The Courts, Ministers, and the Parliamentary Process. Public Administration. Spring, 1956.

Redbrick Universities. Twentieth Century. February, 1956.

Ross, W. A. Local Government Board and After: Retrospect. Public Administration. Spring, 1956.

Soammon, R. M. British By-Elections, 1951-1955. Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

Steiner, F. G. Eden in Trouble. Harper's Magazine. April, 1956.

Trotman-Dickenson, D. I. The British Taxes on Excess Profits. Public Finance. No. 1, 1956.

Walker, P. G. On Being a Cabinet Minister. The New York Times Magazine. June 3, 1956.

Wiseman, H. V. Parliament and the University Grants Committee. Public Administration. Spring, 1956.

Colonial Areas

Apter, D. E. Political Development in Uganda. Current History. May, 1956.

Communist Propaganda Activities in Cyprus in 1955. United States Information Agency. Washington, 1956.

Curtin, P. D. The Gold Coast: Five Years Aiter. Current History. May, 1956.

East Africa: Scylla and Charybdis. The Round Table. March, 1956.

Erskine, G. Kenya-Mau Mau. Journal of the Royal United Service Institution. February, 1956.

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Cyprus Today. London, 1955.

Irvine, K. The Central African Federation. Current History. May, 1956.

Swan, M. Politics and Pork-Knockers. Encounter. April, 1956.

Transition in South-East Asia: The Future of Malaya and Singapore. The Round Table. March, 1956.

Zeidenfelt, A. British West Indies Federation. Social Science. April, 1956.

Commonwealth of Nations

Belshaw, C. S. Canadian Policy and Asia Society. International Journal. Winter, 1955-56.

Blair, L. Arbitration in the Federal Public Service of Australia. Public Administration. Spring, 1956.

Boyd, M. Political Development in Western Samoa and Universal Suffrage. Political Science. March, 1956.

Callard, K. The Political Stability of Pakistan. Pacific Affairs. March, 1956.

Chari, A. Reorganizing Primary and Secondary Education in India. Education. February, 1956.

Crouch, W. W. Civil Service in India. Public Personnel Review. April, 1956.

Ghosh, K. P. The Principles and Outlines of India's Second Five-Year Plan. Eastern World. December, 1955.

Great Britain. Office of Commonwealth Relations. High Commission Territories: Economic Development and Social Services. London, H.M.S.O., 1955 (Cmd. 9580).

Hahn, E. "The Situation" in South Africa. Encounter. January, 1956.

Jamieson, D. P. The Legal Profession in Canada. Canadian Bar Review. March, 1956.

Jennings, I. Crown and Commonwealth in Asia. International Affairs. April, 1956.

Pakistan: Last Stage of Constitution-Making. The Round Table. March, 1956.

Pandit, V. L. India's Foreign Policy. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

Rydon, J. The Constitutional Crisis in South Africa. Australian Quarterly. March, 1956.

South Africa: The Constitutional Crisis. The Round Table. March, 1956.

Thorne, J. The Republic of India—Planning and Administration. Bankers' Magazine. May, 1956.

Weiner, M. Struggle Against Power: Notes on Indian Political Behavior. World Politics. April, 1956.

Westley, D. E. Economic Developments in Pakistan. Washington, G.P.O., 1956.

Western Europe

Barzini, L. Italy and its Aristocracy. Encounter. January, 1956.

Berlia, G. La Dissolution et le Régime des Pouvoirs Publics. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. January-February, 1956.

Blamont, E. La Mise en Oeuvre de la Dissolution. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politiques. January-February, 1956.

Crabbe, V. Syndicalisme et Fonction Publique en Belgique. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 4, 1955.

Eastman, M. Norway: Case History in Socialism. National Review. April 18, 1956.

Foster, W. Legislative Research in Sweden. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Godard, J. Les Budgets Militaires Français. Revue de Défense Nationale. March, 1956.

Goguel, F. Les Elections Françaises du 2 Janvier 1956. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1956.

Grosser, A. Rückblick auf die Wahlen in Frankreich. Europa-Archiv. March 5, 1956.

Ireland Today. Spectator. April 20, 1956.

Levy, D. Les Elections à la Présidence de la République Finlandaise. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1956.

Luethy, H. The Crisis of French Colonialism. Atlantic Monthly. May, 1956.

Mangone, G. J. Sicilian Elections in Italy. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Matton, H. La Cour des Comptes de Belgique et le Droit Administratif. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 4, 1955.

McNee, R. B. Rural Development in the Italian South: a Geographic Case Study. Annals of the Association of American Geographers. June, 1955.

Morris, B. S. Some Perspectives on the Nature and Role of Western European Communist Parties. Review of Politics. April, 1956.

Owen, J. E. Social Welfare in Finland. Social Science. April, 1956.

Philip, D. L'Association Administrative des Pays Scandinaves. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 4, 1955.

Philip, D. La Structure des Partis et la Vie Politique en Norvège. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. February, 1956.

Ruini, M. Il Bilancio dello Stato e l'art. 81 della Costituzione. Rivista di Politica Economica. December, 1955.

Santillana, G. de. Italy Changes Her Ways. Harper's Magazine. May, 1956.

Schwartz, U. Rivalries in Spain. Swiss Review of World Affairs. March, 1956.

Siegfried, A. Stable Instability in France. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

Sistach, R. Défense Nationale et Secrétariats d'Etat. Revue de Défense Nationale. March, 1956.

Steadman, M. S. Jr. French Elections of January 2, 1956. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Touchard, J. Bibliographie et Chronologie du Poujadisme. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1956.

Turtledove, H. L. Why the French Act That Way. Harper's Magazine. May, 1956.

Vernant, J. La France et la Coopération Atomique Européenne. Revue de Défense Nationale. April, 1956.

Central Europe

Anthon, C. G. East Germany. Current History. April, 1956.

Anthon, C. G. East Germany After the June Revolts. World Affairs Quarterly. April, 1956.

Conant, J. B. Freedom and Slavery in a Divided Germany. Department of State Bulletin. April 9, 1956.

East German Economic Development Trends. Swiss Review of World Affairs. March, 1956.

Erhard, L. Germany's Reconstruction. Current History. April, 1956.

Erler, F. The Struggle for German Reunification. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

Fay, S. B. Leadership at Bonn. Current History. April, 1956.

Frei, O. The Remilitarization of Eastern Germany. Swiss Review of World Affairs. April, 1956.

Gatzke, H. W. Reunification. Current History. April, 1956.

Heisenberg, W. Atomic Energy Development in Germany. Atomics Engineering and Technology. April, 1956.

Holleaux, A. La Décentralisation Administrative en Allemagne. Revue de Droit Public et de la Science Politique. January-February, 1956.

Kirchheimer, O. Germany Without Adenauer. New Leader. April 16, 1956.

Kohn, H. Nationalism. Current History. April, 1956.

Midgley, J. The Future of German Democracy. Listener. April 19, 1956.

Snell, J. L. Schumacher's Successors: The Personal Factor in the Shaping of Contemporary German Social Democracy. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. March, 1956.

Spencer, R. A. Germany and the "Long Haul." International Journal. Winter, 1955-56.

Thumm, G. W. The Saar. Current History. April, 1956.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

Apremont, B. and Schram, S. Evolution Récente de l'U.S.S.R. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1956.

Armstrong, J. A. Administrative Apparatus in the Rural Ukraine. The American Slavic and East European Review. February, 1956.

Assembly of Captive European Nations. The Captive Nations—1956. New Leader. April 9, 1956.

Avtorkhanov, A. Social Differentiation and Contradictions in the Party. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. February, 1956.

Barghoorn, F. C. Cultural Relations and Soviet Foreign Policy. World Politics. April, 1956.

Bauer, R. A. Some Trends in Sources of Alienation from the Soviet System. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1955.

Burmeister, A. and others. The End of Forced Labour? Encounter. April, 1956.

The Communist Party and Parliamentarianism—from the Comintern Theses and Statutes of 1920 to the Soviet Party Congress of 1956. United States Information Agency. Washington, 1956.

Edgerton, W. B. Soviet Education Today. Institute of International Education News Bulletin. March, 1956.

Fainsod, M. Russia's 20th Party Congress. Foreign Policy Bulletin. May 1, 1956.

Galay, N. Military Representation in the Higher Party Echelons. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. April, 1956.

Granick, D. Economic Aspects of the Soviet "New Course." World Politics. April, 1956.

Halperin, E. An Analysis of the Recent Moscow Party Congress. Swiss Review of World Affairs. April, 1956.

Humphrey, A. H. Russian Dictatorship: The Firm Base of World Communism. Journal of the Royal United Service Institution. February, 1956.

Jurcenko, A. V. The Current Tactics of the Soviet Collective Leadership. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. April, 1956.

Lattimore, O. Satellite Politics: The Mongolian Prototype. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Martons, M. Providing for the Soviet Officer. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. February, 1956.

Polezhaev, A. Industry and the Sixth Five-Year Plan. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. March, 1956.

Posdeeff, E. The Legal Profession in the USSR. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. March, 1956.

Preliminary Report on 20th Party Congress, CPSU. United States Information Agency. Washington, 1956.

Recent Developments in Molotov's Career. United States Information Agency. Washington, 1956.

Ruslanov, P. Marshal Zuhkov. Russian Review. April, 1956.

U. S. Department of State. Religion in the Soviet Union. Washington, GPO, 1956.

Whitney, T. Aggression by Economic Planning—the Sixth Soviet Five-Year Plan. New Leader. March 26, 1956.

Middle East and Africa

Adams, D. G. Current Population Trends in Iraq. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1956.

Al-Habib, M. M. The Labor Movement in Iraq. Middle Eastern Affairs. April, 1956.

Aschinger, F. E. An Economic Report on Iraq. Swiss Review of World Affairs. April, 1956.

Conaway, O. B., Jr. Mobilizing Israel's Resources for Public Administration. United Nations Review. April, 1956.

Economic Challenge in Ruanda-Urundi. United Nations Review. April, 1956.

The Egyptian Constitution. Middle Eastern Affairs. February, 1956.

Fawzi, D. Transfer of Power in the Sudan. Internationale Spectator. March 8, 1956.

Hance, W. A. The Economic Potentials of Africa. American Economic Review. May, 1956.

Liebesny, H. J. Administration and Legal Development in Arabia. The Middle East Journal. Winter, 1956.

Marshall, A. D. Somalia: a United Nations Experiment. Focus. April, 1956.

Onar, S. S. Les Transformations de la Structure Administrative et Juridique de la Turquie et son État Actuel. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 4, 1955.

Tannous, A. I. Dilemma of the Elite in Arab Society. Human Organization. Fall, 1955.

Woodhouse, C. M. Cyprus and the Middle Eastern Crisis. International Journal. Winter, 1955-56.

The Youngest Republic: Independence of the Sudan. The Round Table. March, 1956.

Southeast Asia

Benda, H. J. Communism in Southeast Asia. Yale Review. Spring, 1956.

Compton, B. R. Red Surabaya. New York,

- Institute of Current World Affairs, 1956.
 Indonesia. Atlantic Monthly. June, 1956.
 Levi, W. Politics in Nepal. Far Eastern Survey. March, 1956.
 Présence du Cambodge. France-Asie. November-December, 1955.
 Salazar, O. Goa and the Indian Union. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.
 Sheinbaum, S. K. Vietnam—a Study in Freedom. Michigan State University Magazine. February, 1956.
 Thailand. United States Department of State. Washington, G.P.O., 1956.
 Wint, G. Last Transfers in Asia. Twentieth Century. March, 1956.
- Pacific and Far East*
- The Constitution of the Republic of Korea. Seoul, Office of Public Information, 1956.
 Henderson, W. Communist China: An American Appraisal. International Journal. Spring, 1956.
 Japanese Communist Party. United States Information Agency. Washington, 1956.
 Kiuchi, N. False Assumptions About the Japanese Economy. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.
 Li, T-T. The Legal Position of Tibet. American Journal of International Law. April, 1956.
 Lorenzo, C. M. Foreign Investments in the Philippines. Economic Research Journal. March, 1956.
 Maeda, H. A National Newspaper in Japan. Nieman Reports. April, 1956.
 Mertsalov, V. S. Mao in Stalin's Footsteps. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. February, 1956.
 Murphey, R. China's Transport Problem, and Communist Planning. Economic Geography. January, 1956.
 Neuvy, P. Regroupement des Forces Politiques au Japon. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1956.
 The Philippine Constitution as the Standard of Government Conduct in Theory and in Practice. A Symposium. Philippine Law Journal. December, 1955.
- Shabad, T. Counting 600 Million Chinese. Far Eastern Survey. April, 1956.
 Taeuber, I. B. Recent Population Developments in Japan: Some Facts and Reflections. Pacific Affairs. March, 1956.
 Ward, R. E. The Constitution and Current Japanese Politics. Far Eastern Survey. April, 1956.
- Latin America*
- Bouças, V. F. O Conselho Técnico de Economia e Finanças. Revista do Serviço Público. July, 1955.
 Carlson, S. and others. The Economic Potentials of Latin America. American Economic Review. May, 1956.
 Cubas, E. Recent Developments in Social Security in the Americas. Bulletin of the International Social Security Association. January-February, 1956.
 Dallien, R. Les Elections Brésiliennes d'Octobre 1955. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1956.
 Dyer, D. R. Sugar Regions of Cuba. Economic Geography. April, 1956.
 Fox, J. S. Problems of Labour Administration in Latin America. International Labor Review. March, 1956.
 Gillin, J. and Silvert, K. H. Ambiguities in Guatemala. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.
 Kling, M. Towards a Theory of Power and Political Instability in Latin America. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.
 Lens, S. Latin America: a Political Report. Dissent. Spring, 1956.
 Mena, A. O. Recent Developments in the Field of Social Security in Mexico. Bulletin of the International Social Security Association. January-February, 1956.
 Moitinho, A. P. L'Enseignement de l'Administration au Brésil. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 4, 1955.
 Patterson, E. F. The Extent and Pattern of the Expenditures of the Argentine National Government. Public Finance. No. 1, 1956.
 Pendle, G. Die Aera Perón. Europa Archiv. March 20, 1956.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

The European Coal and Steel Community: Experiment in Supranationalism. BY HENRY L. MASON. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff. 1955. Pp. xi, 153.)

It was some eighty years ago that Bismarck commented tartly, "Whoever speaks of Europe is wrong." Certainly little has occurred since to prove his judgment false. Yet, between the two World Wars, Ortega y Gasset, in his Revolt of the Masses, could suggest that the idea of Europe was less unbelievable then than that of Spain had been in the eleventh century. Events of the last decade lend support to Ortega's optimism, although many, with good reason, remain skeptical.

Enthusiasm for European union has, in recent years, created many movements and institutions, public and private. Some have proved useful; others seem to be still-born. But, in its effective activity and in its promise, one has been outstanding: the European Coal and Steel Community, often called the "Schuman Plan." To this, as a "pilot experiment in supranational organization," Professor Mason has devoted an excellent little book. With recognition that neither municipal nor international law forms an entirely appropriate framework for analysis, the author endeavors to bring out the general political and constitutional aspects of the Community through a combination in interpretative analysis of the provisions of the treaty and conventions, the expressed opinions of those who have worked with those provisions, and the accomplishments of the organization through 1954. He concludes with a discussion of the nature of supranational organization, and with the prospects of the Coal and Steel Community in a more hostile world than that of its inception. The work is welcome, as there is relatively little analytical material on the subject in English, and not much in other languages.

Professor Mason's discussion brings out clearly that the institutions and procedures of the Schuman Plan refuse to be comprehended within the concepts to which we are generally accustomed. It is, in a sense, a new world in creation, and, if it survives, it will have its own appropriate concepts. Early in the book the author calls attention to the exceptional character of the Community by remarking the peculiar circumstances of its adoption, and in his final paragraph he observes the need for its own sustaining myth. Further evidence on this point is scattered throughout the work: the important role of the Court (p. 42), accompanied by an indication of its limitations in cases of conflict with national tribunals (p. 46); the extensive governmental powers of the High Authority (p. 74), combined with reluctance to exercise them in important issues (p. 92). It is perhaps regrettable that Professor Mason did not orient his analysis more specifically to this perspective.

The author notes that at the time of writing it was still too early to reach even tentative conclusions whether the Community had been able to live up to expectations. A year and a half later the same diffidence is appropriate. Critical conditions which would test it have not yet appeared, and the degree of support for it in member countries remains quite uncertain. A few years ago there were numerous proposals for similar "pools" in agriculture, transportation, and power. Of these one hears little today. Only Euratom and the recent proposal of the Spaak committee for a customs union along Schuman plan lines are still, in mid-1956, candidates for actuality. Yet, even if the Coal and Steel Community fails, so did many efforts at national unification. The experiment remains a valuable one.—WILLIAM H. HARBOLD, University of Washington.

Indian Foreign Policy, 1947-1954: A Study of Relations with the Western Bloc. By J. C. KUNDRA. (Groningen, Netherlands: J. B. Wolters; Bombay: Vora & Co., Publishers, Ltd. 1955. Pp. xi, 239. Rs. 16/-.)

In this study of India's relations with the United States and the Commonwealth countries, Dr. Kundra endeavors to go beyond a mere cataloguing of the moral principles which his country's foreign policy is declared to be pursuing and to explore the "background" of that policy. While he omits the function of various domestic forces (such as the legislature and bureaucracy, interest groups, media of communication), he undertakes an evaluation of geographical, historical, and ideological determinants. This is a formidable task and, if the analysis is not altogether informed by a consistent thesis, it at least penetrates frequently to the fundamental questions associated with India's view of world affairs. It gives proper attention, for example, to the sub-continent's geographic vulnerability to both blocs—to the Communist nations by land and to the Western powers by sea—and to the hypothesis of the "synthetic" quality of the Indian mind, as likely influences in the formation of policy.

Proceeding to an account of the major events of India's relations with the United States, Dr. Kundra provides a useful analysis of stages in the development of the Indian attitude. He defines the first period (1947-1949) as one of relative indifference and inaction on both sides. One does indeed observe, in reading Nehru's statements on foreign policy in these years, a tendency toward improvisation, toward postponing specific commitments rather than disavowing them. Such a tendency would naturally result not only from an absorption in internal problems, but also from an awareness that the domestic determinants of foreign policy had not assumed clear form, as well as from pride and the absence of rigid predispositions. The second period (1949-1950), Dr. Kundra states, was characterized by distinctly warmer relations and a tendency on India's part to seek a loose alignment with the West. The decision to remain within the Commonwealth, involving mutual consultation and various formal and informal types of cooperation in both the economic and military spheres, provided evidence of this tendency. Dr. Kundra gives appropriate emphasis to the Commonwealth connection, which signified a certain spirit of accommodation toward the Western powers, although it was defended in India mainly as an opportunity to influence them. The third period (1950-1954) was one of assertive non-alignment, in which that policy was elevated to the status of a fixed principle, arising out of India's interpretation of a number of critical events—notably the Chinese absorption of Tibet, the Korean war, and, ultimately, the American decision to grant military aid to Pakistan. The Indian leadership demonstrated then (as now) an apparent conviction that it must not and need not provoke either bloc, supported by a growing confidence that India could herself eventually occupy great-power status.

It should be added that the utility of this study would have been greater if it had been submitted to more careful editing, since stylistic errors abound.—GENE D. OVERSTREET, Institute of East Asiatic Studies, University of California.

The United Nations and Pakistan. BY MUSH-TAQ AHMAD. (Karachi: The Pakistan Institute of International Affairs; Distributed in the U. S. by the Institute of Pacific Relations, New York. 1956. Pp. iii, 162. $2.00.)

In these days of giantism Mr. Ahmad's book is continuing proof that good things sometimes come in small packages. It also presents some evidence of the development of political science in Pakistan since 1947, and of the increasing vigor of the Pakistan Institute of International Affairs in promoting the study of international relations. The introductory chapters present a brief, textbook-styled discussion of the background to the United Nations, regional arrangements, and the roles of the major organs of the United Nations. The remainder is devoted to a problem approach to the major areas of conflict within and outside the Organization. Throughout, the Pakistan position is noted, but it is usually secondary to the expository presentation.

The chapter on "Revision of the Charter" is particularly lucid in its discussion of the weaknesses of the Organization and the difficulties faced in trying to overcome them. Mr. Ahmad concludes that "the paralysis that has afflicted the World Organization . . . arises out of disagreement and non-cooperation among the Great Powers and not because of any inherent defect in the Charter." It is toward an East-West rapprochement that the small states must exert their influence.

In the chapter, "Specific Situations and Disputes," Mr. Ahmad cushions his exposition with polemic. On the Palestine case, Pakistan's position that the "fatal step" of partition would make future reconciliation of Jew and Arab impossible is defended on the basis of post-partition developments. Mr. Ahmad also justifies Pakistan's policy favoring admission for Communist China on the grounds that Communist China, unlike the Nationalist government, is able to discharge Charter obligations. In analyzing the Kashmir dispute, he stresses the recalcitrance of India in refusing to agree to arbitration or the holding of a plebiscite. He concludes that the Security Council could and should have used "active intervention" to augment its pacific settlement procedures. India's claim to Kashmir is not discussed, nor is the paradox confronting the United Nations: viz., that the dispute constitutes a clash between law (India's position) and justice (Pakistan's position).

But the dominant theme of the book focuses on the cold war. Although the ramifications of the East-West struggle have played havoc with the new World Organization during its first ten years, Mr. Ahmad concludes, the peoples of the world stake their very lives on the hope that the Great Powers may recognize that the United Nations represents the only means of avoiding a civilization-destroying world war.

Mr. Ahmad has made competent use of both primary and secondary sources and has somewhat successfully tried to balance the legalistic, realistic, and moralistic approaches to major international problems. The student of international organization should welcome this book as a useful guide to the United Nations, as an accurate barometer of Pakistan's position on many world problems, and as a critical appraisal of the UN Organization and some of its Members by an Asian scholar.—JACK C. PLANO, Western Michigan College.

What the United States Can Do about India.

By EUSTACE SELIGMAN. (New York: New York University Press. 1956. Pp. 56. $2.95.)

A partner in the New York law firm of Sullivan and Cromwell, a man of wide international interests, explains briefly why the world looks different from the Indian and American viewpoints and why the interests of the United States are bound up in the Indian future.

Das Selbstbestimmungsrecht der Nationen. By DR. GÜNTHER DECKER. (Göttingen: Verlag Otto Schwartz. 1955. Pp. x, 435.)

A thorough and scholarly discussion of the historical and legal implications of the doctrine of self-determination. The author in addition to discussing the nature of self-determination and the various attempts which have been made to implement it from the eighteenth century to the present, also treats the problem of the nature of the nation and the nation state in contemporary political and legal theory. The work is comprehensive, covering the views of Russian, German and American theorists, the relation of self-determination to the League of Nations and the United Nations, and the specific manifestations of the problem not only in Europe but in Africa, Asia, and the Near East. A brief selection of key documents is appended to the book, which is made additionally valuable to students by the inclusion of a thorough and up to date bibliography.

Le Vatican et la seconde guerre mondiale: action doctrinale et diplomatique en faveur de la paix. By PAUL DUCLOS. (Paris: Editions A. Pedone, Libraire de la Cour d'Appel et de l'Ordre des Avocats. 1955. Pp. 246.)

The author seeks to give a survey of the doctrinal and diplomatic attitude of the Holy See to the problems of the Second World War and the preservation of peace. The period surveyed is from 1939 to 1945 and the study is divided into a statement of the position of the Vatican as a moral and doctrinal force in international affairs and to a consideration of the actual diplomacy engaged in by the papacy first to prevent and later to mitigate the Second World War. A concluding chapter deals with the problem of the Just War. The author has succeeded in presenting an objective survey, relying for his facts upon official publications of the Holy See and allowing them to speak for themselves. The work is by no means exhaustive but will serve as a useful survey and introduction to the vast amount of material in the Vatican archives.

Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs.

Vol. II: Articles 23-54 of the Charter; Vol. III: Articles 55-72 of the Charter; Vol. IV: Articles 73-91 of the Charter. By THE UNITED NATIONS. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1955, 1956. Pp. v, 457; v, 596; v, 461. $3.50 each vol.)

The second, third, and fourth volumes of the announced five-volume summary and analysis of the meaning and working of the United Nations Charter. Prepared by the U. N. Secretariat, these volumes fully redeem the promise of the first (noted in this REVIEW, vol. xlix, p. 1203) and carry the analysis through Article 72. The fifth volume is expected in 1956.

International Relations. By M. MARGARET BALL AND HUGH B. KILLOUGH. (New York: The Ronald Press Co. 1956. Pp. viii, 667. $6.50.)

A detailed and fairly standard new text, with considerable historical underpinning, which describes the nature of the international community, the methods of national policy implementation, the role of international organization, the place of collective security arrangements, and, in a final section entitled "Schism," examines the policies of the major powers.

Principles of International Politics. By CHARLES O. LEROUE, JR. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1956. Pp. xi, 430.)

A new introductory text, but the approach and the ground covered are familiar. An investigation of the state system and the nature of national power precedes two sections dealing with "International Conflict and Its Resolution" and "Alternatives to Conflict." In a section headed "Contemporary Problems," the current political, economic, and psychological aspects of international politics are examined.

The Road to Peace and to Moral Democracy: An Encyclopedia of Peace. By BORIS GOUREVITCH. (New York: International Universities Press, Inc. 1955. 2 Vols. Pp. xiv, 1083, xxvi, 1540. $20.00.)

The author—a Russian exile who is described as socialist, pacifist, and Christian—attempts to illuminate the nature and utter seriousness of the present world crisis by commenting on practically everything done, and everything said or thought by any person of near-prominence in the world in the last decade. A 79-page index may make it of some use as a reference work.

The Positive Contribution by Immigrants. A Symposium prepared for Unesco by the International Sociological Association and the International Economic Association. (Paris: Unesco. 1955. Pp. 199. $2.25.)

The third volume in Unesco's "Population and Culture" series, this contains studies on the United States, United Kingdom, Australia, Brazil, and Argentina, and a separate study on the economic aspects of immigration.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS

Catholic University of America

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies

General

Gouvernement Affaires De la Conférence des Quatre Chefs de Gouvernement à la Conférence des Ministres des Affaires Étrangères. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. January, 1956.

Fraga Iribarne, M. La Diplomacia en el Siglo XX. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. July–September, 1955.

François-Poncet, A. Le Français, Langue Diplomatique. Revue des Deux Mondes. April 15, 1956.

Fuchs, L. H. Nations in the Future: Organization for Survival. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Gelbe-Haussen, E. Die Aussenminister-Konferenz von Genf. Osteuropa. February, 1956.

Healey, D. Neutralism. London, Amper-sand, 1955.

Hislop, I. The Morality of Nuclear Warfare. Blackfriars. March, 1956.

Kennan, G. F. History and Diplomacy as Viewed by a Diplomatist. Review of Politics. April, 1956.

Kissinger, H. A. Force and Diplomacy in the Nuclear Age. Foreign Affairs. April, 1956.

Lee, L. T. Some New Features in the Consular Institution. Georgetown Law Journal. March, 1956.

Mayo, H. B. Coexistence. Is it Possible? International Journal. Summer, 1955.

Menken, J. Co-existence and Cold War. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Messineo, A. La Coesistenza nel Timore. Civiltà Cattolica. October 1, 1955.

Ramsey, J. H. A Decade of International Relations. Dillonvale, Community Press, 1956.

The Responsibility of Higher Education for Helping to Develop Understanding. Symposium. Educational Record. April, 1956.

Rubio García, L. Tras la Conferencia de Bandung: Euráfrica o Afrasia? Cuadernos de Política Internacional. July–September, 1955.

Schmitt, C. La Tensión Planetaria entre Oriente y Occidente y la Oposición entre Tierra y Mar. Revista de Estudios Políticos. June, 1955.

Schram, S. R. La Coexistence Hier et Aujourd'hui. Christianisme Social. July, 1955.

Scott, A. M. Challenge and Response: a Tool for the Analysis of International Affairs. Review of Politics. April, 1956.

Silvain, R. Les Conséquences Diplomatiques de la Bombe H. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. December, 1955.

Sontag, R. J. History and Diplomacy as Viewed by a Historian. Review of Politics. April, 1956.

Spaight, J. M. Balance of Power. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Thompson, K. W. Mr. Toynbee and World Politics; War and National Security. World Politics. April, 1956.

Van Loen, E. Geopolitik oder Imperialismus? Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. February, 1956.

Von Siegler, F. Grossmächte, Weltmächte, Mächteblocks. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. April, 1956.

Von Studnitz, H. G. Reform der Diplomatischen Privilegien. Aussenpolitik. March, 1956.

Woodward, L. Science and the Relations between States. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. April, 1956.

Wyndham, E. H. The European Scene. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Military and Functional Questions

Alphandery, C. L'Énergie Nucléaire de Hiroshima à Genève. Économie et Politique. October, 1955.

Aron, R. A Half-century of Limited War? Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. April, 1956.

Baldwin, H. W. The New Face of War. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. May, 1956.

Beckett, P. Public Administration Training as Technical Assistance: Some Further Observations Based on Experience in Beirut. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Brodie, B. Some Notes on the Evolution of Air Doctrine. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Buzzard, A. The H-Bomb: Massive Retaliation or Graduated Deterrence. International Affairs. April, 1956.

Cobb, E. H. Science and the Services. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Cockburn, R. Science in War. Journal of the Royal United Service Institution. February, 1956.

Ernle-Erle-Drax, R.A.R.P. Deterring Future Aggression. Journal of the Royal United Service Institution. February, 1956.

Maddox, J. G. Technical Assistance by Religious Agencies in Latin America. Washington, National Planning Association, 1956.

Martin, P. Recent Developments in Disarmament. International Journal. Spring, 1956.

Miksche, F. O. Abrüstung oder Umrüstung? Aussenpolitik. April, 1956.

Moch, J. Towards a Disarmed Peace. International Journal. Spring, 1956.

———. Technology and the Future. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. April, 1956.

Müller, W. D. Atompremiere. Gegenwart. October 27, 1955.

The New Industrial Revolutions (I). United Nations Review. May, 1956.

Page, J. D. What is Air Power? Air University Quarterly Review. Summer, 1955.

Rickover, H. G. Lead Time and Military Strength. Our Margin of Survival. Vital Speeches. March 15, 1956.

Shepherd, E. C. The New Era in Air Warfare. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

"Spindrift." Foreign Navies. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Slessor, J. The Great Deterrent and its Limitations. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. May, 1956.

Torlesse, A. D. The Role of the Aircraft Carrier. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Toynbee, A. J. Abrüstung nach Genf. Aussenpolitik. March, 1956.

United States

American Assembly. The Representation of the United States Abroad. New York, Graduate School of Business, Columbia University, 1956.

American Enterprise Association. Analysis of Foreign Aid Issues. Washington, 1956.

Bowman, A. H. Jefferson, Hamilton and American Foreign Policy. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1956.

Dorsey, S. P. Technical Cooperation in the Near East and South Asia. Department of State Bulletin. May 14, 1956.

Drucker, P. F. America Becomes a "Have-not" Nation. Harper's Magazine. April, 1956.

Graebner, N. A. Foreign Policy in '52. World Affairs Quarterly. April, 1956.

Hollister, J. B. An Outline of the Mutual Security Program for 1957. Department of State Bulletin. April 9, 1956.

Howard, H. N. The Development of United States Policy in the Near East, South Asia and Africa during 1955. Department of State Bulletin. March 19, March 26, April 9, 1956.

Kennan, G. F. Can We Do Better than Co-exist? Harper's Magazine. August, 1956.

Lans, A. B. États-Unis: une Étude Critique de la Politique Étrangère Américaine. Documentation Française. January 12, 1956.

Lepawsky, A. Technical Assistance: a Challenge to Public Administration. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1956.

Mann, G. Washington und Peking. Deutsche Rundschau. September, 1955.

Mosely, P. E. Die Sowjetunion und die Vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika; Probleme und Aussichten. Europa Archiv. May 5, 1956.

Nitze, P. H. United States Foreign Policy,

1945-1955. New York, Foreign Policy Association, 1956 (Headline Series No. 116).

Peeters, P. La Stratégie Américaine. (I). Revue Politique et Parlementaire. October, 1955.

Policy for the Cold War. Economist. April 28, 1956.

Problems of American Foreign Policy. Current History. March, 1956.

U.S. Information Agency. Peace—the U.S. Record. Washington, 1955.

Windmiller, M. America's Relations with India: a Re-appraisal. Far Eastern Survey. March, 1956.

Windmiller, J. P. Foreign Affairs and the AFL-CIO. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. April, 1956.

Yool, W. M. The Strategic Air Command, U.S. Air Force. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Latin America

González Ramírez, M. La Política Internacional de la Revolución Mexicana. Cuadernos Americanos. June-August, 1955.

La Politique Extérieure du Mexique en 1954. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. September, 1955.

U.S. Information Agency. Communist Propaganda Activities in Latin America 1955. Washington, 1956.

United Kingdom

Britain and Russia. Symposium. Twentieth Century. April, 1956.

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. The Frontier Dispute in South-East Arabia. London, 1956.

———. United Kingdom Statement on Defense, 1956. London, 1956.

Harvey, I. The Services from Parliament. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

———. Civil Defense—the Fourth Arm. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Hudson, G. F. Where does Britain Stand? Twentieth Century. April, 1956.

Phillips, T. British Influence as a Vehicle of European Civilisation in the Asian and African Tropics. Civilisations. No. 1, 1956.

Randall, A. The Organization of the British Foreign Service. Acta Scandinavica Juris Gentium. No. 3, 1955.

Rothchild, D. C. British Labour and European Union. Social Research. Spring, 1956.

Saundby, R. H. M. The Royal Navy in the Atomic Age. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Yool, W. M. Royal Air Force Problems. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Western Europe

Fischer, G. Quelques Réflexions sur la Position de la France à l'O.N.U. Politique Étrangère. December, 1955.

Lapie, P.-O. Politique Coloniale et Politique Étrangère. Revue des Deux Mondes. May 1, 1956.

Netéllus. Politique de la France au Proche-Orient. Politique Étrangère. December, 1955.

Weber, E. European Reactions to American Policies. International Journal. Spring, 1956.

Central Europe

Bergsträsser, A. Memorandum über die Eingliederung der Streitkräfte in das Staatswesen der Bundesrepublik. Internationales Jahrbuch der Politik. July, 1955.

Borries, K. Die Grossen Mächte und der Deutsche Osten (II). Aussenpolitik. February, 1956.

Dahmen, R. Wie Treibt die Bundesrepublik im Ausland Public Relations? Politische Studien. April, 1956.

La D.D.R.: Symbole et Pièce Maitresse de la Nouvelle Diplomatie Soviétique. Entreprise. November 1, 1955.

Hermens, F. A. Bonn's Foreign Policy. Current History. April, 1956.

Indien und Deutschland. Übersee Rundschau. September, 1955.

Le Statut de la République Fédérale d'Allemagne de 1945 à 1955. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. September, 1955.

Wilson, B. T. Federal Germany and the Changing Face of War. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Barghoorn, F. C. Cultural Relations and Soviet Foreign Policy. World Politics. April, 1956.

Byrnes, R. F. Soviet Policy toward Western Europe since Stalin. Annals. January, 1956.

Chamberlin, W. H. Seven Phases of Soviet Foreign Policy. Russian Review. April, 1956. Coexistence in the Kremlin. Economist. March 31, 1956.

Decier, M. Le Nouveau Style de la Guerre Froide. Écrits de Paris. January, 1956.

Dulles, A. W. The Purge of Stalinism. Department of State Bulletin. May 7, 1956.

Fainsod, M. Russia's 20th Party Congress. Foreign Policy Bulletin. May 1, 1956.

Popovic, K. Un Tour d'Horizon de la Politique Extérieure Yougoslave. Documentation Française. January 24, 1956.

Schapiro, L. The Future of Russia. London, Ampersand, 1955.

Il XX Congresso del PCUS a Mosca. La Politica Estera nella Relazione Krusciov. Relazioni Internazionali. February 25, 1956.

Wien, O. Transportation as a Strategic and Economic Problem of the Soviet Union. Military Review. April, 1956.

Middle East and Africa

Crocker, H. E. Russia and Afghanistan. Contemporary Review. February, 1956.

Dupree, L. Afghanistan between East and West. Royal Central Asian Journal. January, 1956.

Forster, K. Historical Evolution of Arab-Israeli Tensions. Social Science. April, 1956.

Galay, N. The Soviet Breakthrough in the Near East and Southern Asia. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. March, 1956.

Israel and her Neighbours. British Survey. January, 1956.

Lewis, B. Middle Eastern Reaction to Soviet Pressures. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1956.

Marchand, J. Stratégie et Psychologie en Afrique Noire. Revue de Défense Nationale. February, 1956.

Martin, H. G. The Eastern Mediterranean and Middle East. Brassey's Annual, 1955.

Mr. Hammarskjöld's Mission. United Nations Review. May, 1956.

Nasser Imports Bandoengism. Economist. March 24, 1956.

Neuer Affront Gegen die Orthodoxie. Herder Korrespondenz. May, 1956.

O'Ballance, E. The Middle East Scene. Army Quarterly. April, 1956.

Rudin, H. R. Africa in a World Setting. Current History. May, 1956.

Smith, D. Anglo-American Co-operation in the Middle East. National and English Review. May, 1956.

South and Southeast Asia

Fischer, M. W. Indian Views of Sino-Indian Relations. Indian Press Digests (Berkeley, Calif.), February, 1956.

Mehra, P. L. India, China and Tibet, 1950-1954. India Quarterly. January-March, 1956.

Tyson, G. India and the Russian Visitors. International Affairs. April, 1956.

Far East and Pacific

Barrett, R. H. Recent Domestic and International Politics in Australia. Far Eastern Survey. May, 1956.

Dix Années de Relations Sino-Soviétiques (1945-1955). Notes et Études Documentaires. August 18, 1955.

Hellner, M. M. Sea Power and the Struggle for Asia. U.S. Naval Institute Proceedings. April, 1956.

Hitschi, A. The Realities of Japan's Foreign Policy. Japan Quarterly. April-June, 1956.

I-Kua-Chou. Die Aussenpolitische Generallinie der K.P. China's. Ost-Probleme. August 26, 1955.

Langerhans, H. Fernöstliche Kriegsgefahr und Verhandlungen. Aussenpolitik. February, 1956.

Schwarz, U. Japan and her Neighbors. Swiss Review of World Affairs. May, 1956.

Seidensticker, E. G. Thoughts on Anti-American Sentiment in Japan. Japan Quarterly. April-June, 1956.

Tadataka, S. The Socialist View on Foreign Policy. Japan Quarterly. April-June, 1956.

Tammelo, I. Reflections on Some Problems of Australian Foreign Policy. Australian Outlook. March, 1956.

U.S. Information Agency. The Soviet Party Congress and a Possible "Evolutionary" Trend in Asian Communism. Washington, 1956.

International Economic Policy and Relations

Bresciani-Turroni, C. International Aspects of the Present Economic Situation. Banco di Roma Review of the Economic Conditions in Italy. January, 1956.

Butz, E. L. United Efforts to Meet the World Agricultural Situation. Department of State Bulletin. March 12, 1956.

Eckstein, A. Asia's Economic Development. Foreign Policy Bulletin. February 1, 1956.

Ellis, H. S. American Foreign Economic Policy in the Context of World Politics. (Review Article). World Politics. April, 1956.

Grosse, W. Die Weltrohstoff-Abkommen und Behörden. Internationales Jahrbuch der Politik. July, 1955.

Hoffman, M. L. The Present System of World Trade. Lloyds Bank Review. January, 1956.

Linowitz, S. M. The International Businessman Meets the Anti-Trust Laws. Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Papi, G. U. Théorie du Développement Économique et de la Formation des Zones Arriérées. Civilisations. No. 1, 1956.

Peters, K. Veränderungen der Interna-tionalen Kapitalposition Grossbritanniens. Europa Archiv. March 20, 1956.

I Venticinque Anni della Banca dei Regolamenti Internazionali. Quaderni di Studi e Notizie. September 16, 1955.

Von Tzubinger, L. M. Die Sowjetisch-Rumänischen Gesellschaften. Osteuropa. April, 1956.

Wemelsfelder, J. Benelux, an Experiment in Economic Integration. Economia Internazionale. August, 1955.

Wolf, C. Institutions and Economic Development. American Economic Review. December, 1955.

Woods, B. J. P. Economic Co-operation—a Contrast in Methods. London, Ampersand, 1955.

International Law

Barton, G. P. Foreign Armed Forces: Qualified Jurisdictional Immunity. British Yearbook of International Law, 1954.

Bastide, S. Les Conditions Juridiques de la Coexistence. Politique Étrangère. February, 1956.

Baxter, R. R. Passage of Ships through International Waterways in Time of War. British Yearbook of International Law, 1954.

Böhmert, V. Meeresfreiheit und Schelfproklamationen. Jahrbuch für Internationales Recht. Nos. 2/3, 1955.

Coblentz, W. K. The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. California Law Review. March, 1956.

Dominedo, F. M. La Comunità Internazionale e la Lotta per il Diritto. Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali. October–December, 1955.

Dulles, J. F. The Institutionalizing of Peace. Department of State Bulletin. May 7, 1956.

Efron, R. Supranationality in Recent International Agreements. Kentucky Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Fitzmaurice, G. The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice, 1951–54: Points of Substantive Law (I). British Yearbook of International Law, 1954.

Garcia-Mora, M. R. The Doctrine of Sovereign Immunity of Foreign States and its Recent Modifications. Virginia Law Review. April, 1956.

Hakim, J. I. J. The International Character of the Airspace over the Suez Canal. Southern California Law Review. February, 1956.

Houston, O. R. Freedom of the Seas: the Present State of International Law. American Bar Association Journal. March, 1956.

J. S. C. Problèmes Juridiques de l'Organisation du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord. Politique Étrangère. December, 1955.

Jenks, C. W. The Scope of International Law. British Yearbook of International Law, 1954.

Johnson, D. H. N. The Legal Status of the Sea-bed and Subsoil. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. March, 1956.

Jones, J. M. The Nottebohm Case. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. April, 1956.

Khadduri, M. Islam and the Modern Law of Nations. American Journal of International Law. April, 1956.

Kunz, J. L. The Laws of War. American Journal of International Law. April, 1956.

———. Austria's Permanent Neutrality. American Journal of International Law. April, 1956.

Landheer, B. Sociological Aspects of International Law. Jahrbuch für Internationales Recht. Nos. 2/3, 1955.

Lederer, L. J. J. International Waterways—the Organizational Standard of the Enunciative Regime. Revue de Droit International (Sotille-Genève). January–March, 1956.

Li, Tieh-Tseng. The Legal Position of Tibet. American Journal of International Law. April, 1956.

MacGibbon, I. C. The Scope of Acquiescence in International Law. British Yearbook of International Law, 1954.

Malek, C. La Question de la Définition de l'Agression. Revue de Droit International pour le Moyen-Orient. August, 1955.

Mason, G. M. Toward Indivisible International Law? Social Research. Spring, 1956.

Matthies, H. Zur Nachprüfungsbefugnis des Gerichtshofs der Montanunion. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. March, 1956.

Moore, H. The Judicial Approach to International Affairs. Grotius Society Transactions for the Year 1953.

Mroz, M. E. La Place du Droit dans les Relations Internationales. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. No. 3, 1955.

Norris, G., Jr. International Aspects of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954. Jahrbuch für Internationales Recht. Nos. 2/3, 1955.

O'Connell, D. P. The Status of Formosa and the Chinese Recognition Problem. Amer- ican Journal of International Law. April, 1956.

Phleger, H. Fifty Years of Progress in International Law. Department of State Bulletin. April 23, 1956.

Rice, W. G. Some Thoughts on the Binding Force of International Treaties. Wisconsin Law Review. March, 1956.

Robbins, T. H. International Law is no Dead Letter. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. May, 1956.

Rubashkin, M. Conflict of Laws: Jurisdiction over Extraterritorial Crimes: U.S. Military Commission in Germany: Office of the U.S. High Commissioner for Germany v. Hrnecek. Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Rudolf, W. Informationsfreiheit und Rundfunk im Völkerrecht. Jahrbuch für Internationales Recht. Nos. 2/3, 1955.

Van Asbeck, F. M. International Law and Colonial Administration. Grotius Society Transactions for the Year 1953.

Waldock, C. H. M. The Plea of Domestic Jurisdiction before International Legal Tribunals. British Yearbook of International Law, 1954.

Wehberg, H. Interdiction du Recours à la Force. Recueil des Cours (I), 1951.

Young, R. W. The Aerial Inspection Plan and Air Space Sovereignty. George Washington Law Review. April, 1956.

International Organization

United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Booth, D. A. The United Nations, The United States and the International Civil Service. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 4, 1955.

Cavers, D. F. Arms Control in the United Nations: a Decade of Disagreement. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. April, 1956.

Clark, G. Peace through Disarmament and Charter Revision. Dublin, N. H., 1956.

Erim, T. K. La Question de Chypre devant l'Organisation des Nations Unies. Revue de Droit International pour le Moyen Orient. August, 1955.

Giraud, E. Le Secrétariat des Institutions Internationales. Recueil des Cours (II), 1951.

Great Issues before the United Nations. New York, American Association for the United Nations, 1956.

Howell, J. M. French and South African Walkouts and Domestic Jurisdiction. Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

Hyde, J. N. United States Participation in the United Nations. International Organization. February, 1956.

Power, E. W. International Law—United Nations—Administrative Tribunals as Adjudicators of Disputes Arising out of Employment Contracts with International Organizations. Michigan Law Review. February, 1956.

Rossi, M. New Members Shift UN Balance. Foreign Policy Bulletin. January 15, 1956.

Schwellb, E. The Amending Procedure of Constitutions of International Organizations. British Yearbook of International Law, 1954.

Specialized Agencies at Work. United Nations Review. April, 1956.

Vallat, F. A. Voting in the General Assembly of the United Nations. British Yearbook of International Law, 1954.

Wilcox, F. O. The United Nations in the Mainstream of History. Department of State Bulletin. May 21, 1956.

Regional and Collective Security Organizations

Armament of N.A.T.O.—An Estimate of Defensive Strength. Round Table. March, 1956.

The Baghdad Pact. British Survey. April, 1956.

Caildea, B. La Communauté Politique Européenne. European Yearbook, 1955.

Coignard, M. Quelques Aspects Actuels du Contrôle des Armements à la Lumière des Expériences Entreprises. Politique Étrangère. February, 1956.

The Colombo Plan. Current Notes on International Affairs. November, 1955.

Le Développement de la C.E.C.A. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. September, 1955.

Fenwick, C. G. Inter-American Regional Procedures for the Settlement of Disputes. International Organization. February, 1956.

First Annual Report of the Council Representatives of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization. Department of State Bulletin. March 12, 1956.

Goodhart, A. L. The North Atlantic Treaty of 1949. Recueil des Cours (II), 1951.

Gordon L. The Organisation for European Economic Cooperation. International Organization. February, 1956.

Great Britain. British Information Service. Reference Division. The Colombo Plan. New York, 1956.

———. ————. International Colonial Cooperation. London, 1956.

———. ————. Western Co-operation. London, 1955.

Jorin, M. Das Amerikanische Regionalsystem. Europa Archiv. March 20, 1956.

Kogon, E. Mut zum Grösseren Konzept. Frankfurter Hefte. January, 1956.

Kordt, E. Der Europäische Beamte. Berlin, C. H. Beck'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1955.

Leifer, W. Der Vatikan und die Europafrage. Stimmen der Zeit. February, 1956.

Little, T. R. The Arab League: a Reassessment. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1956.

Looper, R. B. Two Approaches to European Economic Integration. Occidente. No. 3, 1955.

López Villamil, H. La Seguridad Colectiva en el Sistema Inter-Americano. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. July-September, 1955.

Mallet, D. The History and Structure of O.E.E.C. European Yearbook, 1955.

Marchal, L. Le Conseil de l'Europe. European Yearbook, 1955.

New Atlantis? Economist. May 5, 1956.

Pan American Union. Coordinating Committee on Technical Assistance. The Americas United for Progress. Washington, 1956.

Reading, Marquess of. Progress Report on the Colombo Plan. World Affairs. Spring, 1956.

Van der Goes van Naters, M. Le Développement de l'Intégration Économique de l'Europe. Luxembourg, Communauté Européenne du Charbon et de l'Acier, 1955.

Van Kleffens, E. N. Unity and Diversity in Western Europe. European Yearbook, 1955.

Vegas, F. L'Unione Europea Occidentale. La Comunità Internazionale. No. 4, 1955.

Wolff, S. The OEEC Project for the Peaceful Development of Atomic Energy. Swiss Review of World Affairs. February, 1956.

DOCUMENTS

United Nations

All entries under this heading bear the imprint of the United Nations (New York), 1956, unless a different place or date are shown.

ECOSOC. World Economic Situation. Full Employment. Replies of Governments. (Doc. E/2726/Add 11; November 16, 1955).

———. Economic Development of underdeveloped countries. Survey of the Work Currently Being Undertaken under the Aegis of the UN, . . . in Matters Relating to Industrial Development and the Improvement of Industrial Activity. (Doc. E/2316; March 2, 1956).

———. Commission on Human Rights. Report of the Eighth Session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities to the . . . , January 3-20, 1956. (Doc. E/CN.4/721, E/CN.4/Sub.2/177; January 31, 1956).

———. Secretariat. Department of Economic and Social Affairs. The Convention on the Political Rights of Women; History and Commentary. (Doc. ST/SOA/27; 1955).

Secretary-General. Forced Labour. Report by the . . . and the Director-General of the International Labour Office. (Doc. E/2815; December 15, 1955).

———. Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories: Summary and Analysis of Information Transmitted under Art. 73(e) of the Charter: Report of the . . . (Doc. A/3108; February 15, 1956).

UNREF. Executive Committee. Revised Plan of Operations (1956). (Doc. A/AC.79/21; November 28, 1955).

United States

Unless otherwise indicated, all entries under this heading bear the imprint: "Washington: Government Printing Office."

Congress

House. 15th Semiannual Report on Educational Exchange Activities. H. Doc. 335. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Report of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems. Message from the President Transmitting the . . . , Covering its Operations from January 1 to June 30, 1955. H. Doc. 336. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Report on the Operations of the Department of State. H. Doc. 374. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Committee on Appropriations. Departments of State and Justice, the Judiciary and Related Agencies Appropriations for 1957. Hearings before Subcommittee . . . U.S. Information Agency. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Departments of State and Justice, the Judiciary and Related Agencies Appropriations for 1957. Hearings before Subcommittee . . . Refugee Relief Program. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Regulations of Exports. Hearings. February 23 . . . March 6, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Committee on Foreign Affairs. Status of Forces Agreements. Hearings. Pt. 2. January 31-February 2, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Report on the Tenth Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations by Hon. Brooks Hays. . . H. Rep 1980. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Mutual Security Act of 1956. Hearings. March 20 . . . May 10, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Report of the Special Study Mission to the Middle East, South and Southeast Asia, and the Western Pacific. H. Rep. 2147. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Committee on Government Operations. United States Technical Assistance and Related Activities in Latin America. Hearings before Subcommittee. October 10–28, 1955. 84th Cong., 1st sess.

———. ———. United States Technical Assistance to Latin America. 14th Intermediate Report. H. Rep. 1985. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Committee on the Judiciary. Establishing a Commission and Advisory Committee on International Rules of Judicial Procedure. Report of . . . H. Rep. 1363. 84th Cong., 1st sess.

———. ———. Senate. 19th Semiannual Report of the Atomic Energy Commission. S. Doc. 91. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Committee on Appropriations. Financing of Aswan High Dam in Egypt. Hearing. January 26, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Committee on Armed Services. Operation of Article VII, NATO Status of Forces Treaty. Hearing before Subcommittee. February 9, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Foreign Service Act Amendments of 1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. March 21, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Foreign Service Act Amendments of 1956. Report to Accompany S. 3481. S. Rep. 1726. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Trends in Mutual Security, Fiscal Year 1948–49 to Fiscal Year 1957; Authorizations, Appropriations, Obligations and Expenditures. Committee Print. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. International Cultural Exchange and Trade Fair Participation Act of 1956. Hearing. February 21, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. United States Information and Educational Exchange Act Amendments of 1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. July 20, 1955 and April 17, 1956. 84th Cong., 1st and 2nd sess.

———. ———. Subcommittee on Disarmament. Hearings. Pt. 2—February 29, 1956; Pt. 3—March 7, 1956; Pt. 4—March 15, 1956; Pt. 5—April 9, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Disarmament—a Selected Chronology—January 1, 1918–March 19, 1956. Staff Study No. 2. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Subcommittee on Technical Assistance. Technical Assistance Programs. Hearing. January 23, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. ———. Report of . . . S. Rep. 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter. Review of the United Nations Charter. Final Report of . . . S. Rep. 1797. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Committee on Government Operations. Reorganization of the Passport Office. Hearings. April 13, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Subcommittee on Investigations. East-West Trade. Hearings. Pt. 1.—February 15–March 6, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Committee on the Judiciary. Constitutional Amendment Relative to Treaties and Executive Agreements . . . Report together with Individual Views to Accompany S. J. Res. 1. S. Rep. 1716, pt. 1 and pt. 2. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

Executive Departments

Department of State. Our Moral and Spiritual Resources for International Cooperation. (Pub. No. 6230).

———. Southeast Asia Treaty Organization—First Annual Report of the Council Representatives, March 1956. (Pub. No. 6305.)

———. Draft Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency. (Department of State Bulletin. May 21, 1956.)

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

Opinions and Personality. BY M. BREWSTER SMITH, JEROME S. BRUNER, AND ROBERT W. WHITE. WITH THE COLLABORATION OF DAVID F. ABERLE, STANLEY G. ESTES, EUGENIA HANFMANN, AND SHERLON J.

KORCHIN. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc.; London: Chapman & Hall, Ltd. 1956. Pp. vii, 294. $6.00.)

Roughly speaking, there are three important questions regarding a political opinion: (1)

What is its validity? (2) What are its social and historical causes and consequences? and (3) Of what use is it to those who hold it? In this thorough-going analysis of ten men's opinions about Russia, the last of these questions achieves the focus of attention. Through interviews, psychological tests, and biographical material, the authors explore the personal meanings, sources, and utilities of each man's opinions. The findings are presented largely through case studies, preceded by a very fine theoretical section.

Law as a Political Instrument. By VICTOR G. ROSENBLUM. (Garden City, New York: Doubleday & Company, Inc. 1955. Pp. vii, 88. 95¢.)

After a general statement on the interrelations of law and politics, the author analyzes judicial policy-making in two areas—economic regulation in the milk industry and segregation in public education. He concludes with an essay on the relation of judicial policy-making to democracy. "Unless and until a governmental system can be evolved that is more susceptible than the present one to direct and responsible popular control, policy-making by our courts within the context of checks and balances, the adversary process, and stare decisis will continue to be an essential part of the process of democratic government" (p. 82).

Six Books of the Commonwealth. By JEAN BODIN. ABRIDGED AND TRANSLATED BY M. J. TOOLEY. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1955. Pp. xliii, 212. $2.50.)

Since no new English edition of the Six Books of the Commonwealth has been printed since the seventeenth century, this abridged and newly edited version will be welcomed. It is preceded by an introduction which provides a biographical sketch and a summary of the argument.

The Doctrine of Anarchism of Michael A. Bakunin. By EUGENE PYZUR. (Milwaukee, Wis.: The Marquette University Press. 1955. Pp. viii, 158.)

Michael A. Bakunin was one of the flamboyant figures of the revolutionary movement of the last century. Despite his temperamental and rather impractical nature he successfully contested with Karl Marx for the leadership of the Second International to the point that Marx was forced to transfer the headquarters of the movement to New York, preferring to see it die a silent death there rather than to allow it to be dominated by the Bakunin heresies. In this work the author presents a succinct summary of Bakunin's doctrine of anarchism. The author makes extensive use of quotations from Bakunin's writings and on the whole allows his subject to speak for himself. The result is the best general introduction to Bakunin's theoretical views now obtainable in English.

The French Faust: Henri de Saint-Simon. By MATHURIN DONDO. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. 253. $3.75.)

Students of social movements will be interested in this biography of Henri de Saint-Simon, which is the most recent treatment of this subject in English. The author has made extensive use of French sources and has consulted the important secondary ones on the Saint Simonian movement. A compact, readable, and objective account of one of the leaders of Utopian Socialism.

Edward Bellamy: Selected Writings on Religion and Society. EDITED WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY JOSEPH SCHIFFMAN. (New York: The Liberal Arts Press. 1955. Pp. xlix, 139. $3.75.)

Edward Bellamy will be remembered as the author of Looking Backward, a Utopian phantasy of great popularity at the close of the last century. The present work endeavors to present Bellamy's general religious and social views in the form of excerpts from his writings. Unfortunately much of the excerpted material is from Looking Backward, which is still obtainable in cheap editions. The editor contributes a useful introduction to Bellamy's life and writings, but the book would have been of greater value had portions of Bellamy's unpublished and out-of-print works been included.

The Political Thought of the German Romantics, 1793-1815. EDITED WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY H. S. REISS. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1955. Pp. vii, 211. $2.50.)

Excerpts from the writings of Fichte, Novalis (Friedrich von Hardenberg), Adam Müller, and Schleiermacher with introductory notes and attached bibliographies and an introductory chapter by the editor.

A Bibliography of the Works in English of Arnold Toynbee, 1910-1954. COMPILED BY MONICA POPPER. (London and New York:

Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1955. Pp. 59. $1.00.)

Students of the thought of Arnold J. Toynbee will welcome this bibliography. It is mimeographed; it includes an impressive array of publications, a fact which will be no surprise to those who have followed Toynbee's work in the theory of history.

Science, Democracy, and Islam; and Other Essays. BY HUMAYUN KABIR. (London: George Allen & Unwin, Ltd. 1955. Pp. 128. $3.00.)

A collection of essays, some previously unpublished, dealing with current problems of democracy, political and social theory, and the role of the state in the modern world. The book is of interest on two counts: first, as an expression of the point of view of a contemporary Indian scholar, and second, as an example of how western liberal ideas have been woven into the thought of the East. The author believes that the future of modern culture depends upon the creation of a religious foundation on which it can be anchored and sees the Islamic faith as an appropriate quarry from which such a foundation may be dug.

Confucius, His Life and Time. BY LIU WU-CHI. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. xv, 189. $3.75.)

Liu Wu-Chi has produced a very enthusiastic study of Confucius. A chronological account of Confucius's life is followed by a discussion of his ideas about education and the content of his teaching. The author of the study concludes that Confucius was more important as a teacher than as a moralist or statesman. The book will probably be more useful to the layman than to the specialist who is looking for new light on unresolved problems of scholarship.

The American Democrat: Or Hints on the Social and Civic Relations of the United States of America. BY JAMES FENIMORE COOPER. (New York: Vintage Books. 3rd ed. 1956. Pp. xxviii, 190. $.95.)

The third edition of James Fenimore Cooper's well-known essay on American government and politics, with an introduction by Robert E. Spiller. Cooper's introduction to the first edition of 1838 and H. L. Mencken's introduction to the second edition of 1931 are also reproduced.

The New American Right. EDITED BY DANIEL BELL. (New York: Criterion Books. 1955. Pp. xii, 239. $4.00.)

A series of essays, several of which have been previously published, by Daniel Bell (the editor), Richard Hofstadter, David Riesman and Nathan Glazer, Peter Viereck, Talcott Parsons, Nathan Glazer and Seymour Martin Lipset, and Seymour Martin Lipset.

A Larger Concept of Community. BY JEFFERSON B. FORDHAM. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State Press. 1956. Pp. 117. $3.00.)

An excellent little book presenting Dean Fordham's contribution to The Edward Douglas White Lectures on Citizenship. It is a vigorous presentation of views relating to the metropolitan community, the trans-state regional community, and the international community.

Kibbutz: Venture in Utopia. BY MELFORD E. SPIRO. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. xii, 266. $4.50.)

An anthropological study of a Marxist-oriented kibbutz of about 500 people founded by some disillusioned urban European Jews. The analysis of the kibbutz's moral postulates and social organization—particularly the unique marriage and family patterns as well as the political structure—points up the practical problems plaguing "utopians."

Personal Influence: The Part Played by People in the Flow of Mass Communications. BY ELIHU KATZ AND PAUL F. LAZARSFELD. (Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press. 1955. Pp. xx, 400. $6.00.)

New York State Library. Checklist of books and pamphlets in the social sciences including anthropology, economics, philosophy, political science, psychology, welfare, but not including education, history and law. (Albany: New York State Library. 1955. Pp. viii, 142.)

The alphabetical finding list giving author, brief title, publication date and call number is intended not only as an aid to users, especially for interlibrary loan, but as "a pilot project, a challenge to the hand-wringing school of librarians who view the rising flood of publications with gloom and panic, while they cite the lamentation of Ecclesiastes and seek to reduce or contain their collections in size." The work, including more than 40,000 titles, while not listing periodicals, newspapers, other types of serials and uncatalogued government documents, does take in many documents catalogued separately as well as a great many other titles likely to be of use to the political scientist.—J. B. C.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

ARNAUD B. LEAVELLE

Stanford University

History and Criticism

Abbagnano, N. La Sociologie de la Liberté de Geroges Gurvitch. Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale. January-March, 1956.

Abell, Aaron I. American Catholic Reaction to Industrial Conflict: The Arbitral Process, 1885-1900. Catholic Historical Review. January, 1956.

Barnwell, H. T. Saint Euremond and Pascal: A Note on the Question of Le Divertissement. Studies in Philology. January, 1956.

Branster, Gerhard. Zur Neuauflage der ästhetischen Vorlesungen Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegels. Aufbau. March, 1956.

Brown, Theodore M. Greenough, Paine, Emerson, and the Organic Aesthetic. The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism. March, 1956.

Bryant, Donald C. Burke's Present Discontents: The Rhetorical Genesis. The Quarterly Journal of Speech. April, 1956.

Budd, Louis J. Altruism Arrives in America. American Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Burlingane, Roger. Zion in the Forest [Roger Williams]. American Heritage. June, 1956.

Carretero, Luis Abad. La Idea de Justicia en el Quijote. Humanismo. March-April, 1956.

Ceyssens, L. Jansenisme et Antijansénisme en Belgique au XVII<sup>e</sup>S. Revue D'Histoire Ecclesiastique. LI/1. 1956.

Cobban, Alfred. The Vocabulary of History. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1956.

Chamberlin, William Henry. Some Mistakes of Marx. The Freeman. May, 1956.

Conover, Milton. St. Thomas Aquinas in Some Recent Non-Scholastic Writers on Political Philosophy. New Scholasticism. January, 1956.

Daix, Alphonse. Faut-il récrire "Le Capital." Esprit. May, 1956.

DeConde, Alexander. William Vaus Murray on Freedom of Religion in the United States, 1787. Maryland Historical Magazine. December, 1955.

Dewart, Leslie. Existentialism and the Degrees of Knowledge. The Thomist. April, 1956.

Dillon, M. L. Captain Jason W. James, Frontier Anti-Democrat. New Mexico Historical Review. April, 1956.

Eros, J. The Positivist Generation of French

Republicanism. The Sociological Review. December, 1955.

Fellows, Otis E. Voltaire and Buffon: Clash and Conciliation. Symposium. Fall, 1955.

Figueres, Leo. Sur la position de Jaures et du jauresisme dans le mouvement ouvrier français d'avant 1914. Cahiers du Communisme. January-February, 1956.

Fletcher, Joseph F. Christian Views on Human Labor, 1500-1860: From Martin Luther to Samuel Smiles. Historical Magazine of the Protestant Episcopal Church. April, 1956.

Franklin, Benjamin. [Various Articles.] Pennsylvania Magazine. January, 1956.

Freistadt, Hans. Dialectical Materialism: A Friendly Interpretation. Philosophy of Science. April, 1956.

Grange, H. Necker jugé par Karl Marx. Annales Historiques De La Revolution Française. January-March, 1956.

Griffith, Gwilym O. Professor Toynbee, Mazzini and the Future Faith. The Hibbert Journal. April, 1956.

Grossman, James. The Dreyfus Affair Fifty Years Later. Commentary. January, 1956.

Harris, Afram L. John Stuart Mill's Theory of Progress. Ethics. April, 1956.

Haywood, C. Robert. The Mind of the North Carolina Advocates of Mercantilism. The North Carolina Historical Review. April, 1956.

Hislop, Codman. A Loud and Awful Warning. The New York Historical Society Quarterly. January, 1956.

Hofstadter, Richard. The Myth of the Happy Yeoman. American Heritage. April, 1956.

Howe, Irving. Orwell: History as Nightmare. The American Scholar. Spring, 1956.

Hübner, Kurt. Fichte, Sartre und der Nihilismus. Zeitschrift Für Philosophische Forschung. X/1. 1956.

Hyde, William J. The Socialism of H. G. Wells. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1956.

Jemolo, A. C. La classe dirigente nel Mezzogiorno. Occidente. January-February, 1956.

Johnson, Humphrey J. T. The Roman Index of Prohibited Books. Cross Currents. Summer, 1955.

- Laslett, Peter. The English Revolution and Locke's Two Treatises of Government. The Cambridge Historical Journal. No. 1, 1956.
- Le Blond, J. M. Christianisme et Souffrance en Souvenir de S. Kierkegaard. Études. March, 1956.
- Mackey, Louis. Kierkegaard and the Problem of Existential Philosophy. Review of Metaphysics. March, 1956.
- Mann, Arthur. British Social Thought and American Reformers of the Progressive Era. The Mississippi Valley Historical Review. March, 1956.
- Maravall, Jose Antonio. La historia del pensamiento político, la ciencia política y la Historia. La Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1955.
- Marias, Julian. La Metafísica de Ortega. Cuadernos. May-June, 1956.
- Marx, Werner. Heidegger's New Conception of Philosophy—The Second Phase of Existentialism. Social Research. Winter, 1955.
- Maurer, Ormond A. The State of Historical Research in Liger of Brabant. Speculum. January, 1956.
- Mora, Jose Ferrater. Ortega y la idea de la vida humana. Cuadernos. May-June, 1956.
- Mueller, Gustav E. Hegel on the Values of Humanistic Education. Educational Theory. October, 1955.
- Mullaney, James V. Developmental Thomism. Thomist. January, 1956.
- Napolitano, Tomaso. La Ultime Assise di Mosca. Nuovo Antologia. April, 1956.
- Nemets, Anthony A. Logic and the Division of the Sciences in Aristotle and St. Thomas Aquinas. Modern Schoolman. January, 1956.
- Noble, David W. The Religion of Progress in America, 1890-1914. Social Research. Winter, 1955.
- Ostlund, Leonard A. Walter Bagehot—Pioneer Social Psychology Theorist. Social Science. April, 1956.
- Pearsall, Robert. Carlyle and Emerson: Horses and Revolutions. The South Atlantic Quarterly. April, 1956.
- Penna, Mario. El "Principe" según Diego de Voloro y el "Principe" según Moquiavelo. La Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1955.
- Powieke, Michael R. Edward II and Military Obligation. Speculum. January, 1956.
- Reiss, H. S. Kant and the Right of Rebellion. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1956.
- Resneck, Samuel. Patterns of Thought and Action in An American Depression, 1882-1886. American Historical Review. January, 1956.
- Rich, Audrey N. M. The Cynic Conception of Autarkeia. Mnemosyne. IV/IX/1. 1956.
- Rovan, Joseph. Le Catholicisme Allemand au Temps d'Hitler (II). Esprit. January, 1956.
- Royce, Josiah. [Various Articles.] Journal of Philosophy. February, 1956.
- Ruiff, Philip. Origins of Freud's Political Psychology. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1956.
- Schapiro, Leonard. The Vekhi Group and the Mystique of Revolution. The Slavonic and East European Review. December, 1955.
- Seymour, Charles. Woodrow Wilson in Perspective. Foreign Affairs. January, 1956.
- Snyder, Phil L. Carl L. Becker and the Great War: A Crisis for a Humane Intelligence. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.
- Solmsen, Friedrich. Neglected Evidence for Cicero's De re publica. Museum Helveticum. January, 1956.
- Stein, Jay W. Beginnings of "Ideology." The South Atlantic Quarterly. April, 1956.
- Strauss, Leo. Kurt Riezler, 1882-1955. Social Research. Spring, 1956.
- Teissedre, Jean. Actualité du Saint-Simonisme. Revue D'Histoire Économique et Sociale. Number 4, 1955.
- Thompson, Kenneth W. Mr. Toynbee and World Politics. World Politics. April, 1956.
- Tominioux, Jacques. De Bergson à la phénoménologie existentielle. Revue Philosophique De Louvain. February, 1956.
- Toynbee, Arnold J. The New Opportunity for Historians. Seymour Lecture. University of Minnesota, 1956.
- Tugwell, R. G. The Fallow Years of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Ethics. January, 1956.
- Weltsch, Felix. The Perennial Spinoza. Commentary. May, 1956.
- Wheeler, Harvey. Calvin's Case (1608) and the McIlwain-Schuyler Debate. The American Historical Review. April, 1956.
- Wolf, Edwin II. Franklin and His Friends Choose their Books. The Pennsylvania Magazine. January, 1956.
- Wood, H. G. Marx and Science. The Hibbert Journal. April, 1956.
- Woodruff, W. Capitalism and the Historians: A Contribution to the Discussion on the Industrial Revolution in England. The Journal of Economic History. March, 1956.
- Zeller, Gaston. Le principe d'équilibre dans la politique internationale avant 1789. Revue Historique. January-March, 1956.

Legal Theory and Public Law Issues

Auerbach, Carl A. Communist Control Act of 1954, A Proposed Legal-Political Theory of Free Speech. University of Chicago Law Review. Winter, 1956.

Baker, Roscoe. Equality and the Fourteenth Amendment. Historia. October, 1955.

Berns, Walter. Freedom and Loyalty. The Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

Brisbane, Robert. Interposition: Theory and Fact. Phylon. No. 1, 1956.

Burton, (Justice) Harold H. The Legal Tender Cases. American Bar Association Journal. March, 1956.

Call, Joseph L. Limited Government and the Welfare Clause. Dickinson Law Review. March, 1956.

DiRuffia, Paolo Biscaretti. La solución italiana al problema de la "jurisdicción constitucional." La Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1955.

Drinnan, Robert F. The Right of Silence. America. April 28, 1956.

Dumbauld, Edward. John Marshall and Treaty Law. American Journal of International Law. January, 1956.

Hall, Jerome. American Tendencies in Legal Philosophy and the Definition of "Law." Comparative Law Review of Japan. Vol. 3, 1956.

Hall, Jerome. Plato's Legal Philosophy. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1956.

Hall, Jerome. Psychiatry and Criminal Responsibility. Yale Law Journal. May, 1956.

Harris, Robert J. The Impact of the Cold War upon Civil Liberties. The Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

Hoffman, Stanley. L'anticommunisme dans le droit public de États-Unis. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. January-February, 1956.

Jacobs, Paul. The Inalienable Right to Get Peacefully Sozzled. The Reporter. April 19, 1956.

Lacy, Creighton. Unequal but Together. The Christian Century. May 9, 1956.

LaFollette, Suzanne. Freedom to Join or Starve. National Review. June 13, 1956.

Mason, Alpheus T. The Core of Free Government, 1938-40: Mr. Justice Stone and "Preferred Freedoms." Yale Law Journal. April, 1956.

Mason, Alpheus T. Inter Armas Silent Leges: Chief Justice Stone's Views. Harvard Law Review. March, 1956.

Natural Law Conference Papers. Catholic Lawyer. January, 1956.

Oulahan, Courts. Reforming the Administrative Process. The Brief. Winter, 1956.

Polak, M. V. Montesquieu et le Droit Public Néerlandais. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October-December, 1955.

Racial Desegregation and Integration. [Various Articles.] Annals. March, 1956.

Spann, Edwin R. The Freedom of the Church and the Freedom of the Citizen. Religion in Life. Spring, 1956.

Vouin, Robert. The Protection of the Accused in French Criminal Procedure. The International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1956.

Wu, John C. Jurisprudence as a Cultural Study. University of Detroit Law Journal. March, 1956.

Special Studies and Analysis

Albert, Ethel M. The Classification of Values. American Anthropologist. April, 1956.

Ames, Van Meter. Mead and Sartre on Man. Journal of Philosophy. March 15, 1956.

Anders, Gunther. The World as Phantom and as Matrix. Dissent. Winter, 1956.

Aron, Raymond. Le fanatisme, la prudence et la foi. Preuves. May, 1956.

Beer, James E. The Bible and Modern Religions: I The Seventh-Day Adventists. Interpretation. January, 1956.

Beth, Loren P. McCarthyism. The South Atlantic Quarterly. April, 1956.

Blackhurst, J. Herbert. Does the World View of John Dewey Support Creative Education? Educational Theory. October, 1955.

Boorstin, Daniel J. The Place of Thought in American Life. The American Scholar. Spring, 1956.

Chen, Theodore Hsi-en. Deviationism in Chinese Communism. World Affairs Interpreter. Winter, 1955.

Coblentz, William K., and Warshaw, Robert S. European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. California Law Review. March, 1956.

Cole, G. H. D. Democratie a l'échelle humaine. Esprit. May, 1956.

Costanzo, Joseph F. Religion in Public School Education. Thought. Summer, 1956.

Cranston, Maurice. The Rights of Man. The Listener. April 26, 1956.

Dean, Howard E. Democracy, Loyalty, Disobedience: A Query. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1955.

DeParga, Manuel Jiménez. La teoría y la realidad constitucional contemporáneas. La Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1955.

Dettering, Richard W. Philosophie Idealism in Rogerian Psychology. Educational Theory. October, 1955.

Dewey, Robert E. The Future of Philosophy. Journal of Philosophy. March, 1956.

Dore, R. P. Left and Right in Japan. International Affairs. January, 1956.

Duclos, Jacques. Developper l'action des masses pour un nouveau Front Populaire. Cahiers du Communisme. January-February, 1956.

Eckstein, Harry. Planning: A Case Study. Political Studies. February, 1956.

Ey, Henri. La psychiatrie. Esprit. April, 1956.

Fainsod, Merle. The CPSU Takes Stock of Itself. Problems of Communism. May-June, 1956.

Farris, Charles D. Authoritarianism as a Political Behavior Variable. The Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

Finer, S. E. The Political Power of Private Capital. The Sociological Review. December, 1955.

Florin, Raymond. Les Bases D'une Démocratie Rationnelle. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. February, 1956.

Future of Liberalism [Various articles]. The Reporter. May 3, 31, 1956.

Gerard, R. W., et al. Biological and Cultural Evolution. Behavioral Science. January, 1956.

Glock, C. Y., Ringer, B. B. Church Policy and Attitudes on Social Issues. American Sociological Review. April, 1956.

Golightly, Cornelius L. Value as a Scientific Concept. Journal of Philosophy. March 29, 1956.

Grant, George. The Uses of Freedom. Queen's Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Greene, Theodore M. Life, Value, Happiness. Journal of Philosophy. May 10, 1956.

Gross, Feliks. Le Pouvoir dans l'Histoire. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. January, 1956.

Guetzkow, Harold. Multiple Loyalties: Theoretical Approach to a Problem in International Organization. Princeton University, 1955.

Gurvitch, Georges. Phénomènes sociaux totaux. Esprit. March, 1956.

Hacker, Andrew. Original Sin vs. Utopia in British Socialism. The Review of Politics. April, 1956.

Hens, John M. Reflecting on Morals. Philosophy. April, 1956.

Herberg, Will. Biblical Faith as Heilsgeschichte. Christian Scholar. March, 1956.

Hershberger, Guy F. The Modern Social Gospel and the Way of the Cross. The Mennonite Review. April, 1956.

Horowitz, Irving Louis. The New Conservatism. Science and Society. Winter, 1956.

Katz, Joseph. Ethics Without Morality. Journal of Philosophy. May 26, 1955.

Kirchheimer, Otto. Politics and Justice. Social Research. Winter, 1955.

Kirk, Russell. Return to Principle in Politics: Conservatives and Liberals Take Thought. Southwest Review. Spring, 1956.

Klain, Maurice. Politics—Still a Dirty Word. Antioch Review. Winter, 1955-1956.

Kling, Merle. Towards a Theory of Power and Political Instability in Latin America. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Krash, Otto. The Oppenheimer Film and Free Inquiry in the Arts and Sciences. American Association of University Professors Bulletin. Winter, 1956.

Lauvau, G. C. Sciences Politiques. Esprit. April, 1956.

Lauvau, G. C. Plantification et liberté. Esprit. May, 1956.

Levine, Solomon B. Interdisciplinary Approach in the Social Sciences. Social Science. April, 1956.

Lilge, Frederic. The Politicizing of Educational Theory. Ethics. April, 1956.

Lockwood, Theodore D. This Nation—Under God? Christian Register. April, 1956.

Lacroix, Jean. Eloge du positivisme. Esprit. March, 1956.

Lowrie, Donald A. Dialectic Morality. Religion in Life. Spring, 1956.

MacKinnon, William J. and Conters, Richard. Authoritarianism and Urban Stratification. The American Journal of Sociology. May, 1956.

Merrifield, Charles W. Current Controversies in the Theory of Leadership. Western Speech. Spring, 1956.

Meyer, Frank S. Principles and Heresies. National Review. June 6, 1956.

Moch, Jules. Political and Moral Aspects of the Atomic Revolution. Confluence. April, 1956.

Moore, Willis. Causal Factors in the Current Attack on Education. American Association of University Professors Bulletin. Winter, 1955.

Muelder, Walter G. Institutional Factors Affecting Unity and Disunity. Ecumenical Review. January, 1956.

- Niebuhr, Reinhold. Literalism, Individualism, and Billy Graham. The Christian Century. May 23, 1956.
- Olson, Robert G. The Three Theories of Motivation in the Philosophy of Jean-Paul Sartre. Ethics. April, 1956.
- Orrego, Antenor. Crisis y reconstrucción. Humanismo. March-April, 1956.
- Pasch, Alan. Empiricism: One "Dogma" or Two. Journal of Philosophy. April 26, 1956.
- Paul, William W. Faith and Reason in Kierkegaard and Modern Existentialism. The Review of Religion. March, 1956.
- Pennate, E. La democrazia e la classe politica. Occidente. January-February, 1956.
- Pierce, Albert. Empiricism and the Social Sciences. American Sociological Review. April, 1956.
- Phillips, Norman R. The Conservative Implications of Skepticism. The Journal of Politics. February, 1956.
- Qureshi, I. H. Relations Between Great Britain and the Indo-Pakistan Subcontinent. Confluence. January, 1956.
- Ricœur, Paul. Certitudes et Incertitudes d'une Révolution [China]. Esprit. January, 1956.
- Rose, Arnold M. Sociology and the Study of Values. The British Journal of Sociology. March, 1956.
- Rossiter, Clinton. The Presidents and the Presidency. American Heritage. April, 1956.
- Roucek, Joseph S. Minority-Majority Relations in Their Power Aspects. Phylon. No. 1, 1956.
- Scheffler, Israel. Science, Morals, and Educational Policy. Harvard Educational Review. Winter, 1956.
- Schapiro, J. S. Revolutions, Digested and Undigested. Social Studies. May, 1956.
- Science and World Politics [Various articles]. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. April, 1956.
- Seeger, Raymond J. History and Philosophy of Science. American Scientist. April, 1956.
- Seligman, Ben B. Keynesian Economics—A Critique. Dissent. Winter, 1956.
- Seton-Watson, Hugh. The Soviet Ruling Class. Problems of Communism. May-June, 1956.
- Siegfried, Andre. États-Unis, 1956. La Revue de Paris. May, 1956.
- Stamps, Norman L. Relevance of Freud to the Study of Totalitarian Movements. Social Science. April, 1956.
- Sulzbach, Walter. Demokratie und freie Marktwirtschaft. Zeitschrift Für Die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. 112/1, 1956.
- Taeuber, Walter. Kulturkrise und Wirtschaftsdenken. Zeitschrift Für Geo-Politik. March, 1956.
- Thorndike, Lynn. Whatever Was, Was Right. American Historical Review. January, 1956.
- Vedel, G. Crise de l'Autorité. Études. January, 1956.
- Viereck, Peter. Vox Populi-Vox Dei or Vox Diaboli. Southwest Review. Spring, 1956.
- Wendland, H. D. Social Humanism and Christian Care. Ecumenical Review. January, 1956.
- Williams, Jay C., Jr. Philosophic Diversity and the Social Sciences, I. Journal of General Education. October, 1955.
- Winch, Peter. Social Science. The British Journal of Sociology. March, 1956.
- White, Morton. Original Sin, Natural Law, and Politics. Partisan Review. Spring, 1956.
- Wrong, Dennis H. Riesman and the Age of Sociology. Commentary. April, 1956.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

HERBERT A. SIMON

Carnegie Institute of Technology

Philosophy of Social Science

Ashby, W. Ross. The Effect of Experience on a Determinate Dynamic System. Behavioral Science. January, 1956.

Easton, David. Limits of the Equilibrium Model in Social Research. Behavioral Science. April, 1956.

Hamburg, Carl H. Psychology and the Ethics of Survival. Philosophy of Science. April, 1956.

Simon, Herbert A. Rational Choice and the Structure of the Environment. Psychological Review. March, 1956.

Winch, Peter. Social Science. British Journal of Sociology. March, 1956.

Motivation and Personality

Farris, Charles D. "Authoritarianism" as a Political Behavior Variable. Journal of Politics. February, 1956.

French, Elizabeth G., and Chadwick, Irene. Some Characteristics of Affiliation Motivation. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. May, 1956.

Haythorn, William; Couch, Arthur; Haefner, Donald; Langham, Peter; and Carter, Launor F. The Behavior of Authoritarian and Equalitarian Personalities in Groups. Human Relations. 1956, #1.

Mack, Raymond W.; Murphy, Raymond J.; and Yellin, Seymour. The Protestant Ethic, Level of Aspiration, and Social Mobility. American Sociological Review. June, 1956.

MacKinnon, William J., and Centers, Richard. Authoritarianism and Urban Stratification. American Journal of Sociology. May, 1956.

Sewell, William H., and Haller, Archie O. Social Status and the Personality Adjustment of the Child. Sociometry. June, 1956.

Siegel, Saul M. The Relationship of Hostility to Authoritarianism. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. May, 1956.

Opinions and Attitudes

Baker, Bela O., and Sarbin, Theodore R. Differential Mediation of Social Perception as a Correlate of Social Adjustment. Sociometry. June, 1956.

Becker, Howard S., and Carper, James. The Elements of Identification With an Occupation. American Sociological Review. June, 1956.

Carlson, Earl R. Attitude Change Through Modification of Attitude Structure. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. March, 1956.

Cooper, Joseph B. Mobility Anticipation, Class Assignment and Authoritarianism as Field Determinants of Attitudes. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1956.

Fisher, Seymour; Rubinstein, Irving; and Freeman, Robert W. Intertrial Effects of Immediate Self-Committal in a Continuous Social Influence Situation. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. March, 1956.

Fishman, Joshua A. An Examination of the Process and Function of Social Stereotyping. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1956.

Graham, Saxon. Class and Conservatism in the Adoption of Innovations. Human Relations. 1956, #1.

Katz, Daniel; Sarnoff, Irving; and McClinck, Charles. Ego-Defense and Attitude Change. Human Relations. 1956, #1.

Mahoney, Gerald M. Unidimensional Scales for the Measurement of Morale in an Industrial Situation. Human Relations. 1956, #1.

Mellinger, Glen D. Interpersonal Trust as a Factor in Communication. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. May, 1956.

Perception of Persons: Report of the Inter-university Summer Research Seminar. Items. March, 1956.

Vinacke, W. Edgar. Explorations in the Dynamic Processes of Stereotyping. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1956.

Weinstein, Eugene A. Weights Assigned by Children to Criteria of Prestige. Sociometry. June, 1956.

Group Behavior, General

Blake, Robert R.; Rhead, Clifton C.; Wedge, Bryant; and Mouton, Jane Srygley. Housing Architecture and Social Interaction. Sociometry. June, 1956.

Brodbeck, May. The Role of Small Groups in Mediating the Effects of Propaganda. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. March, 1956.

French, John R. P., Jr. A Formal Theory of Social Power. Psychological Review. May, 1956.

Gerard, Harold B. Some Factors Affecting an Individual's Estimate of His Probable Success in a Group Situation. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. March, 1956.

Grossack, Martin M. Group Belongingness Among Negroes. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1956.

Jahoda, Marie. Psychological Issues in Civil Liberties. American Psychologist. May, 1956.

Lanzetta, John T., and Roby, Thornton B. Group Performance as a Function of Work-Distribution Patterns and Task Load. Sociometry. June, 1956.

Maloney, R. M. Group Learning Through Group Discussion. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1956.

Roby, Thornton B., and Lanzetta, John T. Work Group Structure, Communication, and Group Performance. Sociometry. June, 1956.

Salisbury, W. Steward. Faith, Ritualism, Charismatic Leadership and Religious Behavior. Social Forces. March, 1956.

Shaw, Marvin E., and Gilchrist, J. C. Inter-group Communication and Leader Choice. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1956.

Wolman, Benjamin. Leadership and Group Dynamics. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1956.

Organizational Behavior

Brown, Julia S. Union Size as a Function of Intra-Union Conflict. Human Relations. 1956, #1.

Clark, Burton R. Organizational Adaptation and Precarious Values. American Sociological Review. June, 1956.

Coleman, John R. The Compulsive Pressures of Democracy in Unionism. American Journal of Sociology. May, 1956.

Dalton, Melville. Managing the Managers. Human Organization. Fall, 1955.

Kennedy, John L. A "Transition Model" Laboratory for Research on Cultural Change. Human Organization. Fall, 1955.

Luce, R. Duncan, and Rogow, Arnold A. A Game Theoretic Analysis of Congressional Power Distributions for a Two-Party System. Behavioral Science. April, 1956.

Martin, Norman H., and Strauss, Anselm L. Patterns of Mobility Within Industrial Organizations. Journal of Business. April, 1956.

Strauss, George. Control by the Membership in Building Trades Unions. American Journal of Sociology. May, 1956.

Tannenbaum, Arnold S. Control Structure and Union Functions. American Journal of Sociology. May, 1956.

Voting Behavior

Eldersveld, Samuel J. Experimental Propaganda Techniques and Voting Behavior.

American Political Science Review. March, 1956.

Epstein, Leon D. Size of Place and the Division of the Two-Party Vote in Wisconsin. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1956.

Farquharson, Robin. Straightforwardness in Voting Procedures. Oxford Economic Papers. February, 1956.

Culture and Institutions

Albert, Ethel M. The Classification of Values. American Anthropologist. April, 1956.

Anastasi, Anne. Intelligence and Family Size. Psychological Bulletin. May, 1956.

Clarke, Alfred C. The Use of Leisure and its Relation to Levels of Occupational Prestige. American Sociological Review. June, 1956.

Marsh, C. Paul, and Coleman, A. Lee. Group Influences and Agricultural Innovations. American Journal of Sociology. May, 1956.

Meier, Richard L. Communications and Social Change. Behavioral Science. January, 1956.

Westley, William A. Secrecy and the Police. Social Forces. March, 1956.

Value Theory and Social Policy

Smith, Nicholas M., Jr. A Calculus for Ethics: A Theory of the Structure of Value. Part I. Behavior Science. April, 1956.

The Climate of Opinion and the State of Academic Freedom. American Sociological Review. June, 1956.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

ABELS, JULES. The Truman Scandals. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company. 1956. Pp. v, 329. $3.75.

BARTON, REBECCA CHALMERS. Our Human Rights: A Study in the Art of Persuasion. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. vii, 102. $2.00.

BRISSENDEN, PAUL F. The Labor Injunction in Hawaii. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. 68. $1.00.

BROOK, DAVID. The U. N. and the China Dilemma. New York: Vantage Press. 1956. Pp. 87. $2.50.

BUCKINGHAM, CLYDE E. Red Cross Disaster Relief: Its Origin and Development. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. 47. $1.00.

CALLISON, I. P. Courts of Injustice: The Failure of Justice in the State Courts. New York:

Twayne Publishers. 1956. Pp. 775. $6.00.

CHRISTIE, ROBERT A. Empire in Wood: A History of the Carpenters' Union. Ithaca, N.Y.: New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations, Cornell University. 1956. Pp. xvii, 356. $4.50. paper; $5.50. cloth.

COLM, GERHARD (ED.). The Employment Act, Past and Future: A Tenth Anniversary Symposium. Washington, D. C.: National Planning Association. 1956. Pp. xii, 203. $2.75.

DENNIS, EUGENE. Letters From Prison. New York: International Publishers. 1956. Pp. 157. $2.00.

DU BOIS, CORA. Foreign Students and Higher Education in the United States. Washington, D.C.: American Council on Education. 1956. Pp. xviii, 221. $3.50.

FARMER, FRANCES. The Wilson Reader. New

- York: Oceana Publications. 1956. Pp. 286. $1.00.
- FISHWICK, MARSHALL W. The Virginia Tradition. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. vi, 111. $2.50.
- GARCIA, ANTONIO. La Rebelión de Los Pueblos Débiles: Nacionalismo Popular y Anti-Imperialismo. La Paz, Bolivia: Liberia-Editorial "Juventud." 1955. Pp. 135.
- GUETZKOW, HAROLD. Multiple Loyalties: Theoretical Approach to a Problem in International Organization. Princeton, N.J.: Center for Research on World Political Institutions, Princeton University. 1955. Pp. 62.
- HILL, J. W. F. Tudor and Stuart Lincoln. New York: Cambridge University Press. 1956. Pp. xiv, 254. $6.00.
- HOLAND, HJALMER R. Exploration in America Before Columbus. New York: Twayne Publishers, Inc., 1956. Pp. 381. $6.00.
- KEOGH, JAMES. This is Nixon: The Man and His Work. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1956. Pp. 191. $2.75.
- KOCHNEFF, BILL. Let's Fight Communism a New Way. New York: Vantage Press. 1956. Pp. 56. $2.00.
- KRATZ, WALTER. American Labor and the Intellectual. New York: Vantage Press. 1956. Pp. 83. $2.50.
- LEGISLATIVE RESEARCH COMMISSION OF KENTUCKY (CHARLES WHEELER, RESEARCH EDITOR). Water Rights Law in Kentucky. Frankfort: Commonwealth of Kentucky. 1956. Pp. 75.
- LEVINSON, EDWARD. Labor on the March. New York: University Books, Inc., 1956. Pp. xxii, 325. $3.50.
- MARCANTONIO, VITO (SELECTED AND EDITED BY RUBINSTEIN, ANNETTE T.). I Vote My Conscience: Debates, Speeches and Writings of Vito Marcantonio, 1935-1960. New York: Vito Marcantonio Memorial. 1956. Pp. 494. $5.00.
- DA SILVA, MELLO, A. Man: His Life, His Education, His Happiness. New York: Philosophical Library. 1956. Pp. 729. $6.00.
- MYERS, HENRY ALONZO. Are Men Equal? An Inquiry into the Meaning of American Democracy. Ithaca, N. Y.: Cornell University Press. 1955. Pp. iv, 188. $1.45.
- PALMER, GLADYS L. Philadelphia Workers in a Changing Economy. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 1956. Pp. xiv, 189. $6.00.
- PAPERS DELIVERED AT THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON AUTOMATION BY JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, DONALD P. CAMPBELL, WALTER P. RUEFELER, JAMES B. CAREY, JACK CONWAY, NAT GOLDFINGER, WALTER BUCKINGHAM, JOHN DIEBOLD, JOSEPH A. BIERNE, ADAM ABRUZZI, AND I. W. ABEL. The Challenge of Automation. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. 77. $2.00.
- RANSOM, HARRY. The First Copyright Statute: An Essay on "An Act for the Encouragement of Learning," 1710. Austin: University of Texas Press. 1956. Pp. xiv, 145. $3.75.
- RUDOLPH, FREDERICK. Mark Hopkins and the Log: Williams College, 1836-1872. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press. 1956. Pp. ix, 267. $4.75.
- WALKER, KENNETH F. Industrial Relations in Australia. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. xvii, 389. $7.50.
- WHEELER-BENNETT, J. W. Three Episodes in the Life of Kaiser Wilhelm II: The Leslie Stephen Lecture, 1955. New York: Cambridge University Press. 1956. Pp. 27. $7.50.
- YOUTSLER, JAMES S. Labor's Wage Policies in the Twentieth Century. New York: Twayne Publishers. 1956. Pp. 344. $5.00.

NEWS AND NOTES

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

The fourteenth annual meeting of the Midwest Conference of Political Scientists was held May 3-5 at Marquette University with 225 persons in attendance. Featured speakers were Denis W. Brogan of Cambridge University who spoke on "The Prospects of Political Science in Europe," Harold Lasswell whose topic was "The Professional Problems of Political Scientists," and Gerhart Niemeyer whose subject was "General Assumptions Concerning Soviet-American Relations." Round table discussions were conducted on the following topics: "Midwest Political Parties," "The Role of Political Theory in Political Science," "Woodrow Wilson as Domestic and Foreign Policy Leader," "Civil Liberties and National Security," "Political Implications of Land Reform in Asia and Latin America," and "National and International Implications of the Twentieth Party Congress."

The most important decision of the business meeting was the action to establish a Midwest Political Science Journal in cooperation with the Wayne University Press.

The officers elected by the Conference for 1956-1957 were Wilfred Binkley, Ohio Northern University, President; Marshall Knappen, University of Michigan, Vice President; Reginald Laing, Carleton College and Ivan Stone, Beloit College, members of the Executive Council for three year terms.

The 1957 meeting of the conference will be held in Springfield, Illinois on May 2-4. The program chairman is Ralph Straetz of Miami University. Co-chairmen of the Committee on Local Arrangements are Jack Isakoff of the Illinois Legislative Council and Philip Monypenny of the University of Illinois.

The Northern California Political Science Association held its annual meeting on May 5 at Stanford University. There were papers delivered and panel discussions held on "Pre-Convention Politics" in general and on the election issue politics of civil rights, foreign policy, farm and conservation. Professor Henry Ehrmann of the University of Colorado addressed the luncheon session on "Pressure Groups in France and Great Britain." Officers elected for 1956-57 were: President Arnaud B. Leavelle, Stanford University; Vice-President, Earl C. Segrets, Sacramento State College; Secretary-Treasurer, Rev. Richard J. Roberts, University of Santa Clara. The following were named members of the council: Norman Jacobson, University of California (Berkeley); Hyman Palais, Humboldt State College; Vernon Puryear, University of California (Davis); Roy Archibald, College of San Mateo; Dean R. Cresap, San Jose State College; Robert L. Johnston, Mills College.

The Pacific Northwest Political Science Association held its Ninth Annual Meeting at Willamette University April 20-21. The following officers were elected: John Swarthout, President; George Wolfe, College of Idaho, Vice-President; Donald Balmer, Lewis and Clark College, Secretary-Treasurer; Board Members: Rev. Richard Twohy, S. J., Gonzaga University, and David Corbett, University of British Columbia.

The 1955-56 Annual Meeting of the New England Political Science Association was held on May 5th at the University of Connecticut. Four papers were presented: "Egypt in Transition," by Walter Sharp of Yale University; "An Approach to the Analysis of Political Systems," by David Easton of the University of Chicago; "The Presidential Press Conference," by Elmer Cornwell, Jr., of Brown University; and "The NAACP and the Courts" by Clement Vose of Bowdoin.

At the business meeting the following officers were elected for the coming year: Athern Daggett, Bowdoin College, President; Guy H. Dodge of Brown University, Vice President; and George Goodwin, Jr., University of Massachusetts, Secretary-Treasurer. Elected to the executive committee were: Gwendolyn Carter, Smith College; James W. Fesler, Yale University and Andrew Gyorgy, Boston University.

The Eighth Annual Conference on American Foreign Policy was held at Colgate University July 2-6. The conference theme was "Waging Peace for Freedom." Approximately 50 outstanding speakers and discussion leaders participated in the conference.

The Committee on East European Studies of the University of Texas will hold a three-day conference on "The Present Political State of East Europe" in Austin, October 11-13, 1956. The conference is being financed by a grant from the Social Science Research Council. Discussion leaders include Professor John Hazard of Columbia University; Professor Andrei Lobonov-Rostovsky of the University of Michigan; John Morrison, Geographic Consultant on the U.S.S.R.; Harrison Salisbury of The New York Times; and Professor Donald Hodgman of the University of California.

The Second Conference on Democratic Theory was held at Buck Hills Falls, Pennsylvania, June 11-19. Directed by William S. Stokes the conference was sponsored by The Foundation for American Studies which is financed by the William Volker Fund. Formal papers were given by Dwight Waldo, William McGovern, Eric Voegelin, Felix Morley, Henry S. Kariel, Alfred de Grazia, William S. Stokes, Willmoore Kendall, Herbert Butterfield.

On March 7-8 the Ninth Annual Conference of the William Edgar Borah Outlawry of War Foundation was held on the campus of the University of Idaho. The series of conferences is devoted to the general theme "The Causes and the Conditions of Peace." This year the specific theme was "Cultural Diversity and World Peace." Major addresses on this theme were delivered by Melville J. Herskovits, Northwestern University, George H. T. Kimple, Director of the African Survey of the Twentieth Century Fund; Harold H. Fisher, Director Emeritus, Hoover Institute and Library, and Boyd A. Martin, University of Idaho.

The Eighth Annual Workshop in Problems of State and Local Government was held at Indiana University, June 18-July 6, under the joint sponsorship of the department of government and the school of education. Louis E. Lambert of the department of government was chairman.

The World Affairs Council of Northern California held a conference on April 13-15. Among the speakers at the various sessions were Allan Dulles of the C.I.A., Carl Marcy, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Edwin Wright of the State Department and Morton A. Kaplan of the Center for Advanced Studies in the Behavioral Sciences.

A workshop entitled "Germany: United or Divided" was sponsored by the department of political science, Marshall College, June 2-21. Visiting lecturers were Taylor Cole, Duke University, Herbert Weil, German Embassy, Conley H. Dillon, head of the department of political science, Marshall College. Carl Leiden of Marshall College directed the workshop.

The Seventh Annual Conference on Problems of American Foreign Policy was held at Indiana University June 29 and 30. The topic was "The Russian Enigma and Western Response." Professor Edward H. Buehrig served as Chairman. Speakers included Harry Schwartz of The New York Times; C. Burke Elbrick, Acting Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs; Brigadier General Charles H. Bonesteel III, Department of Defense; Mr. Nugroho, Minister Counselor of the Indonesian Embassy; Mr. Mahmood Shafqat, First Secretary of the Pakistan Mission to the United Nations; Mr. J. O. Udoji, Permanent Secretary, Ministry of Health, Eastern Region, Nigeria; and a panel consisting of Messrs. Robert Strausz-Hupe, Norman Palmer, Gerhart Niemeyer, and Colonel William R. Kintner.

The Third Mid-West Seminar on U. S. Foreign Policy will be held on the campus of the University of Wisconsin September 9-14, 1956. The Seminar is one of a series jointly sponsored by four midwest universities: Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin and financed by a grant from the Ford Foundation.

The final conference held by the Northwestern University department of political science in connection with its Curriculum Development Project (supported by the Carnegie Corporation) met March 15-17, 1956 and was concerned with the Study of the Community. Papers prepared in advance and discussed at the Conference were: "The Nature of Community and Methods of Community Analysis," by Gordon W. Blackwell, University of North Carolina; "The Political Implications of Community Identification," by Angus Campbell, University of Michigan; "Studying Associations and Organization Structure," by Peter H. Rossi, University of Chicago; and "Individual Participation in Mass Society," by Scott Greer, Occidental College. A limited number of copies of the above papers are available for distribution (as are a few copies of papers read at earlier conferences) from the Curriculum Development Project, Northwestern University, Evanston Illinois.

The department of political science at the University of California at Los Angeles, in cooperation with the American Institute of Planners, sponsored a Planning Institute June 8 and 9 on the subject: Transportation and Metropolitan Planning. Professor Ernest A. Engelbert served as director of the Institute, and the research papers presented will be published.

The Public Administration Service of the department of government, University of New Hampshire, conducted a Public Affairs Institute on the revision of the New Hampshire Constitution on April 7, 1956.

The American University's department of government and public administration during the Summer Session sponsored again its regularly scheduled Public Affairs Laboratory. The Laboratory was under the direction of Catheryn Seckler-Hudson, chairman of the department of government and public administration, Charles M. Hersh, associate professor of government and public administration, and Royce Hanson, lecturer in government and public administration.

The District of Columbia Political Science Association (DCPSA) held its fourth meeting of the current year in the Lounge of the Brookings Institution, May 31, 1956. Sidney Hyman, author of The American President, delivered an address on "The Presidency and the Party System."

OTHER ACTIVITIES

The Ford Foundation has given $1,275,000 to Columbia University to further its work in international affairs. The grant will be used for three main purposes: to expand the Columbia staff in various fields of foreign policy; to develop and strengthen the work of the Near and Middle East Institute, and to produce a greater degree of integration in the teaching of law, business, economics and foreign problems.

The Fund for the Advancement of Education has granted $13,950 to Fordham University's department of political philosophy and the social sciences for research and experimentation on the relationship of class size to the effective teaching of politics, economics and sociology.

The Claremont Graduate School has recently established the Story Program in Public Affairs leading to the Master of Arts degree. This program honors the late Russell McCulloch Story, former President of Claremont College and Professor of government. Concentrations are offered in business economics, government administration and international relations. The Story Program is designed to help prepare young men and women for responsible positions in business and government, at home and abroad.

A new program in natural resources administration is being offered on the graduate level by the Institute of Public Administration and the School of Natural Resources at the University of Michigan. The program combines the fields of public administration and conservation and leads to the degree of Master of Science in the Horace H. Rackham School of Graduate Studies.

The Social Science Research Council has recently announced three new programs of grants for research in fields of special interest to political scientists, as well as to other social scientists. The Committee on Comparative Politics will administer a program of grants for field studies of political groups in areas outside the United States. The Committee on National Security Policy Research will administer a program of grants for research on problems of national defense in the period 1939-1955; this program complements that for research on the history of American military policy, which will again be offered in 1956-57. The Committee on Political Behavior will administer a program of grants to individuals for research on American governmental processes; the program of grants for research on state politics in the United States will again be administered by this Committee in 1956-57. Awards are made under these programs on a competitive basis to individuals possessing the Ph.D. or its equivalent. Application forms and information about these programs may be obtained by writing to the Social Science Research Council, 726 Jackson Place N. W., Washington 6, D. C.

The Institute of Public Administration of the University of Michigan completed on June 15, 1956 a four year pioneering project to establish an Institute of Public Administration at the University of the Philippines in Manila. The project was financed with U. S. government and Philippine counterpart funds under the Point IV program. Originally the project was staffed entirely by Americans, with John W. Lederle as director and chief advisor. During the course of the project, a number of Filipinos were trained in the United States, and Filipinos have gradually assumed full responsibility for the new organization.

A program of Fulbright Predoctoral Fellowships providing internships at the International Institute of Administrative Sciences, Brussels and the International Union of Local Authorities, The Hague is available for the year 1957-58. Application forms and further information can be obtained from the Institute of International Education at 1 East 67 St., New York 21, New York.

A new publication, the Journal of Administrative Affairs appeared this year under the sponsorship of the Institute of Administrative Affairs, University of Tehran. Published in Persian, several hundred copies are mimeographed in English. Inquiries should be directed to the Institute for Administrative Affairs, USOM/Iran, APO 205, New York, New York.

The Brookings Institution has announced the appointment of six Research Fellows, three in economics and three in government for the academic year 1956-57. Those in government are Frank B. Cliffe, Jr., Staff Assistant, Public Administration Clearing House; Lester W. Milbrath, instructor in political science, University of North Carolina; and Merton L. Reichler, instructor in government, Columbia University. Laurin L. Henry, formerly of the Washington office of the Public Administration Clearing House, has been appointed a research associate, and Stanley Kelley, Jr., one of the 1955-56 research fellows, has been appointed to the staff for the year 1956-57. Roy B. Eastin, executive officer and formerly superintendent of documents of the Government Printing Office has contracted to prepare a third edition of Schmeckebier's Government Publications and Their Use, first published in 1936.

Charles Adrian has resumed his teaching duties at Michigan State University this fall after acting as administrative assistant to Governor G. Mennen Williams from January to September 1956.

Charles S. Ascher, of Brooklyn College, attended congresses of the non-governmental organizations which he represents at the United Nations: the International Federation for Housing and Town Planning in Vienna in July, and the International Institute of Administrative Sciences in Madrid in September. He also attended the first Congress of the International Association of Legal Science in Barcelona.

William B. Ballis, of the University of Washington, was visiting professor at the University of Michigan in the 1956 summer session.

Willard F. Barber is now counsellor of Embassy in Warsaw, Poland.

Erwin W. Bard, of Brooklyn College, will spend a sabbatical year in Europe in 1956-57, based largely at the College of Europe in Bruges.

Loren P. Beth, of the University of Florida, taught at the summer session at Boston University.

Hugh A. Bone, of the University of Washington, directed the national workshop of the Citizenship Clearing House at Bedford, Pennsylvania in September.

Bernard Brown, of Michigan State University, has been awarded a post-doctoral Fulbright Research Scholarship for 1956-57 to Study in France.

Ben G. Burnett, of Whittier College, has received a Haynes Foundation grant for research in Latin America.

John C. Bollens, University of California (Los Angeles), is executive officer and research director of the Metropolitan St. Louis Survey, for 1956-57.

Herbert W. Briggs, of Cornell University, was elected Associe de l'Institut de Droit International at its meeting in Granada, Spain in April.

Henry L. Bretton, of the University of Michigan, spent the summer in the Gold Coast under a Rackham grant. He will spend the academic year, 1956-57, in Austria at the University of Innsbruck under a Fulbright Fellowship.

Philip W. Buck resumes his teaching duties at Stanford after a year's leave in England.

Robert K. Carr, of Dartmouth College has been elected to membership in the American Academies of Arts and Sciences.

William S. Carpenter, of Princeton University, is consultant to the Law Revision and Legislative Services Commission in New Jersey and has served as acting director of its Division of Legislative Services and Research.

James C. Charlesworth has had his leave of absence from the University of Pennsylvania extended in order to permit him to continue as Secretary of Administration in the cabinet of Governor George M. Leader.

Edward K. T. Chen, of the University of Houston, is on a year's leave of absence engaged in research in Washington.

James Coleman, University of California at Los Angeles, is spending the year 1956-57 on leave in Africa.

Cornelius P. Cotter has been elected president of the Bay Area chapter of the American Society for Public Administration.

Hoyt Crider is returning to the United States this summer after a two year hitch with the Tehran group of the University of Southern California. He will serve as lecturer in the Civic Center division of the University and will be employed with the Office of the Administrative Officer of Los Angeles County.

Royden Dangerfield, of the University of Illinois, was a visiting lecturer at the summer school of Utah State Agricultural College.

Robert B. Dishman, of the University of New Hampshire, has been appointed by Governor Dwinell to serve a three-year appointment on the Legislative Council.

John Dorsey has returned to Michigan State University after a year with the University Technical Assistance Mission to the Vietnamese government.

Alex N. Dragnich, of Vanderbilt University, lectured at the Army War College February 5-10, 1956, on the future of United States policy toward Yugoslavia, and served as consultant to the Study Group on South-eastern Europe.

David Easton of the University of Chicago, will deliver a paper entitled "An Approach to the Analysis of Political Systems" at the International Political Science Association Conference in Geneva, Switzerland.

William Ebenstein, of Princeton University, was a visiting lecturer at the University of Wisconsin during the summer of 1956.

John H. Ferguson, of The Pennsylvania State University, has been granted a second year's leave of absence to continue his work as Director of Program Evaluation in the Office of Administration of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

LeRoy Ferguson, of Michigan State University, is the recipient of a grant from the Social Science Research Council for 1956-57.

Houston I. Fournoy, who recently received his Ph.D. degree from Princeton, is now serving as legislative assistant to United States Senator H. Alexander Smith.

Russell H. Fifield, of the University of Michigan, spent the summer in Southeast Asia under a Horace H. Rackham grant.

Russell Fitzgibbon, University of California at Los Angeles, has been elected president of the Western Political Science Association, 1956-57.

Harry J. Friedman, of the University of Pittsburgh, will spend next year doing research in India and Pakistan.

William J. Gore served as a project director for one of the seven research teams working for the Federal Civil Defense Agency during the summer of 1956.

George A. Graham, of Princeton University, will be on a leave of absence during the academic year 1956-57 to serve as director of the public affairs program for the Ford Foundation.

J. A. C. Grant, of the University of California at Los Angeles, has accepted an invitation of the Republic of Vietnam to spend the summer in Saigon as advisor on constitutional law and judicial and legal reform. He recently returned from a year's leave in Spain and will resume his duties at Los Angeles in mid-September.

Elmer D. Graper, former head of the department of political science of the University of Pittsburgh, has been appointed chairman of the Civil Service Commission of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Andrew Gyorgy, of Boston University, delivered the last of the 1956 Marshall Woods lectures at Brown University.

John H. Hallowell will return to Duke University in September, 1956 after a year's sabbatical leave in Germany.

Ferrel Heady, of the University of Michigan, attended the International Congress of Administrative Sciences in Madrid September 2-8, 1956.

Dell G. Hitchner, University of Washington, has received a U. S. Specialists grant from the State Department.

Edward W. Hughes, lecturer in politics at Kings College, New Castle, England, will spend 1956-57 as visiting lecturer at the University of Michigan under a Fulbright grant.

Harry V. Jaffa will be on leave of absence from Ohio State University for the year 1956-57, doing research under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

Thomas Jenkins of the University of California at Los Angeles, will be on leave for the academic year 1956-57.

Raymond A. Jolly returns from a two and a half year appointment with the Tehran unit of the University of Southern California. He will continue as a lecturer with the School of Public Administration.

John H. Kautsky, of Washington University, taught at the summer session of the University of Rochester.

William J. Keefe, of Chatham College, has been appointed to the Pennsylvania Commission on Governmental Reorganization which will report to the 1957 session of the legislature.

Richard J. Kozicki, research fellow at the University of Pennsylvania, has received a Ford Foundation fellowship for 1956-57.

Robert S. Lancaster is returning to the University of the South after a year spent as Fulbright exchange professor at the University of Baghdad.

George A. Lanyi returns to Oberlin College in September after spending a year in London on a Ford Faculty Fellowship.

Donald R. Larson, of the University of Miami, is on leave of absence working with the Public Administration Service on various projects throughout the United States and Alaska.

Walter H. C. Laves, of Indiana University, attended a UNESCO Conference on Evaluation of Technical Assistance projects at McGill University, May 29-June 1, 1956. He has been appointed a member of a Special Joint Committee of the American Council on Education Commission on Education and International Affairs and the Committee on Institutional Projects Abroad.

Leo Lott, of Ohio State University, was a visiting lecturer in the summer session at the University of Wisconsin.

Harry A. Marlow, formerly Director, the Civic Center Division, School of Public Administration, University of Southern California, and for the past two years Chief of Party of the faculty at the Institute for Administrative Affairs, University of Tehran, is on home leave this summer prior to his return to Tehran for another two year hitch as Chief of Party.

Hubert Marshall, of Stanford University, is serving as associate director of the Stanford Committee on Undergraduate Education.

Albert B. Martin of The Pennsylvania State University has been engaged as a consultant to the Reorganization Commission of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Charles E. Martin, of the University of Washington, has been appointed director of the World Affairs Symposium to be held at Riverside, California in December.

M. Nelson McGeary, of The Pennsylvania State University, served during the summer as research consultant to the Commission on Government Reorganization of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Peter Odegard will be on leave from the University of California for the 1956-57 academic year.

Daniel M. Ogden, Jr., of the State College of Washington, will be on sabbatical leave in 1956-57 and will spend the year in Washington, D. C.

Felix Oppenheim, of the University of Delaware, has been awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship for the academic year 1956-57.

Vincent Ostrom will return to the University of Oregon after occupying a fellowship at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences. He will serve as director of research for the Northwest Cooperative Project in Educational Administration financed by the Kellogg Foundation.

James K. Pollock, president of the International Political Science Association, presided over a meeting of the executive committee of that organization and a round table following immediately afterward. Edward H. Litchfield, the American member of the executive committee and Evron Kirkpatrick, executive director of the American Political Science Association were in attendance. The sessions were held in Montreux, Switzerland, September 10-14.

Rollin B. Posey, of Northwestern University, will be on leave for the year 1956-57.

Constantine Rackauskas will be on leave from Fordham University during the Fall semester of 1956.

Martin R. Ream, of the University of Southern California, is returning to the faculty of the Institute of Administrative Affairs of the University of Tehran.

Emmette S. Redford, of the University of Texas, has been granted a leave of absence for the fall semester 1956-57.

Neal Riemer, of The Pennsylvania State University, taught at the summer School at Cornell University.

Benjamin Rivlin, of Brooklyn College, has been granted a Fulbright fellowship for research in North Africa.

Victor Rosenblum is on semi-sabbatical leave of absence from the University of California for the fall semester.

Ernest E. Rossi, of the University of Pittsburgh, has been granted an Italian Ministry Foreign Affairs fellowship at the Bologna Center of the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University.

Richard F. Schier, of Franklin and Marshall College, was retained for the past summer by the Bureau of Municipal Affairs, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Robert Scott, of the University of Illinois, has returned from a year's sabbatical leave, most of which was spent in Spain.

H. P. Secher, of Western Reserve University, has been awarded a Fulbright Grant for 1956-57 as an Advanced Research Scholar.

Lester G. Seligman, of the University of Oregon, has been awarded a two year grant-in-aid by the Social Science Research Council. He will be on leave during 1956-57.

Chandler Shaw, of Bethany College, taught at the summer school of West Virginia University.

William Shepherd, of Beloit College, has resigned to enter the field of radio communications.

Foster Sherwood, of the University of California at Los Angeles, is on sabbatical leave for the academic year 1956-57 to engage in research under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

H. Gordon Skilling, of Dartmouth College, taught at the summer session of the University of Vermont.

Rhoten A. Smith has returned to the University of Kansas after completing a year's leave of absence to serve as Associate Director of the National Citizenship Clearing House, Law Center, New York University.

Richard Snyder, of Northwestern University, will be on leave during 1956-57.

George Stambuk, of Indiana University, has received a John Hay Whitney Foundation fellowship grant.

Richard W. Sterling, of Dartmouth, has been awarded a Rockefeller Foundation grant for the year 1956-57.

Paul D. Stewart, of Marshall College, has been serving as research director of the All Huntington Association for a City Manager Form of Government and was elected to the Charter Board in the May primary.

Ivan M. Stone, of Beloit College, was recently elected vice president of the North Central Association of Academic Deans.

William Bruce Storm, of the University of Southern California, will be with the Tehran group during 1956-57.

Thor Swanson, of the State College of Washington taught at the Syracuse University summer session. He will be on leave during 1956-57, having been awarded the Staff Fellowship of the National Municipal League.

Eduard Taborsky, of the University of Texas, has returned after holding a visiting professorship at the University of Tennessee.

Hans B. Thorelli has been awarded the annual prize of the Fahlbeck Foundation. He recently resigned as Director of the Industrial Council for Social and Economic Studies, Stockholm, Sweden to become an associate of the new Marketing Research Service of the General Electric Company, New York City.

Wayne Untereiner, of the University of Southern California, will be with the Tehran group during 1956-57.

Arthur H. Vandenberg, Jr. of the University of Miami, is spending the summer touring the Middle East and Europe.

John Vanderzell has resumed his duties at Franklin and Marshall College after a one year leave of absence to serve as director of research, Bureau of Municipal Affairs, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

William Verhage, of Boston University, has returned from a Fulbright lectureship at the International Christian University, Tokyo, Japan.

S. Sidney Ulmer has been teaching at the summer session of the University of Houston.

Harvey Walker, of Ohio State University, has started a one year assignment as a member of a technical assistance team for the United Nations, teaching public administration in a United Nations specialized school in San Jose, Costa Rica.

Robert E. Ward, of the University of Michigan, is spending his sabbatical year, 1956-57, in Japan under the auspices of a Fulbright grant and a Rackham Fund grant.

James T. Watkins IV, of Stanford, served during the past year as chairman of the regional committee of the National Woodrow Wilson Fellowship Program.

Edward Weidner, of Michigan State University, was Public Administration Specialist of a Michigan State University Ford Foundation mission to the government of Pakistan during most of June and July. He also spent several weeks in Saigon in his capacity as coordinator of the Michigan State University Technical Assistance Mission to the government of Vietnam.

Egbert S. Wengert, of the University of Oregon, will spend the major portion of his sabbatical leave during 1956-57 as visiting professor of public administration in the Institute of Public Administration in Manila.

Allen Whiting, of Michigan State University, served as a consultant to the Rand Corporation during the past summer.

York Willbern, of the University of Alabama, taught at the first summer session of Duke University.

Philip Williams, of Jesus College, Oxford, was a visiting lecturer at the University of Wisconsin summer session.

Arthur M. Wilson, of Dartmouth, has been awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship.

The Woodrow Wilson Centennial Commission is anxious to receive information about all 1956 Wilson literature and all Centennial activities and programs. Information about and copies of all addresses, papers and sermons would be appreciated. Readers are asked to send in notices about all programs and activities, lecture series, discussion forums, library and school exhibits, TV or radio programs, musical or dramatic presentations, and to include the date, place, sponsoring group and participants. Communications should be sent to The Woodrow Wilson Centennial Commission, Interior Building, Washington 25, D.C.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

Gilbert Abecarian, of Sacramento State College, has been appointed visiting assistant professor of political science at the University of Tulsa.

Emile B. Ader is on leave of absence from the University of Tulsa to work with the United States Information Agency.

Charles Aiken has been appointed chairman of the political science department at the University of California.

Elton Atwater, associate professor of political science, has been appointed head of the department of political science at The Pennsylvania State University replacing Harold F. Alderfer.

Hans Baerwald, doctoral candidate at the University of California, has become assistant professor of government at Miami University (Ohio).

Chester W. Bain has been appointed assistant director of the bureau of public administration, University of Virginia. He continues as assistant professor of political science.

Sidney Baldwin, of Northwestern University, has accepted a position as assistant professor of political science at San Diego State College.

Joseph W. Ballantine, formerly director of Far Eastern affairs in the Department of State, will serve as visiting professor at the University of Miami during 1956-57.

Donald G. Balmer has returned as assistant professor at Lewis and Clark College following completion of his doctorate at the University of Washington.

Edward C. Banfield has been appointed associate professor of political science at the University of Chicago.

William M. Beaney, Jr. has been promoted to associate professor in the department of politics at Princeton University.

George Belknap of Michigan State University will be a visiting professor at the University of California for the year 1956-57.

Oliver T. Benson of the University of Oklahoma will serve as visiting professor of government at the University of Texas during the fall semester, 1956-57.

G. Robert Blackburn has been appointed visiting assistant professor of political science at Washington University, St. Louis, for 1956-57.

George S. Blair has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania. He is also chief educational associate at the University's Institute of Local and State Government.

George I. Blanksten, associate professor of political science, has become chairman of the department of political science at Northwestern University.

Virgil C. Blum, S.J., formerly of Creighton University, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Marquette University.

Wilmer L. Bohlmann, doctoral candidate at the University of Washington, will be acting instructor at the State College of Washington during 1956-57.

Kenneth P. Borgen has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in the department of government and public administration at The American University.

Cecil C. Brett has been appointed instructor in government at Indiana University.

Louis Brownlow has been appointed visiting professor of political science at Washington University, St. Louis, for the spring semester of 1957.

William Buchanan, formerly of the faculty of Mississippi State College, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Southern California.

Ronald J. Bunn, formerly of Duke University, has been appointed instructor in government at the University of Texas.

John A. Bunzel has been appointed instructor of political science at Michigan State University.

George P. Bush has retired with the rank of professor emeritus of government and public administration at The American University.

Robert O. Byrd has become associate professor and occupies the Hugh S. Magill chair of the history and science of government at Illinois Wesleyan University.

Lynton Keith Caldwell has been appointed visiting professor of government and coordinator of the Thailand Public Administration program at Indiana University.

Byrum E. Carter has been promoted to associate professor in the department of government at Indiana University.

Reo M. Christenson of the editorial staff of the Toledo Blade has joined the department of government at Miami University (Ohio).

Wesley Chumlea, formerly of the University of Texas, has accepted appointment as instructor in government at Texas A. and M. College.

John M. Clarke has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in the department of government and public administration at The American University.

I. L. Claude, Jr., has accepted an associate professorship at the University of Delaware.

James Coke has been promoted to the rank of Assistant professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania.

Vernon F. Cook of Ohio State University has been appointed as instructor in the department of political science at Western Reserve.

Edward F. Cooke, formerly of Knox College, has been appointed assistant professor in the department of political science of the University of Pittsburgh.

Joseph D. Cooper has been promoted to the rank of adjunct professor of government and public administration in the department of government and public administration at The American University.

Robert W. Cox has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in the department of government and public administration at The American University.

Michael Curtis has been appointed an instructor in political science at Yale University.

Martin Diamond has become assistant professor of political science at the University of Chicago.

Robert T. Daland of the University of Alabama has become assistant professor in the department of government and international relations of the University of Connecticut.

Thomas J. Davy has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania.

Howard E. Dean, who returns to the University of Oregon from his sabbatical leave in the fall, has been advanced to an associate professorship.

Herbert S. Dinerstein has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in the department of government and public administration at The American University.

Paul Dolan, chairman of the department of political science at the University of Delaware, has a Fulbright lectureship at the College of Political Science, Wilhelmshaven, Germany, for the academic year 1956-57.

James R. Donoghue, director of the bureau of government at the University of Wisconsin, has been promoted to full professor.

Harold M. Dorr, professor of political science at the University of Michigan, has been named dean of state-wide education.

Cecil H. Driver has been appointed chairman of the department of political science, Yale University.

Eugene P. Dvorin has been appointed instructor at Michigan State University.

Clyde Eagleton, professor of international law at New York University, has retired.

Professor Rowland A. Egger has been appointed the new director of the Woodrow Wilson Department of Foreign Affairs at the University of Virginia. He has served for two years as the Near East representative of the Ford Foundation.

William C. Ellet, formerly of the State University of Iowa, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Virginia.

Garland Fothergill has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Wisconsin State College.

William O. Farber, professor of government at the University of South Dakota, has accepted a one year appointment in the department of political science at Northwestern University.

Herman Finer will be Walker Ames professor at the University of Washington during the winter quarter, 1957.

Ralph S. Fjelstad has been promoted to Congdon professor of government and international relations at Carleton College.

Vernon L. Fluharty has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor in the department of political science at the University of Pittsburgh.

Robert Y. Fluno has been promoted to the rank of professor of political science at Whitman College.

Daryll Forde, of University College, London, has been appointed visiting professor of political science and anthropology for the fall semester at the University of California.

William R. Gable, formerly of the Georgia Institute of Technology has accepted appointment as a research associate at the Institute of Public Administration of the University of Michigan.

William Howard Gammon, Project Coordinator, Accounting Policy Division Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense, has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration of The American University.

John Gange, director of the Woodrow Wilson Department of Foreign Affairs has resigned from the University of Virginia. In June and July he will direct a Research Training Institute in International Relations for the Social Science Research Council at the University of Denver. In August he will go to Germany as a guest of the German government in Bonn and in October he will take up a Fulbright lectureship in American Studies at the University of Heidelberg.

Hubert S. Gibbs has been promoted to associate professor and chairman of the department of government at Boston University. Former chairman Lashley G. Harvey, remains as director of the bureau of public administration.

Gilbert F. Gilchrist resumes his duties as assistant professor of political science and history at the University of the South after a two year Fulbright scholarship at the University of London.

Ralph Goldman has been appointed assistant professor at Michigan State University.

Merrill R. Goodall has been appointed to the position of associate professor of Asian studies and government at the Claremont Graduate School.

Charles H. Goodman has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration as professor of government and public administration at The American University.

William Gore, formerly of the University of Washington, has joined the faculty at the University of Kansas as assistant professor of political science and will direct the expanded M.P.A. program in state administration.

John Grumm has joined the faculty at the University of Kansas as assistant professor of political science.

Andrew Gyorgy will be on leave for the first semester 1956-57 from Boston University to lecture on Russian foreign policy at the Navy Staff College, Newport, R.I.

Andrew Hacker has been promoted to assistant professor of government at Cornell University.

Myron Q. Hale, formerly of Columbia University, has been appointed instructor in government at the University of Texas.

Louis J. Halle of the University of Virginia is on leave during 1956-57 and will be on the faculty of the Institut Universitaire des Hautes Etudes Internationales, Geneva, Switzerland.

Samuel Halperin, who received his Ph.D. at Washington University in 1956, has been appointed instructor in political science at Wayne University.

Paul Y. Hammond will join the staff of the Institute of War and Peace at Columbia in September, 1956 and will serve as lecturer in government in Columbia College.

Frederick H. Harris, who has been visiting professor at the University of the South, is rejoining the department of political science at the University of North Carolina.

Joseph P. Harris of the University of California will spend the fall in England as a Fulbright professor at the London School of Economics.

Louis K. Harris was promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at Kent State University.

Guy B. Hathorn has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of government and politics at the University of Maryland.

Sherman S. Hayden has become professor of international relations at Clark University.

Donald E. Hayhurst of the University of Pittsburgh has been appointed assistant professor in the department of political science at West Virginia University.

Joseph A. Hearst of Barnard College has joined the department of political science at Idaho State College.

John J. Hebal, doctoral candidate at the University of Minnesota, will be acting instructor at the State College of Washington during 1956-57.

Robert S. Hill has been appointed an assistant professor of political science at the University of North Dakota.

Edward H. Hobbs has been promoted to professor of political science at the University of Mississippi.

Robert T. Holt has been appointed to an instructorship in political science at the University of Minnesota.

Robert A. Horn has been promoted to associate professor of political science at Stanford University.

Fred Horrigan of Indiana University has been appointed research associate at the Institute of Public Administration at the University of Thammasat, Bangkok, Thailand.

Robert Horwitz has been appointed assistant professor at Michigan State University.

Thomas Hovet, Jr., formerly visiting assistant professor at Miami University, has been appointed assistant professor in the department of government of New York University.

Howard K. Hyde has been promoted to adjunct professor of government and public administration in the department of government and public administration at The American University.

Walter O. Jacobson has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in the department of government and public administration at The American University.

G. Edward Janosik has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania.

John E. Johns has joined the department of history and political science at Stetson University.

Scott D. Johnston has been promoted to professor of political science and head of a new department of political science at Hamline University. During 1955-56 his duties included serving as coordinator of the Hill Foundation Four College Area Study Program on the Far East.

Ralph G. Jones, associate professor of government at the University of Arkansas, has completed a year at the University of Minnesota as visiting professor of political science. During 1956-57 he will occupy the chair of international law at the Naval War College, Newport, Rhode Island.

Conrad F. Joyner of the University of Florida has been named instructor in the department of political science at West Virginia University.

Claudius Johnson of the State College of Washington will serve as visiting professor at the University of California during the fall semester.

Eldon L. Johnson, former member of the political science faculty and dean of the graduate school of the University of Oregon has been inducted as the 13th president of the University of New Hampshire.

Morton A. Kaplan has been appointed assistant professor at the University of Chicago.

John K. King of the University of Virginia has resigned to accept a government position in Washington.

Henry A. Kissinger, formerly of the Council on Foreign Relations, has become assistant professor of political science at the University of Chicago.

James R. Klonoski, formerly of the University of Michigan, has been appointed to the faculty of St. Olaf's College.

Kenneth Kofmehl will serve as visiting assistant professor of political science at the University of Kansas.

James L. Kunen has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in the department of government and public administration at The American University.

John Larson, formerly instructor in political science at the University of Michigan, has been appointed assistant professor of business administration at Northwestern University.

Richard H. Leach, who served as visiting lecturer in political science at Duke University during 1955-56, has joined the department of political science as assistant professor.

Luke T. Lee, formerly assistant professor of history and government at St. Lawrence University, has been appointed visiting assistant professor of political science at The Pennsylvania State University.

Shao Chuan Leng will be on leave from the University of Virginia during 1956-57 to lecture at Doshisha University, Kyoto, Japan.

J. G. Liebenow has been appointed assistant professor of government at the University of Texas.

Roy C. Macridis has been appointed associate professor of political science at Washington University, St. Louis.

Joseph F. Maloney has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor at Fordham University.

D. Bruce Marshall has been appointed an instructor in political science at Ohio State University.

Eugene A. Mawhinney, recently promoted to associate professor of political science at Elmira College, has been appointed chairman of the division of social science for a three year term.

Jaro Mayda, assistant professor of law at the University of Wisconsin, has become associate professor of comparative law at Louisiana State University.

Richard McCleery has become instructor of political science at Michigan State University.

Charles H. McLaughlin has been promoted to a full professorship at the University of Minnesota and will continue as director of the programs in international relations and area studies.

Daniel S. McHargue of the University of Michigan has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science.

James H. Meisel of the University of Michigan has been promoted to the rank of professor of political science.

Louis Menand III, of Dartmouth College has accepted the position of dean of faculty at Bradford Junior College, Bradford, Massachusetts.

August C. Miller Jr. of Wheaton College has been granted leave to serve as visiting professor of government at the Naval War College for the year 1956-57.

Warren E. Miller, formerly of the University of California has been appointed assistant professor of political science and research associate in the Survey Research Center at the University of Michigan.

Hans J. Morgenthau has been appointed visiting professor of government at Columbia University and visiting lecturer in government at Yale University for the first semester of the academic year 1956-57.

Robert L. Morlan has been promoted to professor of government at the University of Redlands. During 1956-57 he will serve as visiting lecturer in political science at the Municipal University of Amsterdam.

Donald Munding, who received his Ph.D. at Washington University in 1953, has been appointed assistant professor of government and economics at Augustana College.

Lloyd D. Musolf, associate professor of political science at Vassar College, has been elected chairman of the department for a two-year term.

Earl A. Nehring of the University of California (Los Angeles), has been appointed lecturer in government at Indiana University.

Benjamin Nelson has accepted appointment as professor of History and Social Science at Hofstra College.

Arthur A. North, S.J., of Fordham University has been advanced to an associate professorship.

Robert M. Northrop, formerly of the University of Michigan, has accepted an assistant professorship at Allegheny College.

Alfred G. Obern has been made assistant professor of public administration in George Washington University's new department of business and public administration. He will also supervise the governmental intern program.

Edward O'Connor has resigned as instructor in government at the University of Texas to accept appointment to the United States Foreign Service.

Robert Osgood has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Chicago jointly with the Center for the Study of American Foreign Policy.

John R. Owens, formerly of Wesleyan University, has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of Michigan.

Charles A. Phillips has been appointed to the faculty of the department of government and public administration at The American University.

Roy Pierce, formerly of Smith College, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Michigan.

Jack C. Plano has been promoted to associate professor of political science at Western Michigan College. During the 1956 summer session he served as acting departmental chairman.

Charles Press has become an instructor in the department at Michigan State University.

Ralph Purcell, of Sweet Briar College, has been appointed visiting professor in the department of foreign affairs at the University of Virginia for 1956-57.

Michael D. Reagan, of the department of politics at Princeton, has accepted a position as instructor in Williams College.

John S. Reshetar, Jr., has been appointed visiting lecturer in political science, Yale University, for the next academic year.

Channing B. Richardson has been promoted to associate professor of political science at Hamilton College.

Bennett M. Rich has been promoted to a professorship at Rutgers University.

Clarence W. Rife, head of the department of history and political science at Hamline University since 1929, retired in June after 34 years of service.

William Ritchie, formerly of the University of Michigan, has been appointed to an instructorship at the University of Delaware.

James S. Roberts, formerly visiting assistant professor at the University of Minnesota, has accepted an assistant professorship in political science at the University of Nevada.

William Robson, of the London School of Economics and Political Science, will be at the University of California as a visiting professor during the spring, 1957 semester.

John P. Roche, who joins the staff of the department of political science at Brandeis University in September, will serve at Columbia as visiting professor of government for the academic year 1956-57.

Roland Robinson has been appointed as Research Associate and In-Service Training Officer at the Institute of Public Administration at the University of Thammasat, Bangkok, Thailand under the Indiana University department of government's ICA contract.

John H. Romani has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Western Michigan College.

Clinton Rossiter has succeeded Mario Einaudi as chairman of the department of government at Cornell University.

Stanley Rothman, formerly of Harvard University, has been appointed instructor in the department of government at Smith College.

Edward J. Rozek has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Colorado.

Robert A. Rupen has received an appointment as assistant professor of political science at Bryn Mawr College.

Elie Salem, formerly of the department of public administration in the American University of Beirut, will return to the School for Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University as assistant professor.

Bernard Schechterman joins the department of government, University of Miami, in September as instructor of government.

Joseph Schlesinger has been promoted to an assistant professorship at Michigan State University.

Waldo Schumacher will serve as acting head of the political science department at the University of Oregon during 1956-57.

Paul Seabury of the University of California will teach at Hamline University during the Spring, 1957.

Edgar L. Shor of Indiana University has been promoted to assistant professor. He will serve two years as visiting professor and research director at the Institute of Public Administration, University of Thammasat, Bangkok, Thailand.

David G. Smith has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Stanford University.

Edward C. Smith, professor of political science and chairman of the social science group in the University College of Arts and Science, has retired from New York University.

Donald E. Smith, formerly of the University of Pennsylvania, will be an instructor in political science at the University of Rhode Island.

Ralph Smuckler has been promoted to an associate professorship at Michigan State University.

Russell A. Snook has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in the department of government and public administration at The American University.

Herman Somers of Haverford College will be at the University of California as visiting professor for the 1956-57 academic year.

Frank Sorauf has been promoted from instructor to assistant professor of political science at The Pennsylvania State University.

James R. Soukup, formerly of the University of Michigan, has been appointed instructor in government at the University of Texas.

Harold J. Spaeth, formerly of the University of Cincinnati, has accepted a position as instructor at the University of Detroit.

Cummins E. Speakman, Jr. has resigned from the University of Virginia and continues to teach at the American University, Beirut, Lebanon.

Philip S. Spoerry, a doctoral candidate at Harvard, has been appointed an acting instructor at the State College of Washington.

Normal L. Stamps, Rutgers University, has been promoted to associate professor.

W. J. Stankiewicz, formerly of Princeton University, has been serving with the department of economics, the Government of Ontario.

Wesley A. St. John has been promoted to assistant professor of political science at Hamline University.

Herbert J. Storing has been appointed assistant professor at the University of Chicago.

Owen S. Stratton has been elected chairman of the Wellesley College department of political science for the term 1956-59.

Hobart P. Sturm of Idaho State College has resigned to become executive secretary of the Idaho Municipal League.

Ross B. Talbot, assistant professor of political science at the University of North Dakota, has accepted an appointment in the Carnegie internship program at Columbia University for 1956-57.

Howard Taubenfeld, of Golden Gate College in San Francisco, will serve as lecturer in political science at the University of California during the Fall semester.

Nelson E. Taylor, Jr., has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor at Vassar College.

Richard W. Taylor, of Wisconsin State College, Stevens Point, will be visiting assistant professor of political science at Northwestern University for 1956-57.

Harold S. Thames, has accepted a position as assistant professor of political science at East Central State Teachers College.

James F. Tierney has been promoted to assistant professor at Dartmouth College.

James E. Titus, of the University of Texas, has accepted an appointment as instructor of government at Texas Technological College.

Henry J. Tomasek has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at the University of North Dakota.

Maurice K. Townsend, of the Public Administration Clearing House, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Virginia.

Martin B. Travis, Jr. has been promoted to associate professor of political science at Stanford University. During 1956-57 he will be on leave while serving as research fellow at Columbia University.

David B. Truman has been appointed visiting lecturer in political science, Yale University for the fall term 1956-57.

Shirley S. Ullmer has been appointed an instructor at Michigan State University.

Donald W. Urquidi has been appointed instructor at the University of Miami.

Charles W. Van Cleve has been appointed instructor of government at the University of Texas.

Julius van der Kroef has joined the department of political science at the University of Bridgeport.

P. J. Vatikiotis has returned to the department of government at Indiana University as instructor in government.

Robert S. Walker, formerly of the University of California (Los Angeles), has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of Michigan.

Clarence C. Walton has left the University of Scranton to become dean of the School of Business at Duquesne University.

Frederick M. Watkins, professor of political science, Yale University, has been appointed Director of Graduate Studies.

Myron Weiner, formerly of Princeton, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Chicago.

Ruth G. Weintraub has been made director of program of graduate study in the Arts and Sciences at Hunter College.

Norman Wengert has completed his one-year tenure with the Resources for the Future, Inc., and begins his appointment as Professor of Government and politics at the University of Maryland in September.

H. Bradford Westerfield, formerly of Harvard, has been appointed an assistant professor at the University of Chicago.

Alan F. Westin, formerly a teaching fellow at Harvard, has been appointed senior fellow at Yale University Law School for 1956-57.

Sidney Wise has been appointed chairman of the department of government at Franklin and Marshall College for the academic years 1956-58.

Daniel Wit has joined the staff of Indiana University's public administration program in Thailand as a visiting professor of public administration.

Leonard White has become emeritus professor at the University of Chicago.

J. Roffe Wike has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania.

Coleman Woodbury of Yale University has been appointed visiting professor in political science, public health, and city and regional planning at the University of California for the Spring, 1957 semester.

Dell S. Wright, formerly of the University of Michigan, has accepted an instructorship in political science at Wayne University.

Quincy Wright has become emeritus professor at the University of Chicago.

Malcolm M. Wynn rejoins the department of history and political science at Stetson University.

Ira W. Zartman has been appointed an instructor in political science at Yale University.

IN MEMORIAM

Arthur Fordyce Gamber, associate professor of history and political science at Stetson University since 1948, died June 5, 1956.

Born February 10, 1888 in Norwalk, Ohio, he was educated in the Ohio public schools, Oberlin College, Columbia University and the University of Florida. He taught in public schools in Ohio and North Dakota and entered the college field in 1924. Before joining the Stetson Faculty he had taught at North Dakota Agricultural College, teachers colleges in Dickinson, N. D., Moorhead, Minn., and Valley City, N. D., and the University of Florida.

W. Leon Godshall, head of the department of international relations at Lehigh University, died suddenly on June 1, 1956 at the age of 61. He received his B.S. degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1919, the M.A. in 1920 and the Ph.D. in 1923. Professor Godshall served as instructor in political science at the University of Pennsylvania from 1919-23 and as professor of political science at Union College from 1923-1934. He joined the Lehigh faculty in 1939 as a member of the department of history and government. In 1947 he was appointed chairman of the newly established department of international relations.

In addition to rendering distinguished service at Union College and Lehigh University Professor Godshall accepted invitations as visiting professor at many of our foremost institutions here and abroad. His teaching assignments in Chinese universities reflected his enthusiastic interest in Far Eastern international relations. In 1924-25 and again in 1931-32 he held Penfield traveling scholarships for study in Asia. In 1952-53 he served as the first executive secretary for the Fulbright program in Japan.

Professor Godshall's interest in international relations went far beyond the academic halls. He was a very effective and popular lecturer who spoke to audiences throughout the United States. He served on the national board of directors of the Foreign Policy Association and organized its Lehigh Valley Branch. His work in Rotary International contributed significantly to international understanding. He was very active in the Middle Atlantic States Model United Nations and founded the Model Security Council of Pennsylvania colleges and universities. At the time of his death Professor Godshall was national president of both Pi Gamma Mu and the International Platform Association. He had just received a year's appointment to the Chester W. Nimitz chair of political and social science at the Naval War College.

Professor Godshall's students and colleagues will always remember his stimulating lectures, his careful scholarship, his dynamic ability as an administrator and his leadership in university and community affairs. Above all they will cherish the memory of a man of high character who took time from a very busy life to befriend and encourage young people who shared his enthusiasm for international relations.—EUGENE H. MILLER, Visiting Professor, Department of International Relations, Lehigh University.

Friends of the College of Wooster were grieved to learn this year of the death of Mary Z. Johnson, chairman of the department of political science. Miss Johnson served the college for twenty-eight years and her death culminated a two year illness.

Lawrence Preuss, professor of political science at the University of Michigan, died of a heart attack on July 7, 1956. An alumnus of the University of Michigan, Professor Preuss had served as a member of the faculty since 1928. He was widely known as a scholar and teacher of international law, and on numerous occasions had rendered valuable service to the United States government.

He was associate editor of the Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases from 1933 to 1942, and a member of the executive council of the American Society of International Law from 1937 to 1940 and from 1943 to 1946. He had been a member of the board of editors of the American Journal of International Law since 1946.

During World War II he was assistant and associate chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs in the Department of State, and was a deputy U. S. representative to the U. N. War Crimes Commission. Subsequently, he served the American delegation to the San Francisco conference as a technical expert.

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

E. E. SCHATTSCHEIDER
Wesleyan University

President Elect

V. O. KEY
Harvard University

Vice Presidents

CARL BRENT SWISHER
Johns Hopkins University

WILFRED BINKLEY
Ohio Northern University

ALBERT LEPAWSKY
University of California
(Berkeley)

Secretary

GLADYS KAMMERER
University of Kentucky

Treasurer

MAX M. KAMPELMAN
Washington, D. C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK
1726 Massachusetts Ave., N.W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Managing Editor

The American Political Science Review
HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

Associate Director

WILSON GADDIS

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officio

WELDON COOPER
University of Virginia

PAUL T. DAVID
The Brookings Institution

HERBERT EMMERICH
Public Administration Clearing House

CLAUDE E. HAWLEY
United States Information Agency

NORMAN L. HILL
University of Nebraska

THOMAS P. JENKIN
University of California (Los Angeles)

LOUISE OVERACKER
Wellesley College

CHARLES B. ROBSON
University of North Carolina

WILLIAM T. R. FOX
Columbia University

RUTH WEINTRAUB
Hunter College

JOHN D. LEWIS
Oberlin College

THOMAS H. ELIOT
Washington University, St. Louis

YORK WILLBERN
University of Alabama

ALLAN SAUNDERS
University of Hawaii

CHRISTIAN LARSEN
Sacramento State College

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW

ALBERT SHAW

FREDERIC N. JUDSON

JAMES BRYCE

A. LAWRENCE LOWELL

WOODROW WILSON

SIMON E. BALDWIN

ALBERT BUSHNELL HART

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

JOHN BASSETT MOORE

ERNST FREUND

JESSE MACY

MUNROE SMITH

HENRY JONES FORD

PAUL S. REINSCH

LEO S. ROWE

WILLIAM A. DUNNING

HARRY A. GARFIELD

JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM

CHARLES A. BEARD

WILLIAM B. MUNRO

JESSE S. REEVES

JOHN A. FAIRLIE

BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH

EDWARD S. CORWIN

WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY

ISIDOR LOEB

WALTER J. SHEPARD

FRANCIS W. COKER

ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE

THOMAS REED POWELL

CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA

CHARLES GROVE HAINES

ROBERT C. BROOKS

FREDERIC A. OGG

WILLIAM ANDERSON

ROBERT E. CUSHMAN

LEONARD D. WHITE

JOHN M. GAUS

WALTER F. DODD

ARTHUR W. MACMAHON

HENRY R. SPENCER

QUINCY WRIGHT

JAMES K. POLLOCK

PETER H. ODEGARD

LUTHER H. GULICK

PENDLETON HERRING

RALPH J. BUNCHE

CHARLES MCKINLEY

HAROLD D. LASSWELL

The American Political Science Review

---

VOL. L

DECEMBER, 1956

NO. 4

---

THE POLITICAL SCIENCE OF SCIENCE:

AN INQUIRY INTO THE POSSIBLE RECONCILIATION OF MASTERY AND FREEDOM*

HAROLD D. LASSWELL

Yale University

My intention is to consider political science as a discipline and as a profession in relation to the impact of the physical and biological sciences and of engineering upon the life of man. I propose to inquire into the possible reconciliation of man's mastery over Nature with freedom, the overriding goal of policy in our body politic.

In the interest of concreteness I shall have something to say about past and potential applications of science in three areas: armament, production, and evolution.

I. POLITICAL SCIENCE AND ARMAMENT

It is trite to acknowledge that for years we have lived in the afterglow of a mushroom cloud and in the midst of an arms race of unprecedented gravity. Here I shall support a proposition that may at first evoke some incredulous exclamations. The proposition is that our intellectual tools have been sufficiently sharp to enable political scientists to make a largely correct appraisal of the consequences of unconventional weapons for world politics.

We have correctly understood the strength of the factors that perpetuate a feeble international order even in the face of recent technoscientific developments. The traditional tools at our disposal for the analysis of politics prepare us to regard a voluntary relinquishment of power as much less likely than efforts to perpetuate power. In a divided world it is not surprising to find that more elites expect to be in a better position by continuing the current system than by taking the risks involved in consenting to a new structure of power. But we have not dismissed, as altogether hopeless the prospects of a more perfect union, achieved by measures short of general war. On the occasions when power is relinquished those who make the seeming sacrifice actually expect to be better off eventually in terms of power (and other values) than if they fail to pay the price.

* Presidential address delivered at the annual meeting of the Association in Washington, D. C., September 6, 1956.

For at times voluntary confederation, federation or integration does take place. Steps toward unity occur when elites perceive an external threat or obstacle to the preservation or fuller realization of commonly interpreted values. It occurs when elites perceive a common internal threat or obstacle. When atomic weapons appeared on the scene it required no great acumen to see that they were introduced under circumstances in which factors of division were heavily loaded against factors favoring a new structure of unity. Nuclear weapons were introduced unilaterally by one member of a wartime coalition. It is noteworthy that the innovating member did not feel sufficiently bound to allied and associated powers to share the new weapons with the coalition. When the enemy was defeated incentives to share were reduced. They were further reduced by the estrangement that promptly set in to separate the partners in a coalition that had been unable to achieve a high level of trust and cooperation even under the provocation of war.

It was easy to recognize that the active political elite of the largest potential rival of the United States had more inducements to procrastinate than to make the immediate sacrifices that would have been necessary for a global system of security. Moscow leaders were not faced by an ultimatum, but by an inspection proposal that in the beginning would undoubtedly have laid bare the full depth of Soviet weakness and disunity. The immediate burden of sacrifice would have fallen upon one side; what was missing was a means of equalizing the cost throughout the whole course of the proposed arrangement. Moscow had no grounds for believing that the decision makers of the outside world viewed them or their ideology or their technique with such benevolence that any visible vulnerability would remain unexploited. Certainly the annihilation of mankind seemed remote and hypothetical when compared with the deprivations likely to follow at once the formation of a new international structure.

It was no necessary part of the analysis to assume that leading Soviet figures loved war (after the manner of Ghenghis Khan and other nomadic "shepherds of men"). We understood that it would be political suicide for individual leaders on either side to propose full unilateral disarmament by their own government, or even to champion a ceiling or a method of arms reduction that would be regarded by colleagues or constituencies as unfavorable to continuing independence.

Nor was it part of the analysis to assume that individuals are fully conscious of the values that influence their judgment and that the thrust of unconscious factors is toward voluntary union. So far at least as the upper levels of an active elite are concerned it is implausible to suggest that continuing uncertainty will generate unconscious factors making for trust in the benevolence and good faith of alien leaders. The evidence seems to support the contrary view that protracted insecurity renders it easy to perceive the "Other" as malevolent and devious. Hence the tendency is toward the perpetuation of seeming autonomy rather than in the direction of constructing a more inclusive system of public order.

We knew that the decision process of a body politic is to be understood as a complex and relatively stable network of communication and collaboration. A system acts to sustain rather than to revolutionize its own structure. This harmonizes with the fact that more acts must be repetitive than innovative if a system is stable. More specifically, structural stability is favored by the entrapment of each individual in a limited segment of the whole. The official or unofficial role of a participant determines what is available to his focus of attention, and with whom he may communicate or collaborate. The perspectives of a participant are the result of previous experience in the position, and in the sequence of positions through which he has passed. The playing of any role modifies predispositions by rewarding an act with value indulgences or by imposing value deprivations. As a strategy of maintaining and improving their net value position, individuals continually make and unmake coalitions of an explicit or tacit character. Enough information has long been available to show a qualified observer that the private coalitions upon which members of the Soviet or U. S. elite depend for personal advancement are coalitions whose effect is to sustain rather than to supersede a divided world. Obviously the coalitions entered into by top officers in the Red Army, Navy and Air Forces are not made with Americans; and vice versa. Nor do the corresponding coalitions of top diplomats, civil officials, or party officials cut across the intervening zone.

There are, political scientists know, typical situations in which active elite elements have expected to benefit by means of a more perfect union. Ruling families have intermarried. Today this institutional presupposition is missing; the top men of the USSR or the USA are not dynastic heads. It is a frail reed indeed to rely upon the hope that a Moscow-Hollywood fusion of infatuated youngsters or calculating oldsters will banish the perils of nuclear fission or fusion. Some historic unifications have been the outcome of duels between appointed champions in the manner of David and Goliath. This institutional predisposition is also missing. No one seriously expects to stake the issue of unity upon two doughty pilots armed with jets, or two teams of missile men lobbing away at one another in the South Seas. We also take note of the fact that thus far we have been unable to rely upon the appearance of an external group capable of being perceived as a common threat. The U.F.O., the unidentified flying objects, have not as yet been shown to be intelligence eyes of another planet against whom we may conceivably combine.

I have been indicating how the tools of the profession provided us with categories, propositions and cases adequate to the task of assessing the probable result of the appearance of unconventional weapons. These tools were, in fact, so used. I do not assert that all members of the profession refrained from adding to the lamentations that arose as this or that circle of humanity awoke to the poignancy of the fact that the planet is moving toward apparent doom. Limited catharsis has often been obtained by railing at the stupidity or malevolence of world elites for failing to bring the current nightmare to a peaceful end. Some among us found a measure of private satisfaction in the discovery of fresh evidence of the depravity of man and turned for consolation to the trans-empirical doctrines provided by one or another of the theological and metaphysical traditions of mankind. We need not deprecate these personal solutions so long as it is clear that they are not the distinctive roles for which our profession has sought to equip its members.

To assert that political scientists had tools that enabled us to assess a major development correctly is not to say that we are complacent about our part in the story of nuclear weapons. There is always a gap between fundamental theory and the data required to see how theoretical models explain or fail to explain specific configurations. As private scholars political scientists did not always have access to official information; and even when playing an official role a political scientist was not always shown every significant report in the possession of the government. Such limitations go beyond our responsibility as a profession. We must however assume responsibility for any limitation of theory or procedure that prevented us from making full use of every opportunity open to us.

I have been implying that it is possible to interpret our traditional body of theory as giving full recognition to the contextual character of politics. The classical literature made plain that specialized institutions of community-wide action are part of, and interact with, all institutions of the community, all personalities, all institutional and personal patterns in the surrounding world, and with the physical and biological environment. Modern logical technique has made it more apparent than it was formerly that the intellectual task before us is not the discovery of a small number of new fundamental categories with which to designate the context of interaction. Rather, it is apparent that all comprehensive systems are formally equivalent (hence interchangeable) at corresponding levels of abstraction (and regardless of possible differences in the number of key terms employed at each level). The inference is that within a rich intellectual tradition the most significant task is to construct a continuing institutional activity by which central theory is related continuously to events as they unfold. The fundamental categories are retained as constant features of a frame of reference elaborated and employed to delineate the contours of observational fields. The relevant context is the world political process as a whole.

The limited degree of success achieved by the profession in perfecting or in encouraging the body politic to perfect such an institutional process had adverse consequences for our role in regard to nuclear weapons. Long before atomic weapons were introduced we were well aware of the importance of scientific knowledge for the technology of fighting. But we did not correctly anticipate the approximate timing of the impact of nuclear physics upon military technology. Although we were equipped to assess the political consequences of sudden and stupendous increases of fighting effectiveness we did not foresee that such an emergent was imminent. Since technical developments were not explicitly anticipated we did not clarify in advance the main policy alternatives open to decision makers in this country or elsewhere. We did not create a literature or a body of oral analysis that seriously anticipated these issues. As political scientists we should have anticipated fully both the bomb and the significant problems of policy that came with it.

I do not want to create the impression that all would have been well if we had been better political scientists, and that we must bear upon our puny shoulders the burden of culpability for the situation of the world today. We are not so grandiose as to magnify our role or our responsibility beyond all proportion. Yet I cannot refrain from acknowledging, as I look back, that we left the minds of our decision makers flagrantly unprepared to meet the crisis precipitated by the bomb. I have no desire to hold a kangaroo court on President Truman's momentous decision or upon his principal advisers; or to give credence to the insinuation that "results" had become necessary in the face of Congressional restiveness about the cost of research and development. In the light of hindsight (that should have been foresight) I want to underline the probability that the new weapon was introduced in a manner that contributed unnecessarily to world insecurity. Perhaps the critics are right who say that the bomb should have been demonstrated on an uninhabited island before the live drops were made on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. More important is the question of how formal and effective control might have been extended beyond the decision makers of a single power. At least some members of the winning coalition might wisely have been brought into a system that operated through a common agency of inspection and direction.

Plainly there were not enough political scientists trained in physics, or sufficiently aware of the implication of impending scientific developments, to do much forward thinking and planning. This points to a failure of professional recruitment and training, and calls in question the then-prevailing conception of the political scientist's role. As a profession we are concerned with aggregate processes. It is not our job to supply the working politician with what he knows already, namely a bag of electoral and other manipulative tricks. Our distinctive perspective is not that of a trickster although we must be familiar with the trickster's outlook and his repertory if we are to assess the causes and consequences of his way of doing business for the decision process as a whole in any context. Nor is our role limited to reiterating and celebrating the ideal aspirations of the body politic, and exhibiting how value goals can be derived from fundamental postulates and principles. It is not exhausted by reporting historical sequences to be found in the rise, diffusion and restriction of myth and technique; or even by the formalization and verification of descriptive models of a scientific character. Part of our role, as the venerable metaphor has it, is scanning the horizon of the unfolding future with a view to defining in advance the probable import of what is foreseeable for the navigators of the Ship of State. It is our responsibility to flagellate our minds toward creativity, toward bringing into the stream of emerging events conceptions of future strategy that, if adopted, will increase the probability that ideal aspirations will be more approximately realized.

An implication for our future relation to science and armament is that we need to develop more political scientists who have the competence to infer the weapon implications of science and technology. It then becomes possible to anticipate the implications for collective policy.

Even a moderate degree of cross-disciplinary training or continuing contact should have enabled us to prepare for the advent of nuclear fission (and fusion). The Review of Modern Physics carried an article by Louis Turner of Princeton University in January 1940 in which 133 papers were appraised. They began with Fermi's original report of 1934 and came down to the Hahn-Strassman-Meitner researches which made explicit the import of Fermi's original experiment. In passing it may be noted that the contributions of a dozen nations were catalogued in Turner's review. Not more than half a dozen of the 133 papers were by American authors. Perhaps American political scientists may be partially absolved for lack of foresight under these circumstances. But the over-all record of the profession is not thereby improved, since I do not find that colleagues in other countries were any more in touch than we were. Incidentally, it is worth recording that a standard college textbook in physics included a chapter in which the implications of current research were clearly spelled out. Ernest Pollard of Yale University referred in 1940 to the possibility of nuclear reactors that might generate electrical power or detonate as immensely destructive bombs; or that might produce radioactive substances for research and industrial processes or for a new and frightful kind of chemical warfare. I note further that at the time of the Fermi-Dunning experiment at the Columbia University cyclotron in early 1939 some science writers (especially of the New York Times) were quite definite about what was at stake.

Today in assessing the years ahead we need solid bases of inference about the degree to which the cost of producing unconventional weapons can be cut. Is it probable that the elites of intermediate powers will soon have at their disposal instruments capable of doing enough damage to outside powers to exert a strong deterrent effect? If so, the destiny of intermediate powers will be less grim than it has appeared to be in the recent past. If the drift toward bipolarity is reduced, there will be less hypocrisy or desperation among the elites of intermediate powers in clanging the cymbals of national loyalty in public while they readjust private family, business and political affairs in the light of the contingency that one or the other pole will dominate the globe.

It is important to estimate the likelihood that the instruments of defense can regain ground they have lost in recent times. In what period of time (if at all) is it probable that manned or unmanned flying objects can be harmlessly destroyed before they are on target? Is there any prospect that new knowledge may be used in a few years to seal off great areas of the globe behind impenetrable "energy" shells? This would open the not altogether uninviting possibility that disagreeable sectors of the globe may be sealed over and left to their own devices much as small boys put dishpans over snake pits or gopher holes.

In many ways the most disturbing result of the laggard position of political scientists in comprehending science and technology is that we have displayed no intellectual initiative in furnishing guidance to those who are in command of modern knowledge and its instrumentalities. Alert businessmen have long been on the lookout for promising applications in the marketplace. The professional military man is now accustomed to take the initiative. The question for us as political scientists is whether we have given enough serious attention to the task of reducing the human cost of whatever violence we cannot dispense with.

As an exercise in this line of thought I invite you to use your imagination to ask what an instrument of coercion would look like that incapacitates without killing, mutilating or in any way imposing permanent incapacity. You and I will probably come up with the same answer: a gas or a drug or a beam that when applied will induce sleep or a similar state of suspension. We spent several billion dollars on A and H bombs; and it is commonly said, with some plausibility, that scientists and engineers give you what you pay for. Our suggestion (and I repeat an old proposal) is that we go down the alphabet to the P bomb, the "paralysis bomb." The technical difficulties in the way of paralyzing a city or a region are very great, given current means of delivering a concentrated gas. Possibly the instrument can be a "P beam," a paralyzing beam of sound or of some other kind capable of accomplishing the purpose.

Without being in the least committed to the specific devices referred to, I nevertheless assert that in the future we need not remain as passive as we have been in approaching the problem of harmonizing considerations of humanity with the use of whatever coercion cannot be avoided.

So far as ultra-weapons are concerned it is apparent that the polar powers have reached an impasse. If they keep on they will have the capability of destroying one another several times over. Once would seem to be enough. (Diverting resources to blasting a grave assumes that it is not a common one.) The polar powers have a common affirmative interest in preventing the rise of an outlying gangster or maniac who might take advantage of the declining cost of nuclear weapons to hold up or gravely damage them both. It may be that workable policy proposals will emerge from concentrated study. For instance, in return for universal inspection of new installations the polar powers might be willing to contribute facilities and scientists to UN laboratories situated at intermediate points and devoted to research and development of new and fundamental scientific ideas. By providing for the possible exploitation of the results under collective auspices it may be possible to expedite the development of the UN into a genuine "third factor" that concurrently expresses an inclusive interest. Senator Anderson of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy has already declared in favor of any policy that holds promise of joint activities that "obsolesce" old weapons around which vested and sentimental interests are crystallized.)

Since we are aware of the unforeseeable timing of the many factors that may affect a resort to arms it is evident that rational policies on behalf of peaceful cooperation do not rely upon a single avenue of approach. Wise strategy appeals to as many potential pockets of motivation as possible by making continual use of tactical ingenuity in applying every instrument of policy (diplomatic, military, economic, ideological).

It is generally believed that peaceful cooperation can be most readily encouraged in the field of economic growth. And there are grounds for predicting that developments that impend in the technology of production will rival the leaps that have recently occurred in weapon technology. This brings me to the consideration of our relationship as political scientists to these potentialities. Although the devices that contribute to production may also be employed for destructive purposes, my present concern is with the affirmative uses of science.

II. POLITICAL SCIENCE AND PRODUCTION

Impending is control of weather and climate. As our knowledge of the upper atmosphere increases it will be obvious that the seeding of local cloud formations is a relatively trivial precursor of hemispheric global control. Impending is the solution of the problem of obtaining pure water at low cost from the sea for irrigation purposes. Taken in conjunction with newly available energy sources it is not too early to anticipate the reclamation of the wastelands of the earth—the deserts, the polar ice caps, the tropical rain forests, the mountains (levelled to productive plateaus). As J. G. Harrar has told us, the total solar energy that reaches the earth every 48 hours is approximately equal to all the known reserves of coal, petroleum and wood. Clearly the conversion of relatively minute amounts to usable form would meet the energy needs of future generations. Already enough progress has been made to indicate that in the immediate future many local power needs can be supplied more economically by solar energy than by nuclear installations.

As political scientists we are conscious of the implications if great resource changes are introduced into a divided world. Imagine that the arid areas inside the Soviet zone are populated with the density of the fertile districts. Suppose further that the non-Soviet world does away with the arid lands of the United States, Mexico and South America, the Sahara, and the Middle East. If these regions become as populous as the more habitable parts of the countries where they are located the population of the non-Soviet world will be increased relatively more than the Soviet area.

Think next of the tropical forests. If the tropical rain forests of Central and Northern South America, of Mid-Africa, of India and of South-eastern Asia are made fit for human life to the same degree as the more temperate regions near them the relative population of the non-Soviet world will appreciably increase.

If mountainous areas are transformed into plateaus, and the plateaus are populated to the density of neighboring areas, the population of the non-Soviet world will also sustain a relative rise.

We know that the political consequences of changes in population and energy production depend upon the impact of these developments upon the "threat value" or the "asset value" of the members of the world community to one another. We expect that the flow of capital and know-how required to modernize production tends to conform the facts of economic growth to the configurations that predominate in the arena of world politics. One alternative of policy is to mitigate or modify this tendency to pour the concrete of capital investment into the mould of a current power alignment. To what extent can this result be achieved by instituting multilateral control of great programs of reclamation in selected districts? Can the Sahara, for instance, be jointly developed? Since the ruling circles of a split world pursue different objectives in terms of social structure and ideology it is only feasible to think of even restricted programs of multilateral cooperation within the frame of an agreement in which are prescribed the permissible proportions between governmentalized and non-governmentalized operation to be preserved at successive stages of the project. Further, it will be essential to determine whether the program is intended to consolidate an existing national unity or to lay the foundation for a new nation (one drawn, for example, from widely varying ethnic sources; or from a single principal source of people and culture).

The factor of geographical dispersion has an important bearing upon our expectations. The sources of solar and atomic energy are more capable of being widely distributed than the sources exploited by a technology of fossil fuels like petroleum and coal. It is axiomatic that a decentralized pattern of access to energy provides a favorable resource base for a decentralized outlook, and that the perspectives comprising such an outlook sustain a decentralized network of policy formation and execution. If a reversal is to occur in the trend toward bipolarizing the world, and a pattern resembling the Great Power System of the last century is to revive, two conditions at least must be fulfilled: a network of strong, coordinate centers of energy production; and cheaper costs of producing the newer weapons.

I have been talking of the resources found in the wastelands or neglected opportunities on the surface of the continental blocs. We must take the fact into account that new resources are in prospect whether we look beneath or above the land surface of the earth. To begin with the seas: we shall learn to mine the waters for minerals and to farm the oceans for foodstuffs on a scale hitherto unthinkable. In regard to resources above the surface: we are close to the first experimental expeditions to the moon; and, presently the planets. In this setting the traditional questions that center around the control of air space take on new significance.

As specialists in public law it is not difficult for us to anticipate the form in which conflicting claims to these new resources are likely to be phrased. In connection with the seas those who push particular claims to the exclusive exploitation of a given region will talk in terms of "the territorial sea," "contiguous zones," "jurisdiction" and the "continental shelf." Nation states whose officials push particular claims to share in exploiting the resources of an area will invoke the "freedom of the seas" and other internationalizing concepts. The probing of the upper atmosphere, satellite launching, space platforms and the like will pose the problem of how to adjust claims to exclusive control of "air space" against claims to share control. As expeditions to the moon or the planets become more imminent the question of "who owns what" or "who controls what" will bring into the debate the authoritative language traditionally employed in connection with the acquisition of territory ("exploration," "occupation," "conquest" and other concepts emphasizing priority in time and effectiveness of control).

As clarifiers of the goals and alternatives implicit in a decision process and as advisers of the participants we have an opportunity to reduce the amount of unnecessary friction by establishing a frame of reference in advance of the facts. When factual details appear they will of course exhibit some novel elements; common goals and principles will not. The members of the world community have a long history of accommodating "exclusive" claims and "sharing" claims with one another (as new resources provide new base values for the participants in the world arena).

It is, of course, essential that in taking advantage of this opportunity we deal with the entire context of value goals and principles as they relate to potential facts. I have referred to sets of doctrines that in all probability will be invoked when claims are made. The chief function of these formulations is to guide the attention of decision makers to the context in which pertinent activities occur. Formulas assist in recognizing and evaluating the consequences for international public order of accepting the exclusive or the sharing claim in particular cases or categories of cases.

When we examine past trends in world history it is not difficult to recognize that shifts have occurred in the relative emphasis laid upon exclusive or sharing claims. Grotius was speaking for the Netherlands and for other challengers of the claims of Spain, Portugal and England to monopolize great stretches of the seas. Sweeping readjustments were made in doctrine and in its applications relating to the seas. At first they were mainly in the direction of consolidating an international order in which sharing claims were widely accepted ("freedom of the seas"). In recent decades the trend has been the other way. As my colleague Myres S. McDougal has shown in some detail, claims to the exclusive enjoyment of resources have been accepted as "reasonable" in the light of facts that have appeared in the course of applying science and technology. A recent tabulation shows that no more than thirteen states accept the ancient three-mile rule for the territorial sea. Forty-five states repudiate it in varying degree, claiming wider limits. Contiguous zones of many kinds have been accepted for the administration of customs, the security of neutral states against belligerent activities, fishing conservation, appropriation of the resources of the sea-bed and of the continental shelf.

When we think configuratively about the problems raised in reference to the new resources it is clear that instead of relying on blanket principles (like "freedom of the seas" or "freedom of the air") the most fruitful policy alternatives are likely to emerge when we anticipate the appearance of characteristic factual contexts, and consider how the values chiefly at stake in them can be maximized. Hence we would not expect to apply the same prescription (1) to the sharing of air space for weather observation (where equipment is used that is expressly designed for the purpose and perhaps registered, and when the information obtained is made public) and (2) to the sharing of air space for projects of weather or climate control that may be deleterious to local values.

The contextual (or, synonymously, the configurative) approach is a challenge to imagine the full range of possible means of anticipating and resolving difficulties. On the most uncertain matters it is appropriate to call attention to the need of exploring the possibilities of agreement in advance of conflict. The inference is that no time should be lost, for instance, in putting into the hands of the UN the facilities for research, development and operation of satellites, "space platforms" and travel beyond the limits of the earth's atmospheric and gravitational fields. Doubtless the USA and the USSR will continue to compete with independent programs. Since the polar powers have a stake in moderating the conflict in which they are engaged in the hope of eventual harmony through agreement, not catastrophe, a practical method would appear to be to strengthen the "third factor," especially when both powers are also included within it.

The rapid introduction of new resources under present conditions calls for some degree of community and regional planning; and planning poses thorny questions about the structure and ideology of society. To an increasing extent questions of this kind need to be answered directly rather than by default. It must be conceded that American political scientists are not especially well equipped to participate in the planning function on the scale required. Although we are accustomed to corroborate the classical authorities and the Founding Fathers in praise of the middle classes as contributory to popular institutions of government, we have not as a rule dealt with these traditional doctrines in significant ways. For instance, we have not explored the principles of proportion that are most likely to consolidate or to sustain at various stages of industrial growth the perspectives and operational technique of popular government. Shall we, for example, rely upon a 30-40-50 rule to guide public policy in regard to the permissible degree of market control permitted to private interests? (For example: When one interest has 30% control of output, shall it be subject to special regulations designed to nullify the side-effects of power that go along with economic control? When one interest rises to 40% shall we put governmentally appointed trustees on the Board of Directors? At 50% shall government trustees predominate?)

Whatever the workable rules of proportion may be in representative contexts it is evident that we need to guide our studies of trend correlation and of comparative cases in order to improve the available bases of inference in such matters.

The same approach—the search for rules of proportion—applies to every institutional and personality pattern in a body politic. What are the optimum proportions of community resources to devote to elementary, intermediate, advanced and ultra-advanced education? To research and development in science and technology? To positive and negative sanctions for correctional and other purposes?

One way to jar “cakes of custom” out of the mind is to draft specifications for the first Mayflower expedition to establish continuing occupation outside the earth. (Possibly it could be “Noah’s Jet”?) What proportion of men, women and children of which culture or combination of earth cultures shall we select? What ideological traditions, secular and sacred? What class backgrounds (elite, mid-elite, mass)? What individual and group interests? What personality structures?

By asking questions of this kind we are in a position to assess our present stock of knowledge concerning the interdependence of institutions specialized to power, and all other institutions in the social process of any community, together with the forms of personality involved. These, of course, are the recurring issues of political science and historical interpretation as well as policy.

III. POLITICAL SCIENCE AND EVOLUTION

I have been referring to a few implications of science and technology for weapons and production, and sketching some political ramifications. As political scientists we are perhaps even less well prepared to anticipate developments in genetics, experimental embryology and related disciplines. Taken together these fields signify that, as Julian Huxley has often put it, man is on the threshold of taking evolution into his own hands. By influencing the genes that constitute the key units in man's biological inheritance we affect the entire potential of future generations.

Important as recent innovations are in radioactivity I do not want to give more than passing notice to the dangers that they embody. The only feasible means of coping with these factors is by policies that avert war and preparation for war, and install proper precautions in the handling of high energy radiation for other purposes.

Quite recently the dangers that arise from radioactivity have been authoritatively brought to public notice: all high energy radiation that reaches the gonads stimulates gene mutations; more than 99 per cent of all mutations are dangerous; genes can only be eliminated by the death of the gene carrier or by his incapacity to reproduce. Nearly two years ago H. J. Müller told us that the bomb tests since the war had already exposed the inhabitants of the earth to radioactivity comparable with that of the inhabitants of Hiroshima and Nagasaki after the original explosions. He estimated that about 80,000 harmful mutations are involved and that "it will mean, in the end, several times this number of hampered lives."

It has been pointed out that perhaps the most satisfactory index of genetic damage is the sum of tangible defects existing among living individuals. We are speaking of such stigmata as "mental defects, epilepsy, congenital malformations, neuromuscular defects, hematological and endocrine defects, defects in vision or hearing, cutaneous and skeletal defects, or defects in the gastrointestinal or genitourinary tracts." We are informed that about 2 per cent of the live births in the United States have defects that are of "simple genetic origin and appear prior to sexual maturity." If mankind were subjected to a "double dosing" of radiation the present level of genetic defects would rise, and would eventually be doubled.

Regulatory measures are obviously needed against wars and weapon tests; and they are essential to the disposition of nuclear waste from industrial plants. (It has been remarked that a nuclear power plant is to be viewed as a large scale production of both highly poisonous gas and explosives under a single roof.)

The principal questions to which I desire to call attention pose issues of a relatively new and different order. Some of these questions have already come up in controversies over artificial insemination. They have embarrassed the champions of the orthodox prescriptions that prevail in several fields (theology, ethics, jurisprudence). Shall we call a child legitimate whose biological father is not identical with the sociological father? Even with the consent of the latter? With spermatozoa from a known or unknown source? (A possible international question is whether a nation state like the United States can claim the child as a citizen if the spermatozoa employed originated with an American mail order house and was sent by air mail for use abroad.)

Poignant as these issues are in specific cases they do not confront us with the consequences for public order that are to be anticipated if the progress of biology separates insemination and child bearing from genital contact. The assumption is often made that the continuation of sexual rectitude and even civic order depends upon charging every genital contact with the blessings and perils of procreation. The impending improvement of oral contraceptives, joined with other recent advances, are factors that already suggest the wisdom of other norms and sanctions of public order.

Other developments are threatening current ratios of the influence and power of the sexes. Given the millions and millions of spermatozoa produced by one male and the technique of canning by refrigeration, any very large number of males becomes relatively redundant for purposes of procreation. Must the male rest his future upon other values such as the strictly aesthetic appeal of the male contour? Before the female of the species becomes too complacent in this context it may be worth recalling the significance of some current experiments for the removal of the primordial female function from the body and into other receptacles. (Women, too, may have to rely upon their charm, a role for which their experience has provided extensive preparation.)

Apparently we are closer than most of us like to think to the production of species that occupy an intermediate position between man and the lower animals (or even plants). It is sometimes said, even in august quarters, that "one has not yet succeeded in making a species from another species." Theodosius Dobzhansky notes, however, that "the feat of obtaining a new species was accomplished more than a quarter of a century ago." In recent decades a fair number of new species have been brought into being. It is also true that some species that exist in nature have been recreated experimentally. A garrison police regime fully cognizant of science and technology can, in all probability, eventually aspire to biologize the class and caste system by selective breeding and training. Such beings can, in effect, be sown and harvested for specialized garrison police services or for other chosen operations.

Great strides have been taken in brain design. Experimental models of robots have been built who solve problems of a rather complex order in a given environment. Some of these machines look after themselves to a degree, obtaining and using the raw materials required for energy and repairs. Already it is claimed that the function of reproducing its kind, and of interacting with others, can be in-built.

The question then rises: Given our concern for human dignity when do we wisely extend all or part of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights to these forms? When do we accept the humanoids—the species intermediate between lower species and man, and which may resemble us in physique as well as in the possession of an approximately equivalent central nervous and cortical system—as at least partial participants in the body politic? And at what point do we accept the incorporation of relatively self-perpetuating and mutually influencing “super-machines” or “ex-robots” as beings entitled to the policies expressed in the Universal Declaration?

It is obvious that we are not too well equipped by cultural tradition to cope with these problems. A trait of our civilization is the intense sentimentalization of superficial differences in the visible format of the groupings to be found even within the human species. Recall the theologians, ethicists and jurists who have devoted themselves to the elaboration of symbols to show that the white race alone is genuinely human and hence solely entitled to the dignity of freedom. Recall, too, the counter-assertions, nourished in the soil of humiliation, that have arisen among ethnic groups that seek to overcome their contempt for themselves by dragging down the pretensions of the white imperialist.

Let us recognize that the traditions of certain non-Western civilizations are in some ways better adapted to the problem than the Graeco-Roman and Judeo-Christian perspectives. They possess a relatively broad basis for identifying the primary ego of the individual with a self that includes more than strictly human species in the congregation of living forms. A world view that includes the possibility of reincarnation in lower animal shapes, for example, may prepare its devotees to empathize more readily with other than strictly human species and varieties. Even they, however, may have their troubles with a mobile power plant in nearly human form.

The most disturbing question, perhaps, arises when we reflect upon the possibility that super-gifted men, or even new species possessing superior talent, will emerge as a result of research and development by geneticists, embryologists or machine makers. In principle, it is not too difficult to imagine a superior form. For instance, our sensory equipment does not enable us to take note of dangerous radiation levels in the environment. We have no inborn chattering of a Geiger counter.

I spoke before of taking the intellectual initiative for the use of science and technology for the fuller realization of our value goals. It is plain that if we bring certain kinds of living forms into the world we may be introducing a biological elite capable of treating us in the manner in which imperial powers have so often treated the weak. A question is whether the cultivation of superior qualities ought to be limited to intellectual capability. The answer, I feel confident you will agree, is in the negative. We need to be sufficiently vigilant to prevent the turning loose on the world of a hyper-intelligent species driven by an instinctual system especially inclined toward predation. The blood-stained story of our own species is only too familiar (the stories about succulent missionaries whose bodies were more readily incorporated than their messages are not wholly without foundation). Can we improve the prospects of developing a form of intelligent life copied not after our own image, but after the image of our nobler aspirations?

It is not to be overlooked that the problem of human capability can become acute if in the years ahead we escape from our present habitat on the earth, or are visited by other forms of intelligent life. There are, after all, untold millions of environments resembling our solar system, and it would be more remarkable to find that but one planet is inhabited by a complex living form than to encounter parallel developments. It would of course be embarrassing, at least, to discover that we are the savages or that we are put together on a markedly inferior biological plan.

IV. OUR FUTURE PROGRAM

The fact is that many of the problems to which I have been referring will be upon us long before we can make great changes in the ideological outlook or the socio-political patterns of life in this country or elsewhere. The same point applies to ourselves in our role as individuals and as members of the political science profession. Considering our present predispositions how can we improve the likelihood of contributing to the decision process at every level, from the neighborhood to the world as a whole?

It is abundantly clear that the impact of science and technology does not occur in a social vacuum, but in a context of human identifications, demands and expectations. I make the modest proposal that it is appropriate for political scientists, in company with other scientists and scholars dealing with human affairs, to improve our procedures of continuous deliberation upon the potential impacts of science and technology upon human affairs. No doubt the American Political Science Association and other professional societies constitute an appropriate network for the purpose. We can sustain continuing conferences devoted to the examination of emerging developments. As fellow professionals we have special responsibility for giving thought to the aggregate effects of any specific innovation.

Our first professional contribution, it appears, is to project a comprehensive image of the future for the purpose of indicating how our overriding goal values are likely to be affected if current policies continue.

A closely related contribution consists in clarifying the fundamental goal values of the body politic. We are accustomed to confront political ideologies with new factual contingencies and to suggest appropriate specific interpretations. We also confront political doctrines with rival doctrines, and with comprehensive theological and metaphysical systems. I have called attention to the point that the basic value systems of European civilization, in particular, are likely to be exposed to sweeping challenge as biology and engineering narrow the obvious differences between man and neighboring species, and between man and centrally operating machines. The crisis will be peculiarly sharp if we create or discover forms of life superior to man in intellect or instinctual predispositions. Our traditions have not been life-centered, but man-centered. We possess various paranoid-like traditions of being "chosen." Clearly a difficult task of modifying these egocentric perspectives lies ahead.

The third task is historical and scientific. It is historical in the sense that by mobilizing knowledge about the past we are enabled to recognize the appearance of new patterns and the diffusion or restriction of the old. It is scientific in the sense that we summarize the past in order to confirm (or disconfirm) propositions about the interplay of predisposition and environment. If we are to serve the aims of historic recognition and of scientific analysis, one of our professional responsibilities is to expedite the development of more perfect institutions specialized to continual self-observation on a global scale. Self-observation requires guidance by a system of theoretical models of the political process in which a continuing gradation is maintained between the most inclusive model and submodels adjusted to more limited contexts in time and space. Continual self-observation renders it necessary at each step through time to reevaluate the appropriateness of the operational indices for the variables and concepts employed at the most recent step. In this way all the concepts that figure in systematic, descriptive political science can be kept chronically pertinent to the ordering of political events as the future unfolds.

The fourth task is inventive and evaluative. It consists in originating policy alternatives by means of which goal values can be maximized. In estimating the likely occurrence of an event (or event category), it is essential to take into account the historical trends and the scientifically ascertained predispositions in the world arena or any pertinent part thereof.

The relationship of American political science to these tasks is in many ways unique. The typical department is a microcosm of the macrocosm of university faculties of the social sciences and humanities, and the school of law. It is no secret that a syndicate of philosophers, historians, behavioral scientists and public lawyers is capable of producing some degree of tension among themselves, especially when budgets are at stake. This has led to the suggestion that every component skill should be sent back where it came from—to the departments of philosophy, history, sociology and psychology, for example, and to the law school. In this way political science could be given back to the Indians. The catch is that we are not agreed who the Indians may be.

The present situation does make it possible for political scientists to take the lead in integrating rather than dividing our intellectual community. Compared with an entire university, which has become a non-communicating aggregate of experts, each department of political science can be a true center of integration where normative and descriptive frames of reference are simultaneously and continuously applied to the consideration of the policy issues confronting the body politic as a whole over the near, middle and distant ranges of time.

The profession is advantageously situated therefore to take the lead in a configurative approach to the decision process in society. Where it plays this part, political science is the policy science, par excellence. If the implications of science and technology are to be correctly appraised, it will be essential to recruit some trained personnel from such fields into political science, to improve the science-content of professional education, and to provide for continuing cooperation among the professions involved.

It is quite unnecessary for any one individual to emulate the universal ambitions of renaissance man. But if we are to take the lead in performing the configurative or matrix function it is quite essential for the profession as a whole to achieve the division of labor, the understanding and the insight capable of realizing as fully as possible the dream of relevant universality. Each of us can at least widen the boundaries of the self and open the way to identify with living forms that differ from traditional images. We can step toward the possible reconciliation of a growing mastery over Nature with the dignity of freedom for all that lives. In the congregation of living forms human life may come to play a yet more distinguished role in generations to come, a role that transcends even the vision of the commonwealth of man championed by the distinguished political scientist and statesman, the centennial of whose birth we take pride in according special commemoration this year.

THE ORIGINS OF THE PRESENT JAPANESE CONSTITUTION

ROBERT E. WARD

University of Michigan

Throughout the years when the Meiji Constitution served for most purposes as Japan's basic law (1890-1947), it was always a matter of considerable value to the nation's constitutional scholars to have readily available an authoritative statement of the intent of the framers of that document. This was Itō Hirobumi's Kempō Gige (Commentaries on the Constitution).<sup>1</sup> It played a role somewhat analogous to that of Madison's journals in our own annals of constitutional, legal and historical scholarship, but was even more definitive. It is interesting therefore to speculate just where present or future Japanese scholars might find a similar source for their present constitution. The facts presently available would indicate the necessity of a pilgrimage to New York's Waldorf Tower. There or in its immediate environs are to be found the most notable of the "founding fathers" of the present Japanese Constitution.

I

That one should have to seek on foreign shores for the author of the fundamental law of a great modern state is in itself a phenomenon unique in recent history. Even stranger perhaps is the fact that some nine years after its promulgation and four years after the end of the military occupation which made it possible in the first place, this constitution remains formally intact and unamended. If there were a sure prospect that it would remain so, perhaps the entire issue might better be left to the attention of future historians. But it has become increasingly clear during the last two years that the so-called "conservative" groups which control contemporary Japanese politics are determined to amend the present constitution in a number of important respects, if not indeed ultimately to rewrite it completely.<sup>2</sup>

This emerging campaign is now beginning to utilize the issue of the constitution's alien authorship. It is doubtful that the time is yet ripe for a full-blown national publicity campaign focused upon this point, for the revisionist movement is still at a fairly early stage of development.<sup>3</sup> The scene is being carefully prepared, however, and it now seems distinctly probable that when the Government chooses to present formally its bills of constitutional revision, the twin facts that the document was American and may readily be portrayed as having been imposed upon a reluctant Japanese Government as a result of none-too-gentle Occupation suasion will constitute an important part of its case.

<sup>1</sup> Tōkyō, Maruzen, 1889. Prince Itō had been in charge of the small group which actually drafted the Meiji Constitution.

<sup>2</sup> I have given a detailed account of these developments in "The Constitution and Current Japanese Politics," Far Eastern Survey, Vol. 25, pp. 49-58 (April 1956).

<sup>3</sup> In fact, the Socialists and their allies gained a sufficient number of seats in the Upper House election of July 8, 1956 to prevent the passage of any bill of constitutional revision for at least the next three years.

This is to say that a major policy and program of the late Allied Occupation of Japan is about to be reviewed on terms which cannot help but be of serious concern to the United States. The fact that the Occupation was in a technical sense an Allied operation will divert no criticism from this country. No one in Japan or abroad considers it as anything but what for all practical purposes it most patently was—a strictly American endeavor. As a consequence it is the United States which will be arraigned informally but effectively before Japanese public opinion. The actions of our officially responsible agents during 1945–46 are already being challenged in a number of important respects. Particularly where the constitution is concerned, an increasing number of questions are being asked in Japan under increasingly public circumstances. By what legally recognized authority was constitutional revision required of Japan? If such an authority existed, was its implementation properly the prerogative of the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers (SCAP) or of the Far Eastern Commission (FEC)? Who wrote the constitution in the first instance? What was their authority to do so, and what were their qualifications? What types and degrees of pressure were used to induce the Japanese Government to accept constitutional revision, and how justifiable were the pressures? To what extent did the actions of the Occupation authorities in Japan represent the official policy of the United States?

Oddly enough, these are questions which have not as yet been seriously raised in this country. A scattering of individuals and at least two official reports have cast considerable light upon some or all of them, but outside of scholarly circles scant attention has been paid.<sup>4</sup> Public opinion in this country seems to believe that, whatever our failures or shortcomings elsewhere, in Japan our Occupation on the whole did a remarkably effective job. In many important respects this is true, but the successes should not obscure the other side of the record, especially since our mistakes have a nasty habit of returning years later to plague both the domestic and the international scene. Japan's present fundamental law—often termed the "MacArthur" or the "Whitney Constitution" after its two most eminent progenitors—is a case in point. The Japanese and, incidentally, the world public will hear a good deal about this subject in the near future, and it behooves us in particular, as a principal party, to know the facts of the matter. Due to an understandable official reticence, <sup>4</sup> See, for example, Mark Gayn, Japan Diary (New York, 1948); SCAP, Government Section, Political Reorientation of Japan (Washington, 1950), 2 vols.; Theodore H. McNelly, Domestic and International Influences on Constitutional Revision in Japan, 1945–1946 (Unpublished doctoral dissertation at Columbia University, 1952); U. S. Department of State, The Far Eastern Commission (Department of State Publication 5138; Washington, 1953); Harry Emerson Wildes, Typhoon in Tokyo (New York, 1954); Harold S. Quigley and John E. Turner, The New Japan, Government and Politics (Minneapolis, 1956); and a work by the former chief of the Government Section, Courtney Whitney, MacArthur His Rendezvous with History (New York, 1956). The Royal Institute of International Affairs has published a recent and authoritative contribution to this list by Hugh Borton in F. C. Jones, Hugh Borton and B. R. Pearn, The Far East, 1942–1946 (London and New York 1955).

these are not yet all available but, insofar as the story can now be pieced together, they seem to diverge at important points from the several versions so far made public.

II

The story properly begins with a consideration of the terms upon which Japan surrendered to the Allied Powers. The subsequent legal rights of the Occupation to control and to impose "reforms"—including constitutional changes—upon Japan depend ultimately upon the nature and extent of the commitments which Japan and the victorious Powers respectively assumed at the time of surrender. These are set forth in the Potsdam Proclamation of July 26, 1945, in the several notes subsequently exchanged between Japan and the Allied Powers, and in the formal Instrument of Surrender signed at Tōkyō Bay on September 2, 1945. It is the ambiguity of these documents which gives rise to the principal legal issue here involved. This might perhaps be summarized in the question: to what extent is an unconditional surrender really unconditional?

Section 13 of the so-called Potsdam Proclamation states clearly the doctrine of unconditional surrender in the following terms: "We call upon the government of Japan to proclaim now the unconditional surrender of all Japanese armed forces, and to provide proper and adequate assurances of their good faith in such action. The alternative for Japan is prompt and utter destruction." Despite this forthright demand for "unconditional" surrender, much of the remainder of the Proclamation is devoted to a statement of the Allied Powers' intentions vis-à-vis a defeated Japanese Empire. This constitutes in effect a series of "conditions" whereby the Allies undertake certain obligations to the Japanese, e.g. to preserve Japanese sovereignty over the home islands, to allow Japan's disarmed troops to return home, to permit Japan to maintain certain industries and to withdraw the Allied occupying forces at a specified future occasion. The fact that the United States government has chosen officially to adopt the view that these stipulations do not constitute conditions possessed of any binding contractual force does not of itself preclude or invalidate variant interpretations by other interested parties.<sup>5</sup>

The particular aspect of these negotiations of present interest, however, concerns the degree to which they legitimize the Occupation's later activities in the field of constitutional reform. Here again the documents were ambiguously enough drawn so that variant and contradictory interpretations emerge. On the one hand, Sections 6 and 10 of the Potsdam Declaration demand that: "There must be eliminated for all time the authority and influence of those who have deceived and misled the people of Japan into embarking on world conquest . . ."; and that: "The Japanese Government shall remove all obstacles to the revival and strengthening of democratic tendencies among the Japanese people. Freedom of speech, of religion, and of thought, as well as respect for the fundamental human rights shall be established." On the other hand, according to Section 12, "The occupying forces of the Allies shall be withdrawn from Japan as soon as these objectives have been accomplished and there has been established in accordance with the freely expressed will of the Japanese people a peacefully inclined and responsible government."<sup>6</sup> A major contradiction lurks in these high-sounding phrases. If the first group is emphasized, it is quite possible to argue with some cogence and persuasiveness, as General Whitney has actually done,<sup>7</sup> that the removal of "all obstacles to the revival and strengthening of democratic tendencies among the Japanese people" is impossible without substantial constitutional and governmental reforms and that these are, consequently, authorized by the Potsdam terms. But if, on the other hand, one looks primarily to the "freely expressed will of the Japanese people" proviso, one can argue that, although in terms it only purports to set a precondition to the withdrawal of forces, it requires that in the last analysis the Japanese people must freely determine what specific type of "peacefully inclined and responsible government" they prefer. Any abridgment of this right then presumably becomes a breach of the obligations undertaken, morally at least, by the Allied Powers at Potsdam.

<sup>5</sup> See Political Reorientation, Vol. 2, pp. 413-15; and Jones, Borton and Pearn, op. cit., pp. 506-07, for the texts of these official exchanges.

An examination of the basic documents will indicate that an embarrassing prominence has been accorded by the Allies, and in particular by the Government of the United States, to this "freely expressed will of the Japanese people" proviso. In addition to its original occurrence in the Potsdam Proclamation, the official Allied reply of August 11, 1945 to Japan's qualified acceptance of the Potsdam terms reiterated and made more specific the commitment of Paragraph 12: "The ultimate form of government of Japan shall, in accordance with the Potsdam Declaration, be established by the freely expressed will of the Japanese people." This point was underlined again in the presidential directive of September 6, 1945, entitled "United States Initial Post-Surrender Policy for Japan":<sup>8</sup>

The ultimate objectives of the United States in regard to Japan, to which policies in the initial period must conform, are: . . .

(b) To bring about the eventual establishment of a peaceful and responsible Government which will respect the rights of other states and will support the objectives of the United States as reflected in the ideals and principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The United States desires that this government should conform as closely as may be to principles of democratic self-government but it is not the responsibility of the Allied Powers to impose upon Japan any form of government not supported by the freely expressed will of the people.

On November 3, 1945, the language of the italicized portion of this statement was reiterated almost verbatim in the Joint Chiefs of Staff "Basic Initial Post-Surrender Directive to SCAP (The Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers) for the Occupation and Control of Japan." Thus, although the case is not conclusive, it can certainly be argued from the published documents that the Allied Powers, the United States as the chief occupying power, and the Supreme

<sup>6</sup> Italics added.

<sup>7</sup> Political Reorientation, Vol. 2, pp. 622-23.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid., Vol. 2, p. 423. Italics added.

Commander as their immediate agent were officially and publicly committed to the policy of favoring and supporting, but not imposing, a democratic form of government upon Japan. It was repeatedly asserted at the outset that ultimately "the freely expressed will of the Japanese people," not the desire of the United States or SCAP, was to prevail in this sphere.

Nevertheless, it was made apparent to the Japanese authorities very early in the Occupation that the Supreme Commander felt that "no political reform that did not encompass revision of the Meiji Constitution would be worth serious consideration."<sup>9</sup> Without that, he apparently felt that any reforms which might be achieved would be fatally vulnerable to the whims of future cabinets and Diets, once the protection afforded by the Occupation's authority was withdrawn. In September, 1945, General MacArthur informed the then premier, Prince Higashikuni, that he regarded constitutional revision as a matter of prime importance. In October the issue figured prominently in interviews between General MacArthur, Prince Konoe and the new premier, Shidehara Kijūrō. Prince Konoe was informed in some detail of those constitutional dispositions which SCAP felt should be changed.<sup>10</sup>

Stimulated in this manner, the Japanese themselves began working on constitutional revision. In fact, due to a curious "misapprehension" on the part of Prince Konoe which has never been satisfactorily explained, they set up two separate and competing agencies in this field. The first, located technically within the Imperial Household, was headed by Prince Konoe assisted by Professor Sasaki Sōichi. This was established on October 11, 1945, and pretty much collapsed as a serious political effort with the issuance of an anonymous statement by Allied Headquarters on November 1, 1945 denying Konoe's repeated public statements that his efforts in this field had been suggested and were sponsored by General MacArthur himself. Despite this rebuff, Konoe is said to have presented an Outline of Constitutional Revisions to the Emperor on November 22, 1945, which was supplemented by a more detailed statement by his colleague Professor Sasaki on November 24.<sup>11</sup>

The second and but slightly more durable agency, established by the Japanese Government on October 24, 1945, was a cabinet Committee for the Investigation of Constitutional Problems, under the chairmanship of a former Tōkyō University law professor and then minister-without-portfolio, Matsumoto Jōji. This included a number of outstanding Japanese legal experts and held some seven general and fifteen research meetings between October 27, 1945 and its dissolution on February 2, 1946. We have no information, from Mr. Satō's account or any other published source, about what went on in the inner councils of the government during this period. The Committee was apparently unable to reach complete agreement within its own ranks, but, despite this, finally presented informally to SCAP on February 1, 1946 two documents entitled "Gist of the Revision of the Constitution" and "General Explanation of the Constitutional Revision Drafted by the Government."<sup>12</sup> These represent very limited revisions of the Meiji Constitution, and were perhaps intended by the Matsumoto Committee and the Japanese Government as a tentative and bargaining first approach to ascertain more precisely and concretely just what degree of constitutional change SCAP intended to require. They almost completely ignore, if indeed the Committee knew about, the specific areas of constitutional reform recommended to Prince Konoe in October 1945 by George Atcheson, the Political Adviser to SCAP, and provide for very little constitutional change of any democratic significance. The underlying assumption seems to have been that the Meiji Constitution was itself capable of development along democratic lines and that only minor tinkering was necessary to achieve this. Given a government of the political and social persuasions of the Shidehara Cabinet and a committee in general reflective of these, this attitude is hardly surprising. Both were reluctantly responding to SCAP pressure in an area of the most fundamental importance; one can scarcely believe that, if left to their own devices, they would have engaged in any very extensive revision. From their standpoint, a posture of slow and cautious bargaining was obviously indicated in order to ascertain the specific nature and extent of SCAP's demands and the strength with which they were held. How else could they avoid the danger, as they saw it, of overcommitting themselves to unwanted democratic innovations? It seems, therefore, either curiously naive or calculated to entertain seriously the expectation that the first Matsumoto Draft would display any significant degree of democratic reform. Whatever the reasoning, the Supreme Commander reacted most adversely to these documents and on February 1, 1946 ordered General Whitney, Chief of his Government Section, to draft a detailed rejection of the Matsumoto proposals.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid., Vol. 1, p. 90.

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., Vol. 1, p. 91.

<sup>11</sup> See Satō Tatsuo, "Nihonkoku Kempō Seiritsushi," Jurisuto, No. 81 (May 1, 1955), p. 6; McNelly, op. cit., p. 48; and Jones, Borton and Pearn, op. cit., pp. 327-28. An allegedly accurate version of Konoe's suggestions appears in the Mainichi Shimbun for December 21, 1945.

Thus far the story of the origins of the new Japanese constitution is fairly clear and the principal facts generally agreed upon. The Supreme Commander was following quite literally the terms of his basic directive to support and encourage, but not to impose, democratic changes upon the Japanese. After February 1, 1946, however, developments took a new and surprising turn, important facts become most difficult to obtain, and conclusions must often, therefore, remain tentative. Despite such qualifications, materials recently published in Japan have yielded important fresh insights into what actually transpired.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>12</sup> The English texts of both of these are given in Political Reorientation, Vol. 2, pp. 617-21, together with the text of an unofficial but more complete draft which was "leaked to" and published by the Mainichi Shimbun on February 1, 1946 (pp. 611-16). This last is generally regarded as accurate.

<sup>13</sup> The following materials are particularly notable: 1) Miyasawa Toshiyoshi and Satō Isao, "MacArthur Kempō Sōan Kaisetsu [A Commentary on the MacArthur Draft Constitution]," Kokka Gakkai Zasshi, Vol. 68, Nos. 1 and 2 (Sept. 1954), pp. 1-6 and 1-37. The authors, stimulated by the earlier publication of an incomplete and somewhat garbled

On February 3, 1946, after further reflection on the whole matter of constitutional revision in the light of the unsatisfactory Matsumoto Committee proposals, General MacArthur concluded, in the words of the Government Section Report, that "the most effective method of instructing the Japanese Government on the nature and application of these principles he considered basic would be to prepare a model constitution embodying those principles."<sup>14</sup> On the same day he instructed General Whitney to have the Government Section draft such a constitution, extending full discretion as to its terms save that he stipulated three groups of points which he wanted incorporated. These included the first known version of the famous "no war" clause depriving Japan of armed forces and the right of belligerency, which eventually became Article 9 of the new constitution.<sup>15</sup> This decision to supply the Japanese with a model constitution was of fundamental importance, particularly because the resultant draft was, with remarkably few significant changes, to become the constitution of Japan.

The taking of so momentous a decision on this particular date—February 3, 1946—presents an interesting problem. As one follows the series of steps leading to the adoption of a new Japanese constitution, one is constantly troubled by the question of pace and timing. From the end of October 1945 to February 1, 1946 the Occupation authorities do not seem to have manifested any extraordinarily urgent concern about constitutional revision. One detects some impatience with the dilatory proceedings of the Matsumoto Committee, to be sure. But at the same time this was matched by a disposition to wait and see what sort of proposal the Japanese were going to make. Then suddenly about February 1 constitutional revision became a matter of the highest priority, text by Dr. Watanabe Tetsuzō, here publish for the first time the official text of the original draft constitution prepared by SCAP and handed to the Japanese representatives on February 13, 1946. Both the original English version and the official Japanese translation are given. 2) Satō Tatsuo, "Nihonkoku Kempō Seiritsushi [History of the Formulation of the Japanese Constitution]" Jurisuto, Nos. 81 (May 1, 1955) +. Nineteen sizeable installments of this marathon article had appeared in the columns of Jurisuto between May 1, 1955 and February 1, 1956, the last issue available to the writer. More are yet to come. The author was Chief of the First Section of the Cabinet Bureau of Legislation in early 1946, and, after February 26, served as Minister Matsumoto's chief assistant in drafting and revising the several Japanese versions of the constitution produced by the Government. He also conducted much of the vital liaison with SCAP on this matter. His opportunities for first-hand observation and for obtaining reliable information about the constitution were practically unparalleled. In general his story is carefully presented, consistent with what facts have been established, straightforward and plausible. 3) Satō Tatsuo, "Nihonkoku Kempō Tanjōki [A Record of the Birth of the Japanese Constitution]," Toki no Hōrei, Nos. 189 (May 3, 1944) +. This series, by the same author, had gone through fifteen installments, with more to come, by October 13, 1955, the last issue available to the writer. It is a less technical and more popularized version of essentially the same materials.

---

<sup>14</sup> Political Reorientation, Vol. 1, p. 102. For a more detailed account of this development, see below, pp. 992 ff.

<sup>15</sup> The text of these three points is given in Political Reorientation, Vol. 1, p. 102. See also Jones, Borton and Pearn, op. cit., p. 330.

and within three weeks an entirely new constitution was drafted and accepted in principle by the Japanese Government. The question naturally arises as to why such frantic haste. The fundamental law of a great modern state was involved. This was certainly a matter of sufficient gravity to merit a somewhat more deliberate, dignified and careful procedure.

The question is rendered even more puzzling by General MacArthur's categorical assurance on January 30, 1946 to the visiting members of the Far Eastern Advisory Commission that he had ceased to take any action on constitutional reform and that, as a matter of fact, the entire issue had been taken out of his hands by the Moscow Agreement. This assurance was given two days before General Whitney submitted to General MacArthur a formal memorandum claiming to prove that SCAP had authority to proceed with constitutional reform, and four days before General MacArthur ordered his Government Section to produce a model constitution for the guidance of further Japanese efforts in this field. This official statement to the Far Eastern Advisory Commission is of sufficient interest to merit quotation:<sup>16</sup>

On January 30 [1946] General MacArthur talked confidentially to the members in regard to the problems of the Occupation. As to the question of constitutional reform, he said that the matter had been taken out of his hands by the Moscow Agreement of December 26, 1945, which had set up the Far Eastern Commission. When he started out in Japan his original directive gave him jurisdiction in the matter but now he had ceased to take any action. He said that it was his hope that whatever might be done about constitutional reform would be done in such a way as to permit the Japanese to look upon the resulting document as a Japanese product, for he believed that only in this way could the work be permanent. He said that it was his conviction that a constitution, no matter how good, forced upon the Japanese by bayonets would last just as long as bayonets were present, and that he was certain that the moment force was withdrawn and the Japanese were left to their own devices they would get rid of that constitution, merely for the purpose of asserting and maintaining their independence of ideas that they had been forced to accept.

There seems to be a sizeable gap dividing the Supreme Commander's views expressed on January 30 and the action which he initiated on February 3. In the absence of clarification from General MacArthur or other high SCAP officials, the explanation of this gap can only be conjectured. The following considerations seem relevant, however, to the questions both of authority and timing which have been raised. They require some understanding of the general situation at this time.

III

Some competition appears to have developed among several United States and international agencies for the predominant influence over the general nature and formulation of the proposed new democratic constitution. This was occasionally so pronounced as to tempt a cynical observer to conclude that, of all possible candidates, only the Japanese Government displayed any reluctance to father this document. At various times the principal actors in this drama are said to have been the Department of State, the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee (SWNCC) through its Far Eastern Subcommittee, the Far Eastern Commission (FEC) and SCAP; indeed, it has been claimed beyond this that within SCAP there was a brief but bitter rivalry in 1945 between the Government Section and the Office of the Political Adviser, i.e. the Department of State's liaison officer with General MacArthur, over their respective roles in the revision of the Meiji Constitution.<sup>17</sup> Although the precise details of the interplay of these agencies are still to be made clear, a general outline of major developments may be attempted.

<sup>16</sup> U. S. Department of State, The Far Eastern Commission (Far Eastern Series 60; Washington, 1953), p. 44. The Far Eastern Advisory Commission was the inter-Allied agency initially charged with making recommendations on the implementation of the Japanese surrender terms.

Of the several rivalries involved, the most persistent and public was that between SCAP and the Far Eastern Commission. FEC was in the first instance the product of British and Soviet dissatisfaction with the authority of the already existing Far Eastern Advisory Commission. They desired a larger share in the formulation and execution of policy toward occupied Japan than had been allotted them. This they apparently obtained at the Moscow Meeting of Foreign Ministers on December 26, 1945. Here it was agreed to set up two rather complex international agencies, the Far Eastern Commission (FEC) with headquarters in Washington, D. C., and the Allied Council sitting in Tokyo. While the latter had only advisory authority, the former was empowered "to formulate the policies, principles and standards in conformity with which the fulfillment by Japan of its obligations under the Terms of Surrender may be accomplished" and "to review, on the request of any member, any directive issued to SCAP or any action taken by the Supreme Commander involving policy decisions within the jurisdiction of the Commission." The dominant position of the United States was protected by its veto power and by the recognition of its authority to issue interim directives to SCAP "pending action by the Commission whenever urgent matters arise not covered by policies already formulated by the Commission; provided that any directives dealing with fundamental changes in the Japanese constitutional structure or in the regime of control, or dealing with a change in the Japanese Government as a whole will be issued only following consultation and following the attainment of agreement in the Far Eastern Commission."<sup>18</sup> On this basis a multinational agency of eleven states was established in Washington on February 26, 1946.

Despite the date of its actual establishment, it will be noted that the Commission's terms of reference had been known to the governments concerned and to SCAP since the end of December 1945. It was quite obvious from these <sup>17</sup> See Theodore H. McNelly, cited above, note 4, p. 43. Dr. McNelly claims that certain individuals in the Political Adviser's Office were working closely with the Konoe group on constitutional revision, and that this angered General MacArthur and induced him to order the Political Adviser's Office to cease its operations in this connection, thus leaving the field to the Government Section. See also Jones, Borton and Pearn, op. cit., p. 328.

<sup>18</sup> Far Eastern Commission, Secretary-General, Activities of the Far Eastern Commission, February 26, 1946-July 10, 1947 (Washington, 1947), pp. 37-38. Italics added.

that the setting of policy on constitutional reform in Japan was not only to become a prerogative of the FEC but that its authority in this field was given special and protected status, since it was exempted from the scope of the United States' general right to issue "interim directives" on urgent matters. In other words it was clear by the end of December 1945, if not earlier, that if the United States, or any of its agencies such as SCAP, seriously intended to control the terms and forms of constitutional revision in Japan, it would be highly expedient to push the process as rapidly as possible. If not, a significant share of its authority might be preempted by the FEC. Once the Commission came into existence, it made abundantly clear its view that the determination of major policy on the revision of Japan's constitution was one of its prime concerns. It definitely resented what it viewed as SCAP's subversion of its authority in this field.<sup>19</sup>

The precise role of the Department of State and the interdepartmental planning agency bearing the ponderous title of State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee (SWNCC) in the development of this constitutional issue in Japan is more difficult to ascertain. It was fairly common knowledge in Washington during the early days of the Occupation that relations between the Department of State and SCAP were scarcely cordial. On several occasions the situation became acrimonious enough to spill into the press.<sup>20</sup> Despite such rivalry, however, there appears to have developed during January 1946 at least a limited, and perhaps coincidental, commonality of view between the State Department and SWNCC on the one hand and SCAP on the other upon the subject of constitutional revision. It seems probable that the basis for this unwonted consensus was their agreement on the need for constitutional reform in Japan, and their common preference that this be controlled ultimately by an American rather than an international agency. Given the existing international situation, this was, from the United States' standpoint, a quite reasonable preference. The difficulties of dealing with the Russians alone had already been elaborately demonstrated. Innumerable possibilities of discord, delay and unsatisfactory compromises might be attendant upon dealing with any multinational agency of the size and complexity of the FEC.

The attitude of SWNCC, which may safely be held to accord with that of the Department of State, is best exemplified in a policy paper entitled "Reform of the Japanese Governmental System" and identified as SWNCC-228. The origins of this document appear to go back at least to the spring of 1944,<sup>21</sup> thus attesting a long standing belief on the part of SWNCC and its predecessors in the Department of State and elsewhere that constitutional reform was essential in Japan. Beyond this, it seems probable that SWNCC may at this particular time have been seriously concerned over the possibility that General Mac-

<sup>19</sup> See U. S. Department of State, The Far Eastern Commission, op. cit., pp. 43-65; and Jones, Borton and Pearn, op. cit., p. 351.

<sup>20</sup> See, for example, the Washington Post for September 20 and 23, 1945, or the New York Times for December 31, 1945 and January 1 and 2, 1946.

<sup>21</sup> The writer is indebted to Professor Borton for information on this score.

Arthur might carry through a project of constitutional reform on his own authority without extensive or formal reference to the views of the Committee or the Department of State. In this light, SWNCC-228 is to be interpreted in part as an attempt by the Committee to lay down broad lines of policy for the guidance of SCAP's activities in this field, thus insuring some consideration for the Committee's views. Finally it was doubtless intended, in part at least, as an American policy paper for use before the FEC. The statement was approved by the Committee itself on January 7, 1946 and forwarded to General MacArthur, not as a directive, but for his information, on January 11.

The text of SWNCC-228, insofar as it has been available, is also of considerable interest.<sup>22</sup> Since we are not presently concerned with the substantive recommendations of the Conclusions, suffice it to say that they supply for the Supreme Commander a list of general political objectives for Japanese governmental reform, e.g., a responsible government and executive branch, a representative and powerful legislative branch, a broad guarantee of civil rights, fiscal accountability, abolition or reform of the imperial institution, etc. Without exception, all of these formal recommendations were eventually embodied in the new Japanese constitution. However, the "Conclusions" contain no mention of Japan's permanent disarmament. To the contrary, the "Discussion" section, although speaking of the "abolition of the Japanese armed forces," anticipates their ultimate revival and recommends the advisability of formal action to obtain permanent subordination of the military to civilian control by requiring that ministers of state in all cases be civilians.

Of major present interest is the fact that the "Discussion" section of this paper does squarely, if not altogether satisfactorily, confront the problem raised by the several official Allied commitments to the effect that "The ultimate form of government of Japan shall, in accordance with the Potsdam Declaration, be established by the freely expressed will of the Japanese people." Its argument goes as follows:

The Potsdam Declaration stipulates that the occupying forces shall not be withdrawn from Japan until a "peacefully inclined and responsible government" has been established. Past declarations of the United Nations, and the clear intention of the Allies permanently to eliminate Japanese practices and institutions which have made that country a danger to other nations, clearly indicate that that stipulation refers not merely to the particular Japanese Government which the Allies recognize prior to withdrawal, but also to the nature of Japan's governmental institutions. Although "the ultimate form of government of Japan" is to be determined by the "freely expressed will of the Japanese people," the Allies, in accordance with the above provision and as a part of their overall program for the demilitarization of Japan, are fully empowered to insist that Japanese basic law be so altered as to provide that in practice the government is responsible to the people, and that the civil is supreme over the military branch of the government.

<sup>22</sup> The Department of State has made available to the writer at least a sizeable portion of the text of those sections of SWNCC-228 entitled "Conclusions," "Facts Bearing on the Problem" and "Discussion." There are additional sections, but these have not been available for examination. With the exception of a brief and partial summary of the conclusions in the State Department report, The Far Eastern Commission, op. cit., p. 45, this would seem to be the first time that this information has been released.

This is to say, of course, that certain of the terms upon which Japan surrendered are held by the United States to be more ultimate, more controlling than others, and specifically that the "freely expressed will of the Japanese people" guarantee is properly to be interpreted only within the context of and subordinate to other more basic terms and policies, and as a condition precedent to the termination of the Occupation. From a practical and legal standpoint this is probably a tenable position. Given the potentially contradictory terms of the Potsdam Declaration and the overriding need at the time for taking all steps calculated to insure as permanently as possible the peaceful and responsible character of the Japanese government, this was certainly the most probable position for the United States to take. Even so, however, there remains the problem of the ultimate Japanese reaction to such a stand. They may not concur in the long run and will probably choose instead to interpret the "freely expressed will" proviso as an absolute guarantee, and the United States' stand in SWNCC-228 as evasive, legalistic and essentially immoral—or "insincere," as they are more apt to say. The ambiguous and implicitly contradictory terms of the Potsdam Proclamation lend partial support to such a construction.

Thus SWNCC-228 seems to indicate that the Committee itself—speaking for the State, War and Navy Departments—had agreed: 1) that constitutional revision was necessary and desirable in Japan, 2) that the terms of surrender did not preclude the Allies from requiring such revision, and 3) that, while it was preferable that constitutional reforms be initiated by the Japanese, if they refused to do so, the Supreme Commander might "as a last resort" order the effectuation of a specific list of constitutional changes.<sup>23</sup>

Against this background we may examine next what is known about the Supreme Commander's attitude toward constitutional reform. We have already seen that, while General MacArthur is quoted as telling the Far Eastern Advisory Commission on January 30 that he had ceased to take any action in this field as a result of the Moscow Agreement, he apparently changed his mind within the space of the ensuing four days and initiated a number of moves which were to have sweeping consequences. In explaining this seeming change of mind, it must be remembered that SCAP's concern for constitutional reform did not begin suddenly in the opening days of February 1946. General MacArthur and his Government Section had been deliberately prodding and stimulating Japanese activity in this area since at least the preceding October. But it was not until February that the question came to be assigned an overriding priority, indeed to be treated as a crisis imperatively demanding solution within the shortest possible space of time.

<sup>23</sup> These points are summarized in Section 7 of the "Discussion" part of SWNCC-228 in the following language: "To have lasting value and hence to be most effective, the constitutional and administrative reforms necessary to correct the defects in Japan's governmental system should be initiated and carried into effect by the Japanese Government out of a desire to eliminate elements of the national structure which have brought Japan to its present pass and to comply with the provisions of the Potsdam Declaration. Failing such spontaneous action by the Japanese, the Supreme Commander should indicate the reforms which this Government considers necessary before it can consider a 'peacefully inclined and responsible government' to have been established in Japan, a condition of the Occupation forces' withdrawal. Only as a last resort should a formal instruction be issued to the Japanese Government specifying in detail the reforms to be effected."

A series of important developments began on February 1, 1946: First, General MacArthur ordered his Chief of Government Section, General Whitney to prepare a detailed rejection of the unsatisfactory constitutional proposals of the Matsumoto Committee. Next, General Whitney submitted to the Supreme Commander a lengthy and cogently reasoned memorandum setting forth his official opinion as to the extent of SCAP's authority "to deal with fundamental changes in the Japanese constitutional structure, either by approving or disapproving proposals made by the Japanese Government or by issuing orders or directives to that Government."<sup>24</sup> After considering the several issues of substance and procedure involved, General Whitney concludes that "in the absence of any policy decision by the Far Eastern Commission on the subject (which would, of course, be controlling), you have the same authority with reference to constitutional reform as you have with reference to any other matter of substance in the occupation and control of Japan." It is a well-reasoned brief and represents one quite plausible interpretation of the matter.

Sections Four, Five and Six of the memorandum are of particular interest. These concern the relative roles and authorities of the Supreme Commander and the Far Eastern Commission in the area of constitutional reform. They point out with force and clarity that although any policy directive which the Far Eastern Commission might promulgate on this subject would be controlling on SCAP: 1) General MacArthur's authority was unimpaired until such action by the FEC; and 2) if constitutional revision were originated not by Occupation fiat but by the Japanese government's submission of a reform project to SCAP, (which was an object of policy on substantive grounds), then General MacArthur's subsequent approval of this would not constitute an "order" by SCAP, and hence would not entail prior consultation with the Allied Council for Japan.<sup>25</sup> Thus without definitely recommending any specific form of action, this last clause suggests that, if it is desirable to avoid the intervention of an international body, this may in part be accomplished by arranging that constitutional reform be initiated in a technical sense by the Japanese rather than by SCAP.

Two days after the submission of this memorandum, i.e. on February 3, 1946, General MacArthur changed his mind about the handling of the Matsumoto Committee's proposals. The reasons for this sudden change are still unknown. The decision to draft a model constitution for the guidance of the <sup>24</sup> The complete text of this interesting memorandum is given in Political Reorientation, Vol. 2, pp. 622-23. It is not known whether this advice was initiated by General Whitney or previously solicited by SCAP.

<sup>25</sup> The words of the memorandum were: "It is my opinion that the word 'order' in the charter of the Allied Council is used in the sense of compulsion and would not embrace a mere approval by you of constitutional reform measures submitted to you by the Japanese Government, although your action in approving the same would be subject to review by the FEC under the general review authority of its charter." Op. cit., p. 623.

Japanese, while not a breach of any specific directive to SCAP, paid only lip service to the spirit of the injunction in SWNCC-228 that "only as a last resort should a formal instruction be issued to the Japanese Government specifying in detail the reforms to be effected." A variety of factors may have determined this change of attitude. It may have been due in part simply to cumulative irritation with Japanese dilatoriness or to the natural impatience of a man of action with governmental temporizing and international red tape. Beyond this, General Whitney's recent biography of General MacArthur confirms a further important consideration already suggested.

"When shortly thereafter," General Whitney's account states,<sup>26</sup>

the State Department at the Big Three Foreign Ministers meeting in Moscow in December of 1945, surrendered the unilateral authority we were then exercising over Japan to an eleven-nation policy-making commission and gave the Soviet Union veto power over all policy incident to Japan, MacArthur realized the urgency of immediate action under the powers he then held.

If the Supreme Commander's Aide is accurately portraying his superior's views, this is an extraordinarily interesting statement. Such a view certainly disregards the spirit, if not the letter, of the obligations officially assumed by the United States at Moscow; it also illustrates how firmly the Army doctrine was established that a theater commander is entitled to the fullest freedom of action. Both the United States Government and the Supreme Commander by then had ample provocation and precedent of a practical sort to support this preference for speedy unilateral action. The Soviet attitude and abilities to exploit divisive and potentially explosive issues had already been made painfully and dangerously obvious in Western and Central Europe, and MacArthur's concern to avoid similar perils in Japan is certainly understandable.

As of early February 1946, it emerges, therefore, that the Supreme Commander felt strongly the necessity of prevailing upon the Japanese Government to accept a democratic constitution. It also was desirable on a variety of grounds that such a constitution not be imposed upon the Japanese by formal SCAP directive, but rather that it appear to be of official Japanese origin and be presented to SCAP by the Japanese Government as their own project for which they sought his approval and support. Since FEC was to be formally established in Washington probably before the end of February, time was of the essence. As it turned out, only by gaining Japan's acceptance in principle of a constitution prior to February 26 was it possible for SCAP to forestall possible intervention and to present the FEC with a fait accompli.

IV

When, on February 3, General MacArthur changed his mind, as has already been noted, he summoned General Whitney and ordered him "to prepare a draft constitution."<sup>27</sup> General Whitney at once returned to his Section and informed his three ranking officers—Colonel Charles L. Kades, Lieutenant Colonel Milo E. Rowell and Commander Alfred R. Hussey—of the Supreme Commander's decision. These men then devised a plan of procedure which was approved by General Whitney on February 4. Thereafter a general meeting of the Section's personnel (with the exception of the Korean Division) was called and General Whitney informed them, quite dramatically it is said, of the awesome responsibility which had been placed upon them.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>26</sup> Major General Courtney Whitney, MacArthur, His Rendezvous with History (New York, 1956), p. 247. Italics added.

<sup>27</sup> See Political Reorientation, vol. 1, p. 102.

Under conditions of the greatest secrecy, the Section then organized itself as a "constitutional assembly" composed of some 25 persons divided, with minor overlapping, into nine committees and a secretarial and interpreting service. In addition to General Whitney, four members of this group were lawyers, though none appears to have specialized in constitutional law; another was a former member of Congress, one a specialist in public administration, and two were academic figures—one an historian specializing in China and the other a sociologist with extensive prewar experience in Japan. None of them appears to have had any expert qualifications for the reasonably complex and technical job of drafting a constitution; none of them, with the exception of the two academic figures and one female staff member seems to have had any substantial prewar connection with or knowledge of Japan, its traditions and political institutions. This is not to impugn in any way the individuals involved; the task was a military assignment, certainly not of their own choosing. But it must be recognized that for so fundamental, and critical a task, their qualifications left a good deal to be desired.

The Government Section Report tells something of the labors which ensued.<sup>29</sup> They must in truth have been titanic. The working group consisted of 21 of the 25 Section members. These twenty-one were organized into nine committees: a Steering Committee with directive and coordinating functions, plus working committees on the Legislature; Executive; Judiciary; Civil Rights; Local Government; Finance; the Emperor, Treaties and Enabling Provisions; and the Preamble. One cannot but admire the enthusiasm and energy which all must have brought to their task. A variety of sources, mostly American, seem to have been briefly consulted, although one participant claims that the Soviet Constitution was also studied.<sup>30</sup> Their deliberations were further complicated by the fact that:<sup>31</sup>

... those working on the problem had to bear in mind constantly that they were dealing not only with the abstract problem of writing a democratic constitution but that they were proposing the most far-reaching political reforms for an entire nation, and that, to the greatest extent feasible, the provisions and institutions should be designed to fit the <sup>28</sup> One account claims that General Whitney began his statement with the words: "Ladies and gentlemen, this is an historic occasion. I now proclaim you a constitutional assembly." See Mark Gayn, Japan Diary (New York, 1948), p. 126; or H. E. Wildes, Typhoon in Tokyo (New York, 1954), p. 44.

<sup>29</sup> Political Reorientation, Vol. 1, pp. 102-05; see also McNelly, op. cit., pp. 155-68; Gayn, op. cit., pp. 126-29; Wildes, op. cit., pp. 41-46; and Whitney, op. cit., pp. 246-62.

<sup>30</sup> Wildes, op. cit., p. 44.

<sup>31</sup> Political Reorientation, Vol. 1, p. 105.

Japanese political picture. The document was to serve as a model or pattern, was to be presented as a statement of general principles but in such form that their application could be readily understood. Unless, however, the statement bore some relationship to the existing state of things, it was obvious that it would not serve its purpose.

A wise caution, certainly, although given the group's unfamiliarity with the legal and actual workings of Japan's political system, it is somewhat difficult to see how more than superficial observance could have been given it.

The "constituent assembly" seems to have operated under the strongest sort of pressure for rapid results. It is claimed that the original schedule called for a completed draft in ten days, and looked forward to its adoption within the ensuing eight days, on Washington's birthday, it was hoped.<sup>32</sup> Incredible to say, the first half of this fantastic schedule was actually bettered, the draft being completed on February 10, six days—and doubtless nights—after its commencement; while the Japanese Government actually did informally accept it in "basic principle" on February 22, thus establishing a curious symbolism hitherto appreciated by but a few of the immediate actors in this strange drama. This awesome display of speed and "efficiency" without a doubt represents the world's record time for the devising and acceptance of a constitution for a major modern state.

Upon completion, the draft constitution was presented to General MacArthur who approved it with but a single significant change.<sup>33</sup> The draft was then mimeographed in English on February 12 and presented to the Japanese at a meeting at the Foreign Minister's Residence on February 13, 1946. In the words of Japan's most recent and authoritative commentator on this whole development, this is "the date which should go down in history as the day on which the Japanese Constitution was conceived."<sup>34</sup>

This meeting of February 13 is of critical importance, the principal point at issue being the terms in which the Supreme Commander's officers presented the Government Section's "draft constitution" to the representatives of the Japanese Government. How permissive or how coercive were they? We do not yet have a detailed first-hand report from one or more of the participants, but the secondary accounts presently available yield the following picture.<sup>35</sup>

The meeting was held at 10 A.M. on February 13, 1946 at the Foreign Min-

<sup>32</sup> McNelly, op. cit., p. 161; Wildes, op. cit., p. 44; and Whitney, op. cit., p. 250.

<sup>33</sup> Political Reorientation, Vol. 1, p. 105. The change seems to have involved the deletion of a provision forbidding any amendment to the constitution "impairing or altering the provision of the bill of rights." Ibid. p. 104.

<sup>34</sup> Satō Tatsuo, op. cit., note 11 above, Jurisuto, No. 82 (May 15, 1955), p. 13.

<sup>35</sup> The following account is based primarily on the detailed version given by Satō Tatsuo in the two series of articles cited in footnote 13, and on the Government Section's and General Whitney's own versions in their respective works already cited. Mr. Satō was not himself present at the meeting of February 13, but he claims to base his account of it on Minister Matsumoto's own written summary of what was said, on conversations with Matsumoto, and on the stenographic records of recent discussions of this meeting by other actual participants and a number of well-informed Japanese before the Liberal Party's Constitutional Investigation Committee. See Jurisuto, op. cit., No. 82, p. 12. See also Quigley and Turner, op. cit., pp. 118-20.

ister's official residence in Azabu. The Supreme Commander was represented by General Whitney, Colonel Charles L. Kades, Lieutenant-Colonel Milo E. Rowell and Commander Alfred R. Hussey, Jr. The Japanese group consisted of the then Foreign Minister Yoshida Shigeru, Minister of State Matsumoto Jōji, a member of the Foreign Ministry staff named Hasegawa, and Mr. Yoshida's confidential secretary Shirasu Jirō. The meeting had originally been requested by the Japanese for February 5 to discuss the Matsumoto proposals submitted to SCAP on February 1 and subsequently had been postponed for a week at their request. So far as they knew, its purpose was still to discuss Minister Matsumoto's recommendations for minimal revision of the constitution. The Government Section Report describes the events of the meeting in the following terms:<sup>36</sup>

General Whitney informed the Japanese representatives that the proposals of the Matsumoto Committee were totally unacceptable, that they fell short of that broad and liberal reorganization of the Japanese governmental structure along democratic lines which the Allied Powers could regard as significant evidence that Japan had learned the lessons of war and defeat and was prepared to act as a responsible member of a peaceful community. He then stated that the Supreme Commander had caused to be prepared a detailed statement of those principles he deemed basic, that the statement was being presented to the Japanese Government in the form of a draft constitution, and that the Government was advised to give it the fullest consideration and use it as a guide in its renewed efforts to prepare a revised constitution. The Japanese were told that there was no compulsion upon them to take further action but that the Supreme Commander was determined that the constitutional issue should be brought before the people well in advance of the general election and that they should have full opportunity to discuss freely and freely express their will on constitutional reform. Failing action by the Cabinet, General MacArthur was prepared to lay the issue before the people himself.

The only question that ensued involved the question of a unicameral legislature, which Dr. Matsumoto questioned. The Japanese appeared visibly surprised and disturbed and said they would have to consider the matter and discuss it with the Cabinet before any definite answer could be given.

So far as it goes, this seems to be a completely accurate statement of what transpired at the meeting. In itself and despite its explicit disclaimer of any intent to compel action by the Japanese Government in this matter, the account establishes the application of a very compelling pressure to obtain a favorable and speedy reaction from the Japanese Government. The threat to take the entire issue to the people over the Government's head was potent. Given the traditional distrust of Japanese officials for popular sovereignty in any form, rendered particularly acute at the moment by the country's desperate and tumultuous economic and social circumstances and the unprecedented scale of left-wing political activities, it is difficult to conceive of any more ominous development from the standpoint of Japanese officialdom than a constitution formulated in the "marketplace." The addition of the warning that SCAP intended that the issue of constitutional revision be brought before the people "well in advance of the general election" gave to this threat practically the force of an ultimatum. The statement was made on February 13. At the time the general election was scheduled for March 31, a bare 45 days later.

<sup>36</sup> Political Reorientation, Vol. 1, p. 105.

In his recent book General Whitney has expanded upon the official version of this threat to take the draft constitution to the people. He reveals that he made this statement without prior authorization from General MacArthur and was somewhat concerned as to whether his superior would approve of it. His account goes as follows:<sup>37</sup>

Then I took a chance. With no prior authorization from MacArthur, I told the Japanese that while there was no compulsion upon them to take further action, the Supreme Commander was determined that the constitutional issue should be brought before the people well in advance of the general election. He felt, I explained, that they should have full opportunity to discuss and freely express their will on constitutional reform. Therefore, I said, if the cabinet were unable to prepare a suitable and acceptable draft before the elections, General MacArthur was prepared to lay this statement of principle directly before the people.

The effect of this statement upon the Japanese representatives was immediately visible. Mr. Shirasu straightened up as if he had sat on something. Dr. Matsumoto sucked in his breath. Mr. Yoshida's face was a black cloud. . . .

By the time we had left Mr. Yoshida's residence shortly thereafter, we were fairly convinced that our proposed draft would be accepted as the basis for the revised constitution. But my gratification at this was tempered by the realization that I had committed MacArthur to a political maneuver which he might consider rash [i.e. the threat to publish the draft]. . . .

But I had known him long enough so that I should have realized what his answer would be . . . "Court," he said, "don't you know that I have never repudiated any action taken for me by a member of my staff? Right or wrong, whether I like it or not, I accept the situation as it stands and determine my next move from there." Nothing more was said on the subject.

This threat of publication might in itself have been enough to insure the compliance of the Shidehara Cabinet.

According to Mr. Satō's account, however, further and even stronger pressures were brought to bear. He attributes to General Whitney these additional statements which do not appear in either the official Government Section Report or General Whitney's own account: (1) That a constitution similar to that drafted by the Government Section would "without fail be accepted by SCAP, the United States [Government] and by the Far Eastern Commission as well."<sup>38</sup> (2) That "General MacArthur had for some time been considering most seriously the maintenance of the Emperor, but that it was essential to the accomplishment of this aim that the Japanese Government proclaim a revised constitution similar to the draft here being presented. If this was not done, the person of the emperor could not be guaranteed."<sup>39</sup> After concluding on the rather remarkable note that SCAP was not "ordering" the Japanese Government to adopt such a constitution, General Whitney is then said to have given the Japanese twenty minutes in which to examine the draft constitution which had been presented to them.<sup>40</sup> He and his aides in the interim withdrew to the garden.

<sup>37</sup> Whitney, op. cit., pp. 250-52.

<sup>38</sup> Satō, Jurisuto, No. 82, p. 13; Tokino Hōrei, No. 170, p. 15.

<sup>39</sup> Ibid. Italics added.

<sup>40</sup> General Whitney estimates the time as "about an hour." Op. cit., p. 251.

After this break, the meeting resumed under somewhat melodramatic circumstances, described by General Whitney in the following terms:<sup>41</sup>

... At the end of about an hour, I decided that we should rejoin our hosts, and we were rising as Mr. Shirasu reappeared.

He seemed flustered by the drastic changes in our draft, and it occurred to me that this was an opportune moment to employ one more psychological shaft. I did not know the impressive support that I was about to receive from an unexpected quarter.

As he mumbled apologies for keeping us waiting, I replied with a smile: "Not at all, Mr. Shirasu. We have been enjoying your atomic sunshine."

And at that moment, with what could not have been better timing, a big B-29 came roaring over us. The reaction upon Mr. Shirasu was indescribable, but profound.

When we seated ourselves across the patio from the committee members again, I could see that Mr. Shirasu's colleagues were as upset by our proposals as he was. . . .

Their perturbation is readily understandable. The conversations having been resumed on this heavy-handed note, Matsumoto, after trying to ascertain the reasons for which a unicameral legislature was being recommended, explained that they would have to study the draft constitution and consult with their colleagues. Their visitors then departed. According to Mr. Satō, the meeting had lasted for slightly over an hour.

The attitude subsequently adopted by the Japanese Government testifies to the persuasiveness of the pressures which SCAP's representatives are said to have exerted at this meeting. Their full force should be appreciated. First, the statement attributed to General Whitney that a Japanese Constitution similar to the Government Section model would "without fail be accepted by SCAP, the United States and by the Far Eastern Commission" placed the Japanese in a very difficult position.<sup>42</sup> They were told that the Allied Powers intended to insist on extensive constitutional revision. They were in effect offered a choice between accepting the model provided by SCAP's Government Section or of embarking on the uncertainties of drafting a variant version more to their liking. They were assured of SCAP's approval and support of its document and officially informed that it would also be accepted by the top Allied authorities. Moreover, a specific and detailed constitution was before them. Without a doubt, it was most unpalatable, but at least they knew the worst of its terms. If they were to reject the Government Section Draft and set out to write their own constitution, they might seriously jeopardize the good will of the Supreme Commander and of his Government Section. These were perhaps the most important agencies in Japan at that time and for an unpredictable number of years to come; no responsible Japanese officials would lightly incur such a risk. Second, if they were to write their own constitution at some later date, it would then have to be approved in the first instance by SCAP and his Government Section. Would they approve any version not substantially similar to the Government Section Draft? The Japanese could only guess at what positive gains might ultimately accrue from delay. Third, if they delayed for more than a week or two, the Far Eastern Commission could be expected to have come into official existence and operation. The Japanese were quite well aware that the FEC was intended as a policy-determining agency for the Occupation, with a special interest and authority in the field of constitutional reform. Did they prefer to deal with the known dangers presented by SCAP, or the unknown perils of a remote and complex international agency of which the USSR was a prominent and powerful member?

<sup>41</sup> Ibid.

<sup>42</sup> If such a statement was made, one cannot refrain from wondering by virtue of what authority or prescience General Whitney could thus commit the still nonexistent FEC to the approval of a document it had never seen.

The most decisive pressure said to have been brought against them is, however, the threat to "the person of the Emperor."<sup>4</sup> If such a threat was made, one can understand far better the docility of the Japanese in the remaining negotiations on constitutional revision. It is only necessary to recall that when they accepted the terms of surrender set forth at Potsdam, they attempted to make but a single stipulation that "the said declaration [of Potsdam] does not comprise any demand which prejudices the prerogatives of His Majesty as a Sovereign Ruler." Their overruling concern was to salvage at least the imperial system from the ruins of national defeat.

The wording of this "threat" is also of interest: "the person of the Emperor could not be guaranteed." The inference from this was a potential menace not to the imperial system but to the present emperor individually. There was already some uncertainty over the degree of protection afforded the imperial system—not the reigning emperor—by the Allies' evasive reply to Japan's qualified acceptance of the Potsdam terms. This particular phrasing of the "threat" therefore could hardly have been more skillfully chosen. It does not raise the difficult question of the fate of the system as such, but confines itself to the fate of the individual, Hirohito, the Shōwa Emperor. It does this, furthermore, at a time when there was a strong segment of official and public opinion in the victorious Allied countries in favor of forcing the Emperor to stand trial before an international tribunal as Japan's foremost "war criminal." The attitude adopted by SCAP on this issue could well have been of critical importance. If speed, secrecy and docile acquiescence in the terms of an American-drawn constitution were the price of the Supreme Commander's favor, the official reaction might very well have been—to use the words of the Imperial Rescript ending the war—"to endure the unendurable and suffer what is insufferable."

The pressures, once applied, are said to have been maintained. Matsumoto reported immediately to Premier Shidehara and thereafter set to work on a revised explanation of the Matsumoto Draft, hoping this might serve for further negotiation. When Shirasu Jirō took this to Headquarters on February 18, he was informed there was no possibility at all of the Matsumoto Draft being considered. More significantly, Mr. Satō says that Shirasu was told at this time that "whether or not there was any intent [among the Japanese] to make progress on the basis of the Headquarters Draft should be demonstrated by the twentieth. If not, the Headquarters Draft would be published."<sup>44</sup> This implies in effect a two-day ultimatum.

<sup>4</sup> Mr. Satō is very specific about the wording of this alleged threat, even to the extent of supplying the English phrase "person of the Emperor" in its kana equivalent.

It was only at this point, on February 19, that the Japanese cabinet was officially informed of the pending negotiations and the gist of the terms of the MacArthur Draft. Following the cabinet meeting Shidehara himself had an audience with General MacArthur to make quite certain of his current intentions and to ask for an extension of the "ultimatum" to February 22. The premier had a further interview with General MacArthur on February 21 and reported the results to a cabinet meeting on the twenty-second. It was at this meeting that the Japanese Government decided officially that Minister Matsumoto should visit Headquarters that afternoon and "accept the so-called basic principles set forth at the meeting of the thirteenth," as well as explore more fully the subject of "basic form." Matsumoto acted accordingly and returned from an hour and forty minute conference with General Whitney and four of his aides most disappointed that "they had shown practically no inclination to compromise." So on Washington's birthday, the Japanese Government agreed in principle to draft a constitution following closely the terms of the so-called "MacArthur Draft" of February 13, 1946. It was just ten days since the Japanese representatives were first shown the American draft.

Considerations of space preclude detailed analysis here of the terms of the MacArthur Draft compared to those of the several ensuing "Japanese" Drafts.<sup>45</sup> Suffice it to say that it provided for Japan a curious amalgam of the British and American systems of government. The Emperor was stripped of all power, theoretical as well as actual, and left simply as "the symbol of the State and of the unity of the people." The "sovereignty" of the popular will was asserted. A unicameral legislature was created and designated as "the highest organ of state power" and the "sole lawmaking authority of the State." A cabinet on the British model was established and linked to the legislature in normal parliamentary fashion, save for the addition of an ambiguous and potentially troublesome statement vesting plenary "executive power" in the Cabinet. The judiciary chapter was plainly drawn from American experience and vested "the whole judicial power" in "a Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Diet may from time to time establish." Article 73 even granted to the Supreme Court final power of judicial review in all cases arising under the civil rights chapter of the Constitution and very extensive powers to review the constitutionality of laws, ordinances and official acts in all other cases. The third chapter embodied what is perhaps the world's most extensive constitutional guarantees of civil rights. Besides all of the normal protections, this extends to freedom of thought and conscience, academic freedom, the essential equality of the sexes, social security, and the right to work. Most unusual of all, however, was Chapter II on the "Renunciation of War." In wording this follows in general the text provided by General MacArthur when he instructed the Government Section to draft a model constitution.<sup>46</sup> By its terms Japan renounced its sovereign right to make war or to use force or threats of force as a means of settling international disputes. Beyond this, it also stated that "no army, navy, air force or other war potential will ever be authorized" or any rights of belligerency conferred upon the State.

<sup>44</sup> Jurisuto, No. 82, p. 14.

<sup>45</sup> A Japanese text of the MacArthur Draft (in the Foreign Ministry's translation of the original English version) is given in Jurisuto, No. 82, pp. 14-18. English and Japanese versions are also available in T. Miyazawa and I. Satō, op. cit., note 13 above, pp. 1-37 of separately paged appendix.

This brief statement of major provisions does scant justice to one of the more remarkable constitutional endeavors of our time. Viewed in an abstract and technical sense, there is little that is mechanically wrong or inoperable about the document, despite the jumble of institutions not usually found together. It is a "textbook constitution," such as might be expected from a small group of earnest, well intentioned men having few professional qualifications for their task, even less specialized knowledge of the Japanese political system, and working under intense pressure. In such circumstances it is all too easy for a combination of democratic idealism and concern for short term tactical objectives to overshadow long range considerations and the unpalatable socio-political facts of the situation. Despite protestations to the contrary, this seems to be what happened in SCAP during these hectic early weeks of February 1946. The Government Section patched together an almost ideally democratic constitution, one that could scarcely have gained serious consideration if advocated for adoption in the United States. It had even less relevance to the traditional and dominant political aspirations or practices of Japan.

Events after February 22 continued to move rapidly. In strict secrecy the Japanese began on February 26 to prepare what is known as the First Japanese Government Draft of the Constitution. Under strong pressure from SCAP, this was completed on March 2—nine days earlier than originally scheduled—and delivered to the Government Section at 10 A.M. on March 4.<sup>47</sup> The negotiating session which ensued between Japanese and American representatives lasted with but minor interruptions for thirty hours, until 4 P.M., March 5. During this period the First Japanese Draft and a lengthy explanation of it by Minister Matsumoto were translated into English. Government Section officials then objected to a number of proposed changes from the MacArthur Draft. Resolution of these issues took up the remainder of the night and most of the next day.<sup>48</sup> During this session the Japanese gained SCAP's consent to the

<sup>46</sup> See p. 986, above.

<sup>47</sup> An English translation of this is available in Political Reorientation, Vol. 2, pp. 625-30. The original Japanese text is in Jurisuto, No. 83, (June 1, 1955) pp. 12-16.

<sup>48</sup> The Japanese representatives seem to have been quite willing to proceed at a more decorous pace, but Mr. Satō claims that they were informed about 6 P.M. on March 4 that General Whitney, with the imminence of the general election in mind, wanted immediate results and was prepared to wait till midnight for a firm draft, and, if this was not long enough, until 6 A.M. Under such pressure, the exhausted Japanese, abandoned after the first half-hour by their leader, Matsumoto—who claimed to be ill—had no choice but to continue through the night. After Matsumoto's early departure, the Japanese seem to have been represented principally, if not entirely, by Shirasu Jirō (confidential secretary to the substitution of a bicameral for a unicameral national assembly; they got very few other concessions of any significance. The product of this marathon meeting was a third draft, the so-called "Second Japanese Government Draft" or the "Cabinet Draft." The English text was controlling and—save for the substitution of a bicameral legislature—as a whole bears a closer resemblance to the "MacArthur Draft" than to the intermediate "First Japanese Government Draft" of March 2.<sup>49</sup>

The Japanese Cabinet met more or less continuously throughout the day and evening of March 5. As it became available from the meeting at Headquarters, the text of the "Second Japanese Government Draft" was presented to them. It is said that Premier Shidehara and other ministers burst into tears upon reading it.<sup>50</sup> Seeing no practicable alternative, however, they decided to submit it to the Emperor. Premier Shidehara did this at 5 p.m. and the Emperor promptly issued an Imperial Rescript stating that:<sup>51</sup>

It is therefore my desire that the constitution of our Empire be revised drastically upon the basis of the general will of the people and the principle of respect for fundamental human rights. I command hereby the competent authorities of my Government to put forth in conformity with my wish their best efforts towards the accomplishment of this end.

On March 6 the text of this new draft was published in both Japanese and English. General MacArthur immediately made known his strong approval.<sup>52</sup>

It is with a sense of deep satisfaction that I am today able to announce a decision of the Emperor and Government of Japan to submit to the Japanese people a new and enlightened Constitution which has my full approval. This instrument has been drafted after painstaking investigation and frequent conference between members of the Japanese Government and this Headquarters following my initial direction to the Cabinet five months ago. . . .

Some three and a half months later—on June 21, 1946—on the occasion of the submission of the Draft Constitution to the Diet, the Supreme Commander issued another public statement in which he said in part:<sup>53</sup>

. . . The Government Draft now before the Diet is a Japanese document and it is for the Foreign Minister), Satō Tatsuo (of the Cabinet Bureau of Legislation), and Hasegawa Genkichi and Obata Kunryō (two officials from the Foreign Ministry). At least sixteen officers of the Government Section plus a number of Nisei translators and interpreters were arrayed against this small group. General Whitney appeared only after the work was completed late in the afternoon of March 5 and then only to express his great pleasure at the nature of the results—a sentiment which, as Satō wryly says, was hardly shared by the Japanese. Both he and General MacArthur, however, were in constant indirect communication with the negotiators. They received, and apparently approved of, each article as it emerged from the meeting at the Government Section, as did Minister Matsumoto also. General MacArthur had approved the entire draft by 5:30 p.m., March 5—about the same time as the Emperor did. See Whitney, op. cit., pp. 254–55.

<sup>49</sup> An English version of this draft is printed in Political Reorientation, Vol. 2, pp. 631–36. The Japanese text may be found in Jurisuto, No. 86 (July, 15 1955), pp. 52–56.

<sup>50</sup> Satō in Jurisuto, No. 88 (August 15, 1955), p. 34.

<sup>51</sup> SCAP, Summation of Non-Military Activities, March 1946, p. 18.

<sup>52</sup> Political Reorientation, Vol. 2, p. 657.

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., p. 660.

people of Japan, acting through their duly elected representatives, to determine its form and content—whether it be adopted, modified or rejected. . . .

The publication of the "Second Japanese Government Draft" on March 6 was the first public intimation that decisive official action in this sphere was imminent. All proceedings until this time had been conducted in the strictest secrecy by both SCAP and the Japanese Government. The U. S. Department of State had not seen the draft constitution before its publication. There is no indication that any other branch of the U. S. government was consulted in any significant manner or shown any of the constitutional drafts.<sup>54</sup> The FEC was completely surprised by the publication of the March 5 Draft.<sup>55</sup> Secretary Byrnes announced on March 12 that the new constitution would be submitted to the FEC before final adoption. Judging from press comments, the Japanese public was equally surprised by this specific development, although a general public discussion of desirable constitutional changes had been going on for several months. Japanese newspaper and political reaction—with the exception of the Communist Party—was in general distinctly favorable. Mixed with this pleasure, however, was a veiled but detectable incredulity that so liberal a document had been the product of the Shidehara Government. The more sophisticated readers were left in little doubt that SCAP's role in its formulation must have been considerably more than advisory and consultative. Mass reaction is more difficult to determine with any accuracy. Among other obstacles, adequate popular comprehension of the draft constitution was impeded by the fact that the March 5 Draft was written in bungotai, a technical literary form of the language generally used in official documents but difficult for the average Japanese to understand.<sup>56</sup> A concerted publicity campaign was launched, however, to explain and popularize the March 5 Draft.

For present purposes the remainder of the Constitution's history may be speedily recounted. Following the publication of the March 5 Draft, popular attention centered upon the campaign for the April 10, 1946 general election of members of the House of Representatives. It was SCAP's plan that this should serve in effect as a popular referendum, with the proposed new constitution the principal policy issue at stake.<sup>57</sup> Actually this was not the case. All parties save the Communist approved the draft constitution in principle, but popular interest seems to have focussed primarily on more mundane problems of national and individual livelihood and subsistence, and on the great number of

<sup>54</sup> See Jones, Borton and Pearn, op. cit., p. 341.

<sup>55</sup> See McNelly, op. cit., pp. 226-27.

<sup>56</sup> At SCAP's insistence, the April 17, 1946 and subsequent drafts of the new constitution were written in ordinary Japanese. This occurred after the general election of April 10, however.

<sup>57</sup> It was widely claimed in Washington, D. C. at this time that both the Department of State and the Far Eastern Commission strongly disapproved of this plan and were urging some more specific consultation of Japanese public opinion with respect to the constitution, perhaps in the form of a special constitutional assembly or referendum. See Jones, Borton and Pearn, op. cit., p. 342.

bitter personal and party contests for Diet seats. It is difficult to regard the results as a reliable expression of popular views on the constitution.

On April 15 the Japanese Government submitted what is known as the "Third Japanese Government Draft" to SCAP.<sup>58</sup> The most notable change here was the use of colloquial Japanese rather than the formal bungotai, but a number of minor alterations of language and detail were made. SCAP accepted these and the draft was published on April 17. The same day it was submitted to the Privy Council for its scrutiny and approval, a procedure mandatory for all bills of constitutional amendment under the Meiji Constitution. On April 22 the Privy Council commenced its deliberations on the Draft, only to be interrupted on May 24 when the newly constituted Yoshida Cabinet briefly withdrew the Draft to make some minor changes. Resubmitted on May 25, it was approved by the Privy Council—by a less than unanimous vote—on June 8, 1946.

On June 20 a "Fourth Japanese Government Draft," with slightly altered style and terminology, was formally introduced as a bill of constitutional amendment into the House of Representatives at the newly convoked Ninetieth Session of the Imperial Diet.<sup>59</sup> From June 25 to 28 this bill was debated before a plenary session of the lower house. From July 1 to August 21 it was considered by two committees, a Special Committee of 72 members representing the various parties in the House in proportion to their strength, and a smaller 14 member Subcommittee which actually formulated all changes made in the original bill. The amendments so recommended—all accepted by the lower house—involved changes in the Preamble and twenty-two articles of the draft constitution, as well as the deletion of one and the addition of four new articles. A number of minor verbal changes were also made.<sup>60</sup> Throughout, the Government Section was consulted and all proposed changes "were checked with" it.<sup>61</sup> On August 21 hearings before the lower house sitting as a Committee of the Whole were resumed, and on August 24 all changes recommended by the Special Committee were approved and the amended bill was adopted by a vote of 421 to 8. Six of the eight opponents were Communists. The bill was then sent to the House of Peers.

<sup>58</sup> The English text is printed in Political Reorientation, Vol. 2, pp. 637-42.

<sup>59</sup> The English text is available ibid., pp. 643-48. Technically this took the form of a bill of total amendment to the Meiji Constitution. To avoid charges of illegality or the occurrence of a constitutional interregnum, SCAP was most insistent that the procedure of amendment specified in Article 73 of the Meiji Constitution be literally followed. Whether in fact it was so followed rests primarily upon whether or not under the Meiji Constitution the Diet had the power to amend an Imperial project of constitutional amendment. Japanese legal authorities are in disagreement on this matter. For SCAP's views, see Dr. Oppler's memorandum to the Government Section, ibid., pp. 662-66.

<sup>60</sup> A list of these changes may be found in Satō Isao, Kempō Kaisai no Keika [The Development of Constitutional Revision], Tōkyō, Nippon Hyōronsha, 1947, pp. 349-57. See also McNelly, op. cit., pp. 332-39.

<sup>61</sup> Political Reorientation, Vol. 1, p. 111. What degree of positive influence or control was involved in this "checking" is hard to say. The Government Section does not seem to have been displeased with any of the results.

The House of Peers—by this time somewhat reconstituted as a result of SCAP's purge directives—began its consideration of the Bill of Revision on August 26. On August 31 it was sent to a Special Committee of 45 members for more intensive examination. On September 26 it was referred to a 15-member Subcommittee, which on October 3 recommended three amendments. These were accepted by a substantial majority of a plenary session of the House of Peers on October 6, and the amended Bill was returned to the House of Representatives for its concurrence. The lower house gave this on October 7, with only five members (including four Communists) known to have voted against it. The amended Bill was then resubmitted to the Privy Council which accepted the changes on October 29. On November 3, 1946 the Emperor formally promulgated the new "Constitution of Japan (Nihonkoku Kempō)," to take effect six months later on May 3, 1947.

The one-sided votes in both Houses of the Diet give a most misleading impression of the actual course of debate. The reservations and misgivings expressed on the floors of both Houses and in their committees were numerous and grave. Many members evidently did not regard either the Cabinet or themselves as having a completely free choice. In the House of Peers in particular one frequently detects a distinct preference for many of the institutions and practices of the Meiji Constitution. Under the circumstances it is most difficult to assess accurately the true sentiments of the national legislature. Its members were neither ignorant nor insensitive to the considerations of national interest which seem earlier to have determined the views and actions of the Shidehara Cabinet. Japan was under military occupation; SCAP and the Government Section were generally recognized in sophisticated political circles as the real authors of this constitution and its strongest proponents; the Japanese Government was already committed in principle; and the Government could always wield the weapon of dissolution against any large scale opposition in the lower house. Finally, SCAP's very thoroughgoing political purge in the spring and summer of 1946 had drastically affected the national political scene in terms of personnel, organization and attitudes; and the threat of further purges was very real. These were circumstances scarcely calculated to produce in the national legislature a full, free and uninhibited expression of views on so sensitive an issue—particularly at the voting stage. These considerations of course, weighed differently with various parties and individuals. They affected least the socialist and so-called "proletarian" elements which in general strongly and genuinely favored the new constitution. But they bore with particular strength upon the dominant conservative element of the membership, and it is here in particular that the representative quality of the Diet's voting and action is open to question.

While the draft constitution was before the Diet, SCAP's concern continued to be actively asserted. In the words of the Government Section Report: "Consultations were carried on almost continuously, and all proposed amendments were checked with Government Section, but only on one occasion did the Supreme Commander instruct the Japanese Government to take any specific step."<sup>62</sup> Mr. Satō's account confirms the continuous scrutiny and clearance of amendments by the Government Section and intimates pressure on the Diet to adopt some of them.<sup>63</sup> It is doubtful whether any more explicit orders would have been necessary. With the single exception noted, no order or instruction is known to have been issued to the Japanese Government during the whole process.

The single instance was stimulated by the Far Eastern Commission. When the FEC's committees were organized on March 14, 1946, they found that the Japanese Government had already issued—eight days earlier—a draft constitution which General MacArthur had strongly endorsed in a public statement. The FEC could do little save to adopt on July 2 a policy decision entitled "Basic Principles for a New Japanese Constitution,"<sup>64</sup> substantially identical with the earlier SWNCC-228 of January 7, 1946. The FEC continued to discuss Japanese constitutional reform on a number of occasions throughout the year, often in a context indicating their disapproval of SCAP's course. As a result, several other directives were sent to General MacArthur. These referred primarily to the FEC's determination that it should have a right ultimately to review any new Japanese Constitution, that all cabinet ministers should be civilians, and that a majority of the Ministers of State should be members of the Diet.<sup>65</sup> The last two of these required changes in the text of the draft constitution, which SCAP prevailed upon the Japanese to accept before the new constitution was formally promulgated on November 3, 1946.

In the end, how closely does the new Japanese Constitution resemble the original "MacArthur Draft?" It is difficult to answer that question definitively. Some of the differences between the two documents are so subtle that they do not even appear in a translated version; they rest upon the selection of delicately shaded terms and phrases in Japanese or upon the peculiarities of Japanese grammar. Others continue to be debated in Japanese legal circles, and the experts themselves are undecided as to a proper interpretation of the points at issue. Such subtleties aside, the prevailing impression is the extremely faithful manner in which the terms of the present constitution mirror those of the original Government Section Draft.

The similarity begins with such obvious matters as style, wording and the internal ordering of the chapters and articles. Despite a considerable number of changes of detail in wording, no one reading the two texts could be in doubt that the relationship is very close. This sense of substantial identity in a literary way is heightened—for anyone possessed of some familiarity with the style of Japanese public documents—by the unmistakable alien and American

<sup>62</sup> Ibid.

<sup>63</sup> See, for example, Toki no Hōrei, No. 178 (Aug. 3, 1955), p. 18, or Satō Isao, op. cit., p. 193.

<sup>64</sup> The text is in Activities of the Far Eastern Commission, February 26, 1946–July 10, 1947. Department of State Publication 2888 (Washington, 1947), pp. 65–66.

<sup>65</sup> Ibid., pp. 65–68, and Political Reorientation Vol. 1, p. 111 and Vol. 2, pp. 661 and 667–68.

quality of the language in both. This fact alone has occasioned a certain amount of literary anguish among sophisticated Japanese; the style is simply not good Japanese. It was even necessary to invent new ideographic compounds to express certain of the concepts expressed, so foreign were they to Japanese patterns of thought. Beyond this, a study of the allusions and literary sources of the language in the preambles of both drafts is illuminating. A partial listing would include the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, the Gettysburg Address, the Atlantic Charter and General MacArthur. No analogous references to the Japanese literary heritage occur.<sup>66</sup> Throughout both versions of the constitution the wording, style and even the punctuation are almost always very similar and, more often than not, substantially identical.

In an institutional sense there are two especially prominent differences between the two drafts. The first and perhaps the most significant is the substitution of a bicameral national legislature for the unicameral body originally favored by the Government Section. This involved, of course, a good deal of corollary adjustment in other related sections. While making some concession to Japanese views in this respect, SCAP still did not endorse the type of bicameral assembly which the Japanese really wanted. Their project had called for an upper house based on the "corporative" and professional elements in society. SCAP rejected this however, in favor of an upper house based essentially on the usual geographic and demographic factors.

The second major institutional change has to do with the Supreme Court and its right to review issues of constitutionality. The "MacArthur Draft" had originally specified that the power of judicial review should be final only with respect to cases arising under or involving the civil rights chapter of the constitution. Rulings on constitutionality in other spheres might be set aside by a two-thirds vote of the entire membership of the Diet. In the course of the all-night negotiations at the Government Section on March 4-5, this wording was discarded in favor of a general and unqualified grant of power to the Supreme Court "to determine the constitutionality of any law, order, regulation or official act." This wording remained through all subsequent versions of the constitution.

A number of other less conspicuous differences appear between the two drafts. The final version contains a stronger and more explicit statement of popular sovereignty. Article 9, the "renunciation of war" clause, has changes in wording, the precise effects of which are still moot. The civil rights chapter, elaborate to begin with, has been even further refined and expanded. Specific clauses have been added requiring that the Premier and a majority of the ministers of state be Diet members, and that the Premier and all ministers must be civilians. The early requirement that the Premier's appointees to cabinet status must receive Diet approval has been deleted, as has an article conferring original jurisdiction in certain cases upon the Supreme Court. A guarantee of universal adult suffrage has been added, and the provisions concerning the financial status of the Imperial House have been strengthened. Finally an explicit statement of the principle of local autonomy has been added. These appear to be the more important substantive changes. Perhaps they sound more impressive than they really are. The changes noted here relate to but a very small fraction of the constitution's 103 articles. The basic concepts, institutions and practices originally conceived by the Government Section and embodied in the so-called "MacArthur Draft" are in almost all cases substantially identical in content, style and wording to the provisions of the present Constitution of Japan.

<sup>66</sup> See McNelly, op. cit., pp. 203-05.

V

The essentially American origins of the present Japanese constitution raise questions reaching far beyond the historical concern for setting the record straight. For better or worse, actions were taken that cannot now be undone. Their consequences are of continuing and positive importance and the lessons to be drawn from the entire episode are still clouded with uncertainties.

In the first place, the entire process of clandestine American influence on the style, content and adoption of the Japanese constitution poses in acute fashion the issue of the degree of independence and autonomous power in the political sphere which should be accorded to the military commanders of overseas theatres or occupied areas after hostilities have ceased. Neither the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee nor any other civilian agency of the Government saw the specific or complete terms of any constitutional drafts prior to their publication on March 6, 1946. Recognizing the American military tradition of freedom of action for theater commanders, and bearing in mind the weakness of the State Department in top councils throughout the war, one still can only marvel at the degree of freedom permitted to or taken by the Supreme Commander in this highly political matter.

It is difficult to conceive of any other single action of the Allied Occupation of Japan comparable in external or internal importance to the formulation of the new constitution. So far as is known the effective support for the quixotic Article 9, the "renunciation of war" section, derived solely from General MacArthur. No other branch of the United States Government and no responsible Japanese ministry or agency is known to have even considered such a clause prior to February 13, 1946. Yet this decision alone has constituted a most serious and continuing impediment to the United States' military and diplomatic world strategy since 1947-48 at least. The responsibility for this would seem—in the light of the present evidence—to rest squarely on the Supreme Commander's shoulders.

Would prior consultation with the Department of State or SWNCC have avoided this outcome? For a complex of reasons the influence of the Department was in eclipse during the war. But it is very hard to imagine the staff of the Department assenting, even in February 1946, to the permanent and constitutional disarmament of Japan. It is equally difficult to conceive of a professional diplomat imagining that General Whitney's heavy handed "psychological shafts"—which he seemed to confuse with diplomacy—provided an appropriate or durable foundation for a democratic political order in Japan. There is nothing inherent in the administrative nature of a military occupation which renders it impossible to confer some jurisdiction in such fundamental political cases upon the civilian and more professionally qualified branches of the national service.

Our failure to do so in Japan seems to have contributed in an important degree to a second development of continuing concern to American national policy, the growing movement for revision of the "MacArthur Constitution."<sup>87</sup> The so-called "conservative elements" in Japanese politics, which have since the war controlled about two-thirds of the popular vote and of the seats in the national House of Representatives, have never made any secret of their distaste for the present constitution. As the Occupation drew to a close in 1952 and Japan regained her independence, they became increasingly vocal on this score. Since 1952 constitutional revision has been openly advocated by major conservative groups in every general election, and today the Hatoyama Government is engaged in forming a special committee of Diet members and experts to investigate the precise form which revision should take.<sup>88</sup> The newly consolidated Government Party, the Liberal-Democrats, is seriously working for revision of the election law in order, it is widely alleged, to maximize its chances of obtaining more than the two-thirds majorities in both Houses of the Diet required for the initiation of any constitutional amendment.<sup>89</sup>

It remains to be seen whether their losses in the 1956 elections postpone indefinitely the passage of any bill of revision by the Diet. But the constitution further requires a popular referendum on any proposed amendment. At this point the grounds upon which revision is to be presented to the Japanese electorate would become important. The revisionist appeal to the public has been based on multiple grounds, including the claim that the constitution was "made in America" and imposed upon an unwilling Japanese Government by the Occupation authorities, together with nostalgia for a more dignified status for the Emperor. Thus far the Government has used this potentially explosive appeal to nationalistic sentiments with marked circumspection. But the entire constitutional story is so ideally suited to extremist agitation that it may be hard to keep its popular presentation within the moderate bounds the present Japanese Government would probably prefer. The United States may therefore have cause to regret afresh the impulsive actions of its agents in 1946, for the animus of such a campaign must necessarily be anti-American.

<sup>87</sup> For a more detailed account of this, see the present writer's "The Constitution and Current Japanese Politics," in the Far Eastern Survey, vol. 25, No. 4 (April 1956), pp. 49-58.

<sup>88</sup> The Socialist Party has formally declared that it will not participate in the work of this Committee, despite the fact that its establishment was specifically authorized by the Diet in early 1956. The Japan Times, August 11, 1956.

<sup>89</sup> See, for example, Mainichi Shimbun for December 20, 1955, or the New York Times for March 20, 1956.

Most serious of all, however, is the damage this constitution may have done to the very cause it was intended to serve—the democratization of Japan. By imposing upon the Japanese a constitution hopelessly unsuited to the political ideals or experience of the vast majority of the population, the long term interests of democracy may have been ill served. Instead of a system of government based upon and geared to the social, economic and political realities of Japanese society, a hollow but elaborate façade modelled after an idealized version of Anglo-American political institutions was hastily patched together. The result is an enormous gap between political fact and constitutional fiction, the true extent of which has been carefully concealed by a variety of devices. This is not to say that real and important changes in what we would regard as a “progressive” direction have not occurred under the new constitution. They have, and the terms of political competition in Japan have been profoundly affected in several ways of lasting significance. But in general the older and more traditional political views and practices not only survived but grew stronger and bolder after a lean and cautious period during the early years of the Occupation. Since their exponents have controlled postwar Japanese governments with but a single brief exception, actual governmental practice has consistently deviated in numerous important respects from what the constitution and its supporting legal system said it should be. This discrepancy has bred a hypocritical attitude towards the constitution and law in general. Inconvenient constitutional provisions have too often tended to become simply a challenge to administrative ingenuity to invent ways of subverting their intent. In this process democratic institutions and the popular regard for them suffer. The revisionist argument is that postwar Japan has been afflicted by too much democracy and that in important respects the traditional institutions, or a modified version of them, are better. The claim is heard with increasing frequency that “we tried democracy and it didn’t work.” The spreading of that attitude holds ominous implications for the future of Japanese democracy. Unfortunately SCAP must bear some share of the blame for this development.

This was certainly not the only conceivable type of constitution for Japan. In retrospect one can only wish that the Japanese, with advice and guidance of a more open and far less compulsive sort, had been permitted to work out their own constitution over a suitable period of time. Its institutions would doubtless have been far less glittering, and the measure of “democratic progress” obtained far more modest; but the probability is that it would have been basically acceptable in both respects. Beyond this, it could not help but have been better attuned to the people’s political capabilities and, because of this, probably a more durable and workable system. At least it would have been demonstrably “made in Japan,” thus freeing the United States of the numerous embarrassments flowing from its unfortunate involvement with this constitutional ac-couchement forcé.

A NOTE ON THE REVISION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE FOURTH REPUBLIC

ROY MACRIDIS

Washington University (Saint Louis)

Recent political developments in France, particularly the dissolution of the National Assembly and the subsequent elections of January 2, 1956, overshadowed one of the most interesting and long-awaited enactments of the second legislature of the Fourth Republic. A law of November 30, 1954, passed by the National Assembly by the required two-thirds majority, realized the revision of the constitution of the Fourth Republic. The law was the culmination of debates that had begun when the new constitution was framed.<sup>1</sup> One might indeed say that constitutional reform was advocated throughout the whole period of the Third Republic, and in 1945 the French people overwhelmingly expressed themselves in favor of a constituent assembly to frame a new republican constitution. Yet when the document was drafted and submitted to the people it was received with great apathy and endorsed on October 13, 1946, by a minority of the registered voters. No sooner had it been put into force than the movement for reform recommenced, and various leaders like DeGaulle, Reynaud, Mendès-France, Laniel and Bidault joined the eminent statesmen of the Third Republic in proclaiming the need for further revision.<sup>2</sup> Perhaps no better evidence testifies to the inherent instability of the French body politic than this perennial dissatisfaction with the basic instrument of government.

The constitutional revision of November 30, 1954, introduced in 1950,<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For background material see Roy Pierce's "France Reopens the Constitutional Debate," this REVIEW, June, 1952; Jean Boivin-Champeaux, "Peut-On Réviser la Constitution?" Revue des Deux Mondes, April, 1952; George Berlia, "Le Projet de revision constitutionnelle adopté par l'Assemblée Nationale le 23 juillet, 1953," Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique en France et à l'Etranger, juillet-septembre, 1953, pp. 680-696. For a commentary which, however, deals at length with the procedure for amending the Constitution, see F. Goguel, Revue Française de la Science Politique, "La Revision Constitutionnelle de 1954," juillet-septembre, 1955, pp. 485-502. Since writing this I have come across Roy Pierce's "Constitutional Revision in France," Journal of Politics, Vol. 17, pp. 221-247 (May, 1955).

<sup>2</sup> The demand for reform became even more pronounced as time went on. In 1953, four Prime Ministers, Designated Reynaud, Mendès-France, Bidault, and Marie, failed to receive the requisite absolute majority after putting the question of constitutional reform and the need of legislation by decree at the forefront of their program. Année Politique, 1953, p. 42 and pp. 484-514.

<sup>3</sup> The projected revision, involving eleven articles, was formally agreed upon on November 14, 1950. On November 30, of the same year, the project was introduced in the National Assembly and received a favorable vote, 369 to 181. On January 26, 1951, the bill for constitutional reform with amendments cleared the Council of the Republic by 295 to 17 votes and was subsequently referred to the Committee on Universal Suffrage of the National Assembly. It remained there until July 23, 1953, when it was passed on first reading by the National Assembly by 468 to 127 votes. It then passed the Council of the Republic by 240 to 74 votes. After a number of postponements it reached the floor of the National Assembly again and passed on November 30, 1954.

provides a good insight into the manner in which basic decisions are made in France. The revision fails to incorporate the most needed of the reforms advocated,<sup>4</sup> and almost all the changes made bring France closer to the institutions of the Third Republic that the French people solemnly and overwhelmingly rejected. It is perhaps only an added note of irony that Mendès-France, generally acknowledged to be a political leader breathing reform and reconstruction in every one of his pronouncements, was the Prime Minister who put all the weight of his prestige in favor of the enacted revision when the final vote was taken in the National Assembly.

The reforms advocated ever since the enactment of the constitution of the Fourth Republic were addressed to a wide variety of problems. For the sake of simplicity we may classify them in three main categories: (a) reforms aimed at buttressing the position of the democratic parties in the National Assembly by depriving the two extreme political groups of certain powers and privileges that were either real or had a nuisance value; (b) reforms of more basic character designed to strengthen the political and legislative leadership of the Cabinet and the Prime Minister and to promote Cabinet stability; and (c) reforms addressed to the improvement of the relations between the Council of the Republic and the National Assembly. The following articles were revised: 7, 9, 11, 12, 14, 20, 22, 45, 49, 50, and 52.

1. REFORMS TO WEAKEN EXTREMIST GROUPS

These reforms were designed to strike at both extremes and more particularly the Communist Party. They modify provisions of the Fourth Republic's constitution framed at a time when collaboration with the Communist Party was a political reality and when the RPF or, for that matter, the Poujadist movement, had not yet been founded. Now that these groups, in a familiar pattern, seem ready to use the procedures of democracy to undermine democracy, some modest weapons have been added to the majority's arsenal. Article 7 empowering the National Assembly to declare war after prior consultation with the Council of the Republic, now provides also for the declaration of a state of siege "in accordance with the law." Article 11 is revised to strike out the requirement of proportional representation, which in the past gave an automatic representation to the Communist Party, in the election of the Secretariats of the two assemblies. Instead, the Bureau of each Chamber is to be elected in accordance with the standing rules of each body.<sup>5</sup> Article 12 formerly provided for one of the most important constitutional duties of the Bureau of the National Assembly by authorizing it to convene Parliament for an extraordinary session upon the request of the Prime Minister or upon the request of one-third of the members of the Assembly. As the article was revised, the calling of an extraordinary session is mandatory only if requested by the Prime Minister or a majority of the members of the National Assembly. In retrospect this revision may prove fortunate since the Communists and the Poujadists together have very close to one-third of the seats, and extraordinary sessions could have been forced upon the Cabinet. Thanks to this revision the Cabinet will be able to count upon brief periods of tranquillity.

<sup>4</sup> The literature on this subject is quite extensive. For background material, see particularly Léon Blum, La Réforme Gouvernementale (1919); R. Capitant, Le Crise du Parlementarisme (1934); Y. Haikal, La Dissolution de la Chambre des Députés (1935). For the period since the adoption of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic, see: Jacques Meyer, "Constitution et Assemblée," Revue de la Défense Nationale, décembre, 1951; Boris Mirskine Guetsevitch, "La Revision Constitutionnelle," Revue Politique et Parlementaire, décembre, 1951. For one of the parliamentary debates, see: "Proposition de résolution tendant à décider la révision des articles 30, 45, 46, 51, 52 et Titre VI de la Constitution pour assurer la stabilité ministérielle," Journal Officiel de la République Française—Documents Parlementaires—Assemblée Nationale, Annexe No. 9048, 3 août, 1954.

Along another line, article 22 is revised in a manner that limits the scope of the immunity of deputies from arrest or prosecution. They will no longer be protected during the period of their mandate, but only during sessions of the Parliament. When Parliament is not in session a deputy may now be prosecuted and arrested. Some guarantees are inserted, however. The arrested deputy can delegate his right to vote until the Parliament has pronounced itself on his immunity; and if Parliament does not make a decision within thirty days the deputy is automatically released. Finally, article 52 is revised so as to allow a Cabinet to stay in office during elections held in consequence of a dissolution of the National Assembly. The old article 52 provided for the replacement of the Prime Minister by the President of the National Assembly and of the Minister of the Interior by a person designated by him in accord with the Bureau of the National Assembly. It further provided that Ministers of State were to come from the various parliamentary groups not represented in the Cabinet. The new article will thus avert the participation of Communist and other extremist groups in the Cabinet during an electoral campaign unless they were already in it.

These revisions give the Assembly power to strike swiftly at the Communist Party and to protect itself against unwelcome harrassments from minority groups that have shown themselves in the past extremely adept in utilizing parliamentary maneuvers in order to undermine the Cabinet.<sup>6</sup> In most cases the reforms also bring the country closer to the institutions of the Third Republic. This is particularly true of the declaration of a state of siege, the limitation of the scope of parliamentary immunity, and the manner of election of the Bureaux.

<sup>5</sup> The Bureau of the National Assembly is composed of one President, six Vice Presidents, fourteen Secretaries, and three questeurs. The functions of the secretaries and the questeurs are purely routine—the counting of votes, the supervision of physical arrangements, etc. The President, however, and the six Vice Presidents preside over the sessions of the Assembly. The new constitutional revision makes it possible to elect the whole Bureau by majority vote and thus exclude members of the two extreme political groups, provided, of course, that the center groups can agree among themselves on a slate.

<sup>6</sup> Immediately after the formation of the Laniel government in June, 1953, and the adjournment of the Parliament, Communists and Socialists demanded an extraordinary

2. REFORMS TO STRENGTHEN CABINET LEADERSHIP

Suggestions for strengthening Cabinet leadership and promoting Cabinet stability are as old as the Third Republic. At the risk of oversimplifying, they can be reduced to the following: (a) unqualified right of dissolution; (b) executive budget; (c) priority for government bills and more powers to the Cabinet to control the legislative business of the Parliament; (d) sharp limitations upon the financial and legislative powers of the upper house; and (e) responsibility of the Cabinet only to the lower house. It is a political handicap to these proposals that they are in the nature of a standing invitation to "cross the Channel"—an invitation that no French statesman can accept lightly.

The framers of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic instituted the last two of the advocated reforms by reducing the second Chamber to what was generally considered to be a state of political and legislative impotence. When the Council of the Republic was first convened in 1947, President Auriol told it, without any attempt at being humorous, "If the power of decision belongs to the National Assembly, yours is the power of prudence and wisdom." The only substantial right the Council had was to block or to amend legislation that came to it from the National Assembly by voting against it or amending it by an absolute majority vote, in which case the Assembly could override this vote only by an absolute majority. Given the lack of a cohesive majority in the Assembly and the conservative complexion of the Council, this power proved a stronger weapon than the framers of the Constitution anticipated. In some instances it was abused. On the other hand, article 48 disposed in the most unqualified terms of the matter of Cabinet responsibility. The Ministers "are not responsible before the Council of the Republic." The double political responsibility of the Cabinet under the Third Republic and particularly in the years between the two wars had aggravated Cabinet instability and had imposed upon the Prime Minister an impossible task.

The first three of the reforms advocated in the past, however—the right of dissolution, executive budget and cabinet control over legislative business—were not realized, so that the Constitution of the Fourth Republic in these respects reintroduced in essence the letter or the practice of the Third Republic. In fact two modifications were brought about, one dealing with the manner of designating a Prime Minister (article 45) and the other prohibiting delegation of legislative powers to the Cabinet (article 13), which weakened instead of strengthening Cabinet leadership. The first, by requiring an investiture vote to a Prime Minister by an absolute majority and requiring by implication a second vote of confidence on the Cabinet formed by him, made the choice of a Prime Minister and the formation of a Cabinet difficult, prolonged the duration of crises, and accentuated the conventional character of a Cabinet. In the first session for the purpose of discussing some of the economic reforms promulgated by decree. Annales Politiques, 1953, p. 61 ff.

---

legislature, eight out of fifteen political leaders invited by the President of the Republic succeeded in forming a Cabinet that was acceptable to the National Assembly. In the second legislature, only seven out of twenty-four succeeded. Cabinet crises averaged ten days and in some instances lasted over three weeks. The constitutional prohibition of delegation of law-making power to the Cabinet, on the other hand, was ignored. The laws of 1948 and 1953 reintroduced, juridical subtlety to the contrary notwithstanding,<sup>7</sup> the old system of decrets-lois; and the ominous expression, pleins pouvoirs, or pouvoirs spéciaux, gained wide currency once more. Almost every Prime Minister in the second legislature of the Fourth Republic asked for special powers or full powers, and many received them. Yet the controversy about the constitutionality of the procedure embarrassed many a government, brought the fall of others, and led to interminable debates that distracted attention from legislative programs.

It would have been natural, therefore, to expect a constitutional revision to be addressed to the realization of some of the reforms that had not been carried out. There was, in fact, a strong parliamentary movement spearheaded by Paul Reynaud arguing in favor of measures that were designed to strengthen Cabinet leadership. Speaking before the Assembly, Reynaud had urged that the right of dissolution should be given to the Prime Minister so that it could be used if a Cabinet was overthrown at any time within the first eighteen months of office.<sup>8</sup> Writing in 1948, he had also pointed out that

... the instrument of structural and rapid reform (the decret-loi) was destroyed by those who were, after the liberation, persuaded to throw overboard the Constitution of 1875.<sup>9</sup>

Yet neither article 51 nor article 13 was included in the revision of November 30, 1954. The right of dissolution remains as hedged and qualified as ever, while the constitutional prohibition in article 13 against delegation of law-making powers to the Cabinet continues. Perhaps it was conceded that Reynaud's argument was no longer pressing, since constitutional practice had already done away with article 13.

Only a piecemeal attempt was made to strengthen the Cabinet. Article 9 is modified so as to re-establish the right of cloture in the National Assembly by the Prime Minister after the Assembly has sat for seven months. This right had been denied him by the Constitution of the Fourth Republic. Article 49 is modified so as to re-establish the old practice of endorsing a new Prime Minister and his Cabinet by a simple majority instead of requiring a double vote of investiture—to the Prime Minister by absolute majority and subsequently to the Cabinet.<sup>10</sup> Finally, as noted earlier, in case of dissolution the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior are no longer required to be replaced by the President of the Assembly and by a person designated by him. Now they can remain in office to conduct the affairs of government and at the same time campaign, as Edgar Faure did in the last election. Even here, however, a compromise solution is reached, so that in case a Cabinet crisis results from a vote of censure, and dissolution and elections follow, the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior will have to be replaced.

<sup>7</sup> G. Gallichon, "Aspects de la Procédure Législative en France," Revue Française de Science Politique, No. 4, 1954, pp. 795-809.

<sup>8</sup> Année Politique, 1953, pp. 484-490.

<sup>9</sup> Revue de Paris, "Juillet, 1948" août, 1948. The revision of articles 13 and 51 was also specifically contemplated by Mendès-France, Bidault, and Marie, who failed to receive the requisite investiture vote and by Laniel, who became Prime Minister in June, 1953.

It is doubtful that these measures, reviving the practice of the Third Republic, will accomplish much to strengthen the executive. They may facilitate the formation of a Cabinet and may strengthen the President of the Republic by giving him more freedom to select a Prime Minister.<sup>11</sup> But they leave intact the constitutional reasons for Cabinet instability. For instance, an adverse vote on the question of confidence will not count as a "crisis" in the constitutional sense of the word and give the Prime Minister the right of dissolution unless it is by absolute majority. The highly controversial and cumbersome article 51 specifying the conditions under which the right of dissolution can be exercised remains intact. Dissolution cannot take place in the first eighteen months of a Parliament, a provision that may prove very unfortunate in view of the present composition of the National Assembly, and not then unless there are two

<sup>10</sup> Article 45 (Simple Majority for Investiture):

Old Text

"(2) (the President of the Council Designate) shall submit to the National Assembly the program and the policy of the Cabinet he intends to constitute."

"(3) The President of the Council and the Ministers may not be appointed until the President of the Council receives a vote of confidence from the National Assembly by public ballot and by an absolute majority of the Deputies, except in case a force majeure shall prevent the National Assembly from meeting."

"(4) The same procedure shall be followed during the term of the legislature in the event of a vacancy caused by death, resignation or any other circumstance, except in the case set forth in Article 52 below."

New Text

"(the President of the Council Designate) shall choose the members of his Cabinet and submit the list to the National Assembly; he shall then appear before this body to obtain a vote of confidence on the program and the policy which he intends to pursue, except in case a force majeure shall prevent the National Assembly from meeting."

"The vote shall be taken by public ballot and by a majority of the votes cast."

"The same procedure shall be followed during the term of the legislature in the event of a vacancy of the Presidency of the Council, except in the case set forth in Article 52."

<sup>11</sup> Yet, though the revised article was in force when the Mendés-France government fell in February, 1955, it took twenty days for a new Cabinet to be formed. Pinay, Pflimlin, and Pineau tried in vain before Edgar Faure succeeded. M. Goguel suspects that the effect of the revision will be to transform the abstention votes into votes against a Cabinet.

consecutive "crises" within a period of eighteen months. Efforts to delete the "absolute majority" requirement and replace it with a text according to which a "crisis" occurs whenever a government loses on a question of confidence or is censured by the Assembly met with stubborn resistance from the Communists, the Socialists, and the MRP.

It is equally interesting to note that article 17, allowing private members to initiate expenditures at all times except during the budget debates (which had prompted Reynaud to remark acidly that the deputies could commit follies eleven out of twelve months) has been left intact—thus destroying all hopes for the institutionalization of an "executive budget." Furthermore, no consideration was given to the possibility of limiting by constitutional amendment the many dilatory parliamentary devices that paralyze debate on the floor of the Assembly and place the Cabinet either on a footing of equality with private members or at the mercy of the National Assembly. For instance, the right of private members to initiate legislation remains unqualified, with the result that the legislative process is clogged with thousands of bills only a few of which become laws.<sup>12</sup> Government legislative business is hardly ever given priority, and the order of the day is decided in the Assembly by the Conference of the Presidents in a manner that attempts to balance the demands of individual members, parliamentary groups, committees, and the government. Even the decisions of this body, however, can be and are challenged and the order of the day modified frequently by the National Assembly. Above all, interpellations—the device that allows any member to take potshots at the Cabinet—continue to consume the time and energy of the Cabinet and the legislators. No way to restrain them has yet been found, and as long as the device is allowed free rein, the stability and the life of the Cabinet are in constant jeopardy. So it is legitimate to conclude that the most basic institutional factors that accounted for Cabinet instability remain intact.

3. REFORMS IN THE RELATIONS BETWEEN THE TWO CHAMBERS

If the constitutional revision did not improve the position of the Cabinet, it dealt what may well prove to be a heavy blow at the most significant reform of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic, namely, the severe limitations imposed upon the Council of the Republic as a legislative body. This was the result of the revision of articles 14 and 20.<sup>13</sup> Article 14 had prohibited the Council

<sup>12</sup> See D. W. D. Lidderdale, The Parliament of France, 1951.

<sup>13</sup> The old and new texts of articles 14 and 20 follow:

Article 14 (Introduction of Bills)

Old Text

"(2) Bills introduced by members of the National Assembly shall be filed with its Secretariat."

New Text

"Bills are filed with the Secretariat of the National Assembly or the Secretariat of the Council of the Republic. However, bills tending to authorize the ratification of the treaties provided for in Article 27, budgetary or financial bills and bills resulting of the Republic from debating any bills presented by its members. Bills could be introduced but were to be transmitted automatically to the National Assembly without debate. Article 20 provided that the Council of the Republic should give its opinion "at the latest two months after a bill had been transmitted by the National Assembly" and imposed stringent time limits for budgetary bills and bills passed in the Assembly on an urgency motion. In both these cases the Council was required to decide within the same limit of time as that specified for the National Assembly by the standing orders of the Assembly. If amendments were introduced by the Council, they could be "rejected or accepted in whole or in part" by the National Assembly. If the amendments had been carried by an absolute majority vote in the Council, in the reduction of revenues or the creation of new expenditures must be filed with the Secretariat of the National Assembly."

"3) Bills introduced by members of the Council of the Republic shall be filed with its Secretariat and sent without debate to the Secretariat of the National Assembly. They shall not be admissible if they might result in the reduction of revenues or the creation of new expenditures."

"Bills introduced by members of Parliament are filed with the Secretariat of the Chamber to which the latter belong and sent, after adoption, to the other Chamber. Bills introduced by members of the Council of the Republic are not admissible if they might result in the reduction of revenues or the creation of new expenditures."

Article 20 (Powers of the Council of the Republic)

Old Text

"1) The Council of the Republic shall examine, in order to give its opinion thereon, the bills passed on first reading by the National Assembly."

"2) It shall give its opinion not more than two months after receipt of each bill sent it by the National Assembly. When the Budget Law shall be under discussion, this period may be reduced, if need be, to the time taken by the National Assembly for its consideration and vote. When the National Assembly shall have adopted a rule for emergency procedure, the Council of the Republic shall give its opinion within the same period of time as that provided for debate in the National Assembly by the rule of that body. The time limits specified in the present Article shall be suspended during recesses of the session. They may be extended by a decision of the National Assembly."

New Text

"All bills shall be examined successively by both Chambers of Parliament, in view of securing the adoption of an identical text."

"Unless it has examined the bill on first reading, the Council of the Republic shall pronounce itself not more than two months after receipt of the text adopted on first reading by the National Assembly. Each of the two Assemblies shall, if necessary, continue to examine the bill until an agreement has been reached. The text shall then be promulgated in accordance with the procedure set forth in Article 36. Should no agreement be reached within a period of one hundred days reckoning from the day on which the bill has been submitted by the National Assembly to the Council of the Republic for a second reading, the last text adopted by the National Assembly shall be considered to be definite and ready for promulgation."

(Footnote continued on next page)

they could not be rejected by the Assembly "in whole or in part" except by an absolute majority also.

Though the purpose of this article was to reduce the legislative powers of the upper house, it led to many awkward situations. Very often bills were passed in the National Assembly by the use of urgency motions and were transmitted to the Council of the Republic without allowing it adequate time to consider the measures. Also, the provision that the National Assembly could reject Council amendments "in whole or in part" was literally construed to mean that no wording could be changed or sentence redrafted. The Assembly actually rejected amendments "in part" (the rejection of an amendment "in whole" raised no difficulties) by deleting words without being empowered to add new ones, by cutting sections and sentences without being allowed to insert a new sentence, a new word, a period or comma. This created technical problems of draftsmanship to which even the elegance and flexibility of the French language could provide no answer. Finally, the constitutional prohibition against having bills introduced and debated on first reading in the Council of the Republic deprived the government of a time-saving device and clogged the legislative process beyond hope in the last months of the session, particularly in December when the budget is introduced and debated but hardly ever passed.

The new articles 14 and 20 introduce substantial modifications. Article 14 now permits the Cabinet and the members of the Council of the Republic to introduce bills in the Council and debate them there before they are forwarded to the National Assembly. Treaties, the budget, and bills involving a diminution of revenue or the creation of expenditure, however, must be introduced in the Assembly. Bills providing for increase of revenue, on the other hand, may

---

"3) Should the opinion of the Council of the Republic be in agreement with that of the National Assembly or should it not have been given within the time limits specified in the preceding paragraph, the law shall be promulgated in the text as voted by the National Assembly."

"With regard to budgetary texts and financial laws, this period shall not exceed the time previously taken by the National Assembly for its consideration and vote."

"4) Should the opinion of the Council of the Republic not be in agreement with that of the National Assembly, the latter body shall examine the bill on second reading. It shall dispose definitively and absolutely of the amendments proposed by the Council of the Republic, accepting or rejecting them in whole or in part. Should these amendments be totally or partially rejected, the second reading of the bill shall be voted upon by public ballot and by an absolute majority of the members of the National Assembly whenever the vote on the whole bill has been taken under the same conditions by the Council of the Republic."

"Should the National Assembly adopt a rule of urgent procedure, the time limit shall be double that provided for debate in the National Assembly by the rule of that body."

"5) The time limits set forth in the present Article shall be suspended during recesses. They may be extended by a decision of the National Assembly."

now be introduced before the Council. The new article 20 provides that in case bills and amendments emanating from one body are unacceptable to the other, they will be considered "successively" by the two Chambers in order to arrive at the adoption of an identical text. This reintroduces the famous navette of the Third Republic, a practice by which a bill was shuffled back and forth between the two Chambers until an agreement upon an identical text was reached. The same article gives to the Assembly the right in considering an amendment emanating from the Council of the Republic to modify it in any manner it wishes by rejecting parts of it, rewriting others, and inserting counter-proposals. This, it is hoped, will facilitate compromise and at the same time save the French language. The Council is required to examine a bill emanating from the National Assembly within a period of two months after the date it receives it, and in case of failure to do so the bill becomes law. For budgetary bills and bills passed by the National Assembly on an urgency motion, however, the time limits within which the Council must act are equal to the time devoted by the Assembly in the case of budgetary bills and twice as long in the case of bills passed upon an urgency motion.

In case no accord is reached between the two Chambers on an identical text within one hundred days, the National Assembly has the final word by deciding upon its own text or by incorporating any particular amendments of the Council of the Republic. The time limit of one hundred days counts from the moment a bill has been sent to the Council for second reading. In case no accord is reached on budgetary bills or bills passed on an urgency motion within one month and fifteen days, respectively, the National Assembly has the last word and may vote the definitive text. Finally, the time limits provided do not include parliamentary recesses.

It is quite clear that the revision of the two articles provides for a compromise solution between some of the more obvious shortcomings of articles 14 and 20 and the desire to maintain the superior position of the National Assembly. The navette is back again, but the National Assembly has the last word and can override the Council of the Republic, and as a result considerable time may be saved. Narrow time limits give to the National Assembly the power to decide definitively on budgetary and financial matters and to override the Council of the Republic. The urgency motion, if agreed upon by the National Assembly, is an additional club that can be used to arouse the Senators from their reflective mood. Finally, the Council of the Republic loses its strongest weapon—that of rejecting a bill by absolute majority and thus blocking legislation unless the National Assembly could muster a similar majority in order to override the senatorial veto.<sup>14</sup>

On the other hand, the Council of the Republic gains through the navette

<sup>14</sup> "The absolute majority rule, instead of being exceptional, has been frequently invoked: nearly a tenth of all the bills passed in the 1946-51 legislature were amended or rejected in the Council by an absolute majority." Philip Williams, Politics in Post-War France, p. 283. Some of these bills, the author adds rightly, were of "first-class importance."

strong delaying powers<sup>16</sup> that may well prove to be, in the long run, formidable. Unless an agreement is reached, the Council of the Republic can hold up legislation for a hundred days. But this time limit does not include recesses, counts only after a bill has been forwarded to the Council of the Republic for second reading, and does not extend from one session to another. Since a session cannot, as a rule, be longer than 210 days while there are actually not more than 180 legislative days for the National Assembly, and since this latter body is not particularly known for its expedition in legislative matters, the delaying powers of the Council may indeed prove insurmountable.

The powers of the Council of the Republic are increased in many other respects. The Senators can now introduce bills and debate them; they are given the right, previously denied, to propose revenue increases; their committees have the right to examine these bills and in so doing to invite Ministers to give explanations and to answer questions. Is it not natural to expect that they will attempt to use these powers in order to regain lost prerogatives? They can do so in many ways. Given the lack of homogeneous majorities in the National Assembly, they can use their new powers in order to negotiate with the Cabinet. A Cabinet determined, on the other hand, to resist the Council may find its ever tenuous majority in the Assembly weakened. If so, is it not logical to expect that the Senators will demand as a condition of their cooperation more seats in the Cabinet upon which they have been casting longing glances?<sup>17</sup> The next step, though constitutionally prohibited, is equally unavoidable. Despite the fact that the Cabinet is constitutionally responsible only before the Assembly, is it not likely that opposition to any given government in the National Assembly may be strengthened, or its downfall assured, depending upon the attitude of the Council to its legislative program?

These questions are not purely speculative. They are supported by the evolution of the Council. Ever since 1948 this body has assumed a number of powers that the framers of the Constitution expressly desired to deny it. It forced the National Assembly to revise its standing orders and limit the use of the urgency procedure so that it might be given more time to deliberate on the bills forwarded to it; it participated actively in legislation that dealt with serious matters of policy and was able to force the hand of the Assembly on a number of issues. For instance, it prevented the liberalization of the colonial franchise; it modified a bill restoring collective bargaining, making it less favorable to the trade unions; it blocked the sliding-scale wage legislation proposed in 1950; it inserted new texts in the budget and suggested important modifications of financial policies; it introduced the system of "oral questions with answers" that resembles in all but name the interpellations used in the past by the Senate; it pressed for membership in the Cabinet and saw a growing number of its members participate in it. Slowly and not imperceptibly the Senators have been regaining not only their title but also the political prerogatives they had lost.

<sup>16</sup> Jacques Fauvet in Le Monde, December 1, 1954.

<sup>17</sup> The Cabinet of Guy Mollet, for example, includes the highest number of Senators—eight—of whom one is a Minister and the others are Secretaries of State.

These trends must be related to the political composition of the Council of the Republic. Ever since 1948 it has been more than the body of reflection—it has been a body of conservative opposition. Given the system by which the Senators are elected they overwhelmingly represent rural France. They represent, in other words, the interests of the farmer and of the powerful agricultural pressure groups that have been traditionally in favor of the status quo. The composition of the Council appears, in fact, to be today a political counterweight to the National Assembly. There are only 14 Communist Party members, 53 Socialists, and 21 members of the MRP out of a total of 320. Two-thirds of its membership is composed of Centrists, Moderates, Independents, and ex-Gaullists. It is doubtful that the Council of the Republic will have more patience with a Leftist Cabinet than the Senate had with Léon Blum. It is, on the contrary, very likely that it will use all its powers to attempt to bring about a Rightist orientation in the composition of the Cabinet. In fact, this is even more likely because a Cabinet will have to rely upon the Council in order to protect its legislative program against dissident groups in the Assembly.<sup>17</sup> The Council may oblige, but not without conditions; and its ability to impose conditions will be based upon the logic that contractual relations, so typical of French politics, imply—namely, the right to participate in the Cabinet<sup>18</sup> and to withdraw support if the conditions are not fulfilled. In this manner the ghost of the old Senate may yet return to taunt the framers of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic.

<sup>17</sup> For instance, the sliding wage scale was "blocked" by the Council in 1950, with the full knowledge and the cooperation of the Cabinet. In December, 1947, and in August, 1948, the Council restored to the form desired by the Cabinet two bills of major importance. Philip Williams, Politics in Post-War France.

<sup>18</sup> This was clearly illustrated in the case of the Bidault Cabinet which almost had its loi de finances defeated by an absolute majority at the hands of the Council. To avert the recurrence of the same situation, Bidault promptly invited the leader of the Radical Senators to join his Cabinet. Ibid., p. 281.

THE STATE DELEGATIONS AND THE STRUCTURE OF PARTY VOTING IN THE UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

DAVID B. TRUMAN
Columbia University

Recent controversies over the degree of responsibility displayed by American parties have underscored at least one feature of voting in the Congress. Whatever the merits of the contending interpretations and demands, the facts adduced on both sides suggest relatively fluid, unstructured voting patterns, especially in the House of Representatives. Although the party label is clearly the single most reliable indicator of congressional voting behavior,<sup>1</sup> it is admittedly somewhat less than perfect. The individual Representative may fairly often dissent from the views of most of his party colleagues, not only on matters of local or minor significance but also on issues of national or even global import.

The Representative's "independence" is most commonly, and in a good many instances accurately, ascribed to peculiarities of his constituency which generate demands for a non-conforming vote or, perhaps more frequently, are expected to be the source of recriminations and penalties if he does not display independence of his party colleagues on certain types of issues. But the Member of Congress is by no means always able to predict the electoral consequences of his choices even though he is sure that they may produce repercussions in his district. This unpredictability contributes to the unstructured character of his position. The political intelligence supplied by interest groups and individual petitioners and advisers, valuable though it may be in helping to resolve doubts, is neither so complete nor so accurate as to eliminate the uncertainties and risks associated with the Representative's response to a call for the "Yeas and Nays."

To the ambiguities of the cues the legislator receives from or perceives in his constituency may be added doubts concerning the preferences and intentions of the formal party leadership on any given vote. On those matters in which the leaders are genuinely interested, means are available for communicating the "party" position to the rank and file and even, after a fashion, for enforcing it. But on a number of votes the ordinary Representative, especially if he is a relatively junior member of the House, has no notion of how the party leaders want him to vote.<sup>2</sup> The reasons for this state of affairs may range from a prudent non-feasance to, rarely, a deliberate abdication by the leadership. The stable requirements of the party leader's role in the House may impose this occasional lack of guidance, or it may merely reflect the personality characteristics of the man occupying the role. But, whatever the precise causes, the fact of uncertainty on the part of the rank and file is unmistakable.

<sup>1</sup> Julius Turner, Party and Constituency: Pressures on Congress (Baltimore, 1951).

<sup>2</sup> These statements are based on a number of interviews with Members of Congress from both parties, conducted during March, 1956. They do not reflect a systematic sampling. Confidence in them rests rather upon the consistency with which these views were reported.

In the absence of well-defined, institutionalized, and continuously operative cue-giving mechanisms within the legislative party, one would anticipate that a variety of informal, only partly conscious, but not entirely haphazard devices would be employed by Representatives in arriving at their voting decisions. Moreover, within a body as large as the House or one of the parties in the House these substitute sources of voting-cues would be expected to grow up around familiar associations and relationships serving alternative functions. These would include personal friendships not necessarily political in character, relations of confidence developed through joint service on legislative committees, and even contacts created by the proximity of offices or residences in Washington. They would certainly include the almost ready-made relationships within the state party delegation.

Under certain fairly obvious conditions, voting agreement within the state party delegations is likely to be high. The issues in a given set of roll calls may be of particular importance to organized state-wide interests. They may be of special concern to more localized interests strategically associated with the party organization. Similar voting behavior within the delegation may reflect a tendency of the state party to elect members of Congress from districts roughly similar in socio-economic composition. If the legislative party splits into two opposing regional wings on certain kinds of issues, high intra-state agreement would accompany increased regional solidarity in the House. Finally, if the voting within the legislative party of the House approaches unanimity, it must also do so within most state delegations.

In addition, however, it seems likely that the delegation as a group affects the voting decisions of its members and, under appropriate circumstances, produces marked agreement among them. Some of the factors mentioned in the preceding paragraph, added to the intra-delegation relationships arising from joint concern with matters of legislative party organization or from purely social considerations, make it easy and natural for members of a delegation to consult one another on a variety of legislative questions. The delegation thus tends to constitute a communication structure whose repeated use results in a heightened consensus and similarity of voting among its members. In short, the state party delegation in the House may be a significant alternative cue-giving mechanism within the legislative party, especially on matters whose political implications are ambiguous. Uncertainty is misery and misery loves company.

I

An opportunity to examine the degree of voting agreement within the state party delegations and some of the conditions of such agreement in a single Congress occurred in connection with a larger study of party voting in the House and Senate in the Eighty-First Congress (1949-50).<sup>3</sup> The basic data are the number of agreements between pairs of Representatives within the two parties on selected roll calls of this Congress. The material suffers from the limitations inherent in a case study, but three features of the procedure somewhat reduce these by introducing elements of recurrence into the analysis. First, comparisons between the two parties are permitted, since they are analyzed independently. Second, limited comparisons in series are possible because the two sessions of the Eighty-First Congress are treated as units rather than jointly. Third, agreements can be compared at three levels of unity within each of the parties, since the roll calls were selected by ranking them according to the Rice Index of Cohesion and choosing them in sets in ascending order of cohesion. This technique produced for each party a set of relatively high and a set of relatively low cohesion votes in the second session and a single set of intermediate cohesiveness in the first session.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>3</sup> The study of party leadership in the Congress, of which this report is part, was made possible by a grant to Columbia University from the Carnegie Corporation of New York.

There are 74 roll calls in the sets of each party in the first session and in each of the low-cohesion sets of the second. The high-cohesion sets of the second session include 66 Republican votes and 62 Democratic votes. All votes were considered for inclusion except those on private bills and those on which the party was unanimous (cohesion indexes of 100). The characteristics of the cohesion indexes of the selected sets are given in Table I.

In order to simplify the analysis, ten Republican delegations and thirteen Democratic delegations were selected, representing various regions of the country.<sup>5</sup> For each of the three sets of roll calls the number of agreements between each member of these state delegations and each other member of the same party in the House was computed and tallied by machine procedures, and

---

The author also gratefully acknowledges the help of a fellowship from the John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation, which released him from his usual academic duties during 1955-56, the generosity of the Watson Scientific Computing Laboratory of Columbia University and its able staff, an indispensable resource for the study, and the creative assistance of Elinor G. Truman.

<sup>4</sup> The number and size of the sets was dictated by the number of roll call votes with cohesion indexes of less than 100 in each of the sessions and by restrictions in the chosen procedure for IBM machine computation, which permitted analysis at one time of not more than and, for reasons of efficiency, not appreciably less than 74 votes. These procedures were adopted for the major purpose of a modified Rice-Beyle bloc analysis of the two party groups which would locate the formal party leadership in the voting structure and permit inferences concerning leadership roles. For the basic procedure see Stuart A. Rice, Quantitative Methods in Politics (New York, 1928), ch. 16, and Herman C. Beyle, Identification and Analysis of Attribute-Cluster Blocs (Chicago, 1931).

<sup>5</sup> The largest state party delegation was chosen from each of eight regions if it amounted to at least three men, and the second largest party delegation if it amounted to more than three. In addition, one extra Democratic delegation was selected from the South (Alabama) and one extra Republican delegation from the East North Central region (Wisconsin). The regions used were New England, Middle Atlantic, East North Central, West North Central, Border, South, Mountain, and Pacific. No Republican delegations qualified from the Border, South, and Mountain states. The states selected were, for the Republicans: Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Oregon, and California; for the Democrats: Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Minnesota, Missouri, Oklahoma, North Carolina, Alabama, Texas, Colorado, and California.

TABLE I. DISTRIBUTION OF COHESION INDEXES ON SIX SELECTED SETS OF ROLL CALLS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 81ST CONGRESS

	Republican	Democratic
First Session
Intermediate-Cohesion Set
Number of Roll Calls	74	74
Range of Indexes	2.2-87.6	0.4-88.4
Mean of Indexes	51.01	47.6
Median of Indexes	57.05	47.45
Second Session
High-Cohesion Set
Number of Roll Calls	66	62
Range of Indexes	73.0-98.7	68.6-99.2
Mean of Indexes	88.5	86.5
Median of Indexes	87.95	89.3
Low-Cohesion Set
Number of Roll Calls	74	74
Range of Indexes	2.3-73.0	0.0-67.4
Mean of Indexes	43.08	33.3
Median of Indexes	45.05	34.6

the resulting scores for each man were ranked in descending order.<sup>6</sup> So arranged, the data show, for example, that on the 74 votes of the first session Representative Bolling agreed with his Missouri colleague, Representative Karsten, on 70, while he agreed with Representative McCormack of Massachusetts on 57 and with Representative Grant of Alabama on only 38. In developing the bloc matrices for these sets of roll calls in the larger study, agreements on fewer than 50 per cent plus one of the votes were ignored. (That is, in the sets of 74 votes, fewer than 38 agreements were not tallied.) This was done in order to keep the analysis within reasonably manageable bounds and to maximize the clarity of the resulting structure. The effect of using the same convention here is to increase the significance of any positive findings. For example, this procedure would ignore the agreements of a New York City representative who spent so much time in Manhattan and was so indifferent about inserting in the Record an indication of how he would have voted that he was recorded as agreeing with no member of his party on as many as 38 of the 74 roll calls in the first session. Though he might have indicated his voting preference on 35 roll calls and agreed with seven other New Yorkers on all 35, he would have been treated as if he had not voted at all. Had it been feasible to include such votes in the analysis, the cohesion of such a state delegation would come out higher.

* "Agreements," as used here, include more than actual votes. Any declared position officially recorded in the permanent edition of the Congressional Record was included along with the "yeas and nays." Thus a Representative who voted "nay" on a roll call and one who was paired or announced against would be counted as in agreement on that vote. "Absences" thus cover all unrecorded preferences, including general pairs in which neither partner announces his position.

In order to arrive at a rough preliminary indication of the incidence of intra-state agreements and of the relative cohesiveness of the several delegations, it was necessary to determine how nearly the number of agreements within a state delegation approached the number theoretically possible if the group were perfectly cohesive. The first step was to list, for each member of each selected delegation, the number of scores, beginning with the highest, equal to one less than the number of legislators in the delegation. For instance, there were four men in the Democratic delegation from Minnesota, so the three highest scores of each were listed. Representative Wier's three highest agreements on the roll calls of the first session were with Representatives McCarthy of Minnesota, Blatnik of Minnesota, and Jacobs of Indiana. He thus had two intra-delegation scores among his top three. The same procedure was pursued for the other three men in the delegation, and the number of these intra-state scores in the delegation was then totaled for each of the three sets of roll calls. (In counting those from the state, two or more tie scores in the lowest position were counted as only one.) Since the number of scores with others in the same delegation for a perfectly cohesive group would be equal to the number in the delegation times one less than that number, the ratio of the actual number of scores to this theoretically possible number is not only an indicator of the frequency of intra-state agreements but also a rough measure of the group's cohesion.<sup>7</sup> Thus, referring again to the Minnesota Democrats, if the group were perfectly cohesive, the three top scores of each of the four men would be with his three state colleagues, a total of 12 scores. In the first session the actual total of such scores was three, or 25 per cent of the theoretically possible figure. These percentages for all thirteen of the Democratic delegations on the three sets of roll calls are listed in Table II.

Given the variety of factors which might affect the votes of a state party delegation, one would not expect to find perfect consistency in a set of results such as these. Yet a sufficiently stable pattern emerges from the data to provide a reasonably firm basis for speculation and cautious inference. Although there is a good deal of variation from one delegation to another, the ratios in Table II are high enough to give some support to the proposition that the state delegation is an element in the voting process. (It is well, of course, that these ratios fall considerably short of 100 per cent since, if the latter condition existed, it would almost certainly reflect a condition of party disintegration or chaos in <sup>7</sup> The formula for the number of possible pairs of items in a group of  $N$  size,  $N(N-1)/2$ , cannot be used in this case because of the wide discrepancies possible between the top scores of two men in a delegation. For example, in a delegation of ten one would be interested in the first nine scores of each man in the group. If, on 74 votes, the top score of man A is with man B of the same delegation and they vote the same way on 45 of the roll calls and if man B's ninth score is 55, A will not appear among B's intra-state agreements, although B's name will appear on A's list.

TABLE II. RATIOS OF ACTUAL TO POSSIBLE AGREEMENT SCORES WITHIN SELECTED STATE DEMOCRATIC DELEGATIONS TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 81ST CONGRESS

State	First Session	Second Session
	Intermediate Cohesion, 74 Roll Calls (%)	Low Cohesion, 75 Roll Calls (%)	High Cohesion, 62 Roll Calls (%)
Alabama	36.1	18.1	11.1
California	7.8	24.5	4.5
Colorado	33.3	33.3	16.7
Illinois	24.2	24.5	12.7
Massachusetts	6.7	6.7	3.3
Minnesota	25.0	0.0	0.0
Missouri	34.8	15.9	22.7
New York	10.7	26.1	10.9
North Carolina	7.6	7.3	10.0
Ohio	6.8	15.2	4.5
Oklahoma	23.2	37.5	1.8
Pennsylvania	11.0	26.7	15.2
Texas	30.0	26.6	13.5
13 states	18.0	23.1	11.5

the House and in the country, with each state's representatives functioning as ambassadors to, rather than officials of, a national government.)

More impressive than the incidence of these intra-state agreements, however, or the variations among the delegations, is the pattern indicated by the composite ratios in the bottom line of Table II.<sup>8</sup> These strongly suggest an inverse correlation between the degree of cohesion within the party and that within the state delegations. Again, examination of the figures for each of the state groups reveals that the pattern does not hold for all, yet for twelve of the thirteen delegations, North Carolina being the only exception, the ratios are highest in one of the two sets of votes characterized by relatively low party cohesion. (Note that the mean of the cohesion indexes of the "intermediate cohesion" votes—Table I, above—was nearer that of the low-cohesion set than that of the high-cohesion set.) And in eight of the thirteen delegations the intra-state agreements are highest in the set of votes with the lowest cohesion among the Democrats as a whole, the low-cohesion set of the second session. (The exceptions, in addition to North Carolina, are Alabama, Minnesota, Missouri, and Texas.)

Before attempting to analyze the circumstances of low party cohesion that might account for this pattern it is appropriate to examine the corresponding data for the Republican delegations, for if the same inference cannot be drawn from the votes of the other party, the pattern loses much of its interest and significance. Then one would be forced to conclude that the substance of the particular Democratic votes was responsible for the distribution. But if the pattern holds for both parties, one may legitimately look for more general explanatory factors.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> These figures are based on the sum of the actual agreement scores in the thirteen delegations divided by the sum of the theoretically possible scores.

As the figures in Table III reveal, the general tendency noted in connection with the Democratic voting seems to apply equally to the selected Republican delegations. In nine of the ten cases, Oregon being the exception, intra-state agreements occur most frequently in one of two low-cohesion sets. In five of the

TABLE III. RATIOS OF ACTUAL TO POSSIBLE AGREEMENT SCORES WITHIN SELECTED STATE REPUBLICAN DELEGATIONS TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 81ST CONGRESS

State	First Session	Second Session
	Intermediate Cohesion, 74 Roll Calls (%)	Low - Cohesion, 74 Roll Calls (%)	High Cohesion, 66 Roll Calls (%)
California	15.4	25.0	12.1
Illinois	18.1	15.4	12.8
Iowa	21.4	46.4	1.8
Kansas	26.7	16.7	3.3
Massachusetts	28.6	33.9	12.5
Michigan	15.2	10.6	10.6
New York	7.9	18.9	10.3
Oregon	0.0	0.0	8.3
Pennsylvania	23.5	23.2	16.7
Wisconsin	14.3	23.2	3.6
Ten states	16.1	21.0	11.6

ten, moreover, the highest intra-state score occurs on those votes on which the party is most sharply divided. (The exceptions, besides Oregon, are Illinois, Kansas, Michigan, and Pennsylvania. In some of these, especially the last, the difference between the first-session set and the low-cohesion set of the second session is slight.)

When the composite delegation ratios for both parties are arrayed against the <sup>9</sup> In this connection it is important to bear in mind that the three sets of Democratic votes and the equivalent Republican ones are not identical, since the issues which divide the one party are not necessarily those which split the other. In the first session set 50 roll calls appear among the 74 votes of both parties. In the low-cohesion sets of the second session the overlap is 43 out of 74 and in the high-cohesion sets it is 29 out of 66 Republican and 62 Democratic votes. It is also true, of course, that, even if a vote appears in the equivalent set in both parties, it may occur at the upper end of the distribution in one and at the lower end in the other.

TABLE IV. REDUCED PARTY COHESION ACCENTUATES THE COHESION OF STATE DELEGATIONS:
 MEDIAN INDEXES OF COHESION AND COMPOSITE RATIOS OF ACTUAL TO POSSIBLE
 INTRA-DELEGATION AGREEMENT SCORES ON SIX SETS OF ROLL CALLS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 81ST CONGRESS

Party and Set .	Median Index of Cohesion	Composite Ratios
		Democrats: 13 delegations Republicans: • 10 delegations
Democrats, 81:2, low-cohesion set.	34.6	23.1
Republicans, 81:2, low-cohesion set	45.05	21.0
Democrats, 81:1, intermediate set	47.45	18.0
Republicans, 81:1, intermediate set	57.05	16.1
Republicans, 81:2, high-cohesion set	87.95	11.6
Democrats, 81:2, high-cohesion set	89.3	11.5

median index of cohesion for each set of roll calls, as in Table IV, the strength and consistency of the general pattern appears with striking clarity. What this seems to reveal is that a property of lowered cohesion of the legislative party is not merely bi-polarization of the larger group but a fractionation of the party, or a tendency in that direction, out of which the state delegations emerge as one of the elements of residual significance. Clearly they are not the only such elements, nor would one expect them to be. The considerable variations among the states in Tables II and III suggest the influence of factors other than delegation ties. Moreover, the relatively low ratios, even for comparatively cohesive groups such as the Missouri Democrats or the Massachusetts Republicans, testify to the less-than-complete dominance of the state grouping. Yet, pending further analysis, the fact seems tentatively established that the issues which most sharply divide the legislative party in the House of Representatives do not set up comparable cleavages within the state delegations, with the result that the cohesiveness of the latter tends to rise as that of the party declines.

II

Despite the uniformities just noted, one would be incautious indeed, considering the crudity of these data, not to entertain the possibility that the differences revealed here may be due largely to chance factors. To introduce precise probability calculations into the analysis presents logical and statistical complexities of overwhelming difficulty, yet some further effort to examine these patterns of intra-delegation agreement, taking at least rough account of chance factors, seems imperative.

The simplest appropriate assumption to make is that, if relationships within the state delegations were of no significance, the incidence of intra-state agreements in any sample of scores, such as the number of scores equal to one less than the number of legislators in the delegation, should be no greater than the proportion of the delegation to the legislative party as a whole. Thus, in a

TABLE V. DISTRIBUTION OF INTRA-STATE AGREEMENT SCORES IN EXCESS OF EXPECTED INCIDENCE WITHIN THIRTEEN SELECTED DEMOCRATIC STATE DELEGATIONS TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 81ST CONGRESS

State	First Session			Second Session
	Intermediate Cohesion, 74 Roll Calls			Low Cohesion, 74 Roll Calls			High Cohesion, 62 Roll Calls
	Number in Dele- gation	Number with Excess Scores	Mean Excess Scores	Number in Dele- gation	Number with Excess Scores	Mean Excess Scores	Number in Dele- gation	Number with Excess Scores	Mean Excess Scores
Alabama	9	8	2.25	9	5	1.2	9	0	0.0
California	10	1	1.0	11	9	1.89	11	1	1.0
Colorado	8	0	0.0	3	0	0.0	3	0	0.0
Illinois	12	9	2.33	11	7	2.86	11	4	1.25
Massachusetts	6	0	0.0	6	0	0.0	6	0	0.0
Minnesota	4	1	1.0	4	0	0.0	4	0	0.0
Missouri	13	11	3.09	12	7	1.43	12	11	1.64
New York	23	10	2.0	24	19	2.89	24	13	1.92
North Carolina	12	3	1.3	11	1	3.0	11	4	1.25
Ohio	12	2	1.0	12	5	1.8	12	1	2.0
Oklahoma	8	4	1.5	8	3	2.3	8	0	0.0
Pennsylvania	15	8	1.5	15	13	2.08	15	10	1.7
Texas	20	17	4.6	19	14	2.8	19	11	2.5
13 States	146	74	2.65	145	85	2.33	145	54	1.83

legislative party of 100 and a state delegation of ten, it might be expected that on a purely chance basis one (actually .9) of the top nine scores of any member of the delegation would be an intra-state score. Any number of intra-state scores

TABLE VI. DISTRIBUTION OF INTRA-STATE AGREEMENT SCORES IN EXCESS OF EXPECTED INCIDENCE WITHIN TEN SELECTED REPUBLICAN STATE DELEGATIONS TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 81ST CONGRESS

State	First Session			Second Session
	Intermediate Cohesion, 74 Roll Calls			Low Cohesion, 74 Roll Calls			High Cohesion, 68 Roll Calls
	Number in Dele- gation	Number with Excess Scores	Mean Excess Scores	Number in Dele- gation	Number with Excess Scores	Mean Excess Scores	Number in Dele- gation	Number with Excess Scores	Mean Excess Scores
California	13	8	1.75	12	9	2.4	12	4	1.0
Illinois	14	11	1.91	13	7	2.0	13	6	1.5
Iowa	8	5	1.2	8	8	2.25	8	0	0.0
Kansas	6	3	1.0	6	1	1.0	6	0	0.0
Massachusetts	8	6	1.5	8	6	2.0	8	0	0.0
Michigan	12	5	1.6	12	4	1.5	12	4	1.0
New York	20	4	1.75	20	14	2.64	20	5	1.2
Oregon	4	0	0.0	4	0	0.0	4	0	0.0
Pennsylvania	17	12	2.58	18	12	3.08	18	11	1.5
Wisconsin	8	3	1.0	8	5	1.2	8	1	1.0
10 States	110	57	1.79	109	66	2.32	109	31	1.82

in excess of this, in this example two or more, could be regarded as reflecting the influence of intra-delegation relationships.

For each of the 256 legislators (254 in the second session) in each of the 23 delegations the top scores (equal to the number in the delegation less one) in each of the sets of roll calls were analyzed in this fashion. The results for each delegation were summarized so as to show the number in the delegation, the number having intra-state scores in excess of expectation, and the average number of such excess scores for those having them within the delegation. In order to develop the data as conservatively as possible, a single intra-state score was never treated as significant, no matter how small the delegation, so that the results understate the situation for delegations no larger than three or four.

In the low-cohesion Democratic votes of the second session, since the bloc matrix revealed, not unexpectedly, a very sharp North-South cleavage, the denominator in the proportion of the state delegation to the party as a whole was reduced. For the Southern delegations this proportion was based on the 137 Democrats from the South and the Border rather than on the 258 Democrats in the House.<sup>10</sup> For the Northern delegations and the two from the Border states it was based on the 158 Democrats from outside the eleven states of the South.<sup>11</sup> Although this procedure understates the degree of intra-delegation agreement on this set of Democratic votes, it reveals more accurately the special influence of intra-delegation relationships by discounting the effect produced by a delegation's voting solidly with one of two cohesive wings of the party. For example, if the calculations for the 24-man New York delegation had been based on all 258 Democrats, the number of intra-delegation scores that might have been attributed to chance would have been two rather than four. Twenty-one members, rather than 19, would have had more intra-state scores than expected on a chance basis, and the mean of the excess scores would have been 4.85 rather than 2.89 (Table V).

In general the results of this analysis support the conclusions already tentatively stated, as the data in Table V and Table VI indicate. As expected, the pattern is not completely consistent from state to state in either party. Moreover, neither the per cent of delegation members with excess state scores nor the composite means of the number of excess scores correlate as closely with the median cohesion indexes as do the ratios in Table IV. And among the Democrats (Table V) the composite mean of the excess scores is a little lower for low-cohesion votes in the second session than for the intermediate set of the first session, contrary to expectation, largely owing to the remarkably high means of two good-sized delegations, Missouri and Texas, on the latter votes.

Nevertheless, the basic pattern identified in the previous analysis also appears here. The proportion in the Democratic delegations with a significant number of intra-state scores is inversely related to the average party cohesion of the sets. (The per cents are 50.7, 59.3, and 37.2 for the first-session votes and low- and high-cohesion sets of the second session, respectively.) For twelve of the thirteen Democratic delegations, North Carolina again being the exception, the proportion with a significant number of intra-state scores is highest in one of the two sets of roll calls on which party cohesion was relatively low. For five of the twelve—Alabama, Illinois, Minnesota, Missouri, and Texas—this proportion is highest on the 74 votes of the first session. Other partial exceptions to the expected pattern appear in New York and Pennsylvania, where the number with more than the expected quota of intra-state scores is larger in the high-cohesion set of the second session than in the first session votes, although the means of the numbers of excess scores among New Yorkers are of the anticipated relative magnitudes. (The high mean in the last column of Table V for the Ohio delegation can be ignored, since it represents the scores of only one man.)

<sup>10</sup> Speaker Rayburn was omitted from all calculations because he so rarely exercised his right to vote.

<sup>11</sup> The delegations from the two Border states, Missouri and Oklahoma, were treated in this way after inspection indicated that on the whole both were somewhat more closely tied to the non-Southern legislators.

The data on the Republican delegations (Table VI) are even more clearly consistent with the expected pattern. The proportion of Representatives in these ten delegations with a significant number of intra-state scores is inversely related to the average party cohesion on the three sets, the per cents being 51.8, 60.6, and 28.4 for the first-session votes and for the low-cohesion and high-cohesion sets of the second session, respectively. And the same proposition holds for the means of the numbers of excess scores. In nine of the ten delegations the highest proportion of Representatives with a significant number of intra-state scores and the highest mean of the excess scores occur in one of the sets of votes with relatively low party cohesion, the only exception being Oregon, none of whose four-man delegation had a significant number of intra-state scores on any of the three sets of votes. In five of these nine delegations the highest proportion of significant intra-state scores occurs on the votes with the lowest average cohesion. The exceptions are Kansas, Michigan, Illinois, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, and in all but the first two of these the means of the numbers of excess scores are highest in the low-cohesion set of the second session even though the number with such scores is no higher than on the first-session votes. Michigan is the outstanding exception to the pattern in this group of delegations, since the number of its members with excess intra-state scores is the same for both the low- and the high-cohesion sets of the second session, although the mean is somewhat higher in the former. The New York delegation also deviates somewhat from the norm in that more of its members had excess scores on the high-cohesion votes of the second session than on the roll calls of the first, although again the mean of the number of excess scores is somewhat higher in the latter instance.

III

With proper allowance for the limits imposed by the case of a single Congress, it seems clear that in both legislative parties in the House of Representatives the issues that divide the party as a whole do not split the state delegations in similar fashion. Rather they tend significantly to increase delegation cohesion. In other words, agreement within the state delegations is not simply a reflection of high party cohesion. Nor, among the Democrats, is it merely a consequence of solid delegation adherence to one of two unified wings of the party. Rather the intra-delegation relationships seem to have an independent connection with the voting choices of Representatives, particularly on those issues that divide the party most sharply.

The fact of the significance of intra-delegation relationships and their apparent connection with levels of party cohesion is little more than a political curiosity, however, unless an explanation of the pattern can be adduced or demonstrated. What is there about the diminished cohesion of the party or the issues leading to such cleavage that should bring this result? What relevance has it for understanding the nature of the legislative party in the House?

Reflection suggests that the issues which most sharply divide a party are of two broad types. First, there are those which are difficult, highly controversial questions, the Representative's vote on which seems certain to produce important consequences both for the interests with which he identifies and for his own survival in public life. Although these are thus freighted with significant effects, the certainty of the latter may be much clearer than their precise nature. The Representative thus confronted with a situation both insistent and ambiguous is likely to look about him both for guidance and for reassurance. Consultation with the members of his own state delegation may serve those purposes, perhaps partly because there is defensive value in legislators from the same area and party presenting a solid front on issues of high controversy.<sup>13</sup> On such issues, moreover, the formal leadership may offer little guidance because it prudently avoids becoming identified with either faction on a hot and closely contested issue, because it cannot, in the intensity of the conflict, hope to carry more than a small majority of the party with it, or because the leaders themselves are not in agreement on the issues. Such issues are not necessarily, if this speculation is sound, "local" in their impact, in the sense that the effects of rivers and harbors legislation, a general tariff revision, or an inclusive agricultural bill are local. They may rather be "national" issues of either high or low intensity locally, as seems to be the case with many questions of foreign policy. Although the distinction here is probably more in degree than in kind, there does seem to be a difference between the locally concentrated access of national interests and the access of purely parochial interests, though legislative voting patterns on the two may be identical.

<sup>13</sup> Among the many informal but continuing partisan and bi-partisan gatherings on Capitol Hill, many of which may be of far more consequence than their place in the literature would suggest, the ostensibly social but politically functional meetings of state and regional party delegations are common. (An interesting example is discussed in Tom Connally, My Name is Tom Connally (New York: Crowell, 1954), pp. 89-92. For a suggestive case of a somewhat different sort see Stephen K. Bailey and Howard D. Samuel, Congress at Work (New York: Henry Holt, 1952), pp. 125-26). Both Senators and Representatives testify to the value, on controversial measures likely to cause difficulty in election campaigns, especially primary elections, of solidarity in state party delegations. Unless deep personal or political differences intervene, two Senators from the same state and party may work out a common position on a set of votes about to be taken in the chamber. Much the same thing takes place, apparently, within the House delegations. On occasion such arrangements may bridge the wide gulf between the two wings of the Capitol and, of course, they may cross party lines as well.

Second, the votes characterized by low party cohesion may be expected to include a number of issues of trifling importance, "free" votes on which the party leadership makes no position known because the outcome is a matter of complete indifference to them. The Representative who rushes over from his office or committee room in answer to the bell announcing a roll call on such an issue may be completely ignorant of its substance and import. He may get a quick and decisive briefing from the first acquaintance he meets on his way through the lobby, from a friend on the committee handling the measure, or from a familiar source within his state party delegation. On such votes, therefore, it is less accurate to say that the party is divided than to characterize it as not being united because the matter of party is irrelevant. But the influence of intra-state relationships may nevertheless be high.<sup>13</sup>

Correspondingly one would infer that the state delegation normally plays a diminished role on votes of high party cohesion because there is no need for it to be influential. The issues in this type of situation are no longer controversial, are non-controversial—even if important in many instances—are trifling but unambiguous, or, if controversial, are by definition productive of cleavages between rather than within the parties. Some of the last would include those cases in which a unified leadership commits its reserves of influence, for whatever reason, in order to assure maximum support of a "party" position.

It is one thing to allege that votes of low and high party cohesion have these characteristics but another thing to demonstrate the point. Limitations of space prohibit the inclusion here of a list of all the roll calls, but examination of these six sets of votes indicates beyond much doubt that there are more issues of trifling importance among the low-cohesion votes of both parties than among the high-cohesion votes. For both parties roll calls such as those on authorizing daylight-saving time and changing the hours for the sale of liquor in the District of Columbia, on the omnibus rivers and harbors bill, on legislation for the benefit of limited groups of veterans, on efforts to rescind the curtailment of postal service, and on legislation authorizing library demonstrations in rural areas are much more characteristic of the low-cohesion sets than of either of the others. Minor issues, by any definition, are present in some measure on all the lists, but their distribution seems to accord with the expectation previously stated. "Important" issues of "national" consequence are also evident in all of the sets, but an assertion that they are more frequent on votes on which the party is unified can only be an inference from the more easily documented conclusion that minor matters are less common.

Since the six sets of roll calls by definition take into account intra-party controversy, there is need in characterizing the sets for some indicator of divergence within the House as a whole. Among several possibilities the simplest is the margin by which a motion is carried or lost as a per cent of the total number voting. This is not a completely satisfactory indicator, since "the House" is a constantly changing quantity. Thus a vote on a trivial matter settled by a close margin appears as a controversial item even though as few as 218 members bothered to vote on it at all. However, since failure to vote is often an act of avoidance as much as a reflection of indifference, refinement of the measure to take account of the number of non-voters does not seem readily practicable or entirely necessary.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>13</sup> For an illustration of this see Bailey and Samuel, op. cit., p. 132.

Table VII shows the distribution of the votes in the several sets according to these margins. In both parties the concentration of the low-cohesion and the intermediate-cohesion votes toward the lower end of the distribution indicates <sup>14</sup> The plurality margin in the House is a more satisfactory indicator of controversy within the House, however, than the incidence of "party votes," on which a majority of Democrats oppose a majority of Republicans. As the cluster of votes at the upper end of the distributions in the last two columns of Table VII suggests, the high-cohesion votes of both parties contain a disproportionate number of non-party votes, which testifies to the non-controversial character of many of these roll calls. When one party or both are badly split, however, the incidence of party votes need not be high, though it may be, since controversy within the House does not necessarily follow party lines. For instance, in the Democratic low-cohesion set of the second session there were 31 votes of the 74 on which the corresponding Republican cohesion indexes were relatively high. When these roll calls involved a coalition between the Republicans and the northern wing of the Democrats, who constituted a majority of the Democratic representatives, a non-party vote typically resulted. However, when the votes reflected a coalition between the Republicans and the southern wing of the Democrats, a minority of the party, the result was a party vote. Thus, though party votes slightly outnumber non-party among all the low cohesion votes of both parties, the difference—six percentage points—is not great.

One might further assume that if a considerable proportion of the high-cohesion roll calls concerns issues no longer controversial, among them there would be a concentration of votes on final passage and on the acceptance of conference reports—ratifying roll calls taken after the hotly contested phases of the legislation have passed and the final outcome is clear. Conversely, the low-cohesion votes would include a disproportionate number of votes on modifying amendments, dilatory motions, and the like—votes reflecting the unsettled, controversial character of the issues. Votes on recommittal motions might lie between, since they often provide the only opportunity in the House to register opposition to a measure but also may be merely ratifying actions.

Analysis of the roll calls classified in this fashion raises some interesting questions about the roles of the two legislative parties but contributes little to determining the degrees of controversy within the House. The Democratic distribution fits the expected pattern, but the Republican reverses it. This suggests that the Democrats draw together on the ratifying type of motion because they are the responsible majority party, whereas the Republicans are more likely to be united on the preliminary skirmishes, splitting, when the ultimate result is clear, into a group opposed to the impending majority decision and one willing to go along with it. The latter choice is for them the "tough" one, on which colleagues in the state delegation may be influential, whereas the reverse tends to be true of the majority party. Whether this pattern is indeed a feature of the roles of the majority and minority parties or whether, as the material in Duncan MacRae's forthcoming monograph, "Dimensions of Congressional Voting," suggests, it is a reflection of persistent ideological tendencies in the two parties, only analysis of a Congress in which the majority and minority positions were reversed could determine.

TABLE VII. DISTRIBUTION OF ROLL CALLS BY LEVELS OF COHESION AND BY PLURALITY MARGINS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 81ST CONGRESS

House Plurality (%)	First Session		Second Session
	Intermediate Cohesion		Low Cohesion		High Cohesion
	Repub- lican	Demo- cratic	Repub- lican	Demo- cratic	Repub- lican	Demo- cratic
0.1- 9.9	8	14	10	17	9	2
10 -19.9	12	19	15	14	11	12
20 -29.9	9	8	16	8	5	13
30 -39.9	13	14	13	8	2	7
40 -49.9	8	7	10	17	9	3
50 -59.9	2	2	4	5	3	2
60 -69.9	6	4	1	1	1	1
70 -79.9	5	2	3	4	4	3
80 -89.9	8	4	2	0	5	7
90 -99.9	3	0	0	0	17	12
Total	74	74	74	74	66	62

that these issues tend to be controversial within the House as well as within the parties. The U-shaped distribution of the two high-cohesion sets, on the other hand, reflects the fact that these votes tend to be either non-controversial or are straight party-votes—controversial only between the parties—and therefore are marked by a high degree of discipline on both sides.

It thus seems reasonably clear that the issues on which the state party delegations are most conspicuous and, presumably, most influential—the low-cohesion votes—are of two kinds. Either they are the tough, politically ambiguous questions on which the Representative finds himself genuinely uncertain and subject to mutually exclusive claims—“cross-pressured”—or they are matters of trivial or purely local importance. On both types the familiar associations within the state delegation provide guidance, reassurance, and the defensive advantages of solidarity or near solidarity among partisans exposed to the same or closely related publics.

IV

The significance of the state delegation in the voting of members of the House has been established, at least tentatively, and an explanation of these relationships has been offered and partially verified. But one further problem must be dealt with. Although the term “state delegation” has been employed throughout this paper, the data in Tables II through VI, above, indicate that that there must be a good deal of variation within as well as between delegations. Specifically, is it not possible that what appears to be a “state” phenomenon is only an artifact of a classification that ignores locality and other factors which may constitute a more substantial basis of cohesion than associations within the state delegations? Since none of the delegations in this study reaches or even approaches the theoretically possible—but highly improbable—perfect unity, some clustering of agreements within them is bound to exist. Examination of the scores within the delegations reveals, however, that such clustering is rarely to be accounted for primarily in locality terms.

Among the Democrats an outstanding exception is the Illinois delegation. Numbering eleven men in the second session, this group included nine men from Cook County (Chicago and its close suburbs), one from a district composed of seven "downstate" counties, including the city of Springfield, and one from a two-county district adjacent to the preceding and including the city of East St. Louis. As is evident from Figure 1, six of these men make up a cohesive and all but solid bloc on the low-cohesion roll calls of the second session. Among them these six account for all but three of the scores on which the per cent recorded in Table II is based, and all of them are from Cook County. Of the three

Member and District	District Numbers
	2	3	4	6	8	11	9	1	7	21	25
O'Hara, 2d		61	59	61	61	58					58
Linehan, 3d			63	62	63	63
Buckley, 4th		63		60*	60*	61
O'Brien, 6th	61	62	60		62	64
Gordon, 8th	61	63	60	62
Chesney, 11th		63	61	64
Yates, 9th					56						58
Dawson, 1st	(No scores of 38 or higher)
Sabath, 7th	(No scores of 38 or higher)
Maek, 21st	(None of first 10 scores from Illinois)
Price, 25th	(None of first 10 scores from Illinois)

Cook County

FIG. 1. Local Organization Control: Agreements within the Illinois Democratic Delegation,† on 74 Low-Cohesion Roll Calls, House of Representatives, 81st Congress, 2d Session.

† Counting only those intra-state scores included among the ten highest scores for each man. This figures should be read horizontally. Each row indicates those of the man's ten highest scores that are with others in the delegation.

* Only one of these scores counted in delegation total, as they were tied for 10th place on Buckley's list:

Cook County members not part of this bloc, Yates was a freshman Representative from a district containing a number of high-income residential areas, and Dawson and Sabath were unrecorded on too many of these votes to have any scores of the minimum frequency. What has been described as "Illinois" solidarity, therefore, is in fact a closely knit portion of the Chicago delegation, a conclusion not entirely unexpected, since this group is reputed to be one of the few delegations in the House over which the county leadership can and does exercise continuous and effective discipline.

A very slight degree of the same sort of localization is evident in the New York Democratic delegation, twenty of whose twenty-four members in the second session were from New York City districts. Although the pattern is much less clear than in Illinois, there are signs of some clustering along borough lines, especially within the nine-man delegation from Brooklyn, a tendency that is not astonishing in view of the coalition character of the city's Democratic politics. While these signs appear, however, it is also clear that the pattern of agreements spreads over not only the whole city but all those parts of the state represented by Democrats. There is a solidarity within the delegation that is largely independent of locality solidarity.

In a few other Democratic delegations there are symptoms of intra-state localism, but they are not sharply defined. In the Alabama group, for example, there is some evidence that Representatives from the northern end of the state

Member and District	District Numbers
	1	2	7	8	6	3	9	10
Smith, 1st		51							East
Davis, 2d	51			55
Murray, 7th	44	48
Byrnes, 8th		55
Keefe, 6th	(No scores of 38 or higher)
Withrow, 3d							53	53	West
Hull, 9th						53		51
O'Konski, 10th		43				53	51

FIG. 2. Geographic Factions: Agreements within the Wisconsin Republican Delegation,† on 74 Low-Cohesion Roll Calls, House of Representatives, 81st Congress, 2d Session.

† Counting only those intra-state scores included among the seven highest scores for each man. This figure should be read horizontally. Each row indicates those of the man's seven highest scores that were with others in the delegation.

tend to agree with one another more frequently than with their colleagues from the southern end, and vice versa. This, however, may reflect no more than a tendency for pairs of legislators from adjoining districts to vote together with a high degree of frequency, a tendency apparent in many delegations in both parties.

Among the ten Republican delegations the only instance showing marked signs of intra-delegation localism is Wisconsin (Figure 2). It is not a highly cohesive group, as a comparison of the scores in Figure 1 and Figure 2 will indicate. Nevertheless, a division between the western districts (3, 9, and 10) and those in the eastern half of the state (1, 2, 7, and 8) is apparent, though it is not absolute. This cluster seems to reflect a fairly complex combination of ecological and strictly political or factional influences. The western districts include large portions of the cut-over forest land of the state and most of the poorer farm land, and in general are less prosperous than the sections nearer Lake Michigan. In the western section lies much of the area once given to strong support of the LaFollettes, and here are two of the three counties in the state carried by Stevenson in 1952. The cleavage between the two areas also corresponds roughly to the boundary between the western Protestant, Scandinavian districts and the Catholic, German sections in and around Milwaukee.

Evidences of factionalism not so clearly based on geography also appear among the Texas Democrats (Figure 3). The districts of the highly cohesive ten-man cluster in the lower part of Figure 3, those of the looser seven-man grouping in the upper corner, and those of the three less readily classified men in the middle all are pretty well scattered over the state. (Figure 3 is based on the roll calls of the first session, since they involved the largest number of state scores.) The cleavage, whose precise implications need not be examined here, can be characterized as that between the loosely cohesive cluster generally willing to accept the moderate leadership of Rayburn and the larger fraction of the delegation, often inclined to repudiate his initiative and to cast in with the more "typical" Southerners in the House.<sup>15</sup>

Aside from the sorts of exceptions mentioned above, the great majority of the state delegations examined show no internal clustering on a locality basis and none based on obvious factional lines. These findings, even in the case of some of the exceptions illustrated here, lend support to the proposition that there is political reality to the intra-delegation relationships in the House. And a reasonable inference from the evidence is that in many such groupings there is a conscious effort at concerted voting. Some equally plausible inferences, however, may operate in combination with this one or even in place of it, although the last possibility seems improbable. An illustration is the California Democratic delegation, whose voting structure is built around four men, two from San Francisco (Havenner and Shelley), one from Los Angeles (King), and one from San Diego (McKinnon). It shows no locality cleavage, and it might re-

<sup>15</sup> Both these state studies and the inclusive bloc metrics underscore the lack of solidarity in the representation of the South, race issues apart, of which the Texas cleavage is illustrative.

Member and District	District Numbers
	1	2	3	9	10	14	15	13	19	8	16	5	6	7	11	12	13	20	17	21
Patman, 1st			59	54	57
Combs, 2d	52		54
Beekworth, 3rd	59	54			58	54
Thompson, 9th	54				58	58				55								52
Thornberry, 10th	58		58	58		57
Lyle, 14th	53		55	58	57					54
Bentzen, 15th		51
Worley, 18th	43		44	45	47	45			46	43					48			41	43	41
Mahon, 19th			52	55	51	53						52			52	52		52	52	51
Thomas, 8th	(None of the first 19 scores with Texans)
Regan, 16th									46			53		49		52	50	48	49	49
Wilson, 5th											53			61		59	56	58	61	58
Teague, 6th												50				52	53	48	51	55
Pickett, 7th												61				60	55	53	58	57
Poage, 11th			46*	50	52	48		48	52			47	47	46*		51	46*	49		47
Lucas, 12th												59		60			57	58	56	58
Gossett, 13th												56	53	55		57		54	56	58
Kilday, 20th												58		53		58	54		56
Burleson, 17th												61		58		56	56	56		56
Fisher, 21st												58	55	57		58	58	52	56

FIG. 3. Non-Geographic Factionalism: Agreements Within the Texas Democratic Delegation† on 74 Roll Calls of Intermediate Cohesion, House of Representatives, 81st Congress, 1st Session.

† Counting only those intra-state scores included among the nineteen highest scores for each man. This figure should be read horizontally. Each row indicates those of the man's nineteen highest scores that were with others in the delegation.

* Only one of these three scores was counted in the delegation total, as they were tied for nineteenth place on Poage's list.

flect concerted action by the delegation. And yet there is a strong likelihood that the members of this nucleus were especially accessible to the legislative claims of organized labor. Supposing this to be the case, it might be argued that the statistical cohesiveness of the delegation is no more than a reflection of the accessibility of its individual members, as individuals, to the claims of the same national interest group. It is not necessary, that is, to conclude that intra-delegation consultation occurred at all, although the organizational functions of the state delegations in the legislative party and the political advantages of solidarity among neighboring legislators on issues of high controversy would support the view that both influences—interest-group demands and intra-delegation relationships—were operating simultaneously.

The California Democratic delegation also raises another question. Those top scores for each man which are not within the delegation typically are rather widely scattered, from New York to Washington. For example, the first ten scores of Representative Helen Gahagan Douglas on the low-cohesion votes of the second session included—in addition to four of her fellow Californians—Representatives Price of Illinois, Karsten and Sullivan of Missouri, Jackson of Washington, O'Sullivan of Nebraska, and Feighan of Ohio. Much the same pattern occurs in Pennsylvania, Illinois, and other Northern delegations. Since the increases in intra-state scores are most apparent on the issues that divide the party between North and South, may it not be possible that what appears as increased delegation unity is no more than a tendency for the representatives from the larger urban areas to vote the same way on this kind of issue? This does not seem to be the case in California. Comparing the low- and high-cohesion sets of the second session, while the proportion of "big city" scores is higher on the former by 12.9 percentage points, the proportion of intra-state scores is greater by 16.9 points. Moreover, the incidence of intra-state scores is greater by 13.8 percentage points in the low-cohesion set of the second session than in the votes of the first session, while that of the "big city" scores is slightly smaller, by 3.5 percentage points. Comparable results were found for other delegations, further strengthening the conclusion that the increased unity of the state delegations is not merely an artifact of the procedures employed in the analysis.<sup>16</sup>

V

Because the arguments and the evidence presented in this paper necessarily deal with tendencies and approximations in a legislative body of tremendous diversity and complexity, they should be summarized with a sharp eye on the dangers of overstatement. The basic position is that, unless one assumes that there is no pattern at all in the obviously rather fluid voting in the House, in the absence of institutionalized and fully operative cue-giving mechanisms within the legislative party proper, one would expect to find a variety of substitute devices performing this function. These would reflect associations within standing committees, friendships, and other structural features of the House. Among these the state party delegation, as a group within the legislative party, appears to have an important influence.<sup>17</sup> This statement is an inference from <sup>16</sup> Since almost all Northern Democrats come from "urban" districts, devising a test of this sort presents difficulties. "Big city" districts are here defined as ones which 1) are in or contain a Standard Metropolitan Area and 2) are in or contain a city of 100,000 or more or 3) contain a county of 100,000 or more. The per cents on which the statements in the text are based are not identical with those in Table II, since all tie scores were included in this calculation, there being no defensible way of discriminating among out-of-state scores.

<sup>17</sup> In his forthcoming study, "Dimensions of Congressional Voting," an application of scaling technique to roll calls in the House in the 81st Congress, Duncan MacRae, Jr., presents evidence to much the same effect, particularly in his chapter entitled "Scale Positions and Constituency Characteristics."

the evidence on intra-delegation agreements in voting. The delegation as a group of interacting legislators is strictly speaking an intervening variable in this interpretation; it is consistent with the evidence, but direct observation of its influence is normally not possible.<sup>18</sup>

The influence of the delegation is not completely consistent from state to state or from situation to situation. This was to be expected, since the delegation is not the only factor bearing upon the voting decision. At times the delegation's role is subordinate to or indistinguishable from centralized control by a strong local party organization, as in the case of the Illinois Democrats; from similarity of voting induced by similarities in the socio-economic composition of districts or by persistent factional cleavages within a state party, as among the Wisconsin Republicans and possibly the Texas Democrats; or from solidarity reflecting equal access to delegation members by the same national interest group, as the case of the California Democrats seems to suggest.

Such alternative influences as these are not inconsistent with a considerable measure of consultation and concerted action by the members of a delegation. Moreover, they do not seem fully to account for the persistent evidence of interaction and solidarity within most of the delegations. They do not adequately explain the occurrence of intra-delegation agreements in excess of what would be expected as a result of sharp regional cleavage within a party, such as the North-South split among the Democrats, or as a result of similarities in the constituencies of "big-city" Democrats.

A method of multiple correlation, if a suitable one could be devised, might not only assign weights to these varied influences but also might conceivably show that apart from these other factors—local party organizations, interest groups, similar constituencies, and the like—the relationships among the members of a delegation as a group were of no significance. In the absence of such a precise measure—and it is improbable that one can be developed—it is reasonable to infer that the face-to-face relationships within a delegation are an independent factor making for solidarity.<sup>19</sup> The evidence does not permit an estimate of the relative importance of the delegation as a group, and in some instances solidarity within a delegation can be accounted for on other grounds. But both the logic of the situation and the weight of the evidence seem to warrant assigning to the delegation as an interactive group an influence of its own upon the choices of its members.

<sup>18</sup> Occasional bits of direct evidence on delegation functions are encountered, in addition to those referred to earlier. For example, the twelve-man Missouri Democratic delegation in the 81st Congress, seven of whom were newcomers to the House in 1949, reportedly made a special effort at delegation solidarity as a way of supporting their fellow Missourian in the White House. This incidentally may account for some of the peculiarities in the Missouri data in Tables II and V.

<sup>19</sup> The peculiarly personal character of these agreements is suggested not only by the clustering within the delegations but also by the fact that the number of agreements within the delegations is unrelated to two fairly obvious formal factors, seniority and primary or general election pluralities. The data could not be presented within the limits of this paper, but analysis of the intra-state scores in these terms shows that freshman Representatives are no more likely to tie to others in the delegation than are those who have served for several terms and that occupants of "safe" seats are no more likely to behave in this way than are legislators from "close" districts.

Delegation influence is most apparent on the low-cohesion roll calls of both parties. Though the evidence is not completely satisfactory, these votes appear to contain a relatively large proportion of issues on which associations within a delegation—familiar through their use in connection with bids for committee assignments and a variety of other matters of legislative party organization—can be expected to function as a source of cues and of reassurance. These are the politically explosive but ambiguous issues of major importance, where solidarity at minimum offers defensive protection, and the genuinely trivial matters or those of largely local impact, where state colleagues, among others, are relied upon for advice. Presumably on both types of issues the leadership of the party as a whole does not or cannot supply guidance.

Though the functions of the delegation group are most apparent on the low-cohesion votes, this does not mean that the delegation is irrelevant even when the party is comparatively united. Intra-delegation agreements appear here in several cases more frequently than chance would explain. Reduced ambiguity and more effective operation of the party leadership on the high-cohesion votes would imply, however, a less prominent function for the state delegations on these matters.

Reflection on these findings points to a number of unanswered questions concerning the bearing of the general sociological literature about groups upon the legislative party in the Congress, and concerning the operation of the party group in the House and its role in the total political scheme. The legislative party is a system of mutually interdependent roles whose occupants share relevant attitudes and expectations, and thus satisfies the usual definition of a group. Yet it does not readily fit the specifications characteristic of the literature on groups. The character of the interdependencies and of the shared norms is not nearly so clear as in the case of the small groups from which most of the relevant sociological literature generalizes. Fluidity of internal structure, fractionation, and persistence all seem to be pertinent to a description of the legislative party. They are a paradoxical set of attributes because, given the first two, it is hard to account for the third.

This is not the place to attempt a thorough assault on this problem. It seems likely, however, that the incongruities emerge in part from two circumstances. First, the House and its parties are large, an elementary but fundamental fact that almost certainly has much to do with the peculiarities of structure in both. Second, and probably more important, they are an integral part of a more inclusive system in which variations and ambiguities in the distribution of risks and sanctions, from precinct to caucus to White House, have a bearing upon roles and upon the nature of structure and function. In the small, natural or contrived, "problem-solving" group of the experimental literature, in some larger associations such as militant labor unions, and presumably also in some highly disciplined state legislative bodies, the risks of the members and the sanctions to which they are subject are clear and integrated into the goals of the group. This is not the case with the legislative party in the House, but the persistent reality of party in the functioning of the chamber is unmistakable.

The generally accepted doctrines concerning leadership in formal groups assert that leaders display special attachment to the goals or norms of the group, and that their roles are functionally distinctive in that all members share a dependence on their performing in ways essential to the particular functions of the group. The application of these criteria to the legislative party as a system appears to extend little beyond the survival of the group as a scheduling device and as a means of allocating instrumental rewards such as committee assignments. Even these seem in many instances to be contingent upon the satisfaction of norms deriving from elsewhere in the political system, upon the reconciliation of the legislators' multiple group memberships. Yet the norms do seem at times to include more than procedural functions. When the competing demands of loyalties outside the legislative party are not dominant, the norms of the legislative party apparently can reach into areas of significant substantive policy. Apparently the leadership functions are then similarly extended, though perhaps permissively more often than as a positive role requirement, and they seem to retain a considerable element of contingency. Even under these circumstances there clearly are a number of significant substantive issues on which the leadership cannot or does not set a party line and on which relationships like those within the state delegations presumably tend to be determining.

More concretely, the present study raises a question of the extent, if any, to which leaders attempt to gear into the power that seems inherent in the intra-delegation relationships. These data can throw no light on this question, nor can they indicate whether the intra-delegation relationships reflect a power vacuum within the legislative party which a strong leadership might come to occupy, or merely an inevitable restriction upon the leadership role. To the extent that fractionation along delegation lines is a response to ambiguity in the House rather than to claims from the constituency—and some of the evidence here points in the former direction—further research may reveal a power vacuum. Further investigation may also indicate the conditions, such as the leverage provided by skilled and persistent policy initiatives from the White House, under which the role of the legislative party leader is broadened and the influence of relationships such as those within the state party delegations reduced. The broad theoretical questions and the more concrete descriptive ones raised by these observations may present a challenge worthy of further research effort.

STATE PATRONAGE IN A RURAL COUNTY*

FRANK J. SORAUF

Pennsylvania State University

The use of public employment for political patronage is an ancient phenomenon seldom studied by political scientists in systematic and objective detail. Texts and treatises on political parties reckon with the subject, but usually support their generalizations and conclusions with illustrations rather than comprehensive evidence.<sup>1</sup> Detailed studies date back to the muck-raking period, and deal chiefly with large metropolitan centers. The role of patronage in maintaining the thousands of rural and small city party units across the country, in the face of marked changes in the methods of national party operation over the past generation, is largely guesswork. Yet the vitality of these organizations is a matter of general concern for the future of the party system.

This study is an attempt to apply some of the more familiar assumptions about the value and role of patronage to actual experience in a rural county in central Pennsylvania where it can have little to do with policy control. Exactly what are the political uses of state patronage at this low level? Has it been used to reward the party faithful, or to encourage party activity and contributions, or to woo new partisans? In short, what does a small group of political jobholders contribute to the party that placed them in office—money? service? votes?

Very few states have so large a reservoir of political patronage, waiting to be tapped by the party in office, as Pennsylvania's. The state's partial civil service system covers only 20 per cent or so of its employees, chiefly those in the state police, the state liquor control commission, and those welfare agencies supported by federal government grants. The great majority of the state's administrative and clerical force in Harrisburg, as well as field employees in the highway, forestry, recreational, and institutional services, are politically

* I am especially indebted to Mr. Nelson P. Guild whose interviewing, observations, and criticisms were immensely valuable, and to the Council on Research of the Graduate School of the Pennsylvania State University for a grant with which to undertake this study.

<sup>1</sup> There have been very few full-length patronage studies, David Kurtzman's Methods of Controlling Votes in Philadelphia (Philadelphia, 1935) being about the only one directly concerning the politics of patronage. H. O. Waldby's The Patronage System in Oklahoma (Norman, 1950) approaches patronage largely in terms of its implications for public administration and personnel policy. Patronage also is featured prominently in some of the broader works on parties as, for instance, Harold F. Gosnell, Machine Politics: Chicago Model (Chicago, 1937); Sonya Forthall, Cogwheels of Democracy, A Study of the Precinct Captain (New York, 1946); Frank R. Kent, The Great Game of Politics (New York, 1923); and V. O. Key, Jr., Southern Politics (New York, 1950) and American State Politics: An Introduction (New York, 1956). The subject is also considered in works on public administration and the civil service; Harvey C. Mansfield's paper on patronage at the national level in The Federal Government Service, a report of the American Assembly (New York, 1954) is a good illustration. The learned journals are generally barren of articles on the politics of patronage.

appointed. Generally speaking, while jobs in Harrisburg are more often reserved for gubernatorial largesse, the county chairmen of the governor's party maintain control of appointments to field jobs within their respective counties. Of these the highway jobs bulk largest in most counties.

In a state as heterogeneous and varied as Pennsylvania no single county among the 67 can be called typical. The site of this study, Centre county, represents perhaps the rural, forested, non-mining counties of the central and northern parts of the state. Located in the geographical center of the state, Centre county, with a population of 65,922, has only two boroughs with populations over 5,000: State College (17,227) and Bellefonte (5,651), the county seat. The county is predominantly agricultural, although the single most important "industry" may well be the Pennsylvania State University at State College.<sup>2</sup> The county has in the past 20 years been consistently in the Republican column in national, state, and local elections. The 1954 party registration figures testify to the county's tradition: Republican, 15,827; Democratic, 9,633.<sup>3</sup>

Although the patronage resources available in Centre county are not limited to the 140-odd highway jobs, these are the most important part of local spoils.<sup>4</sup> It is with these highway positions that this study is concerned. After the statewide Democratic victory in November of 1954 control of these positions fell from the hands of the Republicans (who had controlled them since 1938) to the Democrats, and the mass replacement of highway Republicans began. In the summer of 1955, eight months later, we interviewed the Republican appointees who were on the highway payrolls on November 1, 1954. Having been removed from their jobs by the summer of 1955, these men might be more willing to talk of their experiences as political appointees than those still working for the state.

Out of a total of 138 workers, we interviewed 123, or 89 per cent. The interviews were conducted in person and were preceded by a brief explanation of the purpose of the study. The questions were reduced to a few short, essential items; interested and articulate respondents were encouraged to talk on.

A word or two about the organization of the county highway crews may be helpful in interpreting the results of the study. The basic unit in the county highway force is a small work group, headed by a "caretaker" and manned by a small number of "laborers." To each group is assigned the maintenance of roads within a specific area in the county. Serving the needs of the county as a whole is a crew of equipment operators and skilled workers (painters, a materials tester, blacksmith, etc.) headed by a small number of foremen. The total sample of the 123 who were interviewed included: 17 caretakers, 67 laborers, 24 equipment operators, 6 skilled workers, 5 foremen, 3 janitors, and 1 typist.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>2</sup> The census figure of 17,227 residents in State College includes students living in town who account for a large part of the total. While the Pennsylvania State University is located at State College, it maintains the separate postal address of University Park.

<sup>3</sup> In the 1954 elections, however, the county did reflect the widespread swing to the Democrats that resulted in the victory of Governor George M. Leader. In Centre county the Republicans polled 9,442 votes to 9,164 for the Democrats. An occasional "county seat" Democrat also captures a county or local office.

<sup>4</sup> The county organizations are also able to place some patronage appointments in Harrisburg and within the county in positions with the forest and waters service, various state institutions within the county, and the state fish hatchery.

I

The first group of results clusters about the partisan attachment and activity of the highway workers. Whether the jobs are being used to pay past political debts or to recruit active partisans for the future, one might expect the appointees to be staunch party adherents. At the time of the interview 106 (86 per cent) were registered Republicans; the remaining 17 (14 per cent) were registered Democrats who had changed their registrations after the 1954 elections in the hope of remaining with the highway. Twenty more declared that they had at some time in the past been Democrats, so that only 70 per cent of the sample have been life-long Republicans. And at least 12 of those 20 sometime Democrats became Republicans earlier in order to get a highway job under a Republican administration. Furthermore, only 59 (48 per cent) of the group profess to vote at every election, 37 (30 per cent) claim they vote a straight Republican ticket, and 33 (27 per cent) say they discuss politics, if only occasionally. Judging by registration and voting records, then, these Republican jobholders would appear to be something less than loyal, vocal partisans. To the extent that the patronage was used to create a bloc of solidly Republican voters, it was only a very partial success.

Nor do the results of these interviews indicate that the 123 highway positions went primarily to reward past party activity or to bolster the party organization. Some 24 (20 per cent) reported having campaigned for the party before being placed on the highway; this campaigning took any number of forms (circulating nomination papers, canvassing for voters and votes, introducing candidates), but by far the most common activity was "hauling" voters to the polls. Similarly, only 7 (6 per cent) held a party office before going on the highway, and 10 (8 per cent) were candidates for public office before appointment. If one combines all three of these forms of political activity into one rough-and-ready index of political activity, only 30 (24 per cent) had rendered the party at least one type of service before appointment.

The Republicans were, however, more effective in using the jobs as leverage for extracting political activity after appointment. A total of 43 (35 per cent) campaigned while on the highway, 13 (11 per cent) held party office, and 17 (14 per cent) were candidates for public office. In toto, 49 (40 per cent) recorded at least one form of political activity after placement on the job. Combining activity both before and after appointment, 49 (40 per cent) campaigned, 13

* The Superintendent and Assistant Superintendent of the highway forces in the county were intentionally omitted from this study, since as supervisory employees they are in no way comparable to the large group of highway workers. They are frankly political appointments, and in addition to directing highway work they serve as "political supervisors" of the highway crews, collecting party contributions and screening many appointments.

(11 per cent) held party office, and 25 (20 per cent) ran for office. Finally, 59 (48 per cent) showed at least one form of activity for the party either before or during appointment, even if it amounted only to bringing an isolated voter to the polls 10 years ago.<sup>6</sup>

In one particular respect, however—financial contributions—the highway workers came in overwhelming numbers to the aid of their party. Of the 123, fully 97 (79 per cent) declared themselves party contributors while on the job, even if only once or twice; 19 (15 per cent) denied ever having contributed, and 7 (6 per cent) refused to answer the question. But the widespread hesitance to answer detailed questions in this area of low-grade party finance makes it hard to write with much confidence about their contributions. Not all of the 79 per cent who claim to have contributed did so at every election; about one-quarter of the "yes" group confessed giving only "occasionally," at "some elections," "a few times," or "once." The median contribution per highway worker, among those contributing at a given election, was probably less than five dollars; the political revenue per election totaled perhaps no more than a modest three or four hundred dollars.

Approaching these data on political activity negatively, 30 per cent of the appointees have not been consistently registered as Republicans, and a large portion of this group changed registrations either to land a job originally or to win Democratic favor after 1954. A large 70 per cent do not vote a straight Republican ticket, and 73 per cent do not discuss politics. Finally, 60 per cent have never campaigned for the party, 89 per cent have never held party office, and 80 per cent have never run for public office—either before or during their tenure on the highway. These data, then, would seem to indicate that the Republicans managed neither to reward a great deal of past party loyalty nor encourage future partisan efforts, either at the polls or within the party apparatus.

In several respects, though, the party has shown a determination to earn dividends on its political investments. First of all, the superintendent and the assistant superintendent of the highway office in the county did carefully solicit the workers for political contributions during working hours. The feeling was widespread that at least a token contribution was the course of prudence. A puzzling minority claim they were never asked to contribute; it seems likely in these cases that a contribution was assumed or tacitly expected. But although the solicitations were apparently made systematically, there is no reason to think that the Republicans dismissed highway employees for failure to contribute or to contribute with suitable generosity. Secondly, in addition to the careful cultivation of contributions, party chairmen in some parts of the county have dispatched caretakers and equipment operators on election day to bring distant voters to the polls. A number of the workers apologized for this campaigning and explained it was not voluntary.

<sup>6</sup> The figures add to a total greater than 100% because some workers campaigned both before and during their employment on the highway. The same reason applies to the data on party office holding and on candidacies.

The relationship between partisan activity and political jobholding varies considerably among the several job categories on the highway. In general, the better-paid caretakers were considerably more partisan and politically active than the laborers (see Table I). They were more frequently life-long Republicans, they voted more consistently and more consistently Republican, and they discussed politics far more frequently than the other highway workers. In addition, they were more active by far in party affairs and councils, accounting by themselves for over half of all those who have held party office. They were also the most regular and the most generous contributors to the

TABLE I—POLITICAL CHARACTERISTICS OF WORKERS (BY OCCUPATION)

	Total Group (123)	Care- takers (17)	Equip- ment Operators (24)	Laborers (67)	All but Care- takers (106)
Registration
Republican at interview	86%	100%	88%	81%	84%
Republican all of life	70	94	63	66	66
Political interest and loyalty vote at every election	48	76	33	45	43
vote straight ticket	30	59	17	31	25
discuss politics	20	76	8	21	19
Political activity (before and after appointment)
campaigned	40	88	29	33	32
held party office	11	47	0	3	5
ran for public office	20	59	8	19	14
any one type of activity	48	94	33	45	42
Political contributions
contributed at least once	79	100	79	72	75
median contribution	$5	$15	$10	$2-3	$4

party treasury. The vastly greater partisan involvement of these 17 caretakers suggests that there exists in Centre county a genuine patronage system within the entire patronage system—that perhaps for the real functions of reward and stimulus a smaller number of more desirable jobs has sufficed.

Revealing, too, of the uses of patronage in Centre county is the process by which these highway positions are filled. Fully 38 (31 per cent) of the 123 workers interviewed claim not to have sought the job they held, but rather were asked to take it by a party official, caretaker, or superintendent.<sup>7</sup> For the other 69 per cent who admit having actively pursued a job on the highway, there seems to have been no one procedure to follow, no royal road to employment. The largest number (31 per cent) began by approaching a local party official, but 26 per cent went to the county highway superintendent and 19 per cent to the local caretaker. A majority of the job-seekers landed a political job with only one sponsor, or without having seen the local party functionary. As a matter of fact, 51 (41 per cent) of all the 123 jobholders do not recall having seen any party official during the process of being placed on the highway rolls; the local committeeman probably had nonetheless approved the application without seeing the applicant. Recollections about an event that for some of the interviewees happened over 20 years ago may have faded, and ought therefore to be interpreted with reserve; it seems unlikely, though, that the information should be totally disregarded.

<sup>7</sup> These jobs, as one might expect, were the least desirable ones; 26 of the 38 were laborers.

The total effect of such an uncertain placement process is not easy to assess. In some cases, especially those involving laborers, the local party must act as a recruitment agency in order simply to keep the highway crews fully manned. When, as in these instances, the party has to seek takers for its jobs, the patronage system is clearly serving no political purpose. In other cases the party dispenses the patronage, but in a haphazard way that may defeat its own purpose—by allowing personal friendships rather than partisan merit to influence the decisions, by permitting the highway worker to forget that he has a political job and that he works because of Republican (or Democratic) beneficence, and by tolerating the recruitment of workers solely on the basis of ability in a crude and informal merit system.

Something of this unclear image and imperfect use of patronage opportunities may be illustrated in another way. We asked each subject why he thought that he in particular was given his political job. Seventy-one (58 per cent) begged the intent of the question by answering something in the nature of "there was a vacancy" or "the highway needed a man"; some of this group, however, mentioned additional reasons. But only 15 (12 per cent) of the whole group cited their Republicanism, and 16 (13 per cent) referred to political influence or "pull." Another 20 (16 per cent) knew a worker on the highway crew, 9 (7 per cent) needed a job, 6 (5 per cent) claimed they were known as good or qualified workers, 2 (2 per cent) had had other patronage jobs, and 19 (15 per cent) expressed no opinion. Apparently many of the jobholders either took for granted or forgot the political control over the highway positions. At least, most men thought non-political considerations entered into their success in getting a job. Their feelings were perhaps summed up by the worker who remarked: "When I found out what a political job it was, I sometimes wondered how I got it."

Since the incompatibility of patronage and a merit system rests at bottom on the use of political "worthiness" as the standard of merit in patronage, the result of this study that perhaps most fundamentally challenges the premises of the patronage system was the revelation that many of the jobs did not change hands after the Republican defeat in 1954. Of the 123 workers interviewed, 38 (31 per cent) were still on the job at the time of the interview in summer of 1955. And 34 (28 per cent) were still on the highway one year later (November, 1955) on the very eve of the local elections in Centre county, when one might reasonably have expected the Democrats to be marshalling all available resources for an assault on the county court house. One must conclude, then, that the Democrats, denied state patronage in Pennsylvania since 1938, were not able to use the available jobs for political rewards, unless they hoped to "purchase" votes from apostate Republicans whom they permitted to continue on the job.

A brief analysis of the 34 workers able to survive the sudden death of political change suggests some reasons why the turnover in personnel was incomplete. The survivors, when compared with the total group, exhibit less partisan loyalty and a shorter record of political activity: less straight ticket voting, fewer political discussions, more registration changes, and less political activity of any form. In addition to the generally lower level of political allegiance among the holdovers, a second point of note concerning them is the extraordinary hardness of the skilled workers: the equipment operators, the foremen, and the various skilled employees. The strongly partisan caretakers, by contrast, were virtually wiped out, and the percentage of laborers declined noticeably.

Doubtless the survival of the more skilled employees illustrates the extent to which an informal merit system has infiltrated the ranks of patronage. The skills and experience required for these jobs are evidently too rare and too important, in an era of full employment, to be disregarded for political purposes. The data amply illustrate the relative importance of political considerations as against those of skill and experience. The almost total absence of the "politicking" caretakers from the holdover group, and the consequent overweighting of the "apolitical" skilled men, influences the total level of political activity among the holdovers. If, however, one makes comparisons within occupational groups, setting holdover laborers and equipment operators against the total number of laborers and operators, an interesting fact emerges. The holdovers among the unskilled laborers are less political than the total group of laborers, but the holdovers among the skilled equipment operators are actually more political. It appears, then, that the skills which equipment operators possess are an asset which more than outweighs the liability of Republican activity and partisanship. The comparisons also indicate that far more laborers than operators changed their registration after November, 1954, some to curry Democratic favor and others, at Democratic behest, to make their retention appear politically respectable.

In addition, we asked each of the 34 holdovers to speculate on the reasons for his success in keeping the job. Their reasons again suggest the diverse ways of patronage. Their success, they thought, was due to: irreplaceable skills or experience (18), influential Democratic friends (6), change in registration (5), reputation as a good worker (4), influence of caretaker (4), personal need (3), political inactivity (2), and "don't know" (6).<sup>8</sup> These self-analyses tend to support the conclusions already given. The Democrats were forced to reappoint skilled and experienced men, albeit Republicans; these account for one part of the holdover group. The other portion of the holdovers were generally politically inactive or less loyal Republicans, or those who had friends among Democratic leaders and caretakers. They could be reappointed without subjecting the Democrats to the embarrassment of retaining vocal or aggressive Republicans.

<sup>8</sup> Some of the respondents gave more than one reason for their retention.

The irony here is that if the highway workers should realize that those with the loosest party ties can best survive a change of parties, they will defeat the primary purpose of patronage. A number of the interviewees made it abundantly clear that they were well apprised of this possibility. Several observed that after the Democratic victory in 1954 the first workers replaced were the active party men who "stuck their bills out." Furthermore, any party that fails to effect a complete and ruthless change of workers threatens the effectiveness of the entire system of patronage by encouraging the workers to hedge against an eventual change of parties in the state.

In an undisguised attempt to discover the effectiveness of patronage in luring voters to the dispensing party's banner, the 123 workers were asked whether they felt they "owed" their vote to the Republican party. A surprisingly large group of 55 (45 per cent) replied "yes"; 66 (54 per cent) said "no," and the remainder had no opinion. However, only 20 of those 55 who replied "yes" also reported voting a straight ticket, a fact which would cast some uncertainty on the avowals of obligation. Furthermore, of these 20 straight ticket voters who also felt an obligation to vote for the party, 11 recorded past party activity that might indicate a pre-existing party loyalty. Remaining, then, are 9 straight ticket voters who confess "owing" their vote and yet who have no other record of party activity.

Testing claims of obligation against actual performance in terms of straight ticket voting, one may doubt the efficacy of a political job to attract a solid vote for the party. It may, of course, create a voting tendency or "leaning"—an "all other things being equal" loyalty—that is not intense enough to create straight ticket voting. The data serve also to point out that a number of those professing obligation were probably fairly well committed to Republicanism on other grounds. One may, therefore, wonder whether the highway worker will even deliver his own vote, much less those of his friends and neighbors. Time and again, workers professing no obligation added remarks to the general effect that "I earned every cent I got; I didn't owe them a thing."

Finally, to get something of a worker's eye view of the patronage system, each worker was asked whether he favored putting the highway jobs on a civil service system, whereby the worker, if qualified, would retain his job regardless of election results. The answers were overwhelmingly in favor of civil service; 99 (80 per cent) favored it, 13 (11 per cent) were opposed, and the remainder had no opinion. However, of the 99 "yes" respondents, 39 expressed a reservation that would in some manner limit it to the lower patronage ranks; most frequently their intention was to exclude the county superintendent and his assistant. Many patronage holders apparently believe that some political jobs are more political than others.

The wide acceptance of civil service may be a normal reaction on the part of men who are now on the outside looking in. Yet 27 (79 per cent) of the 34 men who were still on the job also favored the introduction of civil service. Patronage by its nature fosters an insecurity and consequent opposition within its own ranks; to this extent it carries within itself the seeds of its own opposition. And this pent-up insecurity and hostility may break loose when the worker loses his job—his anger may cancel whatever gratitude he earlier had, or he may experience a complete disenchantment with parties and politics. Workers repeatedly commented that "politics ought not to hurt the working man." To deprive a man of his livelihood for no other reason than the victory of a gubernatorial candidate strikes many of them as unjust, if not immoral. Especially when the worker can see that appointments are made for other than political reasons, he feels that removal for political reasons alone represents a sort of "dirty pool," a game with different rules for each side.

That this loss of a job is a serious matter to these men is borne out by the fact that of those interviewed in the summer, 37 (30 per cent) were unemployed.<sup>9</sup> For a man of 50 or 60, who has spent most of his adult years on the highway, unemployment is a personal tragedy that will inevitably produce bitterness. This insecurity may also account for the fact that of the 85 who had been replaced by interview time only 40 indicated a clear willingness to get the job back sometime in the future; 25 said they were not interested, and 16 said "yes" with reservations.<sup>10</sup>

One final point is relevant to Schattschneider's hypothesis that "the patronage fields will yield their most abundant fruit if plowed and replowed often, for gratitude is a perishable commodity."<sup>11</sup> Half of the 123 men had 9 years or more of service (either continuous or interrupted) on the highway, and 39 (32 percent) men had totals of 14 or more years. In Centre county, at least, the fields of patronage have been allowed to lie fallow, or at best to reseed themselves. Some resulting spoilage of gratitude may account for the loss of vitality in the system.

II

This study reflects one small view of patronage in one political milieu. Its limitations are readily apparent—the reliance on the memory and veracity of the interviewee, the small scale of the study, and the possibility that the microcosm of Centre county may not be widely representative. Moreover, this research dealt with unattractive, poorly-paid maintenance jobs. The conclusions

<sup>9</sup> Some had been removed only a week or so before we interviewed them; others had been out of work for five or six months.

<sup>10</sup> Reservations were of these types: they would return if the jobs were covered by social security, if the pay were better, if the work were steadier, if they could return soon, or if they wouldn't have to force another man out of his job.

<sup>11</sup> E. E. Schattschneider, Party Government (New York, 1942), p. 103.

that have preceded and those that will follow must be evaluated with these caveats in mind.

The data, first of all, suggest that there are many levels of patronage with varying degrees of political effectiveness. Even within the narrow range of this study, two patronage systems emerge—the more effective system of appointments to the caretakers' positions and the appointments to other jobs. In the better-paid caretaker jobs the party secured markedly greater political activity, rewarded more loyal partisans, and extracted greater party effort. But in the less attractive highway jobs, political activity and interest fell off sharply, merely proving that as the desirability of the job decreases, its value as political currency decreases. One may wonder, then, whether patronage must extend so far down the scale of public employment in order to achieve its political purposes.

It is precisely this dubious value of, say, an unskilled laboring job that imposes the first limitation on the effective use of patronage. Demand for the jobs is often so feeble that the party must solicit workers for the jobs, or at best dispense them haphazardly. The significant political leadership in the county will generally be uninterested in such employment.

At the same time, the parties are restricted in their exploitation of these jobs by the need to maintain a reasonably effective highway crew. Appointees of the previous administration may have to be retained, especially if their skills are irreplaceable, and new workers will often be recruited as much on merit considerations as on those of political worthiness. There exists, then, an informal merit system where initial appointment and even survival on the job depends often on skills and experience.

Thirdly, the unclear and even hostile attitude of the 123 jobholders toward the patronage system sharply limits its effectiveness. The workers lacked a clear impression that theirs were political jobs, bestowed for political reasons; and if they did realize it, they rarely seemed reconciled to the fact. Their sentiments on "owing" votes to the party and on civil service reform indicate an unwillingness to play according to the ground rules of the patronage game. Many, furthermore, struck at the political roots of patronage by underplaying their political activity in order to hedge against the omnipresent possibility of a change of parties. One suspects also that politicians themselves hesitate in a small, tightly-knit community to engage in the ruthless hiring and firing that patronage demands.

Under these circumstances it certainly is not amazing that the political uses of these highway jobs have been haphazard and partial. The surprising disclosure, perhaps, is not that three-fourths of the workers were politically inactive before appointment, but that one-fourth were active. However, the data do create doubt that such low-level patronage can serve any great political role in the face of such limits to its effectiveness. In view of the workers' high degree of political inactivity, it becomes clear that the highway jobs were often neither rewarding past political activity nor encouraging it in the future. Furthermore, the degree of registration changing and split-ticket voting indicates that in most cases the jobs did not go even to loyal and vocal Republican partisans.

In this one county, then, patronage accomplishes a number of purposes. It serves a limited function as a political reward and stimulus, particularly in the more desirable caretaker positions. It serves also as an ad hoc merit system, whereby skilled and experienced men are recruited by superintendents and caretakers and then given even a semblance of tenure regardless of political changes. At another level the party simply runs an employment and recruitment agency, staffing the highway crews and trying to keep them at full strength. Finally, patronage may gratify the egos of local party functionaries and supervisory highway employees by permitting them to dispense political largesse to friends and acquaintances in the community. What political strength the local party does gain from its appointments may, therefore, be partially offset by the need to attend to the non-political uses of patronage.

EMERGING CONFLICTS IN THE DOCTRINES OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION*

HERBERT KAUFMAN

Yale University

As a self-conscious discipline among the cluster of specialties or "fields" encompassed by political science, public administration came late and grew fast.<sup>1</sup> Its recent arrival and rapid growth sometimes obscure the fact that its origins are to be found in a process of experimentation with governmental structure that long preceded the appearance of public administration as a subject of systematic study and is likely to continue as long as the nation exists. This process of experimentation goes on vigorously today, and the development of new forms is generating discord more profound and far-reaching than any that has ever hitherto divided students of public administration. It is with the sources and significance of that discord that this paper is concerned.

I. THREE CORE VALUES

The central thesis of this paper is that an examination of the administrative institutions of this country suggests that they have been organized and operated in pursuit successively of three values, here designated representativeness, neutral competence, and executive leadership. Each of these values has been dominant (but not to the point of total suppression of the others) in different periods of our history; the shift from one to another generally appears to have occurred as a consequence of the difficulties encountered in the period preceding the change.<sup>2</sup> Much of the early literature commonly identified as within the province of public administration was written during the transition from the first to the second of these values, and the great flood of materials produced after World War I often reflected both the second and third values when these for a time (and for reasons to be explained) pointed in the same direction for governmental improvement. Lately, however, the courses of action indicated by the second and third values have been not only different, but contradictory; the cleavage is becoming increasingly apparent in the doctrines of public administration. What the effects will be on the fraternity of practitioners and on their aspirations to professional status is difficult to say, but it seems clear that commitments to values that have become incompatible can produce only gulfs in the realm of ideas and confusion in proposals for governmental reform.

* This is a revision of a paper prepared for the Panel on "The Study of Public Administration Since Woodrow Wilson" at the 52nd Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association on September 7, 1956, at Washington, D. C.

<sup>1</sup> "Although the art of administration has been practiced for centuries, it has not been widely written about until recent times . . . . The study of public administration has advanced to an extraordinary degree since 1920 . . . . (T)he study of public administration is still primarily American." Leonard D. White, Introduction to the Study of Public Administration, 4th edition (New York, 1955), pp. 9, 10, 11.

<sup>2</sup> To be sure, the three values, which will be examined in turn, are not the only ones to be fulfilled by the governmental system, but the design and functioning of the government have been such that these appear to have received prime stress in the ordering of our political life.

The Quest for Representativeness. The earliest<sup>3</sup> stress was placed on representativeness in government, the quest for which clearly had its roots in the colonial period, when colonial assemblies were struggling with royal governors for control of political life in the New World and "No taxation without representation" was a slogan that expressed one of the principal interests and anxieties of the colonists. The legislatures thus became the champions of the indigenous population, or at least of the ruling elements in the colonies, against what was regarded in many quarters as executive oppression. When the Revolution drove the British out, the legislatures in the new states were, with but a couple of exceptions,<sup>4</sup> enthroned in positions of leadership of the new governments, and, although the franchise continued to be limited to a relatively small proportion of the people, it was through the legislatures that governmental policy was formulated and legitimated. Even in the states that continued to operate under their colonial charters in the post-Revolutionary years, the governors were reduced to figureheads with little influence in the making of governmental decisions. In ten of the states, the governors were elected by the legislatures, most of them for only one-year terms; in just one state did the governor have a veto, and even that was limited by present-day standards. Governors had few powers of appointment and removal, or of administrative supervision and control. They did not function as legislative leaders. Lacking in status and in constitutional and administrative strength, governors had no source of political strength, and they therefore remained subordinate to the legislatures in every respect; they had no leverage with which to exert influence even if they had been so inclined. Hence, the office was regarded as primarily ceremonial and a symbol of honor rather than as a seat of power, and it therefore rarely attracted men of distinction in the early days of the Republic. Consequently, as late as the opening years of the Twentieth Century, the governorship was a dead-end road. As one authority has remarked, they served their short terms and returned to private life with few accomplishments behind them and nothing before them but the pleasure of being called "Governor" for the rest of their days.<sup>5</sup> The legislatures ruled virtually unchallenged.

<sup>3</sup> It is impossible to date any of the periods with precision, except arbitrarily, and it is probably unnecessary to do so for most purposes, but their origins can be identified, and so, roughly, can their zeniths.

<sup>4</sup> New York and Massachusetts. These states provided important models for the federal executive, which ultimately was set up as an even stronger—and perhaps better—office than its prototypes.

<sup>5</sup> There were notable exceptions of course. Cleveland became President after serving as Governor of New York, Hayes and McKinley had both been Governors of Ohio before moving to the White House, and other governors became influential in national politics. As a general rule, however, the governorship was not a springboard to power or prominence.

In local government, too, collegiate bodies were in charge. Whether they were truly "representative," and whether one ought to refer to the governing organ of a community that is not "sovereign" as a legislature, are questions we need not consider here. Suffice it to say that local executives labored under the same or perhaps greater handicaps than their state counterparts and therefore presented no more of a challenge to the local institutions corresponding to legislatures than did the governors to the state bodies.

The constitutional specifications for the Presidency constituted a counter-trend to the apparent value system of governmental designers in early America. For the President was invested with greater authority than almost any other chief executive of the time. Yet even at the federal level, there were clearly widespread expectations that the Congress would provide the primary motive power for the government, a view shared, according to Binkley, even by many incumbents of the White House whose "Whig conception" of the Presidency as subservient to the legislature may be contrasted with the "stewardship theory" of independent Presidential authority to be enunciated much later in history. While Washington and Jefferson fought to protect and extend executive power from the very first, it is probably not stretching the facts to argue that Presidents for a long time had an uphill struggle in this effort, and that many chose to yield to the sentiment of the day and the strength of the giants in Congress. Whether or not the legislatures were actually the most representative institutions need not be explored here; there is ample evidence that they were thought to be so.

The enthronement of the legislature was one of the two major tangible indications of the value placed on representativeness; the other was the rather uncritical faith in the electoral principle. It began with the extension of the franchise and a thrust toward universal adult suffrage. But the faith in elections also took the form of an increasing number of official positions filled by balloting. The first half of the Nineteenth Century saw the number of elective offices sharply increased, especially after the Jacksonian Revolution burst upon the country. The ballot grew in length until almost every public official from President down to dogcatcher came to power via the electoral route. Moreover, with the rise of the party organizations to new influence as a result, even those positions which were not made elective were filled by party faithful; the spoils system came into its own. By the time of the Civil War, voters found themselves confronted by hundreds of names on their ballots, and each change of party brought with it a change in virtually all government employees.

The Quest for Neutral Competence. As early as the middle of the Nineteenth Century, it had become clear to some people that legislative supremacy, the long ballot, and the spoils system did not in fact increase representativeness; as a matter of fact, they often seemed to have just the opposite effect. For one thing, they tended to confuse both voters and interest groups and thereby opened the way to power to political bosses who, while providing a measure of integration in the bewildering pullulation of government, often utilized their positions to advance their personal interests and the interests of the organizations they headed without regard for the interests of many of the governed. For another thing, legislators and administrators at every level of government proved themselves peculiarly vulnerable to the forces let loose by the burgeoning industrial system; corruption beset legislatures from county boards and city councils right up to Congress itself, and the venality and incompetence of many public officers and employers were common knowledge.

Disillusionment with existing governmental machinery was a result. State and local constitutions and charters grew longer and more detailed as reformers tried to reduce the discretion of legislative bodies. Limitations on the length and frequency of state legislative sessions were imposed to limit the amount of harm they could do. And at every level, reformers began to cast around for new governmental machinery that would provide a high level of responsible government service while avoiding the high costs of unalloyed representative mechanisms.

Thus began the quest for neutral competence in government officials, a quest which has continued to the present day. The core value of this search was ability to do the work of government expertly, and to do it according to explicit, objective standards rather than to personal or party or other obligations and loyalties.<sup>6</sup> The slogan of the neutral competence school became, "Take administration out of politics."

This school produced its own rationale and mechanisms for this purpose. The rationale was the now-familiar politics-administration dichotomy, according to which politics and administration are distinct and separable processes that should therefore be assigned to separate and distinct organs. The mechanisms were independent boards and commissions and the merit system, which were designed to insulate many public officials and public policies from political pressures.

The movement gathered momentum after the Civil War, although the first <sup>6</sup> Proponents of this value generally did not demean representative institutions; on the contrary, they claimed their programs would strengthen those institutions by rationalizing governmental operations and improving their quality to such an extent that elected officers would be in a position to exert greater control over policy than they ever could hope to do in the prevailing political jungle. The case for neutral competence has normally been made not as an alternative to representativeness, but as a fulfillment of it.

The disillusionment of some was so thorough, however, that they lost faith completely in representativeness, in the capacity of a people to rule themselves, and returned to advocacy of rule by an aristocracy of talent. Civil service reform was, in fact, a movement which found its leaders among the grandsons and great-grandsons of the "Patricians" of early days, among the "Old Whigs" and their sons, among those who had been enamored of, or grew up under, British or German or French institutions (for example, the Adamses, Godkin, Schurz, Villard, Rosengarten), and among the urban mercantile and older businesses or professions rather than among the new industrialists. Distrust of the populace may still be observed in some modern writers and even in some current supporters of the neutral competence idea, but, for the most part the concept of representation was so deeply ingrained in American thinking—and, indeed, in American emotions, for the word has become a revered one—that few dare to attack it openly whatever their beliefs may be.

agitation for some of its objectives goes back even further. In local and state governments, library boards and park boards and police boards and boards of health and finance boards and utilities commissions and boards of education and boards of assessment and equalization and boards and commissions for a dozen other purposes mushroomed up all over the governmental landscape. At the federal level, the Interstate Commerce Commission came into being, to be followed in the Twentieth Century by a host of like bodies. These agencies, at every level, differed from each other in details, but had the same underlying structure: their members were appointed for overlapping terms supposedly on the basis of their reputations for general ability and character and specialized knowledge. They were granted wide discretion and secure tenure for substantial periods, and were expected to formulate policy on nonpolitical premises. Objectivity was reinforced in some instances by mandatory bipartisan membership on the boards. The exigencies of the times made it necessary for legislatures to delegate power to administrative agencies; the advocates of neutral competence deflected delegation from the chief executives and the departments under their control to what was later to be branded "the headless fourth branch of government."

The merit system, peculiarly, made its greatest advances where boards and commissions were slowest to gain a foothold—the federal government. Pressure for the merit system began before the Civil War; its first fruit was the federal Civil Service Act of 1883. Initially, the objectives of the program were confined principally to controlling the selection of government workers by taking the power to hire staff from the hands of executive heads (who were politicians) and lodging it with experts who, if they did not actually appoint personnel, at least could screen out all but those who could pass tests of one sort or another. This aspect of the program spread rapidly in the federal government; despite the subsequent growth of the federal service, about nine out of ten government employees today are under some form of merit appointment. But the process did not stop with the removal of the appointing power from politics; over the years, the Civil Service Commission extended its surveillance to dismissal, promotion, and position classification; eventually, with the aid of new legislation, the political activities of civil servants were reduced to little more than voting. A wall was erected between the government bureaucracy and the politicians, a wall policed by the Civil Service Commission.<sup>7</sup>

The quest for neutral competence, though it began about a century ago, has never waned. The training of civil servants became steadily more formal and systematic as time passed; courses, departments, and even schools of administration appeared in universities. Organization and methods analysis became a profession in itself. Boards and commissions are still common modes of handling administrative problems—witness, for example, the Atomic Energy Commission. Supporters of the merit system continue unabated their efforts to extend it “upward, outward, and downward.” The desire to make government employment an attractive career service was given new voice by the Commission of Inquiry on Public Service Personnel a generation ago, and by the Task Force on Personnel and Civil Service of the Second Hoover Commission more recently. The city manager plan—and even the town, county, and state manager plans—have continued to score successes. Neutral competence is still a living value among students of government, career civil servants, and, perhaps more significantly, among much of the general populace.

<sup>7</sup> The states and localities were slow to follow suit. By the turn of the century, only two states had enacted civil service legislation and only a few of the largest cities. Even today, the formal merit system still has a long way to go at these levels: states and localities remain the prime targets of the civil service reformers. But they have made some impressive gains during the last quarter-century, and the idea is still spreading.

The Quest for Executive Leadership. Just as the excessive emphasis on representativeness brought with it bitterly disappointing difficulties unforeseen by its advocates, so too the great stress on neutral competence proved to be a mixed blessing. And just as the failures of the machinery established with an eye primarily to representativeness helped produce the reaction toward neutral competence, so too the weaknesses of the governmental arrangements devised by the latter school—or, more accurately, the weaknesses of government resulting from the work of both schools—gave impetus to the supporters of a third value: executive leadership.

For both earlier philosophies, and the mechanisms to which they gave rise, created a thrust toward fragmentation of government, toward the formation of highly independent islands of decision-making occupied by officials who went about their business without much reference to each other or to other organs of government. Neither elected administrative officials nor independent boards and commissions welcomed direction from the chief executives; the former were supported by constituencies in much the same way as governors and mayors, and their tenure was linked largely to their vote-getting prowess, while the latter generally remained in office longer than the chief executives and depended very little on them for support. Besides, as these officials and agencies became more accomplished in their respective areas of specialization, they tended to resent efforts of “laymen” and “amateurs” to intervene; this tendency revealed itself even in some civil servants nominally under the chief executives, who, though formally subject to dismissal, turned out in practice to have quite secure tenure, and who, by adept maneuvers in negotiating bureaucratic armistices (“memoranda of agreement”) and in forming alliances with legislative committees and clientele groups, succeeded in carving out for themselves broad areas of discretion free of real supervision by their political chiefs.

The drive toward fragmentation could not be effectively countered by legislative bodies, despite their vast statute-making, financial, and investigative powers. Even Congress can exercise only a general and intermittent oversight over administrative agencies, and has had to confine itself to providing general standards guiding the exercise of administrative discretion and to occasional intervention to correct abuses or to force specific changes in policy. And state legislatures and city councils and county boards operate under still greater limitations; many of these bodies are in session for only brief periods out of each year (or biennium), and administrative officials conduct the business of government with great latitude in the long intervals between meetings. Moreover, even if legislatures met often enough and had enough technical assistance of their own to exert control over administration, their composition and procedures would render them incapable of providing integration; working through tens of committees, reaching decisions through processes of compromise and concession among representatives of small territorial units, functioning increasingly as reviewing bodies for proposals placed before them by executive and administrative agencies and by interest groups, they are generally too slow and too fragmented to perform this function effectively.

Neither have the courts been able to integrate the component elements of American government. They were not designed for this responsibility, and they are completely unable to discharge it. Limited to refereeing disputes between contending parties, formal in procedure and deliberate in method, they could not play this role even had they been willing. In fact, they have increasingly moved toward acceptance of findings of fact by administrative organizations and toward restriction of their own activities to review of questions of jurisdiction and procedure.

The centrifugal drives of the representativeness and neutral competence institutions thus found no important counter-force in the legislatures or in the courts. So the efforts to maximize these values brought with them the dispersion of governmental policy-making processes.

There were widespread criticisms of this fragmentation.<sup>8</sup> It bred chaos; agencies pursued contradictory policies in related fields. It fomented conflict; agencies engaged in bitter bureaucratic warfare to establish their spheres of jurisdiction. It opened gaps in the provision of service or of regulation; clienteles were sometimes denied benefits or escaped supervision because they fell between agencies. It was costly; many agencies maintained overhead organizations that could have been replaced more cheaply and effectively by a common organization, and citizens had to make their own way through bureaucratic labyrinths. And, most important of all, it led to irresponsibility; no one quite knew how the pattern of organization and program came into existence or what could be done to alter it, each segment of the fragmented governments became a self-directing unit, the impact of elections on the conduct of government was minimized, and special interest groups often succeeded in virtually capturing control of individual agencies. No one seemed to be steering the governmental machinery, though everyone had a hand in it. At best, it seemed to be drifting (and just when the growth of the economic system appeared to make greater direction necessary), while at worst it showed signs of flying apart or grinding to a stop. These were among the forces that persuaded many students of government that chief executives had to be built up to take charge of the machinery.

The office of the chief executive became their hope because it furnished the only available means of achieving the end sought.* Movement toward strengthening chief executives began long before there was an explicit body of doctrine to explain and justify it. In the federal government, it took the form of struggles between Presidents and Congress for control of policy. Since the Presidency was set up with strong constitutional powers at the very start, the battle raged over the breadth of the powers conferred rather than over formal constitutional changes. Those powers were firmly defended, liberally interpreted, and gradually expanded under the strong Presidents from Washington on. The governors, on the other hand, having been granted few powers at the start, gained strength slowly, largely through constitutional amendment, in the course of the Nineteenth Century. In the same period, many city executives developed from mere chairmen of councils to weak mayors and then to strong mayors, and there was even an occasional step in this direction among the rural units of government. These things were taking place even while the emphasis on representativeness was predominant; they continued after the pursuit of neutral competence became the order of the day; but the Twentieth Century was well on its way before executive leadership became a systematic quest supported by articulate theories, and before it really began to gather speed.

<sup>8</sup> Criticisms, that is to say, of the fragmentation "in general." When it came to the particular fragments over which they exerted their greatest influence, legislators, bureaucrats, party organizers, and interest groups were often defensive of their special positions and hostile to integrating remedies which might disturb their control.

One of the first signs of the new emphasis was the rapid spread of the executive budget in government. For a long time, agency requests for funds were considered individually, and there was no central point at which total expenditures were reviewed and the competing claims balanced against each other in the light of the resources available; indeed, very often, the only way governments could figure out how much they were spending was to add up the appropriation bills after they had been passed. The reformers turned to the chief executives to rationalize the spending process, and out of it came the now familiar phenomena of executive review and adjustment of agency requests, and the submittal of a comprehensive budget supposed to make it possible to see the overall spending pattern. The practice was often far short of ideal, but, for the first time, chief executives were given a powerful instrument with which to control administrative behavior; it was a major advance in striving to equip them to integrate American government. A few large cities and states adopted budgetary legislation during the first two decades of the Twentieth Century, and the Taft Commission on Efficiency and Economy in 1912 urged such a measure upon the federal government. By the middle of the third decade, many of the largest cities, virtually all of the states, and the federal government had budget laws on the books. Since then, in general, the tendency has been toward continued increase in the budgetary powers of chief executives, and toward adoption of the process by those jurisdictions in which it did not previously obtain. A large body of literature now backs up this practice, and, though the lack of a theory of budgeting (as contrasted with beliefs about the appropriate machinery for budgeting) has been pointed out, the executive-budget doctrine is widely accepted and rarely challenged.

* Party bosses occasionally did serve this function, but only occasionally, for it must be remembered that our political parties are really congeries of smaller organizations in most places and therefore hardly equipped to provide governmental integration. Besides, they were phenomena from which governmental designers were seeking to deliver the governmental process.

Another indication of the concern with executive leadership is the administrative reorganization movement. It is frequently described as having begun in 1917, when Illinois adopted a sweeping change in its administrative structure, although such measures had been unsuccessfully urged in other states several years earlier. Under this plan, the number of agencies was reduced, and they were grouped into comparatively few departments headed by officials appointed by the governor; an administrative pyramid, with the governor standing at the apex, was the goal, and if it was rarely achieved completely, the extent to which it was approximated is indeed remarkable considering the degree of fragmentation prior to the changes. The number of elected administrative officials was sharply diminished, and ballots became correspondingly shorter. The appointing and removal power of the governor was also increased. In a single vast upheaval, the reorganizers sought to elevate him from an almost impotent exhorter to a powerful leader; if their efforts did not—as they could not—immediately produce the consequences sought, it was not very long before they began to bear fruit. Administratively and politically, the Illinois governor ascended to new eminence and influence. And more than half the states, some cities, and a few counties and towns, followed Illinois' lead. All during the 'twenties and 'thirties, surveys of government machinery were commonplace, and they became even more so after World War II as the first federal Hoover Commission touched off a wave of "little Hoover Commissions" in the states and many cities. "Concentration of authority and responsibility," "functional integration," "direct lines of responsibility," "grouping of related services," "elimination of overlapping and duplication," and "need for coordination" echoed through state capitols, city and town halls, and even through some county courthouses as chief executives became the new center of governmental design.

At the federal level, there were occasional adjustments and readjustments in the machinery of government in the early part of the century, and the President was even invested with broad powers of reorganization during the emergencies of World War I and the depression. But it was not until the mushrooming agencies of the New Deal strained that machinery to its limits that the practices and supporting dogmas of the reorganizers made their appearance in strength in Washington. Few clearer statements of the executive leadership value than the Report of the President's Committee on Administrative Management have ever been published;<sup>10</sup> with its recommendations on pulling the administrative functions of the independent regulatory commissions back under the President,<sup>11</sup> on drawing the government corporations back into the hierarchy,<sup>12</sup> on bringing personnel management under close direction by the President, on strengthening the White House staff, on getting the General Accounting Office out of the pre-auditing field and returning this operation to the executive branch, and in the tightly reasoned explanations of these recommendations (which were tied to the peg of the separation of powers), the Committee offered the classic presentation of the reorganization aspects of the executive leadership school.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>10</sup> And no clearer or more scholarly justifications of this value than E. Pendleton Herring, Public Administration and the Public Interest (New York, 1936).

The Reorganization Act of 1939, which reversed one formal relationship of the President to Congress by conferring initiatory responsibility for reorganization plans on the former and authorizing the latter in effect to veto such proposals, reflected in practice the theory of the Report; even the frequent use of the legislative veto does not reduce the significance of this expansion of executive power, and the fierceness of the periodic battles over renewal of the Act suggests both Congressmen and Presidents are conscious of this significance. In the course of the years since the Report, without much fanfare, other recommendations of the Committee have been put into practice, too; the influence of the Committee continued to make itself felt for a long time.

The first Hoover Commission was considerably less emphatic about strengthening the chief executive than its predecessor, and the second Hoover Commission has displayed, if anything, some coldness (if not outright hostility) to the concept. It is conceivable, therefore, that the reorganization movement has for the time being run its course in the federal government. But it would probably be an error to write off entirely this phase of the quest for executive leadership.

A third index of this quest, an index related to, but distinguishable from, the developments in budgeting and administrative reorganization, is the increase in the size of executive staffs. The archetype is the Executive Office of the President with its hundreds of specialists providing the President with advice on every aspect of policy, reviewing legislative proposals to work out the Presidential attitude, studying administrative management from the President's point of view, planning, researching, furnishing legal counsel, serving as a source of information alternative and supplementary to the formal hierarchy, and studded with "the President's men," responsible and loyal to him and him alone. This is a far cry from the days when a President's secretariat consisted of a few aides who helped him with his official correspondence; it has helped to give the chief executive the means with which to direct the administration he heads and to formulate programs and press them into statute and then into operation; it has helped make him a real center of political and administrative power. In like fashion, the executive offices of many of the governors have been transformed into instruments of leadership, and some local executives have been similarly equipped; at these levels, the evolution has been somewhat less dramatic, but not much less effective. The tendencies may be uneven in their fulfillment, but they are pronounced.

<sup>11</sup> This point of view received additional support at the state level, although in restrained tones, from James W. Feeler in his The Independence of State Regulatory Commissions (Chicago, 1942).

<sup>12</sup> See also, for example, V. O. Key, Jr., "Government Corporations," in Fritz M. Marx, ed., Elements of Public Administration (New York, 1946).

<sup>13</sup> To be sure, the Committee also advocated expansion of the merit system, and restated the argument that stronger executive leadership would mean greater popular control of government (i.e., representativeness), thus indicating how deep-seated these parallel values were. But this cannot obscure the basic premises of the Committee's Report, nor negate its general impact: it is overwhelmingly for executive leadership in sentiment.

Doctrinally, the sharp conceptual cleavage between politics and administration, which gained currency during the years when neutral competence was ascendent, and which served as such a useful philosophical prop for the machinery favored in those years, became an impediment to the justification of executive leadership. For one thing, chief executives, in whom administrative responsibility and power were to be lodged, were also partisan politicians. Moreover, one of the main reasons advanced for seeking integration was elimination of the fragmentation resulting from acceptance of the idea of the separability of politics and administration. Gradually, therefore, the politics-administration dichotomy fell out of favor in public administration, and the doctrine of the continuity of the policy-formulating process, better suited to the aims of executive leadership, began to replace it. Before long, the traditional orthodoxy became old-fashioned and found few defenders.

By every measure, then, the years from 1910 to 1950 were characterized by the rise of the quest for executive leadership to a place of pre-eminence in administrative thought and action.

The Concurrence of Values. For expository purposes, the quest for the three values has here been treated as sequential, and, to be sure, each had a different high point in time. Nevertheless, it is worth pausing to reiterate that at no point was any of them pursued to the complete exclusion of one or both of the others; evidence of interest in all three can be found at any stage of our history, sometimes in a single document by a single author. As has been observed, the defense of any one was often framed in terms of advancement of the others simultaneously. The story is thus one of changing balance among the values, not of total displacement.

II. THE COALITION

For many years, the proponents of neutral competence and the partisans of executive leadership were able to make common cause, and their alliance became so imbedded in their thinking that the differences between them were hardly recognized. The divisive factors beginning to emerge today then lay hidden beneath the mutual striving after a shared goal—a merit system to replace the spoils system.<sup>14</sup> Much of the standard literature of public administration was written during this honeymoon period and therefore embraced both values at once.

<sup>14</sup> "Merit system" and "spoils system," as used in this section of this paper, include, but are not restricted to, personnel management. Patronage, it will be seen, is but one aspect—albeit the principal one—of spoils, which includes contracts, purchases, and other "favors." The remedies of the reformers were aimed at every aspect.

That the members of the neutral competence school should support the merit system as against the spoils system is not at all surprising; this reform lay at the core of their program for redesigning governmental organization. But it does require some explanation to account for the position of the executive leadership people, since spoils were allegedly one of the most effective devices through which executive influence could be exerted. There would seem to be a contradiction between advocacy of measures to strengthen executives on the one hand and endorsement of a system that appeared to reduce executive influence on the other.

The contradiction is more apparent than real. The spoils system had its uses for chief executives, but, as it operated in this country, it never really gave these officers control of the administrative hierarchy. As a source of inducements to persuade legislators to support executive-sponsored measures, it was quite helpful at times. It was also valuable in providing incentives to attract workers for the parties. But it never furnished the executives with loyal, enthusiastic, capable, disciplined administrative machines; it did not make them chief administrators.

Federal patronage, for example, about which more is known than has been revealed about patronage practices at any other level of government, was distributed largely through Senators and Representatives, hopefully in return for the legislators' votes on issues in which the Presidents were interested. But Congressmen ordinarily had to farm out their patronage to the party organizations in their states and districts, and even dissident wings of Presidential parties which did not give Presidential measures consistent support in the legislative chambers could often count on nominating some federal appointees. During election campaigns the Presidents needed the support of all segments of the parties and could not, therefore, afford to weaken them for their legislative defections. In short, the patronage system strengthened party leaders and legislators more than it did executives. Thus the appointing power of the Presidents was bargained away—shrewdly sometimes, to be sure, from the point of view of legislation and of political survival, but at some cost from the standpoint of administrative management. Moreover, if a President's own nomination was itself the result of bargaining in which he was the chosen rather than the chooser, then his appointing power was largely taken away at the start.

It was not just a matter of creating "ten enemies and one ingrate" with every appointment. Equally important, patronage tended to fragment the executive branch as much as did election of administrative officers. For the loyalty of appointees who owed their positions only formally to the appointing official, but in fact to the state and local party units that nominated them, lay with the nominating powers. In the exercise of their legal authorizations, the appointees tended to be as responsive to individual legislators, local and state party leaders, and local community pressures as to their nominal superiors in the hierarchy. Moreover, since their tenure was sure to be cut short as soon as the opposing party won an election, they tried to squeeze all they could out of their posts while they occupied them; their own personal interests, therefore, were likely to take precedence over official directives when the two conflicted. Trying to lead such a staff was like trying to play croquet in Wonderland; subordinates, like the mallets, balls, and wickets of the fairy tale, operated with a high degree of independence.

• To the supporters of executive leadership, it was clear that the lateral pulls of political parties and individual legislators had to be reduced, and the incentives for public employees to exploit their offices for personal advantage eliminated. Only then could the other means of building up executive influence be made effective; only then could the President assert his authority over administration. So the executive leadership supporters joined the defenders of neutral competence in the drive toward a merit system of appointment, expecting that a bureaucracy chosen by objective standards would be at least as responsive to Presidential direction as to party and legislative pressures. A merit system of appointment controlled by a Civil Service Commission thus served the ends of two schools of thought; for different reasons, and in pursuit of different goals, they united behind it.

Similar factors apparently operated to promote the adoption of objective standards of practice for other activities corrupted by the spoils system. Political discrimination in public contracting, public works, government purchasing, granting of charters and franchises, distribution of benefits and subsidies, and the enforcement of the law, provided a harvest mainly reaped by state and local party and government leaders. These practices, too, gave a bit of leverage to executives in their legislative and political roles, but they did nothing for executive control of the executive branch. So the executive leadership school approved and worked for the adoption of rigorous statutory limitations, cutting party and individual legislators out of these processes as far as possible just as the civil service system freed the appointing process from their depredations. Here, too, though apparently striving for different objectives, the neutral competence and executive leadership groups joined hands.

Consequently, the flood of literature on public administration after World War I unanimously applauded many of the measures designed to take government out of politics. By the 'thirties, however, as the emphasis on executive leadership increased, evidences of discord grew more persistent.

III. THE EMERGING CONFLICT

In thirty years the number of federal civilian employees has more than quadrupled. If power were measurable, the federal bureaucracy's power would probably turn out to have increased by an even greater factor: Governmental policy is now formulated in administrative regulations and orders, as the growth of the Federal Register vividly attests; judicial proceedings before administrative agencies probably exceed in quantity those before the courts; licensing and administrative decisions regarding benefits and subsidies, are the order of the day; and all of this is handled by administrative officials under the very broadest of mandates from Congress and the President. Much of our legislation originates in administrative agencies, and most proposed legislation is submitted to such agencies to determine what the President's position on it ought to be. A corresponding growth of administrative influence has taken place in all large-scale organizations, both governmental and private, but few have a record as dramatic in this respect as the federal government.

The growth of governmental bureaucracy in size and importance was subjected to vehement attacks in this country and abroad. For the most part, however, the attacks were disregarded, especially by political scientists, because it was clear that they were not aimed at the bureaucracy per se, but at the governmental programs administered by the civil servants. The programs themselves were too popular for their critics to assail directly with any real hope of success; the assault therefore took an oblique approach, hitting at what appeared to be a more vulnerable target. The criticism was therefore not taken very seriously in the study of public administration. Students of this subject became ardent and sometimes uncritical defenders of bureaucrats. Now that the controversy over the New Deal has subsided, however, the bureaucracy itself is more or less taken for granted, and attacks upon it are less frequent, less vehement, and less publicized than they once were. This has helped students of public administration to take a somewhat more dispassionate view of the bureaucracy, and some second thoughts may be at hand.

For though the mechanisms of neutral competence were remarkably successful in reducing the influence of the political parties on the administrative hierarchy, they did not necessarily increase the President's control over administration. Rather, they encouraged the development of "self-directing" groups within the bureaucracy, and these groups in turn cultivated their own sources of support among professional groups concerned with the subject matter over which the services have jurisdiction, among their clientele, and among appropriate Congressional committees and subcommittees. The components of the "neutral" bureaucracy, by virtue of their expertness and information and alliances, have become independent sources of decision-making power, and Presidents will probably find them no easier to direct—indeed, perhaps even more intractable, than their partisan predecessors.

As a consequence, some of the standard devices for promoting neutral competence have been openly questioned in the literature of public administration. As noted earlier, the independence of regulatory commissions and government corporations has been vigorously criticized. The Brownlow Committee also sought to make personnel management an arm of the White House and to confine the Civil Service Commission to quasi-judicial functions and a role as "watchdog" of the merit system. This principle was endorsed recently by the staff of the Temporary (New York) State Commission on Coordination of State Activities, by a minority (comprising 11 members) of the Mayor's Committee on Management Survey of the City of New York, by the Sixth American Assembly,<sup>15</sup> and, implicitly, by the present administration in Washington, under which the chairman of the Civil Service Commission serves as administrative head of that agency and is located in the executive mansion. A rising chorus of voices has also begun to call for decentralization of authority for personnel management to line departments,<sup>16</sup> a position stated with particular clarity and force by Commissioner James K. Pollock of the first Hoover Commission in a minority report on personnel. The establishment of Schedule C in the Federal government service in 1953, rolling back merit system protections from a number of positions of a policy-making and confidential character, despite the partisan components of the impetus behind this move, was in large measure an effort to preserve the power of the President over policy. More recently, the arguments of the second Hoover Commission for extension of civil service protections to the very highest administrative officials (in the form of a "senior civil service") have been sharply questioned.<sup>17</sup> Recommendations for an institutionalized corps of political executives have been assailed as likely to weaken the President.<sup>18</sup> The premises of the city-manager plan have been described as inapplicable to large cities, and some spirited defenses of elected mayors have appeared.<sup>19</sup> And all of these views have been reflected in the kinds of administrative improvements adopted in many jurisdictions in recent years. Other similar defections from the coalition between the neutrality and the leadership camps can be found in current literature and practice, but it is not necessary to labor the point; patently, these straws in the wind are examples of the growing divergence between the two philosophies that makes it increasingly doubtful that their adherents will continue to support the same governmental theories or reforms.

Moreover, the philosophical divisions over structural values among the scholars have been intensified by differing political—i.e., program—views. Many of the champions of increased governmental activities, in the realms both of services (welfare, financial, industrial) and economic regulation, tend to rally

<sup>15</sup> Staff Report on Civil Service, State of New York Legislative Document No. 42 (1953); Modern Management for the City of New York (1953), Vol. 2, pp. 216 ff.; The Federal Government Service (New York: Graduate School of Business, Columbia University, 1954), with special emphasis on Chapter 2, "The President, Congress, and the Federal Government Service," by Herman M. Somers.

<sup>16</sup> Cf., Norman J. Powell, Personnel Administration in Government (New York, 1956), pp. 164-71.

<sup>17</sup> E.g., Herman M. Somers, "Some Reservations about the Senior Civil Service," Personnel Administration, Vol. 19, pp. 10 ff. (January-February, 1956); and Paul P. Van Riper, The Dialectics of the Civil Service (mimeo., Cornell University, 1956).

<sup>18</sup> See the papers (mimeo.) delivered by Harlan Cleveland and Wallace S. Sayre at the Conference on the Political Executive, Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, Princeton, New Jersey, March, 1956.

<sup>19</sup> See Temporary (New York) State Commission to Study the Organizational Structure of the Government of the City of New York, Four Steps to Better Government of New York City (1953), Chapter 2; Wallace S. Sayre, "The General Manager Idea for Large Cities," Public Administration Review, Vol. 14, pp. 253 ff. (Autumn, 1954).

behind chief executives and especially behind the President. The reason is fairly obvious: Demands for expansion of government service and regulation originate frequently (though not exclusively) in urban areas, and urban areas have their greatest political effect on the election of chief executives and their smallest impact on the state legislatures and Congress, where they are substantially underrepresented. So executives tend generally to be more sympathetic to those demands than do the legislators, and those who favor an expanding role for government look to elected executives, as a rule, when they want to impress their preferences on governmental policy. Quite apart, then, from the concern about the organizational problems created by fragmentation of government, there are considerations of political preference and strategy that generate support for executive leadership.

By the same token, there are issues of political attitudes and tactics that engender enthusiasm for legislative bodies regardless of questions of representativeness. Legislatures, because of the composition and the sources of their political strength, offer the greatest leverage to those who resist the growth of governmental activities—or, more accurately, who oppose those governmental activities sought by urban populations. Not, then, because legislatures are more representative, but because this is where the backers of a particular political attitude can exert their greatest political strength, many individuals recommend in their proposals for governmental reform that these bodies be strengthened both relatively and absolutely.

Finally, it might be inferred that some reformers distrust all politicians and electorates and pin their hopes on the expertise and efficiency of a professionalized bureaucracy. They seem to be moved not merely by a concern for governmental structure but by political values that include an implicit contempt for what we ordinarily understand to be the democratic process and an explicit respect for an aristocracy of talent that borders on a latter-day faith in technocracy.<sup>20</sup>

So the tendencies toward division reinforce each other, and there are no visible factors thrusting toward alliances like that fortuitous one developed by a peculiar conjunction of circumstances during the infancy of public administration as an academic and occupational specialty. As a result, the language of public administration is likely to become increasingly strategic and tactical in tone rather than "scientific." Just as the naked power issues of the legislatively oriented groups came to the surface in the recent efforts to weaken the Presidency—viz., the Twenty-Second Amendment, which reduces the leadership potential of a President in his second term; the efforts to strip away Presidential reorganization authority in 1953; the fight over the proposed Bricker Amendment; the continuing efforts to revamp the Electoral College in such a way as to reduce the political effectiveness of the urban-labor-liberal entente that has been partly responsible for the aggressive and expansive use of Presidential power—so too, many of the reorganization issues will be discussed in power terms in the future as the public administration groups aligned with the executive and with the bureaucracy, respectively, pull apart. The question that will be asked about suggested reorganizations is not, "What, according to the canons of management science, is the best organization?" but, "What will be the effect of this measure on the institution we support?" The differences in the answers will sharpen the theoretical distinctions between the wings of the public administration group and hasten estrangement of the factions.<sup>21</sup>

<sup>20</sup> There would seem to be an emergent split within this group. Some backers of a professionalized public service are apparently thinking in terms of a corps of administrative generalists to occupy the top levels of administrative agencies regardless of agency subject matter. Others seem to conceive of an administrative elite of occupational specialists—engineers, lawyers, doctors, social workers, foresters, etc.

To many students of public administration trained in the 'twenties, 'thirties, and 'forties, the new atmosphere will be a strange and perhaps a bewildering one, fraught with hostilities. To students trained in the 'sixties, the literature of the earlier period, with its "principles," may seem quaint and even naive. Political scientists of the remoter future, looking back, may well conclude that it is not easy to bridge the gap between a generation seeking to encourage the growth of a professional bureaucracy and a generation in turmoil over how to control it.

<sup>21</sup> One may even hazard the guess that the American Society for Public Administration will remain firmly in the hands of the neutral competence group while the executive leadership school in public administration looks more and more to the American Political Science Association as its forum.

THE LIMITS OF SOCIAL SCIENCE: HENRY ADAMS' QUEST FOR ORDER*

HENRY S. KARIEL

Harvard University

Contemporary social scientists generally regard Henry Adams as a brilliant but erratic figure in the history of American thought. Their image of him is that of a gifted but unreliable and unscientific writer. Yet it is striking how, upon a re-examination of his approach to his world, there emerges a cluster of attitudes and preoccupations which clearly anticipate much of what is significant in the work of these social scientists themselves. The reason why Adams is not, however, regarded as a forerunner of present-day students of society is that he never kept himself from pushing his theories to conclusions. If those who share his scientific ideals must ultimately reach his conclusions, the limits of their science might be exposed by a reconsideration of his personal battle, of his peculiar pains, trials, and failures.

Anticipating familiar tendencies, Adams made a case for irrationalism insofar as he pleaded for the conversion of theory into action; for conservatism insofar as he supported the reduction of discords by a manipulative science of means; and for elitism insofar as he permitted the practitioners of empirical science to settle the social conflicts left open to debate by the traditional methods of politics and philosophy. But Adams' formulation of this case was more than merely prescient. It was so consistent, elaborate, and thoroughgoing—and yet so free from the burden of technical jargon—that intentions and goals unclear or concealed in modern social science may be illuminated by a retracing of his search for genuine knowledge of society, by a retracing of his tenacious effort to cut through an infinite succession of wholly baffling events.

It is apparent from both Adams' "study of twentieth-century multiplicity," the subtitle he gave his Education, and his prodigious correspondence that the environment in which he had found himself never ceased to baffle him. From the moment when, as a young man, he was mystified by the behavior of English diplomats to the time he constructed his final survey of the meaning of history, Adams was to remain impressed by the inexplicability of politics and society, of nature and culture, of life and death. He saw unmanageable, incoherent forces frustrating, twisting, and deflecting all human plans. Nothing ever, it seemed, turned out as schemed. British statesmanship during the American Civil War was "a pointless puzzle." That Senator Sumner and Secretary Hoar should become the victims of the Grant Administration was a meaningless fact. After a study of Secretary Seward, it was impossible to conclude which part of him "was the mask and which was the features." The political machinery and the moral standards supporting "an eternity of Grants, or even of Garfields or of Conklings or of Jay Goulds" were, for Adams, inconceivable. The panic of 1893 was beyond understanding, the cultural output of Paris at the turn of the century a chaos, Paris and London "fantastic," Garibaldi an inscrutable sphinx, the ruins of Rome "bewildering." Confronted by the fact that his sister was painfully dying, he could not help but conclude the senselessness of it all. Nature itself, in the form of Mont Blanc, "looked to him what it was—a chaos of anarchic and purposeless forces."

* The writer wishes to thank his own students as well as the Foundation for American Studies for having given him ample opportunity to have this study debated and criticized.

Once more [Adams wrote Charles Milnes Gaskell in 1907] I find myself pitchforked across the ocean into this inconceivable kettle of absurd humanity, and the only change is that I feel each time more bewildered than before by the fact of my own continued existence, which seems now to connect back with nothing. This world has no relation whatever with my world, and I go on living in dreams. . . .<sup>1</sup>

The universe, in its very foundations, was incomprehensible, profoundly meaningless and absurd. Where it had been possible for John Adams and John Quincy Adams—as it seemed to their great-grandson and grandson—to see the world whole, where they had really known the relations between experienced events to be perfectly natural and rational, Henry Adams saw these relations as nothing but subjective acts of will. Such acts, to be sure, did connect disconnected events; but the connections were not in the nature of things. They were artificially created by man, established not by reason but by convention or force. To anyone who would honestly look after extricating himself from personal prejudice and social habit, nothing but an infinite number of discrete, opaque facts existed. Behind them was the great void.

However Adams' nineteenth-century contemporaries tied up disparate particulars, whatever resolutions commended themselves to them, he was alienated from their law. "Outlawry," he affirmed, was his peculiar birthright.<sup>2</sup> The existing formulas failed to account for the sequence of events, for the Grants, Garfields, Conklings, and Goulds. With such a sequence, Adams could not come to terms. He was unable to find the unifying terms either in or for his world. Life's tensions and tests, contingencies and mysteries, could not be subordinated to any significant end or purpose.

The alternatives for Adams—for anyone seeking to bear up after denying validity to all points of orientation—were to impose order in practice or to conquer disorder in theory. In his search for education, for an underlying natural law, in his attempt to effect a "systematic reduction of variables to some operationally valid framework, Adams might have tried to add his will and his power to existing pressures. He might have acted and imposed order in practice. Yet to a large extent, either he closed the active road himself or the America of his day, constituted as it was, closed it for him.<sup>3</sup> He was not, at any rate, to be the politician. If his concern was ultimately to be with the political order, as indeed it was, he gave little immediate indication of it. If he forever struggled for balance in practice, as he modestly did when, at past fifty, he "solemnly and painfully learned to ride the bicycle,"<sup>3a</sup> he effectively covered this up by concentrating on the problem of balance in theory.

<sup>1</sup> Henry Adams, The Education of Henry Adams (Boston, 1918, hereafter cited as Education), pp. 156, 279, 104; see also Worthington Chauncey Ford, ed., Letters of Henry Adams: 1858-1891 (Boston, 1930, hereafter cited as Letters I), p. 83; Education, p. 281; Harold Dean Cater, Henry Adams and His Friends: A Collection of His Unpublished Letters (Boston, 1947, hereafter cited as Cater), pp. 53, 67; Education, pp. 338, 346, 403, 317, 94-5, 82-3, 287-9; Worthington Chauncey Ford, ed., Letters of Henry Adams: 1892-1918 (Boston, 1930, hereafter cited as Letters II), p. 476; Letters I, p. 148 and II, pp. 580, 622; respectively. These expressions are but a sampling of Adams' bewilderment; nor do they fully suggest the resulting ennui.

<sup>2</sup> Education, p. 243.

Haphazardly yet inflexibly, he set out to perceive a scheme in things which were apparently wholly devoid of scheme, to find reasons for behavior which seemed wholly random and irrational. His encyclopedic, tortuous quest was not only far less playful and idle than Adams managed to make it appear—it actually was desperately serious after the suicide of his wife, an event so irrational that it never did fit the plan of the Education—it was also far from superficial. Taking him into virtually all the disciplines of learning, including geology and paleontology, the search was to be life-long. Adams tried everything but the laboratory experiment. Though always carefully rationed out, the energy and passion with which he proceeded would make it appear reasonable to speak of him as being driven. But his style and bearing alone indicate that after every interpretation of Adams as nothing but the frustrated actor, something remains. Adams and not some autonomous drive obviously did the directing. His constant awareness of what he was about makes it evident that he was thoroughly in control. And this fact alone should make it necessary to refrain from psychoanalysis or socio-analysis, to treat his ideas respectfully in and for themselves, to move economically within the circle of his beliefs.

I

What Adams consistently reached for, it should be clear, was "some great generalization which would finish one's clamor to be educated," some constitutive order basic to change, underlying history. He was plainly dismayed by the conception of history as the manifestation of individual actions to be artistically arranged by the historian. And unwilling to conceive of history as nothing but the capricious and indeterminate behavior of men, he hoped to grasp it as the interplay and the interaction of forces, forces which man himself might somehow discern and learn to master.<sup>4</sup> This meant approaching history as something other than one thing happening after another at random. It meant finding a necessary sequence, necessary relations between events. To find such a plot, or such law, required that Adams disentangle himself from the play that was history.<sup>5</sup> He had to gain, however fleetingly, a moment of insight, a point for perspective. He had to free himself from contingencies and the laws conventionally assumed to govern them, looking upon events from the outside, from some undetermined, freely posited vantage point. Assuming the characteristics of the free-floating intelligentsia made familiar by the sociology of knowledge, Adams expressly recognized the philosopher's need to place himself above history "as though he were a small God immortal and possibly omniscient."<sup>6</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Adams had it both ways: he observed that society had "barred" the political courses he wanted to sail (ibid., p. 263); yet he wrote as early as 1864, "I have now studies immediately on hand, that will certainly require a hundred years of incessant activity to complete, so that it is high time to begin. I look forward not without pleasure to a return to my college life at an advanced age." (Cater, p. 26; see also Cater, p. 312, and Letters I, pp. 154, 160, 162, 258).

<sup>3a</sup> Education, p. 330.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., pp. 224 (see also 472), 300-1, 457, 314. The leading figure of Adams' novel Democracy "wanted to see with her own eyes the action of primary forces; to touch with her own hand the massive machinery of society; to measure with her own mind the capacity of the motive power." "What she wished to see, she thought, was the clash of interests . . .

From such an all-determining vantage point, he resolved to lay out a framework exposing history's fixed pattern, coinciding with it. He was to write, that he "had even published a dozen volumes of American history for no other purpose than to satisfy himself whether, by the severest process of stating, with the least possible comment, such facts as seemed sure, in such order as seemed rigorously consequent, he could fix . . . a necessary sequence of human movement."<sup>7</sup> One result of this depersonalization, of the elimination of the subjective and the arbitrary, was the austerity and dryness of his nine-volume History of the United States During the Administrations of Jefferson and Madison (1889-91). There he wanted to let the facts, or the documents, speak for themselves, permitting them to reveal their natural order, their objective condition. And indeed he kept his comments repressed, checked himself from embellishing the record, made history as pure and positive as seemed possible.<sup>8</sup>

Yet he fully knew that he could not succeed. Unquestionably, if the short span of history he had covered could be identified with certainty, if it could be positively known, the key to all that followed and preceded would be bared. But the attempt to achieve this by means of traditional historical scholarship was obviously senseless. Adams therefore pushed through to another realm of knowledge for a possible answer to the riddle of man's existence and history—its conception, its end, its very point. "Satisfied that the sequence of men led to nothing and that the sequence of their society could lead no further, . . . he turned at last to the sequence of force. . . ." To wrest an answer from the facts, he turned to the physical sciences, hoping that perhaps their unity "would serve."<sup>9</sup> He accepted, for analytical purposes, not only their specific discoveries the tremendous forces of government, and the machinery of society, at work. What she wanted was POWER." Democracy (New York, 1880), pp. 10, 11-12.

---

<sup>5</sup> As Leo Strauss has shown in Natural Right and History (Chicago, 1953), p. 172 et seq., this was precisely the requirement Hobbes had to labor under in order to gain knowledge.

<sup>6</sup> Letters I, p. 206.

<sup>7</sup> Education, p. 382.

<sup>8</sup> See William H. Jordy, Henry Adams: Scientific Historian (New Haven, 1952), pp. 13, 56; for Adams' relation to Comte, see pp. 92-3, 113-20, 254-5. While Jordy's is easily the best intellectual biography of Adams, a full-scale study illuminating both his personality and his complex relation to Western social thought remains to be written.

<sup>9</sup> Education, pp. 382, 431.

—for which he has been soundly criticized<sup>10</sup>—but, more crucially, their method and conventions of investigation.

Natural history, it seemed worth assuming, is governed by the same laws as human history. The physical universe and human society are systematically related. A substructure of forces refers to both; knowledge is basically one.<sup>11</sup> There is a pattern in history just as there is in the stuff studied by the physical scientist. This pattern had to be discerned pure and simple, that is, without the subjective presuppositions which spoiled the social physics of Comte and his precursors. As Adams made clear in the undelivered presidential address he communicated to the American Historical Association in 1894,<sup>12</sup> the challenge had been issued to the historian. It was now essential to go beyond mere analogies and to treat man as the physical scientist had been treating nature. The creation of a science of history, Adams wrote, was a most natural tendency of historical scholarship. Historians had to coöperate with the inevitable. "Historians will not, and even if they would they can not, abandon the attempt. Science itself would admit its own failure if it admitted that man, the most important of all its subjects, could not be brought within its range." Historians, Adams wrote, were standing "on the brink of a great generalization that would reduce all history under a law as clear as the laws which govern the material world." The hope for a "self-evident, harmonious, and complete system" emphatically existed. All that was needed was just one sudden inspiration, one corner turned. Sheer persistence and a lucky break—not genius—would pull it off. "The law was certainly there, and as certainly was in places actually visible, to be touched and handled, as though it were a law of chemistry or physics." And if it should be discovered, "if some new Darwin were to demonstrate the laws of historical evolution," historians, while necessarily coming into conflict with that part of the status quo for which there could unfortunately be no future, would attain power. Where at present they were deprived of direct access to centers of power or denied themselves the satisfaction of exercising it, they would finally reach its very core. They would be able to achieve control in the realm of practice. Reflective insight would become operative. Writing to Henry Osborn Taylor, Adams suggested in 1905 that "it will <sup>10</sup> Jordy, op. cit., pp. 150–1, 163–219; Roy F. Nichols, "The Dynamic Interpretation of History," New England Quarterly, Vol. 8, pp. 163–78 (June 1935); see also Robert A. Hume, "Henry Adams's Quest for Certainty," in Hardin Craig, ed., Stanford Studies in Language and Literature (Stanford, 1941), pp. 361–73.

<sup>11</sup> "The department of history needs to concert with the departments of biology, sociology, and psychology some common formula or figure to serve their students as a working model for their study of the vital energies; and this figure must be brought into accord with the figures or formulas used by the department of physics and mechanics to serve their students as models for the working of physico-chemical and mechanical energies." Henry Adams, "A Letter to American Teachers of History," in The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma (New York, 1920, hereafter cited as "Letter"), pp. 137–263, at pp. 261–2. For a modern manifestation, see David L. Miller, "The Unity of Science Movement," Southwestern Social Science Quarterly, Vol. 26, pp. 252–9 (December 1945); and Otto Neurath, Rudolf Carnap, and Charles Morris, eds., International Encyclopedia of Unified Science (Chicago, 1955).

<sup>12</sup> Cater, p. 328, n. 2.

not need another century or half century to tip thought upside down. Law, in that case, would disappear as theory or a a priori principle, and give place to force. Morality would become police."<sup>13</sup> What has been the traditional philosophical quest for knowledge, the indispensable prerequisite for prudent action, would become a dispensable vocation. The body of knowledge concerning first principles being complete, the historical moment to cease philosophizing and to commence action would have arrived. Morality, a a priori principles, would be justifiably enforced.

The method by which the "physicist-historian"<sup>14</sup> might achieve control, the method which yielded Adams' own science of history, was (1) to disregard the view of history as an unbroken, undifferentiated continuum in time, as an even flow of "events," (2) to search for possible natural, self-evident breaks in the continuity of history, and (3) to examine the forces<sup>15</sup> in the periods between the breaks. Each of these periods—or phases, as Adams called them—would constitute some sort of equilibrium, more or less stable, which would always be qualitatively modified by succeeding periods. The historian's concern would be with the intensity and potency of the forces composing the respective equilibriums. Having taken account of the intensity of force, assigning values to it, he could engage in comparative analysis and possibly make predictions.

In a generally guarded tone, Adams found it useful to posit the existence of four intelligible, discontinuous periods, and from these he projected a fifth. The first was instinctual; the second, characterized by religious fetishism (beginning some 90,000 years ago and ending in 1600); the third, mechanical (1600–1870); and the last, electrical (1870–1917).<sup>16</sup> He had confidence only in the relative accuracy of the mechanical phase, one he therefore used as base. It was from this base that he consequently projected. Since he had to delimit some period, he had to risk the misleading impression created by the specificity of dates. Whatever the impression, however, he was always willing to take or to leave a decade, knowing that this would scarcely affect the ultimate outcome very much.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>13</sup> Henry Adams, "The Tendency of History," in The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma, pp. 125–33 (hereafter cited as "Tendency"), at pp. 126, 127, 128 (see also Letters II, p. 49); Cater, pp. 558–9.

<sup>14</sup> Henry Adams, "The Rule of Phase Applied to History," in The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma, pp. 267–311 (hereafter cited as "Rule"), at p. 310.

<sup>15</sup> Force Adams defined as "anything that does, or helps to do work." Scientific hypotheses as well as reason itself were seen as but dependent, contingent forces. Education, pp. 388, 474; "Letter," p. 208.

<sup>16</sup> "Between the dynamo in the gallery of machines and the engine-house outside, the break of continuity amounted to abysmal fracture for a historian's objects. No more relation could he discover between the steam and the electric current than between the Cross and cathedral." Education, p. 381.

<sup>17</sup> See "Rule," p. 308, also see Cater, p. 529 where Adams looks roughly 100 years ahead, or Letters II, p. 83, where he speaks of 200 years. Later, a triangulation of the development of the ocean steamer brings him to 1927; he allusively maintains, however, that an expert study of the progression of explosives would provide the best data. Education, pp. 341–2; see also Cater, p. 533; Letters II, p. 616.

Projection became possible the moment he was struck by two things: the critical breaks between periods came ever closer together and, in every new period, human energy had increasingly dissipated. This led him to conclude (1) that the dates of equilibrium change are set by a law of acceleration, specifically the law of inverse squares, and (2) that social and intellectual energy is in an ever-accelerating state of disintegration and leveling out—not in fine gradations but in jumps. It was the law of inverse squares which led him to extrapolate, and talk about, an ethereal period. If the base period were really correct, the ethereal one, as he called it, would last from 1917 to 1921, the year in which man, unable to hold off the force of nature, would finally lose control. As the Virgin was the symbol for the age of religious fetishism, as the dynamo was the symbol for that of electricity, so radium symbolized this last phase of man. Its ethereal nature made discussion of it necessarily vague, though Adams was never inhibited about characterizing a present which implied a future:

The play of thought for thought's sake had mostly ceased. The throb of fifty or a hundred million steam horse-power, doubling every ten years, and already more despotic than all the horses that ever lived, and all the riders they ever carried, drowned rhyme and reason. No one was to blame, for all were equally servants of the power, and worked merely to increase it. . . .

Modern politics, is, at bottom, a struggle not of men but of forces. The men become every year more and more creatures of force, massed about central power-houses. The conflict is no longer between the men, but between the motors that drive the men, and the men tend to succumb to their own motive forces.

Power leaped from every atom, and enough of it to supply the stellar universe showed itself running to waste at every pore of matter. Man could no longer hold it off. Forces grasped his wrists and flung him about as though he had hold of a live wire or a runaway automobile. . . .

These things he wrote in the Education. But already three years before he had told his brother Brooks that it was his belief "that science is to wreck us, and that we are like monkeys monkeying with a loaded shell. . . . It is mathematically certain to me that another thirty years of energy-development at the rate of the last century, must reach an impasse."<sup>18</sup>

The conclusions of the physical sciences of Adams' day proved to be all too easy to use for support and extension of his own insight. Adams welcomed Lord Kelvin's second law of thermodynamics less as scientific hypothesis than as final truth. Here was an authoritative, handy formulation stating the universality of entropy. The fact that man, like nature, would come to a dead end, both being subject to the same law, Adams was wholly ready to accept, solicitously noting that man, whose mass was strikingly less great than nature's, would meet annihilation first.

<sup>18</sup> Education, pp. 408, 421-2, 494; Cater, p. 529. See also his letters in Worthington Chauncey Ford, ed., A Cycle of Adams Letters: 1861-1865, 2 vols. (Boston, 1920, hereafter cited as Cycle), Vol. I, p. 135, and Cater, p. 504.

In responding to this formula uncritically, he surely betrayed his temper.<sup>19</sup> Yet an inner check kept the betrayal from being complete. However dogmatic he could sound when making predictions, with whatever exactitude and certainty he might make his repeated announcements of impending catastrophe, he actually accepted no law of physics as conclusive. He never quit the great debate, never let up reviewing the literature of science. On the contrary, he doggedly continued his search for "a spool on which to wind the thread of history without breaking it," his search for some "object which was more than mere plaything, hypothesis, or force among forces."

To the tired student, the idea that he must give it up seemed sheer senility. As long as he could whisper, he would go on as he had begun, bluntly refusing to meet his creator with the admission that the creation had taught him nothing except that the square of the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle might for convenience be taken as equal to something else.

Knowing his own theory provided no answer—that his answers were not generated by his science—he kept raising his question of what might account for man's behavior, of what might give it meaning. And for Adams, there was to be no conclusive victory over the facts of history. While the extent of his discernment has been remarkable enough to all students of his work, the world did remain mysterious, irreducible to any set of symbols. Order might be the dream of man, but chaos persisted as the law of nature. The sequence of history, of society, of men, had led to nothing; the relation of cause and effect was artificial; the sequence of thought was unintelligible. There was to be no formula. Adams laid claim to no meaning. He offered no conclusion, either to philosopher or ruler.

... in the chaotic and unintelligible condition in which I found—and left—the field of knowledge which is called History, I became overpoweringly conscious that any further pretence on my part of acting as instructor would be something worse than humbug. . . . As History stands, it is a sort of Chinese Play, without end and without lesson.

History remained "a tangled skein that one may take up at any point, and break when one has unravelled enough. . . ." The historian, it turned out, was purely arbitrary. What end or purpose might be discerned in history, the historian had supplied it. History, beyond all appearance, had no goal or purpose. All Adams could see, at the end, was endless flux and change—no necessary development.<sup>20</sup>

Ultimate reality was to him nothing but motion, nothing but force and its intensity.<sup>21</sup> Consequently no perceived particulars could be related to anything

<sup>19</sup> He seems to have known as much. In 1891 he wrote to Elizabeth Cameron, "Unfortunately I am cursed with the misfortune of thinking that I know beforehand what the result must be. . . ." (Letters, I, p. 458). And in 1910 he ironically wrote his brother Charles that he had provided "the logical and mathematical demonstration that the human race is going to end when I do. . . ." (Letters II, p. 551.)

<sup>20</sup> Education, pp. 302, 382, 451, 472, Letters II, p. 119 (see also Education, pp. 303, 306, 353).

<sup>21</sup> Education, p. 282; "Rule," p. 310.

but one another—a conclusion which even physical science was compelled to reach.<sup>22</sup> If motion is all, if everything is relative, there can be no durable truth—and Adams knew it: “when he came to ask himself what he truly thought, he felt he had no Faith. . . .” For a while, he said, he believed in the truth of Darwinism. But he was certain “that whenever the next new hobby should be brought out, he should surely drop off from Darwinism like a monkey from a perch. . . .”<sup>23</sup> He knew “that the idea of one Form, Law, Order, or Sequence had no more value for him than the idea of none; that what he valued most was Motion, and what attracted his mind was Change.” And he added that he “was the first in an infinite series to discover and admit to himself that he really did not care whether truth was, or was not, true.” In the absence of truth, there could be no success, for there would be nothing to measure it by. In the absence of any point of orientation, there could only be the aimless pursuit—“the pursuit of ignorance in silence” which had “led the weary pilgrim into such mountains of ignorance that he could no longer see any path whatever, and could not even understand a signpost.”<sup>24</sup> There was, indeed, no ground for support, no point from which to survey self or world. One might search for a reliable order, but Adams had foreknowledge of the necessary defeat.

II

To support Henry Adams' intellectual position, truly to embrace it, is to block all alternatives, to absolute, intensely personal despair. To believe, without compromise, without qualification, (1) that, in the final analysis, everything about man, about society, about history, about the universe itself, everything which man himself has not fabricated, is totally mysterious, (2) that, again in the final analysis, there is no point to anything, that nothing has intrinsic significance, that nothing is coherent except that which man himself has forced to cohere, (3) that man is but a force—a self-generating, self-activating, self-replenishing one—in a universe of forces, that all is ultimately force, and (4) that no particular event, no discrete thing, is autonomous but, when truly understood, related to some substructure of forces—to value and act on this combination of propositions is to permit the human enterprise to become literally unbearable.

The despair of this position has always invited attempts to bear up by removing the conflict between the self and the environment, to gain direct, immediate knowledge of the nature of things, to dispense with the ambiguities of all forms of mediation—basically those of language. It is revealing to note to what extent Adams himself edged toward the various forms assumed by man's desperate effort to reach spiritual truth directly, to bridge the gap between the self and the universe. Thus he significantly played with self-annihilation, making overtures to both total quietism and unreserved activism.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., pp. 227–8, 434.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., pp. 231–2. He concludes, not surprisingly, that “he was a Darwinian for fun.” See also Cater, p. 648.

<sup>24</sup> Education, pp. 328, 433.

Those who have covered Adams' trail, his friends, critics, and biographers, have unearthed no record whatever of suicidal thoughts he might have entertained. But his abiding "hunger for annihilation," his conscientious effort to deny himself, has been fully evident. "I have deliberately and systematically effaced myself," he wrote Brooks in 1895, "even in my own history." He managed to keep himself concealed again and again—publishing anonymously, resisting every portrait photographer, unwilling "to talk or write or appear," refusing to address the American Historical Association, turning away from the honorary degree Harvard offered to bestow upon him, contriving to objectify himself by keeping the first person singular out of the account of his life.<sup>25</sup>

His same inability to come to terms with himself, his same inability to see the self as essentially and ultimately meaningful, found expression in an approval of a straightforward activism which makes it perfectly explicable that Adams conceived of mindless selfishness as "the only spring of success," and confessed, "I like best Bergson's frank surrender to the superiority of Instinct over Intellect. You know how I have preached that principle, and how I have studied the facts of it. In fact I wrote once a whole volume . . . in order to recall how Education may be shown to consist in following the intuitions of instinct."<sup>26</sup> It was in one of the most impressive passages of this volume that Adams paid his respect to the education of his grandfather. On one summer morning, he recalled, the old President had done with unreasoning, silent display of authority what, of necessity, had to be done—taken the rebellious Henry to school, and "without a word."<sup>27</sup> This inclination, an admittedly permanent one, to appreciate that silent strength and mastery which needs no apologetic other than its massive effectiveness, which justifies itself by virtue of its sheer potency, is a natural enough conclusion from Adams' premises. Assuming that none of the particular things within human experience can have meaning, he might nonetheless have conceived of the undifferentiated whole as meaningful. But to accept as meaningful only the universe in its awful entirety is to deprive oneself of any ground for making distinctions and discriminations, for caring about parts and articulations. Knowledge of such a universe must remain inexpressible, beyond symbolization, language, discourse. It is not surprising, therefore, that if reflection on the universe as well as on history is not enough to teach man anything—permitting him only to make what he will or to enjoy his nonsensical tautologies—all he can do, if act he must, is to act without reflection, without thought. While thoughtful action may still seem possible in the absence of a meaningful cosmos, it must lack a basis beyond the subjectivity of individuals, becoming altogether optional. Dependent on utility and efficiency, thought must appear either as a variety of action, as mere instrument for domination, or else as wasteful check on action and expansiveness.

<sup>25</sup> Cater, pp. xlvii, 36, 328, 519, 596, 647, 770; Letters II, pp. 8, 10–11, 70. To the editor's preface of the Education, actually written by Adams, he obtained permission to attach Henry Cabot Lodge's name. (Cater, pp. xc, 523.)

<sup>26</sup> Cater, p. 520; Letters II, p. 524.

<sup>27</sup> Education, pp. 12–13. For a possibly contrasting view of "men who sprang from the soil to power," see p. 265.

It is in one of Adams' poems, "Buddha and Brahma,"<sup>23</sup> that he goes the mystic's complete circle from uninhibited, spontaneous activism to acceptance and quietism. Just as he had asked himself about the terminus of history, so in this poem the Buddha is asked whether the world is eternal. Responding, but making no sound,

The Buddha raised the Lotus in his hand,
His eyes bent downward fixed upon the flower.
No more!

To the son of the Rajah of Mogadha, an active ruler and warrior, this mysterious gesture begs for interpretation. He asks his father to explain. But the Rajah refuses, urging his son, "Think not! Strike!" He adds that all his "wisdom lies in these three words." Having been pressed to give the gesture meaning, the Rajah finally affirms:

The Universal has no limit. Thought
Travelling in constant circles, round and round,
Must ever pass through endless contradictions,
Returning on itself at last, till lost
In silence.

And it is again on this note that the poem concludes:

Life, Time, Space, Thought, the World, the Universe
End where they first begin, in one sole Thought Of Purity in Silence.

Whatever law there might be, whatever the answer to Adams' question, it defies denotation and symbolization. Whatever unifying principles may exist, whatever constitution there is for man and society, it is beyond human articulation. The keenest exercise of the intellect and the most refined apprehensions of the sensibilities can teach man nothing but the wisdom of silence. Writing to Mabel La Farge in 1898, Adams professed that if I had a commission from the Infinite to concentrate all practical wisdom in the most condensed form of dying advice to my fellow beings, I should without a moment's hesitation say to Infinite Wisdom: "Hold your tongue and mind your own business!"

When reason is useless, when thought merely travels "round and round," when certain knowledge is ever contradicted, one is driven to the "study of . . . ignorance in silence," revering St. Francis' way of repudiating "the thread spun by the human spider" as "the most satisfactory—or sufficient—ever offered." When all relations between facts are hypothetical, nothing can be affirmed with certainty: "The student had nothing to say. For him, all opinion founded on fact must be error, because the facts can never be complete, and their relations must be always infinite." Realizing "he could teach his students nothing"—that is, nothing truly educating them—"the greatest good he could do them was to hold his tongue." There being no final science of history, it became necessary to stress, as Adams did, that "silence next to good temper was the mark of sense." "The situation seems to call for no opinion," he wrote in "The Tendency of History," "unless we have some scientific theory to offer. . . ." Either a finished theory—or nothing.<sup>29</sup>

<sup>23</sup> Yale Review, Vol. 5, pp. 82-9 (October 1915).

III

This existentialist, puritanical strain—one which makes all talk of God turn into blasphemy—is profoundly anti-humanistic. In being silent, man inescapably voids all expression, all discourse, fabrication, and art. Yet Adams' life and works contradict precisely such anti-humanism. If Adams mystically sought self-annihilation, spontaneous activism, or total quietism—if indeed he approached the mystic's conclusive solution of a conflict which, unresolved, drives man to despair—he always stopped short of actually embracing it. It is fascinating, in fact, to watch Adams move toward the mystic's final co-ordination—and to see him shrink back. Thus from Ceylon he banteringly wrote that he had gone "to the sacred bo-tree, which is now only a sick shoot or two from the original trunk, and under it I sat for half an hour, hoping to attain Nirvana. . . . I left the bo-tree without attaining Buddhahip."<sup>30</sup> Never giving up the various forms of expression, he compromised his mysticism. Consistently, if wistfully, he nullified the basis for his attempt to strike through paradoxes to some inexpressible holy synthesis. His self-depreciation was never quite complete.<sup>30a</sup> His quietism was as constantly restrained as his activism. His pursuit of ignorance in silence was after all what he had reluctantly called it: his "final profession."<sup>31</sup> He had always fully responded to the example provided by Henry James in a letter he addressed to Adams in 1914:

Of course we are lone survivors, of course the past that was our lives is at the bottom of an abyss—if the abyss has any bottom; of course, too, there's no use talking unless one particularly wants to. But . . . one can, strange to say, still want to—or at least can behave as if one did. Behold me therefore so behaving—and apparently capable of continuing to do so. I still find my consciousness interesting—under cultivation of the interest. Cultivate it with me, dear Henry. . . . You see I still, in presence of life (or of what you deny to be such,) have reactions—as many as possible—and the book I sent you is a proof of them. It's, I suppose, because I am that queer monster, the artist, an obstinate finality, an inexhaustible sensibility. Hence the reactions—appearances, memories, many things, go on playing upon it with consequences that I note. . . ."<sup>32</sup>

Undeniably, Adams did act on the suggestion that, although the world is black, although all is pointless, one can yet want to go on, keep talking, culti-

<sup>29</sup> Cater, p. 434; Education, pp. viii, 306, 310, 367-9 and 501; Henry Adams, Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres (New York, 1904), ch. 15; Letters II, p. 119; "Tendency," p. 133. The counsel of silence pervades Adams' writings: see also Letters I, p. 301; Letters II, pp. 70, 122-3, 317, 445, 468, 552; Cater, pp. 235-358, 475, 496, 519, 521, 524; Education, p. 358.

<sup>30</sup> Letters I, p. 526. His relation to Catholicism may be similarly characterized; see Jordy, op. cit., p. 286, n. 90.

<sup>30a</sup> See Education, pp. 305, 462.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., p. 369; emphasis supplied.

<sup>32</sup> Percy Lubbock, ed., The Letters of Henry James, Vol. II, pp. 360-1 (New York, 1920).

vate interests, react, and take note. While he was certain that there were no certainties, that therefore all was absurd, he not only kept on looking, for he was an insatiable traveler, but also kept on professing, articulating, writing. He never ceased taking part in the perennial human debate and thus never completed his alienation from society, hanging on as its diffident participant while ever departing from it.<sup>33</sup>

This unresolved tension between engagement and disengagement persisted. To maintain it, Adams invariably avoided giving his convictions secular power. He consequently communicated no sense of commitment to any dogma, remaining exasperatingly fuzzy and inconclusive to every generation of readers of the Education. He notably failed to argue any position to its terminus, aware that in an America enjoying its gilded age no opponents could be enlisted in systematic debate.<sup>34</sup> There was, he lamented, no audience: "No one cares." In an America pervaded, as Louis Hartz has shown, by an irritatingly effective, all-corrosive liberalism, Adams was unable to come to the point and challenge the national creed head-on.<sup>35</sup> It was his very indirectness, supported by the doctrine that there were no certainties, that kept him from feeling free either to create his own truth or, by a shock of recognition, to intuit some specific truth immanent in history. Thus he rejected the Nietzschean view that the artist-historian should impose on his material and simply fabricate his myth no less than the Hegelian one that History is permeated by Spirit moving in a determinable way. He never arbitrarily filled the nothing he encountered: he patented no Dialectic, identified no True Leader, held no brief for Reason manifest, designated no Elite, Party, or Race.<sup>36</sup> That he institutionalized no insight, translated no transcendental truth into secular reality, imposed no law of science, is worth emphasizing for it distinguishes his effort from historicism such as that of Marx and Engels. Whatever law there seemed to be, whatever science appeared to be true, for Adams it required infinite qualification. Thus he found it easy to call his "Rule of Phase" his last plaything, "not <sup>33</sup> Even where he might be tempted to rationalize his failure, he admits his desire for power (Education, pp. 263, 358-9). In 1862, he wrote to Charles Adams, "But what we want is a school. We want a national set of young men like ourselves or better, to start new influences not only in politics, but in literature, in law, in society, and throughout the whole social organism of the country—a national school of our own generation." Cycle I, p. 196. The Education and the "Letter," too, were intended "to serve a social purpose," Cater, p. 781; Letters II, p. 524; see also Jordy, op. cit., pp. 250-5.

<sup>34</sup> How hard Adams tried may be seen in his review of Charles Lyell's Principles of Geology where, as he confessed later, "he resorted to what he thought the bold experiment of inserting a sentence in the text, intended to provoke correction." (Education, p. 227.)

<sup>35</sup> Cater, p. 621; see also pp. 330, 644-5, and his letter to Henry Holt, p. 455. To Henry James, Adams wrote in 1903, "We knew nothing—no! but really nothing! of the world. One cannot exaggerate the profundity of ignorance of Story in becoming a sculptor, or Sumner in becoming a statesman, or Emerson in becoming a philosopher. Story and Sumner, Emerson and Alcott, Lowell and Longfellow, Hillard, Winthrop, Motley, Prescott, and all the rest, were the same mind,—and so, poor worm!—was I . . . Improvised Europeans, we were, and—Lord God!—how thin!" (Letters, II, p. 414.)

<sup>36</sup> This is not to deny his doctrinaire economic notions or his ingenuous anti-Semitism.

meant to be taken too seriously"; he noted he was a Darwinian "for fun"; he regarded his "Letter to American Teachers of History" as a "fable," as a "form of humor." And by holding that the relation between facts must be always infinite, he put every relation between facts, every correlation, in doubt—making all statements equivocal, leaving all histories ambiguous, inverting every formulation until it affirmed its opposite, and then denying that too. His assertion that "no one means all he says, and yet very few say all they mean, for words are slippery and thought is viscous" can well stand as his final disclaimer.<sup>27</sup>

To see Adams employ this process of integrating ambiguities is to see the artist at work. The artist can provide a dimension for understanding politics and society whenever he disciplines his implacable urge to negate the world, whenever he harnesses the impulse which makes him shatter, as André Malraux has argued, the forms he has inherited. In qualifying and requalifying whatever did find expression, whatever did become manifest, Adams expressed himself ironically, elliptically, artistically. It is as artist that he used symbols pointing at both the obvious and the concealed. By plausibly relating the concealed to the obvious, he denied what is affirmed, cancelled what is credited. He thus helped make the unbelievable believable, the impertinent pertinent, the unconventional conventional. To carry this off, the artist must be playful.<sup>28</sup> He must be entertainingly, dramatically serious in order to lead man into the dark caverns of experience—caverns he lights up, illuminating what without the light touch would be unbearable. And yet he will keep men from embracing and fighting for the very truth he has revealed, committed as he is to mock that too. At his finest, which is also at his most anti-social, he cannot help but reveal that whatever implausibility his exploration has made plausible it too is streaked and freakish, not to be taken in earnest, something already too comfortable to justify human discomfort, too domestic to merit sacrifice.

The result of the artist's elliptical method—if it is successful—is to provide a fuller view of any specific situation, to broaden perceptions, enhance imaginative sympathies, heighten and refine consciousness. The capacity for this Adams himself discerned in the artist John La Farge:

Of all his friends La Farge alone owned a mind complex enough to contrast against the commonplaces of American uniformity. . . . The American mind—the Bostonian as well as the Southern or Western—likes to walk straight up to its object, and assert or deny something that it takes for a fact; it has a conventional approach, a conventional analysis, and a conventional conclusion, as well as a conventional expression, all the time loudly asserting its unconventionality. The most disconcerting trait of John La Farge was his reversal of the process. His approach was quiet and indirect; he moved round an object, and never separated it from its surroundings. . . . One was never quite sure of his whole meaning until too late to respond, for he had no difficulty in carrying different shades of contradiction in his mind.<sup>39</sup>

<sup>27</sup> Letters II, p. 515, n. 1; Education, p. 352 (see Cater, p. 682); Letters II, pp. 524, 531; Education, pp. 410, 451.

<sup>28</sup> Thus Adams thought Raymond Poincaré's "artistic measure" was precisely his "light touch." Education, p. 455. " 'Discuss serious things lightly and light things seriously,' was one of his rules of good conduct. . . ." Cater, p. lxvii. See also his letter to George Cabot Lodge, Cater, pp. 540–3.

Keeping contradictions in suspense, the artist projects possibilities which it is unconventional to consider. Taking stock for individuals too absorbed in their immediate environment, too captivated by present urgencies, the artist will expose their usual business and politics as incomplete ventures, as meager pre-occupations, as flat and stale and unpromising. Developing new analogies and utopias, he may detect riches men fail to appreciate. And pointing to the concrete sources of vitality and impotence which tend to escape extremists—activists too much in touch and quietists too much out of touch—he may not only emancipate men from the dictates of the past but also provide a basis for mediation and reconciliation. Sensitive to continuities he may chasten those who are merely expansive and fitful. He may make it possible for men to re-order and stabilize their existence, in the words of Herbert J. Muller,<sup>40</sup> “by systematically complicating all issues, stressing the defects and the excesses of all values, insisting on tension, imbalance, uncertainty, and contradiction . . . by ironically qualifying the great triumphs and reverently qualifying the great failures. . . .”

To do this is to deprive any particular era or generation of its balance and success. By proclaiming himself to be a failure—by so labelling all of his impressive achievements—Adams outwitted expectations and implied that no one had really encountered success, that his contemporaries were far from triumphant, that it was rash to consider the time of his lifespan as one of equilibrium and fulfillment for American politics and statesmanship. In placing in a wider context the manners and formulas of an America which had yet to come of age, he perceived characteristics to which his compatriots were blind. He saw complexities where others saw simplicities, challenging the prevailing definition of practicality and efficiency, the formula of progress, the belief in inevitable victory, the faith in the necessary destiny of American democracy.

By creating the complicating perspectives which placed American experience in a new light, by establishing new relationships, Adams redeemed a scientific failure which was unmitigated and genuine. For he offered a statement—given actuality in the very way he shaped his life—which is at once elegant and humanistic. Seemingly denying everything, he still affirmed good form—including a deep responsibility to the integrity of the philosophical and scholarly quest. In implying that if men must waste their resources and fail it is imperative that they do so with dignity, he reveals his values—values which the assumptions of his science had to discredit. His immense “failure”—and now the word must be put in quotes—is significant: for he was successfully sustained not by his scientific conclusions but by his artistic commitment. Indeed, he fought heroically: recognizing the necessity of defeat he remained intellectually upright, un-humiliated by nature.<sup>41</sup> Yet it is obvious that the way Adams redeemed his failure as scientist could not lead him to the only education, the only success, he valued—success in formulating a model for comprehending society, in making society the subject of law.

<sup>39</sup> Education, pp. 369-70.

<sup>40</sup> The Uses of the Past (New York, 1952), p. 24. Muller is discussing not the task of the artist but the tragic view of history.

IV

Whether the task is to affect historical events or to gain understanding of them, Adams offered two methods, one by explicit statement, the other by the way he himself proceeded. Events may be dealt with either by the physicist-historian or else by the artist, either by those who master the forces of society or those for whom every view, every conclusion, is too provincial, too specific, too narrow. Characteristically, Adams jeopardized the validity of both methods. Thus he had held not only that scientific, positive history led to nothing but also that art, as a critical, negativist enterprise, had its limits no less: "The mania for handling all the sides of every question, looking into every window, and opening every door, was, as Bluebeard judiciously pointed out to his wives, fatal to their practical usefulness in society."<sup>42</sup> Yet Adams never followed up his doubt. He never openly stated that neither of his alternative approaches makes it possible to deal with the events of this world in a reasonable manner, that is, by persuading men in terms of a rationally held and defended standard, one which is on the one hand admittedly less final than a Law of History but on the other immune to the irresponsible relativism implicit in the artistic method, a standard exposed to the impact of debate but beyond the endless mockery of irony. Only by acknowledging the relevance of such standards, of such political theory, is it possible (1) to conceive of "an eternity of Grants, or even of Garfields or Conklins or Jay Goulds" and, more importantly, (2) to deal with them by political, non-violent means. In the face of every imperfect, chaotic array of politicians, in the face of the innumerable gradations of human error, Adams counseled either control of conflicting social forces in terms of a determinate, absolute law or else suspension of all articulation. Thus it was easy for him to write, for example, that he saw "no hope for the government [the McKinley Administration] short of sweeping it out of existence."<sup>43</sup> Man had to impose forcefully upon politics or else decline to take it seriously.

The temptation, some fifty years after Adams' prime, to accept as well as act on the dilemma he posed, to treat his alternative roads to truth as the only valid ones, has certainly been strong. His way of obtaining education might <sup>41</sup> One of the characters in Democracy, cast as a successful Massachusetts historian but an ineffectual diplomat, is made to say, "Let us be true to our time . . . ! If our age is to be beaten, let us die in the ranks. If it is to be victorious let us be the first to lead the column. Anyway, let us not be skulkers or grumblers." Since the speaker is a pessimist and cynic, this view is made all the more arresting. See also Cater, p. 449.

<sup>42</sup> Education, p. 232. In 1862 he had already written that a mind to which "evil never seems unmixed with good" and to which "good is always streaked with evil . . . a mind which is not strongly positive and absolute, cannot be steadily successful in action. . . ."
Cycle I, p. 195.

<sup>43</sup> Cater, p. 458; see also Letters II, p. 100.

therefore help shed light on the possibilities of that flourishing modern social science which, like Adams', is motivated by the desire to find theoretical models for a social universe lacking in intrinsic meaning, and which reaches out to order the accidents of history, to master the variables of behavior. This motive and goal pervade present-day research precisely to the extent that it assumes that all sequences of events and all allocations of resources are fundamentally arbitrary and artificial, that all norms, standards, or values are formed by man to serve his needs or escape his secular predicaments, and that the de facto universe is devoid of purpose and meaning.

In a universe wholly free of imperatives, devoid of meaning, lawless in its very essence, social scientists may experience an exhilarating sense of liberation—not, of course, liberation from the formidable institutional and organizational pressures of society, but from restrictive theory. In such a universe, social science is free to impute norms, standards, or values.<sup>44</sup> It proceeds by modestly offering its imputations as hypothetically posited conceptual systems. "More and more," one sympathetic student of the work of social scientists has concluded their self-conscious ambition is the same as that of the natural scientists, to create a set of highly determinate theories for the explanation of empirical social phenomena. Increasingly they are learning the significance and functions of abstract and systematic conceptual schemes.<sup>45</sup>

These schemes, it is hoped, will provide reliable scientific knowledge—the kind justifying unreserved commitment, the only kind which Adams would have credited with the value of education. They will tie the random forces of history together. Composed of the neutral terms that relate variables, they will constructively furnish unambiguous inferential links among the multiplicity of experienced facts, among the mass of historical data. Created free from a politics of compromise, free from the presuppositions of such politics, they will constitute a unified, artificial order of unequivocal connecting terms. Ideally, they will be a social constitution, but one purged of the subjectivism, the ambiguity, the variability of constitutions men have framed so far. They will not satisfy the conditions of an objective, positive, natural science of society as long as subjective, emotional, value-laden terms remain unreduced. Hence all language

<sup>44</sup> Adams was to recall that he had "sat down as though he were again a boy at school to shape after his own needs the values of a Dynamic Theory of History." In order "to become effective" he had "to invent a formula of his own for his own universe. . . ." (Education, pp. 472-3; emphasis supplied.)

<sup>45</sup> Bernard Barber, Science and the Social Order (Glencoe, Ill., 1952), p. 244. The following treatises might be mentioned: Stuart C. Dodd, Dimensions of Society: A Quantitative Systematics for the Social Sciences (1942); Herbert A. Simon, Administrative Behavior (1948); George C. Homans, The Human Group (1950); Harold D. Lasswell and Abraham Kaplan, Power and Society: A Framework for Political Inquiry (1950); Nicolas Rashevsky, Mathematical Biology of Social Behavior (1951); Talcott Parsons, The Social System (1951); Marion J. Levy, Jr., The Structure of Society (1952); Roy R. Grinker, ed., Toward a Unified Theory of Human Behavior (1956); see also Behavioral Science, a journal which began publication in 1956.

tainted by values must be eliminated. Vague standards must be converted into precise indices, into frameworks or constitutions capable of assuming abstract, mathematical form.<sup>46</sup> At their best, social scientists must design a thoroughly refined notational order untarnished by emotive blots, moral considerations, subjectively felt data, and historical bias.

This order will not be conditioned or checked by the changeable, variable factors of human history. As an absolute, it will be radically unhistorical, compressing past and future into a timeless frame. It will be a perfect accounting system, exhaustively taking care of all contingencies, dissolving all novelties and peculiarities by revealing them to be parts of harmonious universals. When suitably embraced, what appears as incongruous and paradoxical will disclose itself as congruent and unified. Once established and refined, a full set of generalizations, losing its hypothetical character, will fully establish the real organization of the facts of social life. Structured by an objectively valid theory, the social continuum, no different from the natural one, will be understood. Thus it should be possible, in principle, for the social scientist to know in terms of what rational structure to arrange society, control every baffling idiosyncrasy, integrate every deviant.

It is Adams' work, the way he had sought education, which can make clear both the activism and the elitism this approach must imply. A social or historical science resolving to become positive by operating on the epistemological premise of the physical sciences, admitting as final knowledge only what has been tested by an artificial, non-natural operation, and treating everything else, including its assumptions, as merely hypothetical, probable, or variable—such a science is compelled by its logic to resort to testing, to setting up operations, to be productive and get results. It must be engaged in experimentation to obtain knowledge, for it considers only that true which it has constructed, manipulated, put to the test.<sup>47</sup> Indifferent toward the limits of history and the standards which transcend it—provoked by all manifestations of freedom and prepared to reduce them—such a science must seek to grasp variables in practice, ordering them, pinning them down, bringing about what Adams called "the despotism of artificial order."<sup>48</sup> Thus its goal, admittedly far from realized, is to incarnate the trans-historical theory it posits, to translate, as Marx had envisaged, abstract philosophy into concrete action, to make the real blend with the ideal.<sup>49</sup>

It is no wonder that Adams was led to note the conflict between such a science and those who would defend their freedom,<sup>50</sup> that he confessed in a

<sup>46</sup> As Adams discerned, "Ignorance required that these political and social and scientific values of the twelfth and twentieth centuries should be correlated in some relations of movement that could be expressed in mathematics . . ." (Education, p. 376). He frequently regretted his ignorance of mathematics; see, for example, Letters II, p. 519.

<sup>47</sup> See Education, pp. 458, 488.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., p. 458.

<sup>49</sup> See Adams' letter to Taylor, cited in n. 13, above.

<sup>50</sup> "Tendency," pp. 128-9.

cryptic comment to have written his "Letter to American Teachers of History" to ask them "what they are going to do about socialism."<sup>51</sup> Moreover, he could scarcely have been pleased by the prospect of a control of social forces so total that men would find themselves living in a realm in which spontaneity and necessity were indistinguishable. If, however, he entertained doubts about all prospects, he must have doubted the inevitability of the potential triumph of social science. Yet the only basis for such doubt is the belief in the possibility of appealing to an incommensurable human quality, the faith in the continuing possibility of using language to educate and enlighten men, the expectation that they will tend to act rightly once they are made aware of what they do, once they are led to see the tension between the real and the ideal, once the artist has raised the implications of their actions to a level of consciousness which makes them feel uncomfortable and rebellious. Adams' resignation was never so complete as to cause him to repudiate this faith or shirk the work it demands. For he had emphatically seen it as his duty "to fit young men, in universities or elsewhere, to be men of the world, equipped for any emergency. . . ."<sup>52</sup> If despite all his digressions he ultimately clarified the failure of positivist science and negativist art to provide a sufficient grounding for dependable knowledge of man and society, he may have equipped the student better than he had reason to hope.

<sup>51</sup> Waldo G. Leland, quoted in Cater, p. xciv. See also Letters II, p. 537.

<sup>52</sup> Education, p. x.

J. ALLEN SMITH: JEFFERSONIAN CRITIC OF THE FEDERALIST STATE*

HOWARD E. DEAN

University of Oregon

It is a commonplace that every period rewrites history in the light of its own problems, and with the aid of wisdom after the event. Changes in the climate of opinion and shifts in the winds of doctrine naturally bring the contributions of earlier thinkers under new scrutiny. Today the mood of critical reassessment is strong, for a significant shift has taken place in English and American political opinion during the past decade; the temper of the times is not visionary, but revisionist, and the pull is not toward revolution, but toward revaluation. The spate of books and articles on the "new conservatism," the "new right," and the "conservative tradition," however, and if ever, defined;<sup>1</sup> the reconsiderations of liberal and reformist thought;<sup>2</sup> the succession of Michael Oakeshott to the chair of Harold J. Laski; the recantations of repentant liberals, and the curious spectacle of revolutionaries triumphantly in reverse; the vogue of Burke and De Tocqueville; and even the difference between D. W. Brogan's earlier acid etching of the American political scene and his recent essay in contentment,<sup>3</sup> all make clear in their varying ways that times have changed.

Louis Hartz has recently said that, "in American social studies we still live in the shadow of the Progressive era."<sup>4</sup> The political and social thinkers who laid the intellectual foundations of Progressivism have long enjoyed the flattery of imitation; surely they also deserve the tribute of reappraisal. It would be churlish, while still standing on their shoulders, smugly to proclaim their feet of clay. But to scan the horizons today we need a different footing. Certainly J. Allen Smith, whose political ideas are the subject of this essay, would wish us to avoid the error of Hway: "Hway, said Confucius, is of no assistance to me; there is nothing that I say in which he does not delight."<sup>5</sup>

One of the most vigorous and incisive voices of the Progressive era, J. Allen Smith was a lawyer who found the ministry of municipal litigation and village

* This article is a revision of a paper read at the Pacific Northwest Political Science Association meeting at Moscow, Idaho, April 1955.

<sup>1</sup> The New American Right, ed. Daniel Bell (New York, 1955); Russell Kirk, The Conservative Mind (Chicago, 1953); Clinton L. Rossiter, Conservatism in America (New York, 1955).

<sup>2</sup> Eric F. Goldman, Rendezvous with Destiny (New York, 1952); Louis Hartz, The Liberal Tradition in America (New York, 1955); Richard Hofstadter, The Age of Reform (New York, 1955).

<sup>3</sup> D. W. Brogan, Government of the People (New York, 1933); Politics in America (New York, 1954).

<sup>4</sup> Hartz, op. cit., p. 27. Professor Hartz suggests that Progressives like Beard, Smith, Parrington, Louis Boudin, and Gustavus Myers did not really grasp the America in which they lived (p. 237).

<sup>5</sup> Carl L. Becker, Everyman His Own Historian (New York, 1935), p. v.

vexation<sup>6</sup> too confining, took a doctorate in economics at the University of Michigan in 1894, and then set forth on an academic career. But the blade of his mind cut too sharply across the grooves of academe, and he was dropped from his first brief post: "the hornets are quick with their stings if the nest of privilege is disturbed."<sup>7</sup> Thenceforth he carried out his "exposition of the gentle art of thwarting the majority will by legal and constitutional means"<sup>8</sup> at the University of Washington where he was professor of political science from 1897 until his death in 1924, a span of years which marked the rise and decline of the Progressive movement.<sup>9</sup> A fearless and stimulating teacher, he was a respecter neither of prescriptive privilege nor of stuffed shirts. He called a spade a spade, he called the Constitution of the United States a reactionary document, and he is now perhaps best remembered as a main forerunner of Beard's economic interpretation.<sup>10</sup> His ideas influenced Theodore Roosevelt, William Allen White, Robert M. La Follette, and many other Progressive leaders. Although his fame today is faded, Parrington's great study dedicated to his memory, "scholar, teacher, democrat, gentleman, he was the friend of all who love justice,"<sup>11</sup> is a monumental reminder of his name. In the late 1930's Odegard and Helms inscribed their book on American politics to his memory,<sup>12</sup> and American government students still make his acquaintance in Christensen and

<sup>6</sup> The phrase is Edmund Burke's. Reflections on the French Revolution, Everyman's Library edition (London, 1953), p. 40.

<sup>7</sup> Vernon L. Parrington, Introduction to J. Allen Smith, The Growth and Decadence of Constitutional Government (New York, 1930), p. xvi. Cited henceforth as Growth. Smith was dropped from the faculty of Marietta College ostensibly as a retrenchment measure, but a replacement was appointed: "apparently money was available if a suitable man was found." Arthur G. Beach, A Pioneer College: The Story of Marietta (Privately printed, 1935), p. 227.

<sup>8</sup> Parrington, ibid.

<sup>9</sup> For accounts of Smith's life and work see Eric F. Goldman, "J. Allen Smith: The Reformer and His Dilemma," Pacific Northwest Quarterly, Vol. 35, pp. 195-214 (July, 1944); Edward MacMahon, "James Allen Smith," Dictionary of American Biography, Vol. 17, pp. 286-87 (1935).

<sup>10</sup> Charles A. Beard, An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States (New York, 1913). Joseph Dorfman has argued that Beard's book was not a documented vindication of Smith's interpretation, but, on the contrary, was partly an effort to meet Smith's charge that the Constitution was a "reactionary" document. The Economic Mind in American Civilization (New York, 1949), Vol. 3, pp. 348-49. In similar vein, Robert E. Thomas has emphasized that Beard had little patience with what he regarded as the imbecilities of the Articles of Confederation; that he had tremendous admiration for the Founding Fathers, was an opponent of Populist-Wilsonian ideas, and an ardent defender of judicial review. "A Reappraisal of Charles A. Beard's An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution," American Historical Review, Vol. 57, pp. 370-375 (January, 1952). As Thomas notes, chapter IV of Beard's The Supreme Court and the Constitution (New York, 1912), entitled "The Spirit of the Constitution," is in marked contrast to Smith's evaluation of that spirit.

<sup>11</sup> Vernon L. Parrington, Main Currents in American Thought, 3 Vols. (New York, 1927-30).

<sup>12</sup> Peter H. Odegard and E. Allen Helms, American Politics (New York, 1938).

Kirkpatrick's widely used anthology.<sup>13</sup> In 1948 Harold J. Laski wrote lovingly and extravagantly that, of American political scientists since 1900, only the work of those like J. Allen Smith was seriously relevant to contemporary America.<sup>14</sup>

Permanently interesting as part of the literature of social criticism in America, as a fresh and penetrating voice at a time when constitutional studies often seemed "formal and devout and lifeless and dull,"<sup>15</sup> Smith is even more significant as revealing the tensions in Progressive thought. The magnitude of those tensions, the conflicting values, the pull of contradictory forces, the deep ambivalence, is suggested by contrasting Herbert Croly's ideal of a benevolent, neo-Federalist, centralized, reforming state with Brandeis's urgent warnings of "the curse of bigness," or by setting Roosevelt's "New Nationalism" alongside Wilson's "New Freedom."<sup>16</sup> The problems of the past do not necessarily die with it: recent controversies over roads to serfdom or roads to reaction are in a real sense the current versions of the perplexities which plagued Progressive minds. Smith's thought strikingly suggests the difficulty and danger both of seeking to attain Jeffersonian ends by Hamiltonian means, and of using Jeffersonian means to fashion a hook for Leviathan.

I

The simple, forceful, audacious theme of Smith's famous first book, which appeared in 1907,<sup>17</sup> was that the spirit of American government is the reactionary, undemocratic spirit of the propertied classes frustrating the will of the masses. Generally regarded as the democratic ark of the covenant, the Constitution was in bitter fact the conspiratorial product of the Thermidorean reaction of 1787 which snuffed out the democracy of the Revolutionary period. In the Constitution property rights and minority interests were hedged about with a system of checks and balances irreconcilable with popular government. Nearly impossible to amend, clogging and baffling the popular will, embracing a spurious federalism which only thinly masked national supremacy, guarded by an oligarchic judiciary, the Constitution was an instrument which defeated the true end of government: "the unhampered expression and prompt enforcement of public opinion."<sup>18</sup> Smith sought to unmask the democratic pretensions of the Constitution, to show that "things are seldom what they seem," al-

<sup>13</sup> A. N. Christensen and E. M. Kirkpatrick, The People, Politics, and the Politician, rev. ed. (New York, 1950).

<sup>14</sup> Harold J. Laski, The American Democracy (New York, 1948), p. 749.

<sup>15</sup> Walton H. Hamilton, reviewing Smith's Growth, Yale Law Journal, Vol. 40, pp. 152-53 (November, 1930).

<sup>16</sup> Herbert Croly, The Promise of American Life (New York, 1909); Louis D. Brandeis, The Curse of Bigness, ed. Osmond K. Fraenkel (New York, 1934); Theodore Roosevelt, The New Nationalism (New York, 1910); Woodrow Wilson, The New Freedom (New York, 1913).

<sup>17</sup> The Spirit of American Government (New York, 1907). Cited henceforth as Spirit.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., p. 305.

though curiously enough for so devoted a champion of the popular will, he never bothered to explain away the gullibility of a people so artfully bamboozled for more than a century.<sup>19</sup>

A "Reform Darwinian,"<sup>20</sup> Smith believed that the line of political progress lay in the evolution from unlimited and irresponsible government, through a stage of limited and irresponsible government, to the democratic level of unlimited and responsible government. His cherished image of democracy was one in which checks and balances were swept away and the people's will reigned supreme. Adverting to the early state constitutions as having approached this goal, he exhibited no Actonian misgivings about the problem of power:<sup>21</sup>

In so far as government had now passed into the hands of the people there was no longer any reason to fear that it would encroach upon what they regarded as their rights.

Like many American political scientists,<sup>22</sup> Smith looked longingly at the disciplined, responsible, programmatic British party system whose American counterpart had been made impossible by the constitutional dispersion of power and responsibility.<sup>23</sup> Yet, unlike many present-day writers, he rejected the vision of the President as a latter-day popular tribune and charismatic oracle of the nation's real will.<sup>24</sup> Indeed, he regretted that the Framers had not intended the President to be "a mere administrative agent of Congress,"<sup>25</sup> and complained that they had bestowed upon him an independent obligation to defend the Constitution which was more binding than "his duty to enforce the laws enacted by Congress."<sup>26</sup>

Despite the claim that Smith "set in motion the economic interpretation"<sup>27</sup> of the Constitution, his essential concern was not with economic foundations, but with political institutions and theories, and his interpretation of politics

<sup>19</sup> Herbert Croly, in rejecting Smith's conspiracy theory of the Constitution, asked why the Jeffersonians had not undone the Federalist handiwork when they assumed power. His answer was that the political system was harmonious with the economic interests of the Jeffersonians. Progressive Democracy (New York, 1914), pp. 46-51.

<sup>20</sup> Goldman, op. cit. supra n. 2, at p. 146.

<sup>21</sup> Spirit, p. 293.

<sup>22</sup> See American Political Science Association Committee on Political Parties, "Toward a More Responsible Two-party System." Supplement to this REVIEW, Vol. 44 (September, 1950). Austin Ranney has suggested that the failure to develop such a system in the United States is not due to popular ignorance of the case for its virtues, but rather to the point emphasized by A. Lawrence Lowell, that "responsible and disciplined parties will appeal only to a people committed to the desirability of unlimited majority rule, and that the American people, far from believing in majority rule, are devoted to the preservation of minority rights against majority rule." The Doctrine of Responsible Party Government (Urbana, Ill., 1954), p. 160.

<sup>23</sup> Spirit, pp. 203-29.

<sup>24</sup> For an extreme example see William H. Riker, Democracy in the United States (New York, 1953), pp. 346-65.

<sup>25</sup> Spirit, p. 145.

<sup>26</sup> Ibid., p. 146.

<sup>27</sup> William Seagle, "James Allen Smith," Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, Vol. 14, p. 116 (1935).

was more political than economic. The political reforms he desired were chiefly the adoption of the direct democratic devices so confidently regarded at the turn of the century.<sup>28</sup> Although he warned reactionaries that continued frustration of the popular will might lead to a national constitutional convention, sweeping away the entire system of checks and balances, his main hope was for reform at the state and local level.<sup>29</sup> His proposals for reform did not go so deeply to the root of things as his reputation as a radical might suggest. Indeed, he pinned his faith largely upon devices which more radical social critics might have scorned as mere mechanical tinkering.

On the economic front, Smith opposed laissez-faire and socialism alike.<sup>30</sup> Believing in the regulative powers of competition, he argued that monopoly and concentration had stifled real competition, and urged a positive role for the state in controlling and organizing industrial forces. But save for the "gas and water" variety, he rejected socialism because of its rejection of the competitive principle as inherently vicious. Economically, his main hopes centered on the adoption of monetary reforms which he thought the key to the revival of competition.<sup>31</sup> He also proclaimed that democracy was the enemy of monopoly, that it demanded equality of opportunity and the equitable distribution of the product of industry. But he was never very clear as to the concrete measures necessary for achieving these goals, and it may be doubted whether monetary reforms were equal to the task. His later thought certainly suggests that he had been shaken by the dilemma suggested in Acton's epigram: "the passion for equality made vain the hope of freedom."<sup>32</sup>

<sup>28</sup> Smith, "Recent Institutional Legislation," Proceedings of the American Political Science Association, Fourth Annual Meeting, Vol. 4, pp. 141-51 (1908).

<sup>29</sup> Spirit, p. 347.

<sup>30</sup> See Dorfman, loc. cit. supra n. 10, at pp. 294-9.

<sup>31</sup> Smith, "The Multiple Money Standard," Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 7, pp. 173-232 (March, 1896).

<sup>32</sup> John Emerich Edward Dalberg-Acton, The History of Freedom and Other Essays, ed. John Neville Figgis and Reginald Vere Laurence (London, 1907), p. 57. Like Edward A. Ross, John R. Commons, and others in the Populist-Progressive tradition (see Hofstadter, The Age of Reform, pp. 8-9; 173-184), J. Allen Smith was quite hostile toward the tide of immigrants, and was particularly concerned with the need to restrict immigration from the Far East. In a paper presented to a meeting of the American Economic Association, "The Relation of Oriental Immigration to the General Immigration Problem," Bulletin of the American Economic Association, Fourth Series, Vol. I, No. 2, pp. 237-42 (April, 1911), Smith pointed to the contradiction in having a protective tariff alongside an open immigration policy which benefitted some employers by providing cheap labor and harmed the American laborer by depressing the standard of living. The furthering of the great purpose of America, the diffusion and preservation of a high level of general well-being, justified in Smith's view the exclusion of "undesirable" immigrants. His argument was largely economic, for he defined "undesirable immigrant" as one willing to work for less than the prevailing rate of wages (p. 242). But his position had a moral basis in addition, for he spoke of "low grade immigrants who lacked the initiative, the energy, and the means" (p. 238) to have come in prior to the exploitation of immigration as a regular business by the great steamship companies. The appearance of "the Chinese coolie, with his low standard of living and his patient endurance, was an undeniable menace to the well-being of the American laborer" (p. 239). The same might be said, Smith added, of much

Despite his angry sense of deeply entrenched privilege and plunder masked by piety and patriotism, Smith's first book was filled with an optimistic faith in progress which to our more chastened age seems almost pathetically naive. He believed that democracy would "raise government to the rank and dignity of a science,"<sup>33</sup> by making it appeal to the people's reason rather than to their fear and superstition: "we are at the threshold of a new social order under which the few will no longer rule the many."<sup>34</sup> One listens with uneasiness to this apocalyptic note which Smith sometimes struck, with its overtone of history redemptively nearing some terminus of righteousness where the unregenerate would be cast out and where in place of struggle and conflict, unanimity and new harmony would prevail.<sup>35</sup>

We are witnessing and taking part in the final struggle between the old and the new—a struggle which will not end until one or the other of these irreconcilable theories of government is completely overthrown, and a new and harmonious political structure evolved.

It would be unfair to read too much into this, but in it lurks the suggestion, at least, of that final victory of the popular will which would mark the end of public policy based on the pressures of various and contending interests, the end of bargaining and negotiation, the end of compromise—the end, indeed, of politics. Fortunately this was a recessive strain in Smith's thought, for it bears the stigma of the saints of many profane eschatologies who readily imagine that conformity in the service of their mortal gods is perfect freedom: secular salvation has often been the goal of that politics of perfection which has borne such bitter witness to the evil that good men do. True believers who look for the motive forces of history conveniently "to commit hara-kiri on the doorstep of the ideal"<sup>36</sup> have never learned that in the grammar of politics there is no future perfect.

It is hard not to admire the courage, the faith, and the passion for justice which moved J. Allen Smith. But it is hard not to smile a bit wistfully at his vision of a new world heralded by the clarion voice of the People, calling in unison, knowing what it wants, how to get it, and hastening to the new Jerusalem by way of the initiative, referendum, recall, direct primary, popular election of Senators, and the "packing" of the Supreme Court. A gulf separates the Smith of 1907 from those more recent analysts of the spirit of American government, who, knowing revolution, dictatorship and total war, have concluded instead:<sup>37</sup> of the immigration from Europe. Exclusion of Oriental immigrants, he explained, "does not necessarily imply a belief on our part that the Oriental races are inferior to our own, but that they are fundamentally different, and if they were admitted in considerable numbers, it would mean a race problem of serious import" (p. 238).

---

<sup>33</sup> Spirit, p. 386.

<sup>34</sup> Ibid., p. 380.

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., p. 378.

<sup>36</sup> Becker, op. cit. supra n. 5, at p. 119.

<sup>37</sup> Herbert Agar, The Price of Union (Boston, 1950), pp. 690–91.

The United States, of course, may some day attain such 'uniformity (or have it thrust upon her) that she will abandon her federal structure; but until that happens she will be governed by concurrent majorities, by vetoes and filibusters, by parties which take both sides of every dangerous question, which are held together by the amusements and rewards of office-seeking, and which can only win an election by bringing many incompatible groups to accept a token triumph in the name of unity, instead of demanding their full "rights" at the cost of a fight.

The world today might do worse than study the curious methods by which such assuagements are effected.

II

The very title of Smith's last book, The Growth and Decadence of Constitutional Government<sup>38</sup> bespoke the disenchantment which came in the wake of the first world war. The mouths of Progressive prophets were stopped with bitter dust: "The war intervened," remarked Parrington, "and the green fields shriveled in an afternoon."<sup>39</sup> The pervasive theme of the book was the danger of centralized power, whether in the national government, in industry, or in that dangerous glimmering of a super-state called the League of Nations. The war and the political changes which accompanied it, wrote Smith, had convinced him "that extreme centralization of political power is one of the greatest dangers confronting this country today. . . ."<sup>40</sup>

Chagrined by the growth of the national patriotism which had supplanted loyalty to the states, Smith protested that the national government had been burdened with tasks for which it was ill suited. As its power swelled, the capacity of citizens to comprehend or control it steadily diminished.<sup>41</sup> His fear of centralization even brought him to disagreement with many liberal friends because of his deep opposition to the proposed federal child labor amendment and to the League of Nations:

I am convinced that the only way to secure any real democracy in this country is to check the growth of federal power and to increase the freedom or initiative and authority of our local governments.<sup>42</sup>

But if he protested against the centripetal forces of government and capitalism, he was still no less critical of socialist propaganda for undermining the popular belief in the regulative powers of competition, instilling the idea that centralized control of industry was natural and inevitable.<sup>43</sup>

Smith's new view of the meaning of the early state constitutions reflected a significant change of attitude. Earlier, he had hailed them as steps on the road to unlimited popular rule. Now he asserted that they had been based on the

<sup>38</sup> Published posthumously (New York, 1930) with an introduction by V. L. Parrington. "A few minutes before his death Parrington had put his signature to a foreword for a book by his late friend and colleague, J. Allen Smith." Joseph B. Harrison, Vernon Louis Parrington, University of Washington Chapbooks, No. 31 (Seattle, 1929), p. 29.

<sup>39</sup> Parrington, Main Currents, Vol. 3, p. 412.

<sup>40</sup> In a letter to John A. Kingsbury, quoted in Goldman, op. cit. supra n. 9, at p. 210.

<sup>41</sup> Growth, pp. 194-95.

<sup>42</sup> Goldman, ibid., pp. 210-11.

<sup>43</sup> Growth, pp. 226-28.

theory that "power, even though supposed to rest wholly on a popular basis, was, nevertheless, thought of as limited."<sup>44</sup> Ruefully he observed that the growth of the idea of unlimited popular power had led to the decline of belief in natural rights and natural law. The older notion of limited government had given way to a doctrine of "governmental absolutism":<sup>45</sup> "Political majorities, no less than public officials, are prone to take into their own hands as much power as circumstances permit."<sup>46</sup>

Like many who had witnessed the crusade to make the world safe for democracy, Smith voiced a growing disillusionment with public opinion. Observing that we had not yet reached the stage of development in which the people possessed the degree of civic intelligence demanded by democracy, he commented that "the great majority have little more rational foundation for their political opinions than for their religious beliefs."<sup>47</sup> In a mood reminiscent of Burke or William Graham Sumner,<sup>48</sup> he emphasized that the political situation is the outcome of innumerable complex factors, that laws and constitutions are the results of slow growth and development, and that the most radical innovations are really but slight adaptations. Few people, he concluded, had the political intelligence or the ability to cooperate long enough to alter greatly the course of public affairs: "commonly accepted opinion, even under a purely democratic form of government, can hardly be regarded as a determining political force."<sup>49</sup>

III

In spite of his reputation as a hard-headed analyst of political realities, J. Allen Smith seriously misjudged some of the strongest and deepest currents in the American political tradition. Too often he found conflict where there was consensus, and unity where there was diversity. His preoccupation with the Constitution as the product of social conflict and conservative reaction led him into that genetic fallacy which judges institutions more by their origins than by their later growth, and so the smoke of Shay's rebellion and the din of the ratification struggle continually intruded themselves into his pages. His division of society into the few and the many came close to being a morality play division of the world into the elect and the damned, and, with his conspiracy theory of the American constitutional system, blinded him to the deep popular consensus on which that system rests.

As it has been suggested that aristocratic conservatives like Hamilton and Fisher Ames projected an unreal demonology of "the howling mob" because they ignored the deep attachment of that "mob" to property rights and consti-

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., p. 14.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., p. 185.

<sup>46</sup> Ibid., p. 163.

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., p. 114.

<sup>48</sup> Sumner, The Challenge of Facts and Other Essays, ed. A. G. Keller (New Haven, 1914).

<sup>49</sup> Growth, pp. 82-83.

tutional government,<sup>50</sup> so might it be said of J. Allen Smith that, by ignoring that same deep attachment, he had fallen into a radical version of the same error. He projected an unreal picture of the classes versus the masses, and belabored an unconvincing conspiracy theory. He was never able to appreciate the point of such wise exaggeration as Jefferson's famous insistence that "every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle. We have called by different names brethren of the same principle. We are all Republicans—we are all Federalists";<sup>51</sup> nor could he have found much comfort in the quip that the difference between the two great American political parties is the difference between Tweedledee and Tweedledum. Unlike later writers who have been heartened by this diagnosis, he would not have agreed that the "disease" is better than its cure. But if discord loomed so large for Smith that he underestimated agreement, he was also not beyond falling into a contrary error, for his conception of "the people" as homogeneous and monolithic squared poorly with the realities of an endlessly diverse and pluralistic continental federalism. His conception of direct democracy could have led only to disillusionment.

One of the most intriguing turns of thought revealed in Smith's later work has never adequately been discussed either by his admirers or his critics. This was his surprising shift from a Rousseauian rejection of checks and balances and the group basis of politics, to an adulation of that prophet of nullification and concurrent majority, high priest of checks and balances, the South Carolina Aristotle, John C. Calhoun. Referring to Calhoun's views on the nature of the union, Smith declared that he had written with "unanswerable logic"<sup>52</sup> in treatises which for "convincing argument have never been equalled in all the literature dealing with constitutional interpretation."<sup>53</sup> In this vein Smith wrote sympathetically of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798, argued that the Framers had not intended to establish national supremacy, and approved Calhoun's doctrine that the Constitution can only be finally interpreted and changed by the concurrent action of the federal and state governments. Voicing his regret that the Framers had omitted the word "expressly" from their grant of powers to Congress, he even went so far as to disapprove the doctrine of implied powers.<sup>54</sup>

Smith's new found acceptance of Calhoun's views on the federal system hinged chiefly on his own attachment to the decentralization and local autonomy which Calhoun had glorified for quite another purpose. This, the weakest element in Calhoun, he applauded openly. But he never avowed the strongest aspect of Calhoun's thought, its pluralism. Yet there was implicit in his later thinking a deep sense of the organic nature of group and sectional interests and

<sup>50</sup> Louis Hartz, "The Whig Tradition in America and Europe," this REVIEW, Vol. 46, pp. 989-1002 (December, 1952).

<sup>51</sup> First Inaugural Address, March 4, 1801. Quoted in Jefferson Himself, ed. Bernard Mayo (Boston, 1942), p. 221.

<sup>52</sup> Growth, p. 159.

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., p. 92.

<sup>54</sup> Ibid., p. 91.

an emphasis upon the multi-group society which was hardly compatible with the monolithic conception of the popular will which dominated his earlier thought. In protesting state encroachment on local government, he asserted that a state is a purely arbitrary division, while a city is a "natural and organic unit with interests peculiarly its own."<sup>55</sup> Even properly apportioned state legislatures, he affirmed, cannot be representative of the various local interests of the state: the people of an agricultural community, for example, have no interest in or concern with legislation relating to municipal utilities.<sup>56</sup> Here, surely, was the seed of a theory of functional representation whose implications Smith never squared with his earlier views.

Perhaps the gravest weakness of J. Allen Smith's political thought was his failure ever to have reconciled the two conflicting images of the political process which are implicit in his work. The significance of this issue far exceeds the mere question of a crucial irresolution in his own thought, for it goes to the very heart of the problem of government. On the one hand was the Rousseauian image with its emphasis upon unleashing the monolithic will of the people, seeking unanimity as its ideal, but settling for majority rule in practice; fearful of centralization and a policy-making bureaucracy, a "state governed by clerks";<sup>57</sup> fearful of representative government with its remoteness from the popular will, and rejecting the whole fantastic notion of the balance of powers; ever suspicious of sinister interest groups and parties—worms within the entrails of the body politic, as Hobbes thought them;<sup>58</sup> Platonic in its emphasis on man fulfilling himself as Citizen; and hopefully envisioning man and the world remade. On the other hand was the image suggested by Madison in The Federalist,<sup>59</sup> with its Calvinist view of man as considerably lower than the angels; its rugged insistence on the ineluctable group basis of politics, its sense of the irreducible conflicts of class, section, and creed; its view of politics as the realm of compromise and the imperfect: the art, not of the best, but of the possible and the second best; its deep rejection of Utopianism; its skepticism of the primacy of politics; its conviction that the problem of power does not disappear when the voice of the people plays at being the voice of God; its insistence that the source of law is not full guarantee of its rightness; and its abiding attachment to the need, above and beyond the suffrage, for those constitutional "auxiliary precautions,"<sup>60</sup> with their counterpoise and plurality of powers, which so complement the multi-group "diversity of the community that its own pluralism is reflected in a pluralism within the government."<sup>61</sup> These were the

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., p. 193.

<sup>56</sup> Ibid., p. 194.

<sup>57</sup> Jean Jacques Rousseau, The Social Contract, Bk. II, ch. 9, Everyman's Library edition (London, 1946), p. 38.

<sup>58</sup> Thomas Hobbes, Leviathan, ch. 29, Everyman's Library edition (London, 1947), p. 177.

<sup>59</sup> The Federalist, Nos. 10, 51, Modern Library edition (New York, n.d.).

<sup>60</sup> Ibid., No. 51.

<sup>61</sup> Norton E. Long, "Bureaucracy and Constitutionalism," this REVIEW, Vol. 46, pp. 808-818 (September, 1952), at p. 811.

polar opposites between which Parrington believed the main currents of American political thought have moved.<sup>62</sup> It is curious indeed that Smith uneasily embraced both of them.

"Militant Jeffersonian Populist"<sup>63</sup> that he was, J. Allen Smith never made his peace with political or industrial Leviathans. There was in him a nostalgic tendency to look longingly after statecraft on a scale suited to "a nation of villagers."<sup>64</sup> Parrington was just as fearful of the future as Smith had ever been.<sup>65</sup>

An industrialized society is reshaping the psychology fashioned by an agrarian world; the passion for liberty is lessening and the individual . . . is being dwarfed; the drift of centralization is shaping its inevitable tyrannies to bind us with.

But Parrington admitted what Smith had never really faced, "the final defeat of the traditional agrarianism."<sup>66</sup>

The disintegration of the earlier romanticisms . . . has run its course. The philosophy of Jefferson and John Taylor, with its physiocratic bias, its antipathy to a money economy, its love of local autonomy, has been buried in the potter's field.

And so, unlike Smith, Parrington had begun to wonder whether it might not be necessary to "take our bearings afresh and set forth on a different path to the goal."<sup>67</sup> Smith's failure to come to grips convincingly with the adjustment of means and ends led him into what Lord Bacon called "the solecism of power, to think to command the end and yet not to endure the means."<sup>68</sup> Even his admirers came to admit that his Jeffersonian views were irrelevant to the problems of an industrial society, that time had left him behind.<sup>69</sup> But we cannot afford to smile condescendingly at Smith's plight, for the dilemma he faced is as crucial today for new conservatives as for new Fabians: many an American liberal "has begun to wonder, with J. Allen Smith, whether incessant centralization is liberalism's best hope."<sup>70</sup>

The greatest limitations of J. Allen Smith's thought for the present obviously stem from the inherent weakness of his oversimplified analyses of American society and of democracy, and from the difficulty of fitting into the contours of his teaching those developments which, burgeoning in his day, have become the very matrix of present day political thought: the growth of the administrative state and the rise of the United States as a world power. His significance

<sup>62</sup> Main Currents, Vol. 1, pp. 267-273.

<sup>63</sup> Alfred Kazin, On Native Grounds (New York, 1942), p. 149.

<sup>64</sup> Walter Lippmann used this phrase of G. B. Shaw's to characterize the longings of Bryan and Wilson. Drift and Mastery (New York, 1914), pp. 128-48.

<sup>65</sup> Parrington, ibid., Vol. 3, p. xx.

<sup>66</sup> Ibid., p. xxvii.

<sup>67</sup> Ibid., p. xxviii.

<sup>68</sup> Francis Bacon, "Of Empire," Essays, No. 19, World's Classics edition (Oxford, 1930), p. 52.

<sup>69</sup> Seagle, loc. cit. supra n. 27.

<sup>70</sup> Goldman, op. cit. supra n. 9, at p. 212.

lies less in the dogmas he proclaimed than in the predicaments he revealed, and in the questions he often failed to answer and sometimes never asked; in some ways "he was like one of those revolving lighthouses which radiate momentary gleams of revealing light far out into the surrounding gloom and then suddenly relapse into complete darkness."<sup>71</sup> But, perhaps it is true that a man ought to be known by the dilemmas he keeps. We should reckon J. Allen Smith's worth less by the battles he won than by the Goliaths he was bold enough to seek to slay. To him we may apply Parrington's words: "Communing with ghosts is not unprofitable to one who listens to their tales,"<sup>72</sup> nor without meaning to those who "like Merlin pursue the light of their hopes where it flickers above the treacherous marshlands."<sup>73</sup> Scholar, teacher, democrat, gentleman, he was a useful reminder that truth is as often compounded of wormwood as of treacle, and a fitting exemplar of the dictum that a professor is a man who thinks otherwise.

<sup>71</sup> David Lloyd George, characterizing Lord Kitchener. War Memoirs (Boston, 1933), Vol. 2, p. 194, quoted by Lindsay Rogers, Foreword to Robert H. Connery, The Administration of an N. R. A. Code (Chicago, 1938), p. xvii.

<sup>72</sup> Parrington, ibid., Vol. 2, p. i.

<sup>73</sup> Ibid., Vol. 1, p. vii.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE.....	1107
Selected Material for a Comparative Study of Local Government. HAROLD ZINK.....	1107
REVIEWS OF BOOKS.....	1134
Dahl , A Preface to Democratic Theory. HERBERT McCLOSKEY.....	1134
Coulborn (ed.), Feudalism in History. CARL J. FRIEDRICH.....	1136
Apter , The Gold Coast in Transition. JAMES S. COLEMAN.....	1138
Scammon (ed.), America Votes—A Handbook of Contemporary American Election Statistics. ALEXANDER HEARD.....	1141
Key , American State Politics: An Introduction. CHARLES M. HARDIN.....	1143
Lubell , Revolt of the Moderates. JAMES C. DAVIES.....	1144
Williams , The Conservative Party of Canada, 1920-1949. WALTER O. FILLEY.....	1146
Dallin , The Changing World of Soviet Russia: An Analysis of Soviet Internal and External Policies; Dewar , Labour Policy in the USSR, 1917-1928. ALFRED G. MEYER.....	1147
Rustow , The Politics of Compromise: A Study of Parties and Cabinet Government in Sweden. ROY V. PEEL.....	1149
Spero , Labor Relations in British Nationalized Industry; Baldwin , Beyond Nationalization: The Labor Problems of British Coal. BEN W. LEWIS.....	1150
Akzin , New States and International Organizations. CHARLES S. ASCHER.....	1152
Brown , Middle-Class Democracy and the Revolution in Massachusetts, 1691-1780. CECILIA M. KENYON.....	1153
Brown , Charles Beard and the Constitution: A Critical Analysis of "An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution." MAURICE KLAIN...	1154
Ekirch , The Civilian and the Military. PAUL Y. HAMMOND.....	1156
Manuel , The New World of Henri Saint-Simon. JAMES H. MEISEL...	1158
Vinacke , Far Eastern Politics in the Postwar Period. HAROLD S. QUIGLEY.....	1159
Li , The Historical Status of Tibet. WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN.....	1161
Vanderbilt , Judges and Jurors: Their Functions, Qualifications and Selection; Aumann , The Instrumentalities of Justice: Their Forms, Functions and Limitations. DAVID FELLMAN.....	1162
Trachsel and Wade , The Government and Administration of Wyoming; Caldwell , The Government and Administration of New York; Higshaw and Fortenberry , The Government and Administration of Mississippi; Doyle , Laird and Weiss , The Government and Administration of Florida; Rankin , The Government and Administration of

North Carolina; Gosnell and Anderson , The Government and Administration of Georgia. W. DUANE LOCKARD.....	1164
Ross , Elections and Electors: Studies in Democratic Representation. WILLIAM S. LIVINGSTON.....	1166
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY.....	1168
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....	1168
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....	1180
INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS.....	1190
POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY.....	1203
OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED.....	1217

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE

Selected Materials for a Comparative Study of Local Government

HAROLD ZINK
Ohio State University

Literature on local government is extensive in such countries as the United States, United Kingdom, and Sweden, fairly comprehensive in such countries as France and Germany, and almost if not quite non-existent in certain of the under-developed countries. With the limited space available, it has seemed desirable not to include any materials relating to the English-speaking countries, since these are generally well known to scholars. An attempt has been made to bring in representative local government systems from the major areas of the world, but neither the Soviet Union, the Peoples' Republic of China, nor any satellite country is included, mainly because of failure to find specialists who would undertake the task. Since this article is likely to be used primarily by those whose linguistic competence is limited to English or a European language, emphasis has been placed on materials in these languages, but as much attention as has seemed feasible has been given to sources in other languages.<sup>1</sup>

It is not surprising that the great preponderance of research in local government has thus far related to specific countries. Nevertheless, there has been some recognition of the importance of comparative studies in local government, and interest in such projects seems to be growing slowly at present.

The earlier studies of William B. Munro, The Government of European Cities (New York, Macmillan, 1909) and William Anderson, ed., Local Government in Europe (New York, Appleton-Century, 1939) may be cited as somewhat isolated examples of earlier comparative works in the local government field. The quite recent studies of William A. Robson, ed., Great Cities of the World (London, Allen and Unwin, 1955), International Union of Local Authorities, Local Government Finance and Its Importance for Local Autonomy (The Hague, 1955), and "Village Government in Eastern and Southern Asia: A Symposium," Far Eastern Quarterly, February, 1956, represent significant projects in the present-day comparison of local government institutions and problems. A pilot study undertaken by the International Political Science Association, under the sponsorship of UNESCO, of rural local government in India, Italy, and Sweden,<sup>2</sup> and a more comprehensive survey, now in progress, by the International Union of Local Authorities, also sponsored by UNESCO, of local government throughout the world may indicate something of the current recognition of the need for local government studies which cross national boundaries.

<sup>1</sup> In addition to those who have contributed the various sections of this bibliographical article, thanks are due to Charles S. Ascher, Fred W. Riggs, and the International Union of Local Authorities for assistance in its preparation.

<sup>2</sup> In this research study, Harold Zink of Ohio State University served as general reporter, and Professors R. Bhaskaran of Madras University, F. Benvenuti of Padua University, and A. Wählstrand of the School of Social Work and Municipal Administration of Gothenberg, as national reporters.

FRENCH LOCAL GOVERNMENT

BRIAN CHAPMAN

University of Manchester

Local government institutions before the Revolution are dealt with best in either Fr. Olivier-Martin, Précis d'histoire du droit français (Paris, Dalloz, 1945) or E. Perrot, Les institutions publiques et privées de l'ancienne France jusqu'en 1789 (Paris, Sirey, 1935). The history of local government during the revolutionary period and the institutions which then emerged to form the basis of modern local government are dealt with most comprehensively in J. Godechot, Les institutions de la France sous la Révolution et l'Empire (Paris, 1951). The pattern of local government created by Napoleon has remained in many respects formally the same to the present day. The development in the nineteenth century can be traced through C. A. Vuillefroy and L. Monnier, Principes d'administration: extraits des avis du Conseil d'Etat et du Comité de l'Intérieur . . . (Paris, Joubert, 1837); L. M. de Cormenin, Droit administratif (2 vols., Paris, Paguernel, 5th ed., 1840), particularly Vol. 1; M. Macarel, Cours d'administration et de droit administratif (Paris, Plon, 1852); A. F. A. Vivien, Etudes administratives (2 vols., Paris, de Guillaumin, 1859); and A. Batbie, Traité théorique et pratique de droit public et administratif (9 vols. and 2 supplements, Paris, Larose et Forcel, 2nd ed., 1885), especially Vols. 3, 4, and 7.

Since then all the major jurists have devoted much space in their treatises on droit administratif to the structure and place of local government: e.g., Duguit, Hauriou, Jèze. At present L. Rolland, Précis de droit administratif (Paris, Dalloz, 1947) and M. Waline, Traité élémentaire de droit administratif (Paris, Sirey, 6th ed., 1951) are outstandingly helpful.

The basic laws on local government, the organization and powers of municipal authorities, of departmental authorities, of budgetary control, of personnel, of elections, are in the Code Dalloz, which is frequently brought up-to-date. For special points and for the jurisprudence concerning local authorities, one must consult the Recueil des Arrêts du Conseil d'Etat statuant au contentieux . . . (Paris, Sirey, Collection Lebon et Panhard). The general theory of centralization and decentralization in France is discussed in C. Eisenmann, Centralisation et décentralisation (Paris, LGDJ, 1948). A simple statement of the relations between types of local authorities is in R. Jannin, "Les collectivités locales" in L'Organisation gouvernementale de la France (Paris, Documentation Française, 1952), which also contains a section by R. Maspétiol, "Les rapports entre le pouvoir central et les collectivités locales." R. Maspétiol et P. Laroque, La tutelle administrative (Paris, 1931) and R. Nestor, Le contrôle du préfet sur l'ad- ministration communale (thesis, Paris University, 1931) deal more specifically with central control, the former being the standard work.

An excellent general survey and history of local government during and after the war is P. Doueil, L'Administration locale à l'épreuve de la guerre, 1939-1949 (Paris, Sirey, 1950). J. Gandouin, La constitution et la réforme de l'organisation départementale et communale (thesis, Paris University, 1950) is a good description of the postwar efforts at reforming local government and the constitutional basis of present local government. B. Chapman, Introduction to French Local Government (London, Allen and Unwin, 1953) is an account of the present status and functioning of local government in terms of political science.

The organization of communal government is dealt with in R. Maspétiol, L'Organisation municipale (Paris, Sirey, 1934). The problem of the very small commune is discussed in P. Roy, L'Administration intercommunale: le problème des petites communes (thesis, Bordeaux University, 1944). Of the various recommendations for reform, R. Lainville, Vers la réforme municipale (Paris, Sirey, 1946) and J. Boulonnois, La réforme municipale (Pontoise, Lachevre, 1946) are particularly to be noted.

Communal personnel and their status and rights are discussed for the pre-war period by M. Aragon, Les administrateurs communaux et intercommunaux (Paris, Sirey, 1935); for the post-war period by P. Bertrand, Le statut du personnel communal (Paris, Sirey, 1946). The text of the present law is in "Statut général du personnel des communes et des établissements publics communaux," Journal officiel, Paris, 1952. The organization and powers of municipal and general police are treated by P.-H. Teitgen, La police municipale générale (thesis, Nancy University, 1934); H. Roth, L'Organisation de la police d'état en France (thesis, Lyons University, 1943); and P. Chemineau, Etude de l'organisation administrative de la police en France (thesis, Toulouse University, 1944). Local government finance is precisely and clearly described in R. Lainville, Le budget communal (Paris, Sirey, 7th ed., 1951); there is some useful material in the general survey of the Ministry of Finance, Inventaire de la situation financière 1913-1949 (Paris, 1949); and an authoritative account of its shortcomings has been published by the Ministry of the Interior, Rapport présenté par l'Inspection Générale, Tome I: Sur la réforme des finances locales (Paris, 1951). The most recent and fully comprehensive study is Jean Singer, Traité général des finances communales et départementales (Paris, 1956).

A commented text of the law on departmental organization and administration is ed. R. Bonnaud-Delamare, Loi du 10 août 1871 relative aux conseils généraux mise à jour et complétée par différents textes législatifs (Niort, 1950). The same author has compiled a list of the powers exercised by members of the prefectural corps in Attributions juridiques des préfets et sous-préfets (Monte Carlo, Editions du Livre, 1951). A general study of provincial life and administration is B. Chapman, The Prefects and Provincial France (London, Allen and Unwin, 1955). The powers and position of secretaries-general of the prefectures are to be found in P. Guerrini, Origines et pouvoirs du secrétaire général de préfecture (thesis, Lyons University, 1938) and P. Rix, Le secrétaire général de préfecture (thesis, Toulouse University, 1933). The recruitment and regulations governing the prefectural corps are gathered together in two publications of the Ministry of the Interior, Statut particulier du corps préfectoral (Paris, 1951) and Recrutement des chefs de cabinet de préfet (Boulogne-sur-Seine, 1952). These officials are, however, in some respects still covered by the "Statut général des fonctionnaires," Recueil des documents et textes relatifs à l'application de la loi (Documentation française, 1950). For the status of the ordinary personnel of the prefectures, two reports of the Inspection Générale de l'Administration are important: Rapport présenté par l'Inspection Générale pour l'organisation et le personnel des préfectures départementales (Melun, 1942) and Tome II, Sur l'organisation et les effectifs des préfectures (1950-51) of the report cited above.

Regionalism has been a controversial issue in France during most of the century. The best pre-war book on the subject is probably M. Brun, Départements et régions (Paris, Presses Modernes, 1939). Under Vichy, regional administration came to be widely used; P. Gay, Le préfet régional (Paris, Sirey, 1942) gives some idea of the changes then made. J. B. Bancal, Les circonscriptions administratives de la France (Paris, Sirey, 1945) picks up the pre-war thread after the war and is an able exposition of the problem in geographic and administrative terms. The existence of regional services and the appointment of a type of regional prefect in 1948 have led to several important practical changes in French local government, ably dealt with in J. Legrand, Les essais d'administration régionale (thesis, Paris University, 1950).

The special position of Paris is illustrated in Raymond-Laurent, Paris, sa vie municipale (Paris, Godde, 1938); M. Félix, Le régime administratif et financier du département de la Seine et de la Ville de Paris (2 vols., Paris, Rousseau, 1945); and B. Chapman, "The Government of Paris," in W. A. Robson, ed., Great Cities of the World (London, Allen and Unwin, 1954). Chapman has dealt with "The Prefecture of Police in Paris" in the Journal of Criminal Law (Northwestern University, 1953). The powers and organization of the two prefectures in Paris are set forth in Organisation et attributions des services du Département de la Seine et de la Ville de Paris and Organisation et attributions des services de la Préfecture de Police, both published by the Imprimerie Municipale, Paris.

An excellent study on the problems of town planning and housing as they affect all local authorities is A. Bordessoule et P. Guillemain, Les collectivités locales et les problèmes de l'urbanisme et du logement (Paris, Sirey, 1956).

There are many specialized articles on French local government in the Revue administrative, Revue du droit public, Revue des collectivités locales, and Bulletin d'information de l'Association du Corps Préfectoral, all published in Paris.

ITALIAN LOCAL GOVERNMENT

BRIAN CHAPMAN

University of Manchester

Most works on Italian local government are formalistic and legalistic. In the course of the unification, 1859-61, the institutions of local government then existing in Piedmont were extended to the rest of the country; these institutions had been borrowed from the French; consequently the formal structure of Italian local government is very similar to the French. The original law on local government was the law of October 23, 1859, sull' amministrazione comunale e provinciale. Various relations and modifications to this law proposed by the Chamber of Deputies in the period 1862-64 are to be found in Camera dei Deputati, Sessione 1863-64, Documenti, Vol. I.

The extension of this system of local government to all Italy provoked considerable opposition, particularly from the northern states. In Milan a school of federalist thought, led by Carlo Cattaneo and G. Ferrari, had a strong following for some time. Cattaneo's works are scattered but show a mind of exceptional quality. The best collection is ed. A. Bertani, Opere edite ed inedite di Carlo Cattaneo (3 vols., Florence, 1890). There is apparently no complete collection of Ferrari's works, but G. Schinetti has edited a small volume of Le più belle pagine di G. Ferrari (Milan, 1927). The most notable supporter in political life of a different form of regional government was M. Minghetti, Minister of the Interior after the unification. He wrote a book on the subject, Le regioni (Florence, 1867), and his proposed law, with speeches, is to be found in his Discorsi parlamentari (Rome, 1888). In I partiti politici e la ingerenza loro nella giustizia e nell' amministrazione (Bologna, 1881), he developed a theme common to many writers of the period: that much of the malaise of political life was due to the occult influence of territorial groups, forced by the nature of the centralized state to maneuver in Parliament. Three important jurists of the late nineteenth century made similar criticisms in their writings on local government: G. F. Ferraris, Teoria del decentramento amministrativo (Palermo, 1898); G. Saredo, La nuova legge sulla amministrazione comunale e provinciale (2 vols., Turin, 1889); and Riccomanni, Lo Stato ed i poteri locali (Rome, 1873). A penetrating exposure of the situation which still existed after the Great War is in the Relazione della Commissione Parlamentare d'Inchiesta sull' ordinamento delle amministrazioni di Stato e sulla condizione del personale (2 vols., Rome, 1921).

A coordinated and consolidated text of local government laws was issued by the Regio Decreto of March 3, 1934: Testo unico della legge comunale e provinciale; an up-to-date version of this was edited by C. Martino and published in 1953 by Ete in Turin. This text covers the administration, personnel, finance, tutelage, and recruitment of provinces, communes, and the government of Rome. A commentary on the text was made by A. Lentini, Commento al T.U. della legge comunale e provinciale (Milan, 1950); the same author discussed the position of local government personnel in his Lo stato giuridico dei dipendenti degli enti autarchici (Catania, 1951?). He also published a systematic work of some quality entitled L'amministrazione locale (2nd. ed., Como, 1953).

Probably the best contemporary work for obtaining information on the legal conditions and status of local authorities in terms of national law and jurisprudence is A. M. Sandulli, Manuale di diritto amministrativo (Jovene, Naples, 2nd ed., 1954). Also to be noted is G. Zanobini, L'amministrazione locale (Milan, n.d.).

In 1945 there was considerable discussion of the future form of local government in Italy; it now has a constitutional status. The Ministero per la Costituzione issued the Relazioni all'Assemblea Costituente: Vol. II is on Autonomie locali. The work of the commissions concerned with drafting the new constitution, two of which were concerned with local government, are published as Atti della Commissione per la Costituzione (Rome, 1946).

The new constitution not only contained a special section on local government but created a new form of local authority, the region. Indeed, Italy is, for constitutional lawyers, now "a State characterized by regional autonomy," somewhere between the unitary and the federal state. Its theoretical foundations are to be found in G. Ambrosini, Autonomia regionale e federalismo (Rome, 1946). The legal status of different kinds of local autonomy have a respectable history and Santi Romano, "Decentramento amministrativo" in Enciclopedia giuridica italiana (Milan, 1897) and P. Bodda, "Autarchia amministrativa" in Dizionario di politica, Vol. I (Rome, 1936), should be noted. For the present constitutional position of local authorities, including the regions, perhaps the best work is still V. Falzone, F. Palermo, and F. Cosentino, La Costituzione della repubblica italiana (Rome, 1948); it is also discussed in all text books on constitutional law: e.g., G. Balladore Pallieri, Diritto costituzionale (Milan, 1949). Two works on regional government are G. Miele, Le regioni (Florence, 1951) and B. Chapman, Italian Regional Government (thesis, Oxford University, 1951). The statutes of the special self-governing regions are most easily obtainable in the official Documenti di vita italiana (Sicily, no. 13; Sardinia, no. 17; Val d'Aosta, no. 19; Trentino-Alto-Adige, no. 21). The regional governments have produced their own Codice regionale and a considerable amount of other material.

There is a considerable bibliography on particular aspects of local government in several reviews. Perhaps those to be most closely studied are the Nuova rassegna, Rivista trimestrale di diritto pubblico, Corriere amministrativa, Amministrazione italiana, Rivista amministrativa, and Rivista della corte dei conti.

GERMAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT

ROGER H. WELLS

Bryn Mawr College

On German state and local government before 1945, James K. Pollock and Homer Thomas, Germany in Power and in Eclipse (New York, Van Nostrand, 1952), is a mine of information; it deals with the pre-Weimar, Weimar, and Nazi periods and has numerous maps and bibliographies. Books published before World War I include William B. Munro, The Government of European Cities (New York, Macmillan, 1909), with a long chapter on Prussian cities, and William H. Dawson, Municipal Life and Government in Germany (London, Longman's, 1914). A recent outstanding work is Heinrich Heffter, Die deutsche Selbstverwaltung im 19. Jahrhundert (Stuttgart, Koehler, 1950), dealing mainly with the nineteenth century, but reaching back into the eighteenth and forward into the twentieth. It is a history of German ideas about self-government, particularly at state and local levels, and what was done or attempted to implement them.

For the Weimar Republic, Frederic F. Blachly and Miriam E. Oatman, The Government and Administration of Germany (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1928) has two chapters and a bibliography on state and local government. The texts of all the state constitutions are given in Otto Ruthenberg, ed., Verfassungsgesetze des deutschen Reichs und der deutschen Länder (Berlin, Vahlen, 1926). A more detailed analysis, stressing cities but with some attention to states and other local units, is Roger H. Wells, German Cities (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1932), with ten pages of bibliography on German sources.

For Nazi Germany, besides the material in Pollock and Thomas, op. cit., reference is made to Fritz Morstein Marx's valuable chapter in William Anderson, ed., Local Government in Europe (New York, Appleton-Century, 1939), to which is appended a translation of the Deutsche Gemeindeordnung (German Municipal Government Code) of 1935. This law, stripped of its Nazi features, was widely copied in the Gemeindeordnungen adopted in the decade 1945-1955.

On West Germany (since 1949, the Federal Republic of Germany), there is considerable information in print.<sup>1</sup> The official publications of state and local units have largely been restored after the lapses of the war and early postwar years.<sup>2</sup> They include state law gazettes (Gesetz- und Verordnungsblätter), proceedings of state legislatures, statistical yearbooks, handbooks and administrative reports, decisions of higher state administrative courts, and a vast quantity of local government documents.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Federal-state relations, Polish administration of the territory east of the Oder-Neisse Line, and the Saar are not covered in this bibliography. Moreover, space does not permit much discussion of Berlin, East Germany, and Allied military government (1944-1949). A standard work on postwar Berlin is Elmer Plischke, Berlin: Development of Its Government and Administration (Bad Godesberg, Office of the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany, 1952) which includes an English translation of the West Berlin constitution of 1950. In the German Democratic Republic, state and local governments have fared as badly as they did under the Nazi regime, the states being abolished in 1952. Some comment on the subject is found in Kurt Glaser's chapter in Litchfield's volume (cited above in the text), and in a chapter in J. P. Nettl, The Eastern Zone and Soviet Policy in Germany, 1945-1950 (New York, Oxford University Press, 1951). On allied military government, see Lucius D. Clay, Decision in Germany (Garden City, Doubleday, 1950; Harold Zink, American Military Government in Germany (New York, Macmillan, 1947); Wolfgang G. Friedmann, The Allied Military Government of Germany (London, Stevens, 1947).

<sup>2</sup> On the earlier documentation, see Everett S. Brown, Manual of Government Publications: United States and Foreign (New York, Appleton-Century, 1950), pp. 85-87.

The state constitutions and laws on state and local government are available, not only in official gazettes of the Länder, but also in convenient collections which often have introductions and commentaries. Texts and English translations of the state constitutions of the U. S., French, and Soviet Zones are provided in Constitutions of the German Länder (Berlin, Office of Military Government for Germany (US), 1947). The constitutions adopted after 1947 are those of Hamburg, Lower Saxony, North Rhine-Westphalia, Schleswig-Holstein, and Baden-Württemberg. For the Hamburg constitution, see Wilhelm Loeschelder, ed., Die Gemeindeordnungen in den westdeutschen Ländern und die Verfassungen von Berlin, Hamburg und Bremen (Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1953), which also contains the text of all the Gemeindeordnungen except those enacted by Lower Saxony and Baden-Württemberg in 1955.<sup>4</sup> Johannes Hohlfeld, ed., Dokumente der deutschen Politik und Geschichte von 1848 bis zur Gegenwart (Berlin, Wendler, 8 vols., 1951-1955) reprints the Schleswig-Holstein constitution (Landessatzung) of 1949 (Vol. 6, pp. 456 ff), the Lower Saxony constitution of 1951 (Vol. 7, pp. 23 ff), and the Baden-Württemberg constitution of 1953 (Vol. 8, pp. 285 ff). For each state, scholars or officials have edited collections of laws on state and local government. See e.g., Günter Dürig, ed., Gesetze des Landes Baden-Württemberg (Munich, Beck, 1956).

Under general works, a comprehensive analysis is Edward H. Litchfield et al., Governing Postwar Germany (Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1953). Besides two chapters on state and local government by Roger H. Wells, other topical chapters include state and local material. J. F. J. Gillen, State and Local Government in West Germany, 1945-1953 (Bad Godesberg, Office of the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany, 1953) deals mainly with the U. S. Zone and Bremen and briefly with the British and French Zones. An earlier study is Comstock Glaser, Land and Local Government in the U. S. Zone of Germany (Berlin, Office of Military Government for Germany (US), 1947). Alfred Grosser, ed., Administration et politique en Allemagne occidentale (Paris, Colin, 1954) includes "case studies" of four states (Lower Saxony, Hesse, North Rhine-Westphalia, Baden-Württemberg) and four cities (Düsseldorf, Trier, Göttingen, and Heiligenhafen).<sup>5</sup>

More specialized publications include Joseph H. Kaiser, Der Landtag (pamphlet, Munich, Hochschule für politische Wissenschaften, 1951); Götz

<sup>3</sup> For further details about the Gemeindeordnungen, see Roger H. Wells' article in the National Municipal Review, Vol. 45, pp. 66-71 (February 1956).

<sup>4</sup> A. Koehler and K. Jansen, eds., Die Bundesrepublik, 1954/55 (Berlin, Heymann, 1956) is a directory of the governmental organs of the Federal Republic, the states, and the principal local units. An important source of current municipal data is the Statistisches Jahrbuch deutscher Gemeinden (Brunswick, Waisenhaus), published annually by the Deutscher Städtetag, the association of the larger German cities.

<sup>5</sup> Among reference works on Germany, one of the most useful on state and local matters is Klaus Mehnert and Heinrich Schulte, Deutschland Jahrbuch (Essen, Rheinisches-Westfälisches Verlagskontor, 1st ed., 1949; 2nd ed., 1953).

Roth, Fraktion und Regierungsbildung (Meisenheim, Hain, 1954), a study of the formation of the cabinet of Lower Saxony in 1951, a monograph of a series edited by Dolf Sternberger, Parteien-Fraktionen-Regierungen; Ernst Walz et al., Die Mittelstufe der Verwaltung (Frankfurt, Institut zur Förderung öffentlicher Angelegenheiten, 1950); Hans Peters, ed., Handbuch der kommunalen Wissenschaften und Praxis (Berlin, Springer), of which the first of three volumes, Kommunalverfassung, appeared in 1956; Otto Ziebill, Geschichte des deutschen Städtetages (Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 2nd ed., 1956), a fifty years' history of the most powerful of the associations of local governments; Verein für Geschichte der deutschen Landkreise, Die Landkreise in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1955), a ten years' history of the county government association; Fredo Wagener, Die Städte im Landkreis (Göttingen, Schwartz, 1955), on city-county relations; Karl Hahn, Praktische Kommunalverwaltung (Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1954), on municipal administration; Seydel, Die kommunalen Zweckverbände (Göttingen, Schwartz, 1955) on the more than 5,000 local ad hoc authorities; Walter Bauer, Dezentralisation der Grossstadtverwaltung (Göttingen, Schwartz, 1955); two monographs by Henry P. Pilgert, Community and Group Life in West Germany and The West German Educational System (Bad Godesberg, Office of the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany, 1952 and 1953); Alice H. Cook, Adult Education for Citizenship in Postwar Germany (pamphlet, Pasadena, Fund for Adult Education, 1954); Hans Wallenberg, Report on Democratic Institutions in West Germany (pamphlet, New York, American Council on Germany, 1956); Theodor Steltzer and others, Bürgerverantwortung in der Gemeinde (Frankfurt, Institut zur Förderung öffentlicher Angelegenheiten, 1952); and Klaus A. Lindemann, Behörde und Bürger (Darmstadt, Roether, 1952) in the Darmstadt survey series.

The most useful periodicals on state and local government are: Archiv des öffentlichen Rechts (Tübingen, Mohr, quarterly); Der Städtetag (Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, monthly), the official organ of the Deutscher Städtetag; Die Selbstverwaltung (Heidelberg, Jedermann, monthly), the official organ of the Deutscher Landkreistag; Politische Studien (Munich, Isar, monthly) issued by the Munich Hochschule für politische Wissenschaften; Zeitschrift für Politik (Berlin, Heymann, quarterly) issued by the Deutsche Hochschule für Politik, Berlin; Neue juristische Wochenschrift (Munich, Beck, weekly); Die öffentliche Verwaltung (Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, twice monthly); and Deutsches Verwaltungsblatt (Berlin, Heymann, twice monthly).

SWEDISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT

ANNIKA BAUDE

Royal Library of Stockholm

Local government institutions have occupied an important place in Sweden over a long period of time and consequently it is not surprising that the literature dealing with the history of the towns and counties is extensive. Space does not permit a listing of even the more significant historical works, but the many titles will be found listed in the catalogues of the Swedish Parliamentary Library and in the Swedish historical bibliographies covering the period from 1771 to date. Note may also be made of Katalog över stadshistoriska institutets registersamling (Stockholm, 1937) and Stadshistorisk revy. Register över stadshistorisk litteratur 1920/21—, published every second year in Stockholm.

Official publications relating to local government in Sweden are numerous. Every county and most of the towns publish proceedings of their councils together with yearly collections of local acts. Some of the large cities publish local handbooks and statistical reports annually. The Stockholms stads statistik, published annually since 1904, is most comprehensive and contains a great deal of significant material. Much information is also included in the national statistical publications such as Sveriges officiella statistik, issued by the Central Statistical Bureau, which since 1913 has published special reports dealing with election returns, financial matters, and the like.

Official reports of public commissions investigating local government problems in Sweden are extensive. Some 13 reports during the period 1944-54 dealt with various aspects of local government. Examples of such reports are: Sveriges offentliga utredningar: Betänkande med förslag till riktlinjer för en revision av rikets indelning i borgerliga primärkommuner (1945) and Länsstyrelsernas organisation och ställning inom länsförvaltningen (1950).

General works dealing with Swedish local government include the following: N. Andrén, Local Government in Sweden (Stockholm, Swedish Institute, 1955); G. Hesselén, Public Administration in Sweden (Stockholm, Swedish Institute, 1952); E. Broms, Studier rörande det svenska landstinget (Stockholm, 1930); P. Grante, Om den kommunala instruktions- och finansmakten (Stockholm-Lund, 1946); T. Grünthal, Modern kommunalförvaltning (Stockholm, 1955); G. Heckscher, Svensk statsförvaltning i arbete (Stockholm, 1952); Å. Larsson, Om kommunaltjänstemän och kommunalarbetare (Stockholm, 1948); F. Thunborg, ed., Den nya kommunindelningen i text, statistik och kartor (Stockholm, 1950); P. E. Sköld and T. De la Motte, Kommunalkunskap (11th ed., Stockholm, 1955); and O. Sörndal, Våra landsting och deras uppgifter (Stockholm, 1947).

There are a number of works dealing with the legal aspects of local government in Sweden. These include: E. Fahlbeck, Förvaltningsrättsliga studier (2 vols., Stockholm, 1938-41); N. Herlitz, Föreläsningar i förvaltningsrätt (3 vols., Stockholm, 1937-42); N. Herlitz, Förvaltningsrättsliga grunddrag (Stockholm, 1943); H. G. F. Sundberg and H. Berglund, eds., Kommunal författningshandbok (3rd ed. Stockholm, 1948); R. Malmgren, Stadsbildningen från rättslig synpunkt (Lund, 1910); S. Sjöberg, Det kommunala besvärsinstitutet (Stockholm, 1948); H. G. F. Sundberg, Kommunalrätt. Allmänna delen (Stockholm, 3rd ed., 1949); and O. Westerberg, Om rättskraft i förvaltningsrätten (Stockholm, 1951).

Various periodicals are worth consulting for material relating to local government: Kammarrättens årsbok. (Stockholm 1927- ); Regeringsrättens årsbok (Stockholm, 1912- ); Landskommunernas tidskrift (Stockholm, 1920- ); Svenska stadsförbundets tidskrift (Stockholm, 1909- ); Sveriges landstings.

tidsskrift (Stockholm, 1914- ); and Årsbok för Sveriges landsting (Stockholm, 1936- ). Förvaltningsrättslig tidsskrift (Stockholm, 1938- ) and Nordisk administrativ tidsskrift (København, 1920- ) not only contain articles of interest but are valuable because of their bibliographies.

DANISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT

AXEL HOLM

Københavns statistiske Kontor, Copenhagen

The municipal yearbook Kommunal Årbog, published annually on commission by the Central trykkeriet in Copenhagen, summarizes the principal developments of local government and contains an index of books and periodicals. Håndbog for Danske Kommuner, edited by N. Møllmann and S. A. Hjernov (3 vols., Copenhagen, Martins Forlag, 1954-55) deals with local government in general as well as special activities on the provincial town, parish, and county levels, but it does not cover Copenhagen, Frederiksberg, and Gentofte. Ernst Andersen, Administrativt Tilsyn med Kommunalforvaltningen (Copenhagen, Gads Forlag, 1940) presents a detailed discussion of the administrative control of local government. Poul Andersen, Dansk Forvaltningsret (Copenhagen, Nordisk Forlag, 1946) is primarily a text on administrative law but contains useful sections relating to local administration. O. Bertolt, Kommunekundskab (Copenhagen, Workers' Educational Federation, 1954) provides a survey of local government in Denmark for study circles. Statistisk Årbog for Danmark, the statistical yearbook published by the Danish Statistical Department, with index translated into English, contains various sections of interest to students of local government and lists all publications of this agency in English. Among the special reports of the Statistical Department which may be useful to local government scholars are the following: Elections of Local Governments (1954), Taxes on Real Property and Persons 55/56, 4th series, Vol. 165, no. 1 and Accounts of Municipalities and Ports, 1946/47-1951/52, 4th series, Vol. 161 no. 1.

For those interested in the Danish capital, the city of Copenhagen has prepared a volume in English, Capital of a Democracy (Copenhagen, 1955). More technical studies of the capital include: Axel Holm's Københavns Kommunes Forfatning (Copenhagen, pub. by the City of Copenhagen, 2nd ed., 1954), used as a textbook in the training of municipal officials, and Axel Holm and Kjeld Johansen, København 1840-1940 (Copenhagen, Nyt Nordisk Forlag, 1941), which traces political and economic developments. Samling af Bestemmelser vedrørende Københavns Kommune, published annually by the city of Copenhagen and going back to 1607, contains decisions of the town council, departmental administrative decisions, and the like. An annual publication, starting in 1840, Københavns Borgerrepræsentations Forhandlinger, contains the proceedings of the town council of Copenhagen. Vedtaeg for Bestyrelsen af Københavns Kommunale Anliggender provides for the formal framework of government in Copenhagen; Københavns Borgerrepræsentations Forretnings- orden lists the rules of procedure of the Copenhagen town council. The Copenhagen Statistical Office publishes an annual statistical yearbook under the title Statistisk Årbog for København, Frederiksberg og Gentofte samt Omegnskommunerne and a monthly statistical review, Statistisk Månedsskrift. The same office publishes a municipal calendar, Københavns Kommunalkalender, which contains an outline of the development and present organization of municipal institutions. Those interested in public finance will find Københavns Kommunes Regnskab og Beretning om Kommunens Anliggender, published annually by the city of Copenhagen and reporting municipal finances, and Regnskab og Beretning fra Frederiksberg Kommune og Gentofte Kommune, a corresponding annual report of the finances of these cities, useful.

The report of the commission appointed by the Danish Ministry of the Interior in 1939, Betaenkning afgivet Hovedstadskommissionen (Copenhagen, 1948) may be of interest though its recommendations relating to municipal reform have not been put into effect.

Gunnar Olsen's De Danske Kjøbstæder gennem Tiderne (Copenhagen, J. H. Schultz Forlag, 1943) presents a history of Danish provincial towns over a period of centuries. W. Oxholm's Landkommunernes Styrelse (Copenhagen, Nordisk Forlag, 1935) gives an account of Danish rural parish administration but is now out-of-date.

Kommunal Tidsskriftindex, published monthly by the Copenhagen town hall library, is an index of municipal periodicals and publications. Danmarks Kommunale Efterretninger is a municipal weekly periodical. Kjøbstadforeningens Tidsskrift, published fortnightly, is the organ of the Danish Association of Provincial Towns; Sognerådstidende is a weekly periodical for rural municipalities. Nordisk Administrativ Tidsskrift, a journal of administration, occasionally runs articles dealing with local government in the nordic countries.

LATIN AMERICAN LOCAL GOVERNMENT

LEO LOTT

Ohio State University

Publications on local government are not numerous in the Latin American countries, though materials are more adequate in Argentina, Brazil, and Mexico than elsewhere. It is to be hoped that the programs organized recently in Brazil and Costa Rica may serve to stimulate interest in this field throughout Latin America.

For useful surveys of local government in various countries of this area Austin F. MacDonald, Latin American Government and Politics (New York, Crowell, rev. ed., 1954) may be consulted.

The legal aspects of municipal government in Argentina are dealt with in Salvador C. Vigo, El régimen municipal de la constitución y las leyes orgánicas municipales (Sante Fé, Imprenta de la Universidad Nacional del Litoral, 1943). Relations of municipalities and the federal government are discussed in Luis Eduardo Molina, El municipio argentino ante el sistema federal de gobierno y los preceptos de la constitución nacional (Cordoba, Imprenta de la Universidad, 1946), and relations of provinces and the federal government in Austin F. MacDonald, Government of the Argentine Republic (New York, Crowell, 1942). A detailed treatise of significance is Rafael Bielsa's Principios de régimen municipal (Santa Fé, Imprenta de la Universidad Nacional del Litoral, 2nd ed., 1940). The important role of the city is dealt with in Horacio Julio Storni, El municipio como institución (Buenos Aires, Valerio Abeledo, 1949). Various aspects of Argentinian municipal administration are dealt with in Alberto G. Caldumbide, Administración municipal (La Plata, ed. del autor, 1942). The federal capital is discussed by Maximo I. Gomez Forgues in "El régimen municipal en la capital federal," Revista de la facultad de derecho y ciencias sociales, Universidad Nacional de Buenos Aires, tercera época, año 4, no. 13, enero-abril, 1949, pp. 135-172. The position of provinces is discussed in Rómulo Amadeo, "Las provincias ¿Son soberanos o autónomas?" Boletín de la Biblioteca del Congreso Nacional, no. 35, mayo-junio, 1940, pp. 369-375. Federal territories are treated in some detail in Juan Hilarión Lenzi, Gobierno de territorios; conceptos básicos de la ley orgánica territorial (Buenos Aires, Tall. gráf. de F. y M. Mercatali, 1939).

An illuminating survey of the development of municipal government in Brazil is to be found in a series of four articles by Océlio de Medeiros published in the Revista do Serviço Público: "A Constituição do direito municipal brasileiro na organização de Imperio," Ano 10, Vol. 2, nos. 3-4, julho-agosto 1947, pp. 45ff; "O município na organização republicana até 1937," Ano. 10, Vol. 1, nos. 3-4, marco-abril 1947, pp. 50-59; "A reforma municipal na Constituição de 1946," Ano. 10, Vol. 1, nos. 1-2, jan.-feb. 1947, pp. 49-57; and "A situação municipal na carta e no regime de 10 de novembro de 1937," Ano 10, Vol. 2, nos. 1-2, maio-junho, 1947, pp. 63-71. Two general volumes dealing with municipal government in Brazil are Orlando M. Carvalho, Problemas fundamentais do município (São Paulo, Nacional, 1937) and Victor Nunes Leal, Coronelismo, enxada e voto. O município e o regime representativo no Brasil (Rio de Janeiro, 1948). Statistical material relating to the various Brazilian states is to be found in a volume issued by the Divisão Territorial do Brasil under the title Situação administrativa vigente. Federal territories are dealt with in Océlio de Medeiros, Territórios federais (Rio de Janeiro, Ed. Nacional de direito, 1944). Local government personnel administration is discussed in J. H. Meirelles Teixeira, O estatuto dos funcionários e a autonomia municipal (São Paulo, Prefeitura do Município de São Paulo, 1947).

The development of municipal government in Latin America and especially in Chile is discussed in Manuel Ponce Jorquera, Gobierno y autonomía municipal. Origen de los municipalidades, su establecimiento in América y el régimen actual instituido en los países americanos (Valparaíso, Imprenta Mercantile, 1946). Treatises dealing with the legal aspects of municipal government in Chile are Jaime Guzmán Palacios, Atribuciones, deberes y responsabilidades de los alcaldes (Santiago, Central de publicaciones, 2nd ed., 1938) and C. Moraga Ramos, De la responsabilidad en las municipalidades (Valparaíso, Imprenta Aurora de Chile, 1944). Raúl Saenz Veyra, Asambleas provinciales (Valparaíso, Sociedad ed. Italiana, 1942) analyzes the functions of provincial assemblies in Chile and contains information relating to local administration.

Two general works on municipal government in Mexico are Armando Carballo, El sistema municipal en México, desde su implantación hasta la constitución de 1917 y la reforma en el D.F. de 1928 en Departamento central (Mexico, 1936) and M. C. Rolland, El desastre municipal en la república Mexicana (Mexico, I. Molina M., 2nd ed., 1939). Economic aspects of municipal government are discussed in Félix Chaires González, Estudio económico de los municipios de los Estados Unidos mexicanos (Mexico, 1936). Three theses dealing with municipal government contain a considerable amount of significant material: Salvador González Lobo, El municipio Mexicano (1940), Florencio Barrera Fuentes, Historia y destino del municipio en México (1950), and Mario Colin, Notas sobre el municipio en México (1949): these were done at the National University of Mexico.

The remaining Latin American countries have only scattering publications in the local government field. These include: Roberto Molina, Guía municipal de Colombia (Bogotá, Imprenta nacional, 1936), now largely out-of-date; Ricardo Arenas Calvete, Guía administrativo (Bucaramanga, Colombia, Imprenta del Departamento, 1949), a more current work dealing with Colombian municipal affairs; a report of the second meeting of municipal government officials in Ecuador published under the title Congreso de municipalidades Ecuatorianas. Segundo (Quito, Fray Jodoco Röske, 1951); and O. G. Ricketson, Jr., "Municipal Organization of an indian township in Guatemala," Geographical Review, Vol. 29, 1939, pp. 643-647.

NEAR EAST LOCAL GOVERNMENT<sup>1</sup>

HAROLD F. ALDEEFER

Pennsylvania State University

Materials in this field are scarce, fugitive, and mostly secondary. In the states which emerged from the gradual breaking up of the Ottoman Empire, the form of local government has followed the French model. Prefects and their staffs, appointed from the national level, supervise every move of local officials, though elective local councils and chief executives give a semblance of democratic government. Thus local government has had little or no interest for the native intelligentsia or the trained civil service, and there is little indigenous literature on the subject. What exists is, for obvious linguistic reasons, not readily useful to the Western reader. Moreover, in English and French there is only too little; still less, in German, Italian, or Russian.

The legal foundations of local government are found in the constitutions of the national states. Helen Miller Davis, Constitutions, Electoral Laws, and

<sup>1</sup> Since the REVIEW hopes to publish in a later issue a bibliographical article on government and administration in Arab Asia, Professor Alderfer has confined his bibliography to non-Arab countries: Greece, Turkey, Egypt, the Sudan, and Iran.—[ED.]

Treaties of States in the Near and Middle East (Durham, Duke University Press, rev. ed., 1953), in which constitutions and other documents are translated into English or French, is basic. A current source of documentary materials and authoritative articles is the Middle East Journal, published quarterly since 1947 by the Middle East Institute, Washington, D. C. The Royal Central Asian Journal, published quarterly since 1914 by the Royal Central Asian Society of London, and Middle East Affairs, a monthly publication of the Council for Middle East Affairs, are authoritative and informative.

The Middle East Institute recently published Current Research in the Middle East, 1955, a definitive 175-page volume which contains 1,018 entries arranged as to topic, researcher, sponsoring organization, time of completion, and scope of work now going forward in the universities and institutes of the Middle East and Western world. Political science is one of the main subjects included. The Royal Institute of International Affairs in 1950 published The Middle East, a Political and Economic Survey (London and New York, 1950), which contains brief sketches of provincial and local governmental organization in Egypt, Iran, the Sudan, and Turkey as well as political information about all Near East countries. Europa Publications Limited, London, published The Middle East, 1955, a survey and directory of Arabia, Cyprus, Egypt, Iraq, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, Libya, Persia, the Sudan, and Turkey. In it are brief outlines of the constitutions and governmental organizations, including those of regional and local governments. Previous editions were published in 1948, 1950, and 1953.

For background material, The Evolution of Public Responsibility in the Middle East, published by the Middle East Institute (Washington, D. C., 1955), is recommended, though the material on government is general rather than specific; it contains a series of addresses presented at the Ninth Annual Conference on Middle East Affairs. Hedley V. Cooke, Challenge and Response in the Middle East: The Quest for Prosperity, 1919-1951 (New York, 1952) has the same defect, as do Alfred Bonn  , State and Economics in the Near East (London, 1948); Halford L. Hoskins, The Middle East (New York, 1954); Ernest Jackh, ed., Background of the Middle East (Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1952); and Hans Kohn, A History of Nationalism in the Near East (New York, 1929).

For a detailed examination of government under the Ottoman Empire, H. A. R. Gibb and Harold Bowen, Islamic Society and the West, Vol. I, and Islamic Society in the Eighteenth Century, (London, Oxford University Press, 1950) are excellent; as an indispensable tool for research Henry W. Hazard, Atlas of Islamic History (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1952) is most helpful.

Writings on technical assistance and Point Four programs of the United States government often deal obliquely with local government, although the true significance of this relationship has never yet been fully explored. The March, 1950, issue of the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science is devoted to Point Four.

In Greece, extensive study of local government was made by the American Mission (ECA) in Athens during the period 1950-52. Articles and pamphlets resulting from this work include several by Harold F. Alderfer: Facts on Greek Local Government: A Preliminary Outline (Athens, U. S. ECA Civil Government Division, 1950); Report on Greek Local Government (Athens, U. S. Mutual Security Administration, 1952); "United States Aid at the Grass Roots," National Municipal Review, April, 1953, pp. 168-171; "Modern Greek Government: The Basic Framework," Journal of Central European Affairs, January, 1953, pp. 331-345; and "Modern Greek Government: The Realities," Journal of Central European Affairs, April, 1953, pp. 28-46. A volume that provides an excellent political background for the troublesome years since the beginning of World War II is Bickham Sweet-Escott, Greece: A Political and Economic Survey, 1939-1953 (London, Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1954). The evolution of local government in liberated Greece is outlined in G. T. Bacopoulos, Outline of the Greek Constitution: Political Systems since the Greek Revolution; Proportional Representation (Athens, 1950).

Modern local government in Turkey is described in broad outline by Eleanor Bisbee in The New Turks (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1951). Her article, "Test of Democracy in Turkey: Structure of the Turkish Government," in the Middle East Journal, April, 1950, pp. 170-182, is enlightening. John M. Donovan, The Government of Turkey (Washington, D. C., 1925) describes regional and local government in some detail. E. D. Ellis's article, "The Evolution of Turkish Political Institutions: Internal Developments in Turkey; Political Growth in Turkey, A Case Study," is found in two installments of Current History: December, 1947, pp. 347-351, and September, 1948, pp. 95-99. H. A. Reed in the Foreign Policy Bulletin of March 15, 1955, discusses "Turkish Democracy at the Cross-roads: Certain Instances of Apparent Political Regressions." The Turkish Information Office supplies a pamphlet Self-Government in Turkey. Some information is also available in the Country Data Book for Turkey (Washington, D.C., 1950) published by the U. S. Economic Cooperation Administration.

A brochure, Cyprus Government, Handbook of Information Prepared for Use of the United Kingdom Goodwill Trade Mission, was issued at Nicosia in Cyprus by the Government Printing Office in 1946.

There is surprisingly little material on Egyptian local government in spite of the long British occupation. J. M. Landan in his Parliaments and Parties in Egypt (Israel Publishing House, 1953) deals with the history of parliamentary institutions and political parties and the extent of European influence, providing a good background for further exploration in local institutions of government. Henry Habib Ayrant's The Fellaheen (Cairo, 1945) gives a sociological and economic picture of village life and its peasants with some side glances at local governing practices.

In the October, 1953, issue of the Journal of African Administration, L. M. Buchanan discusses "Local Government in the Sudan since 1947," and in the Municipal Journal of January-February, 1954, "Local Government in the Sudan, the Financial Structure; Difficulties of Recruiting Suitable Staff." R. C. Mayall has an article "Recent Constitutional Developments in the Sudan" in the July, 1952, International Affairs.

The most ambitious governmental study of modern Iran or, in fact, of any modern Near East nation is the Report on Seven Year Development Plan for the Plan Organization of the Imperial Government of Iran (5 vols., New York, 1949), published by the Overseas Consultants, Inc. Local government, as well as the regional pattern of the national government, is examined in relation to the problem of governmental decentralization. Public health, education, town improvement and planning, low cost housing, water supply, and other local functions are described and analyzed with an eye to recommendations for the future. An earlier American attempt to put Persian government in order is described by A. C. Millsbaugh, Americans in Persia (Washington, Brookings Institution, 1946).

LOCAL GOVERNMENT IN INDIA

R. BHASKARAN

University of Madras

The history of local government in India is divided into three periods: pre-British, British, and since independence. R. K. Mukherji, Local Government in Ancient India deals with the first period. C. M. P. Cross, The Development of Self Government in India, 1858-1914 (Chicago, 1922) discusses the earlier part of the second period, while H. Tinker, The Foundations of Local Self-Government in India, Pakistan, and Burma (London, 1954) considers developments down to 1937. Far-reaching changes are taking place as a result of independence, but it is too early to present anything like a full picture. For information in regard to the many significant changes since Indian independence, scholars will have to depend at present on the reports of the state ministries of local government, annual reports issued by the states, newspapers, and the like.

Various public bodies have conducted inquiries into the problems of local government in India; their reports constitute one of the most valuable sources of information. The Report of the Indian Statutory Commission of 1930, published by His Majesty's Stationery Office in London, has much to offer students of local government. The Report of the Local Self-Government Committee of Bombay (1939), Report of the Local Self-Government Committee of the Government of Uttar Pradesh (1940), Report of the Janapada Enquiry Committee of Madhya Pradesh (1952), and the Report of the Uttar Pradesh Panchayat Raj Amendment Act Committee (1954) are all worth consulting. The Report of the States Enquiry Commission of the Government of India is expected to appear soon and should be a valuable source. The Report of the Taxation Enquiry Committee of the Government of India (1955) sheds light on the problem of local government finance.

Other official publications are useful in a study of Indian local government. The annual Statistical Abstract of India contains much material on local government. The Census of India, 1951, is also useful. Material on local government activities is contained in the annual report of each state; in the annual reports of the state ministries of local government; and in the legal, procedural, and finance manuals published by the states for the use of local government officials. The states publish in a completely codified form the acts and regulations relating to local government bodies within their jurisdictions.

The general literature on Indian local government is not extensive. Several publications deal with the legal aspects of local government; perhaps P. D. Aiyangar, The Law of Municipal Corporations, which has appeared in various editions, is as useful as any. Non-legal studies include: H. T. S. Forrest, The Indian Municipality (Calcutta, 1909); K. Viswanathan, A Guide to Panchayat Administration (1947); M. P. Sharma, Local Government and Finance in U. P. (Allahabad, 1946); Hind Kitabs, Local Self Government in India (Bombay, 1951); K. T. Shah, Constitution, Functions and Finance of Indian Municipalities (Bombay, 1925); J. G. Drummond, Panchaya'ts in India (Bombay, 1937); J. Mathai, Village Government in British India (London, 1915).

The Local Self-Government Institute at Bombay is the center for various programs relating to local government. Its quarterly journal contains much pertinent information. In 1941 this institute published a much-used Directory of Local Self-Government in India; this is now being revised. The Local Self Government Review, published in Delhi, is useful; the Indian Journal of Political Science contains occasional articles on local government.

PHILIPPINE LOCAL GOVERNMENT

M. LADD THOMAS

Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy

Except for a few monographs, little has been published on Philippine local government. Several general works on the Philippines contain some material, usually merely legal descriptions.

Knowledge of its earlier development is prerequisite to understanding contemporary local government. The best single source for the Spanish period is Emma H. Blair and James A. Robinson, eds., The Philippine Islands, 1493-1898 (3 vols., Cleveland: A. H. Clark Co., 1903-09); this collection of translations from Spanish sources includes occasional references to local government. A more compact and detailed description of the organization and finances of towns, barangays, and provinces in the nineteenth century can be found in John Foreman, The Philippine Islands (New York, Scribner's, 3rd ed., 1906), ch. 13; this chapter also stresses the functions of the Judge Governors, Provincial Civil Governor, Gobernadorcillo, and Cabeza de Barangay. José P. Laurel, Local Government in the Philippines (Manila, La Pilarica Press, 1926) provides an excellent account of local government under the Spanish and through the first two decades of American administration.

American policy aimed at the democratization, Filipinization, and increased efficiency of local government; unfortunately, with somewhat conflicting results. Official reports and recommendations are found in Reports of the Philippine Commission, selected items published annually by the Government Printing Office (Washington, D. C.), 1900-15, either as separate documents or as parts of the Reports of the United States War Department. Some of this material for the same period is covered in Dean C. Worcester and Joseph R. Hayden, The Philippines Past and Present (New York, Macmillan, 1930); here are also two informative chapters on the social structure and administration of the non-Christian tribes. Worcester was Secretary of the Interior of the Philippine Islands, 1901-19, and a member of the Philippine Commission, 1900-13. However, the most scholarly and comprehensive treatment of the structure, problems, and tendencies of local government from 1900 to the Second World War is Hayden, The Philippines: A Study in National Development (New York, Macmillan, 1942), chs. 11, 12. Hayden, who was Vice Governor, 1933-35, also analyzes the relation of the local to the central government, emphasizing the trend toward centralization under Quezon.

Two publications necessary for an understanding of the legal status of local government under the Republic are the Revised Administrative Code of the Philippines (Manila, Bureau of Printing, 1951), chs. 56-61, and Emiliano P. Cortez, Provincial and Municipal Law of the Philippines (Manila, Lawyers Cooperative Publishing Co., 1952). While it contains useful background material on pre-Spanish local government (particularly the early written law codes), the main value of José M. Aruego, Philippine Government in Action (Manila, University Publishing Co., Inc., 1954) rests in its extensive coverage, chs. 20-23, of current local government; it relies heavily, however, on the law rather than on actual practice. An attempt to fill this gap is John H. Romani and M. Ladd Thomas, A Survey of Local Government in the Philippines (Manila, Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines, 1954), based on a field survey using extensive interviews with local officials and citizens. Romani and Thomas are also the authors of the study of local administration in Edwin O. Stene et al., Public Administration in the Philippines (Manila, Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines, 1955), ch. 4.

While the conditions of the provinces, chartered cities, and municipalities are uniformly unsatisfactory, the village, or barrio, is at present considered the major problem of local government. Conditions in the barrio are described in Generoso F. Rivera and Robert T. McMillan, The Rural Philippines (Manila, U. S. Foreign Operations Administration, 1952); based on field surveys, it includes an analysis of the concentration of economic and political power in a small group, usually of the dominant land-owning class, in each barrio. The plight of the barrio people and recommendations for government and foreign aid to the barrio are the main themes of Roland R. Renne, "Social Unrest and the Barrio Economy," Philippine Review (December, 1952). M. Ladd Thomas, "The Philippine Rural Development Program," Social Research (Summer, 1955), outlines President Magsaysay's program to alleviate conditions in the barrio and strengthen it administratively. The best recent treatment of the barrio is John H. Romani, "The Philippine Barrio," The Far Eastern Quarterly (February, 1956).

JAPANESE LOCAL GOVERNMENT

KURT STEINER

Stanford University

The following bibliography is designed to be of use to both Japanese area specialists and those interested in comparative institutions. Thus a special effort has been made to cite as much as possible of the pertinent material in English,<sup>1</sup> and to include many articles written in English while excluding specific citations of similar Japanese material.<sup>2</sup>

1. Bibliographies: Material in Western languages is listed in Borton, Eliséeff, Lockwood, and Pelzel, A Selected List of Books and Articles on Japan (Cambridge, 1954)<sup>3</sup> and in The Far Eastern Bibliography, published until 1954 in each August issue of the Far Eastern Quarterly, and since then as a separate issue each September. Those who can read Japanese will find two volumes of the Bibliographical Series of the University of Michigan of great value: John W. Hall, Japanese History: A Guide to Japanese Reference and Research Material (Ann Arbor, 1954) emphasizes the period before the Meiji Restoration (1867);<sup>4</sup> Robert E. Ward, A Guide to Japanese Reference and Research Materials in the Field of Political Science (Ann Arbor, 1950) includes a list of bibliographies on local government, covering mainly the period 1867-1941. Wartime and postwar research is emphasized in Robert E. Ward, "A Survey of Political Science Literature on Japan," this REVIEW, XLVI (1952), 201-213.<sup>5</sup> Fred W. Riggs, "Notes on Literature Available for the Study of Comparative Public Administration," this REVIEW, XLVIII (1954), 515-537, contains a brief section on Japan.

<sup>1</sup> Publications in English or in English and Japanese are cited only by their English title. When a publication appeared only in Japanese, the English translation of the title is given in the text and the Japanese title in a footnote. Japanese personal names are given in the customary Japanese order: i.e., family name first.

<sup>2</sup> No comprehensive study of Japanese local government has been published in any Western language. Kurt Steiner, Local Government in Japan (unpublished thesis, Stanford, 1955) is an introductory survey of its historical, legal, political, and sociological aspects. Cecil C. Brett, The Government of Okayama Prefecture (unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Michigan, 1956) is a valuable case study of local autonomy on the prefectural level.

<sup>3</sup> This work lists the standard bibliographies in English, French, and German.

<sup>4</sup> John W. Hall also wrote "Materials for the Study of Local History in Japan: Pre-Meiji Records," Occasional Papers, no. 3, pp. 1-14 (Ann Arbor, Center of Japanese Studies, University of Michigan, 1952).

<sup>5</sup> The last-named three sources are hereafter cited as Hall, Guide; Ward, Guide; and Ward, "Survey."

The Union of Japanese Societies of Law and Politics publishes annually in English the Japan Science Review: Law and Politics, 1950-. The 1951 and 1952 issues took the form of an annotated bibliography; local self-government is treated primarily under administrative law, but the entries are broader than this heading indicates. A Collection of Opinions on the Reform of the Local Government System, published by the National Association of City Mayors, contains synopses of articles which appeared in 1951 and 1952, when the Occupation reforms were first subjected to intensive reconsideration.<sup>6</sup> Bibliographies of current publications appear, without annotations, as appendices to various periodicals.

2. Periodicals: One of the best of the Japanese periodicals, dealing specifically with local government, is Municipal Problems, published by the Tokyo Institute of Municipal Research.<sup>7</sup> It contains articles of high quality, primarily on problems in public administration. Some issues deal with a single topic: e.g., city planning (February, 1954), housing (March, 1954), or problems of newly-established cities (May, 1956). Each number contains a valuable section on current affairs and a topically arranged list of articles in Japanese and western periodicals. Similar in many ways is the Journal of Municipal Problems, published in Osaka.<sup>8</sup> Self-Government Studies regularly contains articles by officials of the central government, and an appendix summarizing new laws, ordinances, regulations and notifications from the Autonomy Board to the Prefectural governments.<sup>9</sup> A newcomer is the Collection of Essays on Self-Government, published by the Self-Government Research Association.<sup>10</sup> Each issue is devoted to a timely topic: e.g., regionalism (October, 1954) or local administrative commissions (March, 1956), with relevant documents and excerpts from periodicals and newspapers in an appendix. The National Association of City Mayors publishes a monthly journal, City Government, 1952-.<sup>11</sup> Monthly publications under the auspices of the Autonomy Board are Local Self-Government, edited by the Association for the Study of the Local Government System,<sup>12</sup> and Local Government Times, edited by the Local Finance Association.<sup>13</sup> Both

<sup>6</sup> Zenkoku Shichōkai, Chihō Seido Kaikaku ni kansuru Ikenshū (Tokyo, 1952).

<sup>7</sup> The Tokyo Institute of Municipal Research (Tokyo Shisei Chōsakai) was founded in 1922. Municipal Problems (Toshi Mondai) appears monthly.

<sup>8</sup> The Journal of Municipal Problems (Toshi Mondai Kenkyū), 1949-, is published by the Association for the Study of Municipal Problems (Toshi Mondai Kenkyūkai), an organization sponsored by the Osaka Municipal Government. Where a publication shows both a Japanese and an English title—as is the case with the Journal—the English title is used in this bibliography, whether it is an exact translation of the Japanese title or not.

<sup>9</sup> Jichi Kenkyū, 1925—Monthly. The Autonomy Board (Jichi Chō)—until 1952 known as the Local Autonomy Agency (Chihō Jichi Chō)—is the successor to the Local Affairs Bureau of the defunct Home Ministry, but has fewer legal powers than its predecessor.

<sup>10</sup> Jichi Ronshū, May, 1954—Quarterly or Semi-annually. The Self-Government Research Association (Jichi Kenkyūkai) is sponsored by the Osaka Prefectural Government.

<sup>11</sup> Zenkoku Shichōkai, Shisei.

<sup>12</sup> Chihō Jichi Seido Kenkyūkai, Chihō Jichi.

<sup>13</sup> Chihō Zaimukyōkai, Jichi Jihō.

contain articles on current issues. Local Administration, a daily newsletter, primarily for local government officials, is published by the Jiji Press.<sup>14</sup>

Periodicals of wider scope often contain articles on local government. The legal aspects are considered in the law reviews,<sup>15</sup> especially the Public Law Review, published semi-annually by the Japan Public Law Association;<sup>16</sup> other aspects in The Journal of the Association of Political and Social Sciences of Tokyo University,<sup>17</sup> the Annals of the Japanese Political Science Association,<sup>18</sup> the Waseda Journal of Political Science and Economics,<sup>19</sup> and the Sociological Review.<sup>20</sup> Publications in English which occasionally contain articles on local finance are the Kyoto University Economic Review and the Osaka Economic Papers.<sup>21</sup>

3. Yearbooks: Basic data are in the Japan Statistical Yearbook, issued by the Bureau of Statistics in the Prime Minister's Office (in Japanese and English). Statistics are also included in the Local Autonomy Yearbook, of particular value for its account of developments during the year, with the gist of legal amendments and of pertinent directives to local officials.<sup>22</sup> The Municipal Yearbook of Japan is a treasure house of information.<sup>23</sup>

4. Historical Material: The present local government system was built on the system established in the Meiji period. Continuity is apparent on the institutional level and in official attitudes. For historical material, the reader is referred to the above-mentioned Guides by Hall and Ward; many of the entries in Ward's Guide deal with the prewar system.<sup>24</sup> Material in English

<sup>14</sup> Jiji Tsūshinsha, Chihō Gyōsei.

<sup>15</sup> A list of law reviews is in Ward's Guide, pp. 20, 42 ff. See also Hall's Guide, p. 71 f. and Japan Science Review, no. 3, (1952), pp. vii-ix. A new law journal, Jurist (Jurisuto), 1952—, appears twice monthly.

<sup>16</sup> Nihon Kōhō Gakkai, Kōhō Kenkyū, 1949—. The topically arranged surveys of recent contributions to the field of public law are especially useful. The issue of October, 1953 (no. 9), contains a symposium on local government.

<sup>17</sup> Kokka Gakkai, Kokka Gakkai Zasshi, 1887—, monthly.

<sup>18</sup> The Japanese Political Science Association (Nihon Seiji Gakkai), founded in 1948, is a nationwide organization. The Annals (Seiji Gakkai Nempō) reflects recent trends in political science research in Japan.

<sup>19</sup> Waseda Seiji Keizai-gaku Zasshi, 1925—, monthly. A special number which appeared in English in October, 1952, contained articles on the "Development of Local Self-Government in Japan" by Sato Tatsuo and "The Problem of Special Cities in Japan" by Goto Ichiro.

<sup>20</sup> Nihon Shakai Gakkai, Shakai-gaku Hyōron, 1950— Monthly.

<sup>21</sup> Published by the Economics Departments of Kyoto and Osaka University respectively. On local finance, see, e.g., Kambe Masao, "Independence of Local Finance," Kyoto University Economic Review, XXIV (1954), 1-15, and Einoshita Kazuo, "Current Problems of Local Finance in Japan," Osaka Economic Papers, II (1954), 41-52.

<sup>22</sup> The Local Autonomy Yearbook (Chihō Jichi Nenkan) is edited by the Local Autonomy Research Association (Chihō Jichi Kenkyūkai), which consists primarily of members of the Autonomy Board. It is published by the Jiji Press.

<sup>23</sup> Nihon Toshi Nenkan, edited by the Tokyo Institute of Municipal Research and, since 1955 (Vol. 17), published by the National Association of City Mayors.

<sup>24</sup> An outstanding account of the establishment of the Meiji local government system and its subsequent development is History of Fifty Years of Local Self-Government (Jichi is in Walter W. McLaren, "Japanese Government Documents," Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, Vol. 42 (1914).<sup>25</sup> Okuma Shigenobu, Fifty Years of New Japan (New York, 1909) includes an essay on local government by S. Shimizu. There is a chapter on local administration in Harold S. Quigley, Japanese Government and Politics (New York, 1932); Hugh Borton, The Administration and Structure of the Japanese Government (Department of State Publication 2244, Far Eastern Series 8, 1945) shows the development from 1937 to 1945. Oda Yorodzu, Principes de droit administratif du Japon (Paris, 1928) also deals with local administration (pp. 176-223 and passim). A case study, now of historical interest, is Charles A. Beard, The Administration and Politics of Tokyo: A Survey and Opinion (New York, 1923).

5. Legal Material: The text of laws, ordinances, and regulations is published in the Official Gazette. A Supplement to the Official Gazette contains the records of the proceedings of both Houses of the Diet. For the convenience of occupation officials, the Official Gazette and the Supplement for the period from May, 1946, to April, 1952, appeared also in an English edition;<sup>26</sup> various governmental agencies also published English translations of the laws and ordinances regarding their functions. Thus the Prime Minister's Office issued in 1948 a loose-leaf booklet, Laws Concerning Local Autonomy, kept up to date by insertion sheets until 1951. The Local Autonomy Agency and the Local Finance Commission published an English version of the Local Tax Law (with some related laws) in 1950. A number of collections of laws are available in official and private editions:<sup>27</sup> e.g., the privately published Compendium of Local Government Laws.<sup>28</sup>

For the legislative history of the Occupation reform and of subsequent measures, the records of the appropriate Diet committees—especially the Imperial Constitution Amendment Draft Committee and the Local Administration Committee of both Houses—are important. They are published by the Bureau of the House in question.<sup>29</sup> Pertinent court decisions may be found in Gojannen Shi), published by the Tokyo Institute of Municipal Research in 1941. The compiler of this work, Kikegawa Hiroshi, published his later research in a series of articles, "The Process of the Establishment of the Meiji Local Government System" ("Meiji Chihō Seido Seiritsu Katei"), in Municipal Problems, beginning in August, 1953 (Vol. 44, No. 8).

<sup>25</sup> Most books on recent Japanese history refer to the establishment of the Meiji local government system. See, e.g., McLaren's Political History of Japan During the Meiji Era: 1867-1913 (New York, 1916) and Chitoshi Yanaga, Japan Since Perry (New York, 1949).

<sup>26</sup> For detailed information on the Official Gazette (Kampō) and the Supplement to the Official Gazette (Kampō Gōgō), see Ward, Guide, pp. 75 ff, and "Survey," p. 206. From September, 1953, to February, 1954, a private company, the International Public News Agency in Tokyo, published excerpts from the Official Gazette in English under the title, Japan's Official Gazette.

<sup>27</sup> For a description of these collections, see Ward, Guide, p. 68.

<sup>28</sup> Gakuyōshobō, Chihō Jichi Roppō. The collections of laws have the six basic codes as their core and are thus known as Roppō Zensho (Compendium of the Six Codes).

<sup>29</sup> Teikoku Kempō Kaisai An Iinkaiiroku and Chihō Gyōsei Iinkaiiroku.

the Supreme Court Reports<sup>30</sup> and in the Collection of Precedents and Cases Relating to Local Government, published in loose-leaf form by the Autonomy Board.<sup>31</sup>

From time to time special commissions have been established by law to submit proposals for local government reform. The Local Administration Investigation Committee was created in 1949, on the basis of a recommendation of the so-called Shoup Mission.<sup>32</sup> Headed by Kambe Masao, it submitted its Recommendation Concerning Redistribution of Administrative Affairs in 1950.<sup>33</sup> Although the recommendations were shelved, they illuminate a problem of paramount and continuing importance. After the Occupation, the Japanese government began to revise the Occupation-sponsored reforms and a Local System Investigation Council was instituted. Its reports, 1953-, have been implemented in many cases by subsequent legislation.<sup>34</sup>

Prefectures and larger cities publish their by-laws in printed form and the proceedings of their assemblies in printed or mimeographed form. A classified loose-leaf compilation of prefectural by-laws edited by the Autonomy Board is available under the title Collection of Local Government By-Laws.<sup>35</sup> Some prefectures also publish topical compilations of their by-laws and insertion sheets at various intervals. Almost all local entities publish basic data on history, population, schools, budget, etc., under the title Outline of the Government of . . .<sup>36</sup>

6. Secondary Material on the Post-war System: The Occupation gave an official account of its endeavors from 1945 to 1948 in the report of Government Section, SCAP, Political Reorientation of Japan (Washington, Government Printing Office, 1949). The first, narrative volume contains a section on local government (pp. 260-289). The second volume, a collection of documents, includes translations of the various constitution drafts—omitting significantly the original Government Section draft—and of some of the basic laws. All these laws have been amended repeatedly since.

<sup>30</sup> Saikō Saibansho Hanreishū; Gyōsei Jiken Saiban Reishū, both monthly.

<sup>31</sup> Jichi Chō, Gyōseibu, Chihō Jichi Kankei Jitsurei Hanreishū, 1951—.

<sup>32</sup> The Report on Japanese Taxation by the Shoup Mission (4 vols.) was published by SCAP in September, 1949. A supplementary Second Report on Japanese Taxation is available in an edition by the Japan Tax Association. Both are in English and Japanese. The Mission made recommendations on the tax system in general and on local functions and finances in particular. The Autonomy Board publishes a yearly Report on the State of Local Finance (Chihō Zaisei no Jōkyō Hōkoku); also the Autonomy Monthly Report (Jichi Geppō), containing regulations and statistics.

<sup>33</sup> Chihō Gyōsei Chōsa Iin Kaigi, Gyōsei Jimu Saihai-run ni Kansuru Kankoku (Tokyo, 1950).

<sup>34</sup> The Council (Chihō Seido Chōsakai) published its first Report concerning the Reform of the Local Government System (Chihō Seido no Kaikaku ni kansuru Tōshin) in October, 1953. For a critical analysis, see Municipal Problems, Vol. 44, no. 11 (November, 1953).

<sup>35</sup> Jichi Chō, Gyōseika, Chihō Jichi Jōrei Shū, published by the Teikoku Chihō Gyōsei Gakkai (Tokyo, 1951).

<sup>36</sup> Ken (Shi, Chō, Son) Gaiyō, preceded by the name of the local entity.

Books on the Occupation deal with the local government reforms only tangentially.<sup>37</sup> However, American scholars have written articles on aspects of local government. Ralph J. D. Braibanti dealt with "Executive Power in the Japanese Prefectural Government" and with "Neighborhood Associations in Japan and Their Democratic Potentialities."<sup>38</sup> Paul S. Dull, "The Political Structure of a Japanese Village," Far Eastern Quarterly, XIII (1954), 175-190, is a case study that goes beyond the legal institutions. Kurt Steiner discussed "The Japanese Village and Its Government," Far Eastern Quarterly, XV (1956), 185-199; he outlined Occupation and post-Occupation developments in "Local Government in Japan: Reform and Reaction," Far Eastern Survey, XIII (1954), 97-102. Robert E. Ward contributed to our understanding of Japanese political behavior in "The Socio-Political Role of the Buraku (Hamlet) in Japan," this Review, XLV (1951), 1025-1040, and in "Patterns of Stability and Change in Rural Japanese Politics," Occasional Papers, No. 1, pp. 1-6 (1951). He described village government in "Some Observations of Local Autonomy at the Village Level in Present-Day Japan," Far Eastern Quarterly, XII (1953), 183-202. George A. Warp published two critical articles in the National Municipal Review, XLI, XLII: "Americanization in Japan" (October, 1952) and "In Our Image and Likeness" (April, 1953).

Japanese writing on the postwar system has been prolific. An early reform provided for election of the hitherto appointed prefectural governors; in view of present endeavors to return to appointment, Nagahama Masatoshi's brief study on Various Problems Concerning the Public Election of Governors is still timely.<sup>39</sup> Perhaps the best commentary on the present constitution, with a chapter on local government, is the Annotated Constitution of Japan, edited by the Juridical Society of Tokyo University.<sup>40</sup> Very useful discussions of local government are included in all texts on constitutional and administrative law.<sup>41</sup> A monograph on the Constitution and Local Self-Government was pub-

<sup>37</sup> It is impossible to mention all these books here. The Institute of Pacific Relations published Edwin M. Martin, The Allied Occupation of Japan (New York, 1948) and Robert A. Fearey, The Occupation of Japan, Second Phase: 1948-50 (New York, 1950). Harry Emerson Wildes, Typhoon in Tokyo (New York, 1955) is a critical but not always reliable appraisal. Harold S. Quigley and John E. Turner, The New Japan: Government and Politics (Minneapolis, 1956) contains a chapter on local government (pp. 377-406), an excellent introduction to the subject.

<sup>38</sup> Far Eastern Quarterly, IX (1950), 231-244, and VII (1948), 136-164. Braibanti's view on neighborhood associations contrasts with that of John Masland, "Neighborhood Associations in Japan," Far Eastern Survey, XV (1946), 355-358. See also the Tokyo Metropolitan Government's Report on a Survey regarding the Actual Condition of Neighborhood Associations (Chūkai, Jichikai nado Jittai Chōsa Hōkokusho) (Tokyo, 1956).

<sup>39</sup> Nagahama Masatoshi, Chiji Kōen no Shomondai (Tokyo, 1946). His Local Self-Government (Chihō Jichi) is a brief but perceptive study of its development.

<sup>40</sup> Hōgaku Kyōkai, Chūkai Nihonkoku Kempō. The second edition (1954) deals with the constitutional provisions on local government, Vol. 2, pt. 2.

<sup>41</sup> Some post-war texts are cited in Ward, Guide, pp. 71 ff, and "Survey," pp. 207 f. For recent works, see the Japan Science Review.

lished by Yanase Yoshimoto.<sup>43</sup> Sugimura Shozaburo wrote An Outline of the Local Self-Government System.<sup>44</sup> Besides the academicians, some practitioners must be mentioned.<sup>45</sup> Nagano Shiro, Local Autonomy Law Article by Article—Interpretation and Application is a comprehensive commentary.<sup>46</sup>

A number of books deal with the revision of the postwar reforms. Hara Ryonosuke et al., Problematical Points of the Local Government Reform and Royama Masamichi, The Reform of the Local Government System contain excellent expositions of the problems and proposals for their solution.<sup>47</sup> Some fifty authorities contributed to the Collection of Essays on Local Autonomy, published under the auspices of the Autonomy Board by the Local Finance Association.<sup>48</sup> Tsuji Kiyooki, Studies of the Japanese Bureaucracy, deals with the present revisionist trend in a very suggestive chapter, "Natural Reaction and Political Reaction."<sup>49</sup>

Space prohibits discussion of the literature on more specific topics. But the voluminous work of Fujita Takeo must be mentioned, because his special field—local finance—is of fundamental importance and because he shows effectively its connection with the issue of centralization.<sup>50</sup>

7. Field Surveys, Community Studies, and Public Opinion Polls: In a country which comparatively recently adopted institutions developed in a different cultural context, divergences between law and actuality are particularly significant. Thus sociological material is of special interest. Fortunately, American and Japanese scholars have become increasingly interested in community studies. Richard K. Beardsley's thoughtful article "Community Studies in Japan," Far Eastern Quarterly, XIV (1954), 37–55, covers the work done by both up to now.<sup>51</sup> Specifically focused on the political behavior of the Japanese peasantry is Royama Masamichi, Transformation of Self-Government

<sup>43</sup> Yanase Yoshimoto, Kempō to Chihō Jichi (Tokyo, 1954). The new constitutional provisions on local government are also widely discussed in periodicals. Yanase Yoshimoto, Sugimura Shozaburo, Tanaka Jiro, Ukai Nobushige, Hara Ryonosuke, Kaino Michitaka, and others have contributed widely divergent views.

<sup>44</sup> Sugimura Shozaburo, Chihō Jichisei Kōyō (Tokyo, 1951).

<sup>45</sup> See, e.g., Suzuki Shunichi, Local Self-Government System (Chihō Jichi Seido) and Takatsuji Masami, The Standard of Local Administrative Affairs (Chihō Gyōsei Jimu Kihon), both published in Tokyo, 1951. Mr. Suzuki is Vice-Chief of the Autonomy Board.

<sup>46</sup> Nagano Shiro, Chikujō Chihō Jichi Hō-Kaishaku to sono Unyō (Tokyo, 1953).

<sup>47</sup> Hara Ryonosuke et al., Chihō Seido Kaikaku no Mondaiten, and Royama Masamichi, Chihō Seido no Kaikaku, both published in Tokyo, 1953. A recent book by Tanaka Jiro also has the title Chihō Seido Kaikaku no Mondaiten (Tokyo, 1956).

<sup>48</sup> Chihō Zaimukyōkai, Chihō Jichi Rombunshū (Tokyo, 1954). The occasion for this publication was the first anniversary of the Law for the Promotion of Amalgamations of Towns and Villages, a major development in Japanese local government.

<sup>49</sup> Tsuji Kiyooki, Nippon Kanryōsei no Kenkyū (Tokyo, 1953).

<sup>50</sup> See, e.g., Fujita Takeo, An Essay on Japanese Local Finance (Nihon Chihō Zaisei Ron) (Tokyo, 1943) and History of the Development of Japanese Local Finance (Nihon Chihō Zaisei Hattatsu Shi) (Tokyo, 2nd ed., 1951).

<sup>51</sup> Almost all studies deal with rural communities. In the field of urban sociology, see the writings of Isomura Eiichi, especially his Urban Sociology (Toshi Shakaigaku) (Tokyo, 1953).

in Agricultural Villages.<sup>51</sup> Surveys of attitudes toward local self-government have been published by the National Public Opinion Institute and by various local entities.<sup>52</sup> Particularly useful are investigations of the actual operation of newly created or reformed institutions, such as that of the Institute of Social Sciences of Tokyo University, The Administrative Commission: Its Theory, History, and Actuality,<sup>53</sup> and the joint publication of the National Association of Chairmen of City Assemblies and the Osaka Government Research Institute on An Investigation of the Actual Conditions of Local Assemblies.<sup>54</sup> Studies of this type depart from the traditional legal-historical approach and promise new insights into Japanese government and politics on both the local and national level.

<sup>51</sup> Royama Masamichi, Nōson Jichi no Hembō (Tokyo, 1948). There are notes on village government and politics in Andrew J. Grad, Land and Peasant in Japan (mimeogr., New York, 1952).

<sup>52</sup> See, e.g., Kokuritsu Seron Chōsajo, Chihō Jichi ni kansuru Seron Chōsa (1951) and Chihō Jichi ni tsuite no Seron Chōsa (1952); Tokyo-To, Sōmukyoku, Tokyo Tosei ni tsuite (1954); and Toshi Mondai Kenkyū, (Bessatsu), Osaka-shi ni okeru Toshi Gyōsei ni kansuru Seron Chōsa (March, 1954).

<sup>53</sup> Tokyo Daigaku, Shakai Kagaku Kenkyūjo, Gyōsei Iinkai: Riron, Rekishi, Jittai (Tokyo, 1951).

<sup>54</sup> Zenkoku Shi Gikai Gichōkai, Osaka Shisei Kenkyūjo, Chihō Gikai no Jittai Chōsa (Osaka, 1954).

BOOK REVIEWS

A Preface to Democratic Theory. BY ROBERT A. DAHL. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1956. Pp. 155. $3.00.)

Although modern political scholarship has paid unceasing attention to the theory and operation of democratic government, a number of questions essential to its understanding and performance remain as unsettled as ever. Where, for example, ought the power of decision to lie amid the conflicting demands of minorities and majorities? Under what conditions could a majority claim the right to enforce policies intensely distasteful to a legitimate minority? What restraints are needed if majorities, minorities, or those who govern in their name, are to be prevented from gross usurpations of power—indeed, from tyranny itself? What are the logical and empirical preconditions for the operation of a viable democracy?

These are the kinds of questions to which Professor Dahl addresses himself in this remarkably compact and tightly reasoned new book on democratic theory, given originally in lecture form for the Walgreen Foundation. In his approach he skillfully blends into a single admirable product the traditional methods of textual examination, the techniques of systematic or "formal" analysis (including symbolic demonstrations of key logical relations), and, finally, a hard-headed appraisal of the empirical realities. Political theory is approached not merely as an a priori enterprise, without obligation to the facts of life, but as a union of normative and empirical considerations in which the latter serve to qualify the former. The method might be described as systematic model-building, in which the model is assessed, reshaped, and made "operational" through reference to the empirical realities. The result is a work of considerable presence and vitality, sophisticated about method to a degree that most political scientists might well strive to emulate.

If Professor Dahl had done nothing more than demonstrate the value of his approach, pointing political theory to a possible new stage in its development, we should have reason enough to be grateful. But the substantive aspects of his contribution are as fresh and as compelling as the methods he has employed. He directs his attention mainly to three theoretical models (among the several which, he points out, could have been chosen) and subjects each of them to an intensive systematic and descriptive analysis. The first, Madisonian democracy, represents an effort "to bring off a compromise between the power of majorities and the power of minorities, between the political equality of all adult citizens on the one side and the desire to limit their sovereignty on the other." This has been the theory most preferred by Americans, for its emphasis on constitutional checks designed to disperse authority has seemed to them the surest defense against tyranny. Dahl finds the theory deficient both in the descriptive status of some of its assumptions and in the logic by which it is led to its conclusions. The Madisonian theory, he says, fails to demonstrate that tyranny will ensue if power is concentrated; nor has it shown that frequent elections

Chapter IX finds that intra-state politics has failed to keep pace with social demands, has thrown up obstacles to effective popular government, has experienced serious organizational deterioration, and has prompted the transfer of major political demands to Washington. Shortcomings of partisan politics are discerned especially in the quality of candidates developed for state-wide offices and in the failure to maintain adequate opposition parties. While the author is impressed by the power of "blind processes" in shaping political forms and habits (although pages 218 and 280 should be read together on this point), he suggests that state legislatures are perhaps the most strategic points for political reform.

This book is a happy wedding of methodology and purpose. A properly simple statistical apparatus guided by a bold and prolific imagination showers forth analyses which will compel both admiration and (one hopes) emulation. And the whole enterprise is illuminated by the pertinency and urgency of its central political questions, which emerge from the author's common-sense concern for the public welfare.

CHARLES M. HARDIN.

The University of Chicago.

Revolt of the Moderates. BY SAMUEL LUBELL. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1956. Pp. ix, 296. $2.75.)

This intensely written book seeks to describe and explain the mood of the American public as it both faces and turns away from the political problems of the 1950's. Such an ambitious project is bound to be contentious in its methods and findings. But one gets the general impression of a large task quite well performed—better, in considerable measure, than the author's Future of American Politics of four years ago.

Lubell's main thesis appears to be that the mood of the public is one of moderation: don't try too many things and don't try them very hard. He seems to fear that this mood is accompanied by an escapism which denies that there are any real problems to be solved or that, if there are problems, they need be met with more than slogans, sanctimonious righteousness, and a benign indifference. He seems to fear that in the busy process of getting and spending we will indeed lay waste our powers. Yet he shows faith both in the political means for solving problems that are available under our constitutional system and in the ultimate ability of the public itself to face them constitutionally.

The difficulty lies in assessing his data as they bear on this thesis. Lubell is now almost unique among investigators of public opinion in relying on his own rather than group resources for research. He reports that he talked with some 3,500 families during the 1952 campaign. Assuming that he interviewed during a ten-hour day, seven days a week for twenty-six weeks, he was able to spend an average of roughly a half-hour per family. This is fast work.

A more serious methodological problem lies in his prime reliance on deliberately non-random interviewing, because he believes in "concentrating one's interviewing in definable voting areas." Among his definable areas are some of Volume I is fulfilled in later editions, the appearance this year of America Votes will be viewed half a century hence as one of the memorable milestones in the study of American government.

ALEXANDER HEARD.

University of North Carolina.

American State Politics: An Introduction. BY V. O. KEY, JR. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. 1956. Pp. vii, 289, ix. $4.50.)

This book, save for comparative reference, explores politics within the states other than those so masterfully examined in the author's Southern Politics (1949). Much focus is upon institutions and procedures, with Chapter II illuminating the considerable autonomy of individual state politics and Chapter III showing how partisan government is frustrated by the ubiquitous separation of powers, reinforced by the gerrymander (silent or otherwise). The next four chapters tentatively explain the origins and effects of primary elections. Efforts to popularize control of gubernatorial nominations in one-party states, especially in the South, prompted early adoption of primary laws, which were also manifestations nearly everywhere of popular revulsion against bossism and corruption. More recently, as a compelling analysis shows, states wherein major parties are fairly evenly balanced have witnessed the further development of pre-primary conventions or similar nominating conferences (Chapter IV). That primaries typically activate only small percentages of the eligible voters is indicated in Chapter V, which suggests how this fact, plus the appeals of symbolic names or of glittering personalities, can nominate "the most improbable sorts of characters." Further vindicating its subtitle, "The Illusion of Popular Rule," this chapter shows how power tends to gravitate disproportionately to those intra-state areas wherein one or the other party enjoys great preponderance.

Legislative nominations over recent decades are then examined in a number of states; some consequences of the fact that traditionally major party nominations are often tantamount to election are brought out and, more tentatively than the title of Chapter VI implies, the tendency toward atrophy of the organizations of distinctly minority parties is suggested. Chapter VII turns from the primaries to the "Lottery of the Long Ballot."

Chapter VIII shifts from institutions to the group bases of partisan organizations—historical allegiances, sectional rivalries, metropolitan-nonmetropolitan cleavages, and ethnic-racial-religious differences. In an analysis which is of considerable significance for the current theory of political groups, Key argues that "as partisan groupings develop they come to have an existence quite independent of the affiliations of their members with other social groups" (p. 241). This leads, first, to the question whether the hard core of partisan support is similarly composed on the state and national level and, ultimately, to a thoughtful inquiry into the characteristics of partisan leadership, especially as these characteristics differ between the parties, by geographical sections, and over time.

those students able to stand the tedium and cost of an extensive exercise in compilation.

These primitive conditions have spurred political scientists for more than a decade to an active campaign for some sort of system to preserve and publish American electoral statistics. Numerous individuals, committees, and organizations have invested countless hours (and some very countable dollars) in the task. The end result of it all is Volume I of Richard M. Scammon's America Votes—A Handbook of Contemporary American Election Statistics.

The fact that there is a volume at all is more important than what is in the present one, though what is in the present volume is impressive. American politics being state politics, the data are arranged by states. Included are the county-by-county votes for the most recent general elections for president, governor, and the two sitting United States senators, along with the totals for postwar elections of governor and United States representative. The plurality, and the percentage of total vote and of major party vote, have been computed in each instance, and maps are presented showing the political boundaries within each state and within cities of over 500,000 population. Returns by wards or assembly districts are reported for the cities. Additional profile materials about each state are provided, as well as detailed explanatory notes and the 1950 population for each electoral unit. The volume is a superb technical achievement in its contents and format, and those responsible have rendered a major service to all students of public affairs both in and out of the academic world.

It is announced that future volumes will be modified and expanded in response to the expressed needs of those who hope to use them. As soon as possible the returns of direct primaries should be added and returns for Congressional elections should be given by county. Less obvious decisions must be made with respect to lesser state and local government offices, referenda, contests for party office when filled by popular ballot, and limited types of social and economic data useful in electoral analysis. There will be abundant opportunities to improve the usefulness of later editions and it seems assured that Mr. Scammon and his associates will let none that are feasible go by default.

The appearance of America Votes has special significance for the members of the American Political Science Association. Their organization, through a special committee and as a result of much labor by its Washington staff and other members, has succeeded in filling a crying professional need where previous public and private efforts had proved insufficient. The Association has again demonstrated its capacity to organize the energies of scholars for appropriate action. And through the Governmental Affairs Institute, which has been given the task of compiling and editing, the Association has again demonstrated its capacity to bring to successful fruition a complicated, nationwide enterprise which no other organization seemed willing or able to undertake.

America Votes is financed by a grant from the Edgar Stern Family Fund. This is another in the long line of influential contributions made by that foundation to the development of the political science profession. If the promise language, and while there is always a danger of becoming a prisoner or a crusader for a system, it is questionable whether a less systematic approach would have come to grips, as Apter's study has done, with crucial elements in the traditional authority structures which tend either to facilitate or to retard the development of a modern secular political system. It is difficult to see how one can determine the degree of "detrribalization" or "breakdown of traditional authority," to use the clichés characteristic of most other writings on African affairs, without systematic comparison of the functions performed by a traditional authority system at different points in a time series. It is significant that Apter's conclusions and forecasts of probable future developments have been, in the main, sustained or, at least, not proved wrong, by the many dramatic events which have occurred since his study was completed. Given the volatile character of contemporary Gold Coast politics this fact alone attests to the shrewdness of the author's insight and analysis.

JAMES S. COLEMAN.

University of California (Los Angeles).

America Votes—A Handbook of Contemporary American Election Statistics.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY RICHARD M. SCAMMON. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1956. Pp. 422. $12.50.)

On July 14, 1956, Mel Parnell of the Boston Red Sox pitched himself to fame with a no-hit, 4-0 triumph over the Chicago White Sox. The news stories immediately reported the details of Parnell's up-and-down baseball career (he had lost eight consecutive games to the White Sox since last beating them on May 5, 1953) along with reflections on comparable no-hit feats. The last Red Sox to turn the trick, it seemed, was Howard Ehmke in 1923; the last Red Sox lefthander to do it (Parnell is one) was Dutch Leonard in 1916; the last pitcher to do it in Fenway Park (the scene of Parnell's glory) was Ernie Shore in 1917. Abundant other particulars were available, including the score, which obligingly in all cases was also 4-0.

The followers of the sports pages take all this for granted, accustomed as we in America have become to the precise recording of athletic events. Men of business see nothing extraordinary in it either, depending as they do on the infinite variety of production, trade, and financial information put at their finger tips daily by public and private agencies. The student of American politics can react in only one way: with envy.

No one who has not himself tried to study comprehensively American nominations and elections can quite grasp the inadequacy of our electoral statistics. For more than a year in one state the official tabulation of a recent presidential election disappeared, with no copies extant. In one of the largest metropolitan areas officials successively provided a professor with four conflicting sets of ward returns, the second finally being tapped as the best one. In at least two other states the county results of important elections formerly were not available for distribution, even in mimeographed form. In many places the inaccessibility of returns for past elections has confined the study of voting behavior to

This study should command the attention of persons falling roughly into two groups. One group would include those persons having a special interest in African affairs, such as colonial administrators, educated Africans, and the growing number of European and American scholars and officials, and informed citizens, concerned with African political developments. The second group would include those social scientists, including professional Africanists, having a special intellectual interest in methodology and social theory. Many of those in the first group—the likely “general readers” of this book—will find certain parts rather difficult to read. Indeed, there are some concepts and passages which will be fully comprehended only by those acquainted with the works and the special language of Max Weber, Talcott Parsons, and Marion J. Levy, Jr. This is unfortunate, not only because the rapid advance of the Gold Coast toward self-government has created a wide demand for a descriptive and interpretative account along more conventional lines, but also because there lies behind the unfamiliar concepts and terminological innovations of the author a depth of insight regarding the really critical issues involved in African developments which should be communicated to and comprehended by as wide an audience as possible.

The second group, those social scientists particularly interested in methodology and social theory, will find this study especially challenging. It is primarily to this group that Apter's study is addressed. Indeed, his theoretical and methodological emphasis partly explains the use of his special vocabulary, which will tend to discourage the general reader. Given the two audiences interested in his study it might have been better in the balance if Apter had written two books or, alternatively, if the present book had been divided into two parts—one, largely descriptive, for the general reader, and the other, mainly theoretical, for the social theorists. His general conceptual and analytical framework is set forth in a tightly-written Appendix and should be studied very carefully before one proceeds to the body of the work.

The study falls squarely in the center of the Great Debate among social theorists regarding the validity and utility of structural-functional requisite analysis. However, unlike certain proponents of the structural-functional “school,” he has undertaken to subject his methodological framework and analytical categories to the test of a concrete field situation. He has approached this task pragmatically, insisting that the crux of such a test is “whether or not, at the end, our understanding of complex socio-political phenomena has been improved.” Certainly, some of the more general criticisms of the structural-functional approach (i.e., that it tends to be static and conservative, or that its users are “neo-scholastic” prisoners “filling boxes”) are not valid in regard to the study under review.

There are some members of the profession—those less attracted to schematization and methodological elegance—who might argue that the same results could have been achieved, and perhaps expressed in far more readable prose, without the elaborate conceptual and analytical apparatus employed in this study. While many points in the analysis might have been expressed in simpler

African territory by an American political scientist. It is also the first systematic case study of what the author rightly states to be one of the crucial issues of our time: namely, "can a political system such as ours in the West be satisfactorily adjusted to the needs of aspiring peoples in underdeveloped areas in Africa?" In terms of subject matter, it is a timely, significant, and important book; in terms of methodology, it is a work which will provoke considerable debate.

The central focus of Apter's study is what he calls "political institutional transfer" as it has taken place in the Gold Coast, the most politically advanced of all tropical African territories. By such transfer he does not mean simply the introduction of political structures of the British parliamentary system, but the more fundamental processes of bringing about changes in public attitudes and political behavior. His central proposition is that the charismatic authority of Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah, by satisfying the "functional requisites" of traditional leadership among the Ashanti peoples, has been an effective vehicle for endowing the new central parliamentary institutions with a legitimacy recognized by a substantial body of Gold Coast public opinion.

There are certain questions which might be raised regarding this main thesis. One of these would be the extent to which the functions attributed to the Akan chiefs of Ashanti are typical, exhaustive, or really "requisite." Again, assuming that these functions are at least characteristic of the Akan systems as found in Ashanti, to what extent has Nkrumah's charismatic authority effectively replaced the functions of traditional authorities in the political systems of other groups in the Gold Coast from which Nkrumah received very considerable support? The Ewe, for example, are prominent in Nkrumah's entourage, but the pattern of traditional authority among the Ewe is quite different from that of the Ashanti. Finally, there may be much validity in the concept of "charisma" as applied to the peculiar role of Nkrumah vis-à-vis at least certain groups in the Gold Coast, but is charisma a necessary ingredient for effective "political institutional transfer"? Developments in Western and Northern Nigeria and in Sierra Leone suggest other possible patterns. These are examples of the types of questions which might be raised by this very suggestive pioneering study.

In addition to his admirable effort to go beyond the formal legal approach to political developments and to probe deeply into the complexities of social change in the Gold Coast, Apter's study has many other features to commend it. His descriptions are accurate and clearly based upon a keen grasp of the essentials of Gold Coast history, tribal cultures, and contemporary politics. His interpretations are balanced and objective; indeed, the study in general is rigorously neutral as regards the relative virtues of British administration and the Gold Coast movement for national "Freedom." He recognizes, indeed he emphasizes and demonstrates, that in the study of contemporary African politics one cannot find "purely political" elements, and that one is heavily dependent upon the insights and techniques of the anthropologist. His study illuminates in striking fashion the role and significance of traditional elements in African political development.

tive case for a working hypothesis to this effect. In any case, the feudal relationship "forced subordinates to learn and carry out their political functions, and taught superiors the more difficult lesson that their survival and fortune depended on their discharging their own political duty to their subordinates. The personal feudal relationship may be regarded, in fact, as one of the ultimate, completely simple elements with which a political system can be put together" (p. 214). It is a relationship modeled upon the loyalty and devotion of the gang to its leader, suggesting intriguing parallels with the structure of personal relations among the "elite" in the Fascist totalitarian movements.

There seems to be some difference of opinion between the authors on the range and significance of feudalism. Derk Bodde suggests that perhaps the authors are a bit too emphatic in their stress on the governmental side of feudalism. Perhaps a common feature of feudalism is "binding the peasant so closely to the particular land he cultivates as to make him little better than the serf of his landlord proprietor" (p. 91). This view of feudalism is certainly widespread. It would be tempting to explore further the ideas on religion in relation to feudalism and the general notions on cultural growth and change which Coulborn sketches in his concluding "Comparative Study." From the viewpoint of the student of empirical history and government these speculations in the manner of Toynbee are, properly speaking, philosophy of history. One notes certain curious omissions, both in the notes and in the, on the whole, excellent bibliography.

This brief sketch of necessity does less than justice to the extraordinary richness of both material and analysis which Feudalism contains. We also have omitted certain minor criticisms which suggest themselves: e.g., concerning the confusion between German and Germanic, the tortured interpretation of the subjects of post-medieval German states as "nations," the confused and undefined use of such terms as "ideology," and the proposition that "feudal politics stood outside the sphere of religion" (p. 370). Generally speaking, one misses a bit the touch of comparative government and political theory. More serious perhaps is the complete absence of any consideration of the basic work of Otto von Gierke (and of Olivier-Martin) whose elaboration of the dichotomy of Herrschaft and Genossenschaft could have contributed basic insights. But after all such critical remarks are made and elaborated, the fact remains that Feudalism is a significant achievement, and one which students of comparative government can ill afford to neglect. No one hereafter can be excused if he uses the term "feudalism" in the vague and journalistic way in which it has been used until recently by many authors even as learned and acute as Thorstein Veblen. In this sense, the volume is undoubtedly a landmark in the development of comparative and theoretical work in history and government.

CARL J. FRIEDRICH.

Harvard University.

The Gold Coast in Transition. BY DAVID APTER. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1955. Pp. xiii, 355. $5.00.)

This is the first book-length study of postwar political developments in an history." Coulborn himself engages, in his concluding section, in some general speculations about the possibility that feudalism may have been an important factor in the early history of civilization, but he himself stresses that all this is purely hypothetical and so of no great interest to the empirical student of society and government.

And yet, in spite of these predominantly negative conclusions, an extremely interesting and valuable study has resulted. There can be little doubt that what one has been able to put together here as an empirical theory of feudalism and its place in history is of decisive importance to any student of comparative government who recognizes the importance of historical perspective in this field. In order to give a brief hint of the book's value, it is necessary to quote the author's general concept of feudalism in terms of static and dynamic elements. "The static criteria include those of vassal-lord relationships . . . ; a personalized government which is most effective on the local level . . . ; heredity of functions; a system of landholding consisting of fiefs given in return for service; regularization of the rights of the lord over the peasant; existence of private armies; and a code of honor in which military obligations are stressed. The dynamic criteria include those of an antecedent empire which has disintegrated; the impact of barbarian invasion; the outstripping of economic unity by political unity, leading to waning of central authority and rise of local magnates; monopolization of military techniques by a special group; warfare as a means of building larger political units out of lesser ones; and the existence of a universal religion which makes of the feudal period an "age of faith" (p. 199). Certainly Reischauer's incisive account of feudalism in Japan has no difficulty with this conceptual framework. Unusual in this description is the stress on the antecedent empire and the barbarians. The authors consider the role of the barbarian in the development of feudalism crucial; he is "the key man" (p. 181). For it is the barbarian leader of a war band, of a comitatus, who reconstitutes a tottering empire by setting up the feudal relationship in what the authors call a proto-feudal regime. "Proto-feudal and feudal Europe expanded to take in great numbers of new barbarians, as proto-feudal and feudal Japan did, because it is the nature of such systems to expand." The conclusion is drawn that barbarians can be involved in the rise of feudalism at two different, though overlapping, times: namely, in the early days of the disintegration of the old state, and later again, when new barbarians are drawn into the society as it expands. "This is as true of Europe as it is of Japan . . ." (p. 210).

The recognition of the crucial role of the barbarian in the establishment of feudalism leads to the conclusion that feudalism is essentially a process whereby a disintegrating society is rejuvenated and revived—enters as it were a new life cycle. Amidst the chaos and the ever-present threat of disaster the "strong elemental fief" is constructed by strong and ruthless military leaders as a haven of peace and quiet amidst the tossing seas. Coulborn and his associates are not prepared to claim that feudalism has, besides this "reconstituting" role, also a decisive role to play in the constituting of civilized societies, although in his brilliant concluding analysis Coulborn makes out a good specula-cate the sense of mastery which the book conveys, the lucidity and skill with which the argument is developed, and the extraordinary felicity of the prose. Much less can a brief review do justice to the numerous fresh and compelling insights which are met at every stage. Certain aspects of the work have not even been touched upon here, such as the very exciting analysis of preference intensity and its measurement—one of the most original contributions in the book.

Some readers will doubtless find that they do not share all the views that are central to the argument. For example, Madisonian theory seems to me less vulnerable, on either logical or empirical grounds, than it does to the author. Then, too, I would assign greater importance to the role of constitutional restraints as checks against political aggrandizement and tyranny, for "social restraints" may not always be adequate: some attacks on democracy may be successfully met only by recourse to constitutional devices. More important, the argument overlooks the degree to which formal restraints help to define and maintain the social norms which eventually become "internalized." No less than the family or any other social institution, the legal arrangements serve to shape the citizen conscience.

Other disagreements could be stated, but none is sufficient to detract significantly from the importance of the book. It is a unique and unusually intelligent contribution to the literature of political science in general, and, more specifically, to a branch of the field which seems badly in need of new ways of thinking about its oldest and most traditional problems.

HERBERT McCLOSKEY.

Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences.

Feudalism in History. EDITED BY RUSHTON COULBORN. WITH CONTRIBUTIONS BY JOSEPH R. STRAYER, EDWIN O. REISCHAUER, DERK BODDE, BURR C. BRUNDAGE, RUSHTON COULBORN, WILLIAM F. EDGERTON, DANIEL THORNER, ERNST H. KANTOROWICZ, AND MARC SZEFTTEL. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1956. Pp. xiv, 438. $8.50.)

The present volume is the outgrowth of a conference held at Princeton, October 31–November 1, 1950. Its aim is described as being that of "testing the extent of repetition in history." Whether feudalism was the best phenomenon for such a test may be doubted; in terms of his own definition, the main author and editor, Professor Rushton Coulborn, finds only two bona fide feudalisms in history: namely, that of Western Europe (discussed by Joseph R. Strayer) and that of Japan (E. O. Reischauer). His collaborators also deal with "feudalism" in China (Derk Bodde), in Ancient Mesopotamia and Iran (Burr C. Brundage), in Ancient Egypt (William F. Edgerton), in India (Daniel Thorner), in Byzantium (Ernst H. Kantorowicz), and in Russia (Marc Szeftel), but the conclusion appears to be that in none of these can feudalism be definitely shown to have occurred. In spite of this, but for no very clear reason, Coulborn remains convinced that feudalism is "a peculiarly useful example" of uniformities in history and that feudalism is "obviously one of the major uniformities in are by themselves insufficient to prevent the destruction of the republic. The theory so exaggerates the importance of formal constitutional checks that it neglects to give scope to the numerous informal social restraints to be found in every pluralistic society. The safety of democracy, Dahl argues, must rest in the successful internalizing of restraints, in the conscience and predispositions of society's members, not in a complicated network of external checks such as judicial review, staggered terms of office, or the presidential veto.

The second model examined is populistic democracy, which identifies democracy with political equality, popular sovereignty, and, most important, the unrestrained power of majorities. This theory, which attempts to provide a procedural rule for the perfect attainment of equality and popular sovereignty, is in reality no more than an "exercise in axiomatics," essentially lacking in empirical relevance. It is a theory plagued by numerous difficulties: e.g., it assumes that only one alternative will be preferred by a majority at any given time when in fact several alternatives may be equally preferred; it ignores the problem of intensity and would permit a small majority with weak preferences to override the desires of a large minority with strong preferences; it postulates only two goals to be maximized while others of equal importance are discounted or sacrificed; it ignores the fact that in reality a minority rules so that in practice unlimited power would be bestowed upon a few; etc.

The third model, polyarchal democracy, combines elements from the two preceding theories but differs from them in concentrating not on the goals to be maximized but on the common properties exhibited by democratic organizations, in order that the conditions for the existence of democracy may be meaningfully elaborated. In addition to such prerequisites as free voting, equal weighting of votes, the opportunity to insert new preferences into the set of alternatives being offered the electorate, and possession by each individual of identical information about the alternatives, the polyarchal theory places emphasis on a high rate of political activity and on social training in the norms of the system so as to maximize consensus about them. Polyarchy stresses the social rather than the constitutional prerequisites for a democratic order.

The final sections of the book assess American politics in the light of the conditions for democracy previously set forth. The American system is perceived as a hybrid, and a very successful one. Like a polyarchy, which it approximates in certain respects, it permits "all active and legitimate groups in the population [to] make themselves heard at some crucial stage in the process of decision." In this "markedly decentralized system" in which decisions are made by "endless bargaining," there is perhaps less order than in other systems, but it is nevertheless not so defective as its critics make out. It possesses great virtue, furthermore, in mediating the conflicting interests of a highly diverse population, permitting minorities of almost every description to enter into the public debate and influence the outcome. Partly for this reason it reinforces agreement and encourages moderation in a highly complex and rapidly evolving society.

The inadequacy of the foregoing summary can be appreciated only if the reader turns to the volume itself. No brief résumé can satisfactorily communi-noteworthy for ethnic or economic uniqueness and some that are supposedly typical microcosms of regions, for example in Southern locales of race or class tension. This sampling method has the advantages that come with the immediacy of personal contact with vivid individuals. It has the disadvantage of making the selection process depend on the investigator's notions of where vivid, characteristic individuals are to be found. This in turn depends on the general hypotheses or hunches with which the investigator commences his research. He will not go to farm communities, towns, or city precincts where he does not expect to find people who will tell him whether his hypotheses are right or wrong.

The saving grace of this book is that Lubell has checked his own observations against election data—precinct by precinct and county by county—and against the work of others like the Berelson group at Columbia and the Campbell group at Michigan. Although he shows occasional error, the mistakes are small, and he does not do violence to major findings of other research. Some of his statements are banal, as when he reports that extremists in Congress come from the safe districts of both parties or that gerrymandering distorts legislative representation in favor of the party that did the redistricting. Others of his statements have a freshness that keeps one reading, as when he says that McCarthyism was a combined consequence of ethnic segregation among Germans (and Irish) and of frustration over the Korean war.

The difficulty lies in the fact that he is incapable of quantifying his findings in a way that tells how intense among how many different people is the mood of moderation—and therefore whether it is characteristic of our time or of the moment. He cannot say whether a hypothetical John Biederbecker in Wisconsin voted for McCarthy primarily because McCarthy was in 1952 a teammate of Eisenhower or because John Biederbecker voted as his father Johann told him or because John had a son in Korea. In consequence we have no way of assessing the validity of Lubell's basic thesis.

But this difficulty is not confined to Lubell. Where he is bold and for lack of evidence fails to appraise reliably the political animal, many researchers who are more precise in their techniques timidly probe ears, eyes, and toenails, ignoring the fact that they are in contact with a whole animal. They don't even have hypotheses worth testing. Research in political behavior has now progressed from infancy to adolescence. In studying the vast area of voting returns, Lubell has made some contribution. He has been thinking anew and researching anew in a more than elementary effort to probe areas which some sanctimonious and self-righteous political scientists hesitate to examine for fear they lack the instruments and the definitive edition of a political Gray's Anatomy. They do lack instruments and definitive anatomical knowledge. But the body politic is still there and in need of more than topical examination. Lubell has shown at least that scientific progress can be made before the science of public opinion is safely mature.

JAMES C. DAVIES.

California Institute of Technology.

The Conservative Party of Canada, 1920-1949. By JOHN R. WILLIAMS. (Durham: Duke University Press. 1956. Pp. x, 242. $6.00.)

Trail-blazing through the relatively uncharted terrain of the Canadian party system is in some danger of becoming a monopoly of American political scientists. The latest example of this trend is the first systematic analysis of either of Canada's two major political parties. The Conservatives, long since deposed from their pre-eminence after Confederation and in office only seven of the past thirty-five years, still constitute the vital core of opposition to the Liberal ascendancy at Ottawa. In probing for the causes of this protracted debility, John R. Williams has consolidated earlier findings and assembled a considerable quantity of new data on the second-ranking contender in Canada's federal politics. To students of Commonwealth affairs this will be a welcome addition to a meager body of literature.

The concentration upon structure, organization, and functions characteristic of the Mackenzie or earlier Duverger type of party study prevails again here. Utilizing the limited written sources available, interviews, and personal observation, Williams has constructed a fairly conventional but well-documented and objective account of the inner workings of this party. Since Canadians have grafted North American features onto British political institutions, there is valuable material here for those concerned with comparative politics. Deserving of particular mention are a critical appraisal of the national convention (consciously borrowed from the United States and overworked in the frenetic quest for a victorious leader), a detailed and realistic description of the national organization, and original findings on the parliamentary group and caucus. The chapters dealing with party leadership and finances and the pattern of federal elections, while perhaps not of the same interest or caliber, bring together information and statistics which have been either widely dispersed or unavailable.

There are, nevertheless, two respects in which the author has so narrowed his scope as to detract from the potential value of his study. For one thing, he has not satisfactorily situated the Conservative party in the larger context of the party system. Certain contrasts and similarities with the Liberal party are delineated, but the Commonwealth Cooperative Federation and Social Credit, whose emergence has had far-reaching effects upon the Conservative position in Western Canada, receive scant mention. Social Credit, in particular, having jettisoned its radical monetary doctrines and become the champion of orthodoxy in many spheres, has all but displaced the Conservatives in Alberta and threatens to repeat the process in British Columbia. A concluding chapter on party policies which forgoes reference to positions adopted by Conservatism's rivals is also at best artificially abstract.

It is, however, the author's attribution of the long eclipse of the Conservative party to essentially mechanical or subsidiary causes which should arouse most scepticism. Williams seems to regard the following as the principal reasons for the long spell of Conservative adversity: (a) the quality of leadership since 1920 (notably that of R. B. Bennett, a domineering prime minister who divided his followers by veering off on a "New Deal" tangent on the eve of the 1935 election); (b) the convention system, which has bred disharmony and encouraged the selection of men unsuited to lead the parliamentary group in opposition; (c) the neglect of party organization, especially at the local level where "federal elections are won and lost in Canada"; (d) the absence of articulate and accepted Conservative principles. These and other frailties he cites have constituted unquestionable handicaps; the Conservative top brass also appears to consider them the most basic shortcomings. Yet by themselves they hardly account for the post-1935 stabilization of the Conservative share of the popular vote at 27-31 per cent. The proposition that in the same period the electoral fortunes of the Liberals and the two minor parties fluctuated with changes in economic conditions has validity but comes no closer to the root causes of the Conservative impasse.

To this reviewer a whole dimension of politics—namely, the conception of political parties as reflections of the societies which they serve—is largely missing from this analysis. An introductory chapter shows that Williams is by no means oblivious to such social realities or the historical events which gave birth to them. Thus he maintains that by the conscription election of 1917 "the Conservatives completely identified themselves as the party of English-speaking, Protestant Canadians loyal to the British Empire," who were simultaneously "feared by many farmers and workers as the party of big business." Yet the less obvious paths by which the Conservatives (in the electorate as well as in Parliament, it might be added) became "a more homogeneous group in matters of religion and language than are the Liberals" and a party dominated by its Ontario contingent, symbolic to much of the rest of the country of the commercial-financial hegemony of "Tory Toronto," are barely explored. There is both recognition and partial explanation of the massive rejection of the Conservative party by French Canadians, without sufficient emphasis to indicate that this has been the single most influential factor in determining this century's federal elections. In a similar vein, only passing attention is paid to the disruptive impact of rapid industrialization on many regions, to the transformation of agriculture, or to the European immigrants who, since 1900, have gradually diluted the heavily British character of the English-speaking group and have tended to shun Conservative candidates at the polls.

Since questions of structure, leadership, and finances are germane to the study of political parties, Williams has added materially to our knowledge of these aspects of one of Canada's major political forces. His interpretation of that party's low standing rests, however, upon secondary or contributory causes which have been far less decisive than the self-induced vice of political inbreeding in a society grown steadily more diversified.

WALTER O. FILLEY.

Wesleyan University.

The Changing World of Soviet Russia: An Analysis of Soviet Internal and External Policies. BY DAVID J. DALLIN. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1956. Pp. ix, 422. $5.00.)

Labour Policy in the USSR, 1917-1928. By MARGARET DEWAR. (London and New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1956. Pp. viii, 285. $6.00.)

American opinion about the Soviet Union has shifted greatly since the battles of Stalingrad and Berlin. At that time, ten-odd years ago, one was almost considered to be sabotaging the war effort if one criticized the government of Stalin, whereas today it requires a little effort to balance criticism with an appraisal of Soviet achievements, or even to confine oneself to cold, factual description. One of the men responsible for this shift is David J. Dallin, whose war-time (1944) book, The Real Soviet Russia, was one of the first attempts, highly controversial at the time, to bring out some of the most unpleasant features of Soviet society as they had developed in the two decades since the revolution. The book saw two editions and has now been published with such thorough-going revisions that it has been given a new title.

Loosely structured, and having no central focus save the aim of debunking our war-time illusions about Soviet society, this is a group of essays around three themes: the new class structure which has emerged from the revolution, the political system through which the new society is being managed, and the main principles, methods, and problems of Soviet foreign relations. The choice of topics seems somewhat haphazard: for instance, while the author treats the position of the churches and the emergence of Titoism, he does not discuss topics of equal or greater importance, such as the minority problem or the role of the educational system in the growth of the class structure. Some chapters are well prepared and made contributions to scholarship at the time the book was first published: for instance, the one on forced labor. Even today Mr. Dallin's insistence on viewing the inmates of labor camps as a social class in themselves deserves more serious consideration than it has received in the past. Other chapters, however, are brief and skimpy. Throughout the book the author is careful to present the Soviet system as a fluid, developing organism. This enables him to contrast present policies and institutions with those of earlier days and with the bright hopes by which the Bolsheviks justified their seizure of power.

Thoroughly familiar with his material, the author assumes his reader to have both a great deal of knowledge and plenty of misconception, so that often his tone is that of argument rather than exposition. Instead of taking the long-forgotten intellectual products of war-time good-will to task, he might have performed a more useful service by a less polemical and more systematic and descriptive presentation. While his book is lively and full of interesting observations, it remains impressionistic, journalistic, superficial. And while it does contribute a feel of the conservative, authoritarian climate of present-day Soviet Russia, as contrasted to the heroic dreams of the revolution, it offers little more that is new, exciting, or food for thought. It contains few statements that the reviewer would challenge, but equally few of interest to him. Its journalistic and polemical character tends to render it useless as an introduction for freshmen and general readers, and the scholar in the field should be familiar with the facts it presents.

Mrs. Dewar's monograph on Bolshevik policy regarding the working class during the first eleven years of Soviet rule is far more modest, pedestrian, and useful. In the first 160 pages, the author with great care summarizes the legislation and the heated discussions on labor's role in the "proletarian dictatorship" and the management of industry, workers' rights and material benefits, and the incentives and coercive measures designed to make them submit. These are followed by an appendix of about 120 pages, in which more than five hundred decrees, ordinances, and instructions concerning labor are summarized. The book is an indispensable reference work for students of Soviet political and social developments.

ALFRED G. MEYER.

Columbia University.

The Politics of Compromise: A Study of Parties and Cabinet Government in Sweden. BY DANKWART A. RUSTOW. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1955. Pp. xi, 257. $5.00.)

The author of this book, Professor Rustow of Princeton University, is one of the small group of American scholars who were enabled to spend a year of study in Sweden under the auspices of the Social Science Research Council. It has been the privilege of the reviewer to read in manuscript several similar studies made during the past twenty years, but this is the only one which has appeared in print. Inasmuch as American political scientists have now for a generation shown a great interest in the Swedish political system, it is extremely fortunate that a book has appeared in English. Rustow's work should do something to fill a void caused by the excessive addiction of publishers to the political history of Central Europe.

Three chapters of this study provide the historical background, briefly recounting the events leading to the establishment of the bicameral Rikstag of 1866, which replaced the old Riksdag of four estates. More attention is given to the rise of Lantmannapartiet, translated as the "Ruralist party" (perhaps, Estate-Owners party would be better), and the various protectionist and pre-liberal coalitions which finally led to the modern Högerpartiet (Conservatives) and Folkpartiet (Liberals). Although most of the standard sources are cited, the main reliance seems to be on Thermaenius, who until recently was the chief authority on Swedish parties. Chapter Two leads up to the establishment of the Four Party System, and Chapter Three relates the history of the development of this system from 1920 up to the present time. There are still some students who believe that with respect to number there are only three types of party systems: (1) the one-party system, (2) the two-party system, and (3) the multi-party system. However, the Scandinavian political scientists, writing of their own countries' experiences, and the French writers of the New School, looking at various other countries, have all urged that we give serious thought to the merits of the "Few-Party System," that is, something intermediate between the kind of party structure that has plagued France and the one that we have in the United States, the defects of which are now being recognized.

Rustow's chapters on party stability and the effective working of the system of proportional representation employed in Sweden are very good. He notes that there is a lively and highly informed debate being carried on continuously by students of political behavior and electoral methods. But he concludes that the Swedish system is one well-suited to a nation with a high degree of political sophistication.

The final section, dealing with the legislative process, cabinet government, and "the politics of compromise," reveals the wisdom of the Swedes in developing a system of government in which emphasis is placed on the soundness of the procedures for discovering issues, preparing them for legislative action, conducting debate, and communicating decisions to the administration. Rustow's final chapter (which has the same title as the book) seems inconclusive. Undoubtedly the reason for this feeling on the part of the reader is due to the fact that the rather intricate machinery the Swedes have evolved for policy-determination works very well for them because of scores of factors which are unique. One cannot, for example, isolate from Swedish experience one single institution, such as bicameralism, preparation of legislation, or the proportional method of voting, and from this one example recommend the adoption by others of the institution which works so well in the far North. Anyone at all familiar with Swedish social, economic, and political life knows that there are problems unsolved, and some tendencies which are disquieting. But, on the whole, it is refreshing to read a book about a country which has managed its affairs with prudence and care at a time when there are so many studies of threatening circumstances, conflict, and frustration.

ROY V. PEEL.

University of Utah.

Labor Relations in British Nationalized Industry. BY STERLING D. SPERO. (New York: New York University Press. 1955. Pp. 83. $2.75.)

Beyond Nationalization: The Labor Problems of British Coal. BY GEORGE D. BALDWIN. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1955. Pp. xxii, 324. $6.00.)

Here are two first-rate books dealing with that most vexing and important problem, the position of labor in nationalized industry. The books are conceived along quite different lines, and the impact of each is unique both in range and character; yet each in its own way makes a genuine contribution to the total discussion. Interestingly enough, the smaller of the two books undertakes to deal with much the larger and more general aspects of the subject. Spero is concerned broadly and philosophically with the whole array of labor relations under nationalization; Baldwin digs deeply into the coal industry.

Spero presents scarcely more than a carefully thought out and well organized set of notes, setting forth some facts, asking some pertinent questions, and making some judicious comments on the position of labor in British nationalized industry since 1945. In 76 pages of text (small pages, large print) he deals with the general problems of labor representation on the Boards, collective bargaining, strikes and government intervention, consultation, training and promotion, and workers' control, and traces in broad terms the pertinent developments and issues in the coal and railway industries.

This is a wise little book. The author does not go far beneath the surface in his analyses, and his judgments are moderate and qualified; but both analyses and judgments make sense. Labor and nationalization have had a rough time with each other in Britain, but Spero distinguishes among difficulties attributable to nationalization per se, to the inherent complexities of the labor-management relationship, to adverse economic conditions from which Britain and British labor have suffered, and to the fact of transition. He points out that "nationalization came to Britain at a time when circumstances were the most favorable for the transition from private to public operation but the least auspicious for demonstrating the success of new economic experiments." It is quite true that nationalization provides a new environment in which "new attitudes can flourish" in dealing with the extremely difficult problems of labor relations. To me it is significant that, in the first decade at least, it does not appear that British nationalization has prevented the Government (even a Labour Government) from behaving like a government in treating with labor, or the men and unions from behaving like men and unions.

Baldwin's book begins where Spero's leaves off; it explores in depth and detail the problems of labor relations in a single nationalized industry. The clue to Baldwin's approach is to be found in the title he has given to the book: the coal crisis in Great Britain is not the result of nationalization, nor will it be cured by nationalization—the difficulties and any solutions lie beyond nationalization. In successive chapters the author analyzes the processes and problems involved in the technological basis of British mining, the Coal Board and the union, collective bargaining, joint consultation at the pits, wages and wage movements, labor supply and absenteeism, the transfer of manpower, and labor and technological change. The study is replete with meaningful facts and statistics, carefully interpreted; and at every turn it gives evidence of Baldwin's thorough knowledge of the technology and organization of the industry, of the miners and their bosses, and of the British economy and the British people. It also demonstrates that Baldwin knows how to lay out and prosecute a difficult and important piece of research. Its structure and air carry conviction. Even before the ink was dry on the several British nationalization acts, American (and British) readers were regaled with conclusions and judgments on the results of nationalization drawn from operating experience, and the flood has continued. Baldwin's book tells us a very great deal that we ought to know about the British coal industry, nationalization, and labor; it also shows us what a book which purports to be based on experience and the record ought to be like.

BEN W. LEWIS.

Oberlin College.

New States and International Organizations. By BENJAMIN AKZIN. (Paris: UNESCO, International Political Science Association. 1955. Distributed in the U. S. by International Documentation Service, New York 27. Pp. 200.)

This pithy and pregnant monograph is significant both for its content and for its place in the stream of international official and professional cooperation in the promotion of political science. As early as its Second Session in 1947, the General Conference of UNESCO authorized the Director-General to encourage and assist social scientists to study problems arising from recent developments in international collaboration. As one step in this process Walter R. Sharp, then in the UNESCO secretariat, encouraged the International Institute of Administrative Sciences to collect data from fourteen countries, which he summarized as general rapporteur in National Administration and International Organization, published by IIAS for UNESCO in 1951.

At later sessions, the UNESCO General Conference asked social scientists to focus more sharply on the "administrative, legal and sociological problems of internal organization" facing "Member States that have recently obtained their independence," resulting from their participation in the UN and its specialized agencies. As a result of a meeting of experts convened by UNESCO, in which Rowland Egger took part from the U.S., IIAS was commissioned to undertake a further study, National Administrations and International Organizations, for which Roger Grégoire served as general reporter. The focus of the "sociological" problems was deemed, wisely, to lie in the province of political science and international relations. The International Political Science Association accordingly invited rapporteurs from six countries to respond to an elaborate questionnaire: India, Indonesia, Israel, Lebanon, Pakistan, and The Philippines, for which John W. Lederle prepared the report. Dr. Akzin supplemented these replies by interviews at the headquarters of UN agencies and by his own rich background of research and teaching on the continent of Europe and in the United States, before he became Herbert Samuel Professor of Political Science and Constitutional Law at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Dr. Akzin's volume is as much a research-planning monograph as a substantive report. It uses the detailed reports from six countries as a springboard for a "first attempt to analyze the political science aspects of the relationships between international organizations and new States generally," intended "to help and encourage" these states to conduct their own studies.

The result is a series of twenty-three pithy chapters, traversing briefly a wide range of problems for study. Each chapter poses provocative questions, based as much on the author's shrewd and realistic insights as on the replies to the questionnaire by the country reporters. What is meant by a "new" state? What is meant by "independence"? How does the crop of new states in the wake of World War II differ significantly from those of 1918—or 1877? How do the international organizations, both within and without the UN system, differ in their receptivity to new states as members? What do new states want or expect from membership in international organizations? What part do citizens of new states play in the non-governmental organizations that are enmeshed with the UN system? How is one to distinguish personal from official roles?

How do new states meet the burden of international cooperation—not only of financial contributions, but of providing competent delegates, experts, and cognizant staffs of ministries? (Akzin estimates that “adequate staffing for international relations” for even the smallest state involves a minimum of “a thousand professionally trained officials.”) Which international organizations do new states join and why? Do new states do better or worse than old states in implementing the decisions and recommendations of UN agencies? Is there genuine popular support in new states for participation in international agencies?

On each of these and other questions Akzin offers comments which make clear that “newness” is not of itself always a decisive characteristic: the state of economic development may be more important. He justifies amply his thesis that each state, new or old, needs separate study; and he provides a useful frame of reference for such studies.

CHARLES S. ASCHER.

Brooklyn College.

Middle-Class Democracy and the Revolution in Massachusetts, 1691–1780. By ROBERT E. BROWN. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1955. Pp. ix, 458. $6.00.)

This is an important book. Its thesis is dual: that there was already democracy in Massachusetts at the time of the Revolution, and that therefore, contrary to some recent interpretations, the Revolution did not involve an internal class struggle but was a more or less simple overthrow of British imperial rule. Professor Brown challenges the long accepted view that property qualifications for voting excluded a major proportion of the population from the franchise. He asserts that in Massachusetts, at least, almost all adult males could and did meet these qualifications easily, and he offers convincing evidence to support his argument.

The qualification required of voters was the possession of a forty-shilling freehold, or alternatively, real or personal property valued at forty or fifty pounds. By a study of tax and probate records, the author demonstrates what, in practice, this qualification amounted to. A very small farm or an estate consisting only of “household goods and blacksmith tools” would meet it easily. What percentage of the population owned sufficient property? By comparing records of specific elections in various towns with poll and tax lists of those towns, Professor Brown arrives at an estimate of the proportion of actual voters to adult males. By such calculations, supplemented by other evidence which space does not permit the reviewer to describe, the author concludes that very few adult males were disfranchised, and that, in the rueful words of Governor Hutchinson, “anything with the appearance of a man” was permitted to vote.

The implications of this work are far-reaching. The first question to be asked is whether the situation in Massachusetts was typical of that elsewhere. If it was, then it would appear that there was a much broader base of popular government at the time of the Revolution than we have hitherto assumed. Both the political struggles and the institutions of the Revolutionary period must appear in somewhat different perspective. An extensive suffrage is not necessarily identical with democracy, but it does suggest that "the people" was a very inclusive term in practice and not simply a rhetorical flourish. Professor Brown's work also raises questions about constitutional developments in the first half of the nineteenth century. If the property qualifications of the first state constitutions did not prevent an appreciable number of adult males from voting, then the subsequent removal of those qualifications may represent not so much a new democratic spirit, as constitutional adaptation to a changing economic situation in which an increasing proportion of the population was without property. This would help to explain how the Rhode Island that would have nothing to do with the Convention of 1787 produced a Dorr's Rebellion in 1841-1842. In short, this careful study of the franchise in Massachusetts points up the necessity for much new research and new interpretation before we can trace fully the evolution of democracy in America.

CECELIA M. KENTON.

Smith College.

Charles Beard and the Constitution: A Critical Analysis of "An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution." BY ROBERT E. BROWN. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1956. Pp. 219. $3.50.)

Professor Brown is so shrewish in his critique of the historical method of Charles Beard that we have a right to expect that his own method, like Caesar's wife, will be above reproach. This is not the case.

Beard in his Interpretation, Professor Brown thinks, was guilty of omitting, suppressing, misrepresenting, and otherwise distorting evidence. The author begins with a denunciation of Beard's "use of the writings of James Madison," charging that Beard falsified Madison's viewpoint: first, by quoting from the tenth number of The Federalist rather than from the others; second, by omitting Madison's reference to non-economic factors. Beard was straining, Professor Brown insists, "to make Madison an 'economic determinist.'" The criticism, typical of this book, is simply captious. Beard did not expound a monolithic theory or pretend that Madison did. He argued, using Madison's words, that "the most common and durable source of factions has been the various and unequal distribution of property." This proposition was a staple both of Federalist and of Anti-Federalist political thought. It is as illuminating and pertinent today as the latest figures on lobbying which show that business, farm, and labor groups far outspend all others.

Every time Professor Brown catches Beard citing another scholar's book, he delivers a homily on the virtues of primary evidence. Yet, as often as not, when Beard produces first-hand observers, Professor Brown rules them out as witnesses for Beard on the ground that they—Hamilton, Henry, Higginson, Knox, Marshall, G. Morris, and others—are not "objective" or "representative." Thus Patrick Henry's report that most small farmers opposed the Constitution "was merely . . . an opinion." In this fashion Professor Brown scorns, disparages, or ignores evidence favorable to Beard. Curiously, he is willing to use some of Beard's witnesses—Hamilton, Knox, and Morris, for example—to uphold his own arguments. He disdains as a "secondary work" McMaster and Stone's book of documents but cites similar volumes himself. He scolds Beard, properly I think, for using 1790 statistics to deal with events two or three years earlier, but supports one of his own contentions with something Madison wrote in 1821. He quotes against Beard one of Charles Pinckney's Convention speeches, then observes: "Pinckney's letter to Madison, quoted by Beard, gives just the opposite view . . . so it apparently depends on which Pinckney quotation we use." Does it? Are a public statement and a private letter equally credible?

While he discounts testimony by Gouverneur Morris favoring Beard, Professor Brown relies heavily upon Morris's assertion that nine-tenths of Americans were landowners. This assertion may be, for all we know, as meaningful as N.A.M. effusions nowadays that "every American is a capitalist." Yet Professor Brown builds upon it a crucial part of his argument, reasoning that "at least ninety per cent of the men were voters. . . . A farmer could not have made a living on a freehold small enough to disfranchise him." In condemnations of democracy by Convention members Professor Brown sees further proof that in 1787, contrary to Beard, the United States was a democracy.

He belittles statements like that of Mercer of Maryland, which labels "the Governments of America" "aristocracies," and that of Hamilton, which notes in "all" states "some individuals . . . deprived of the right [to vote] altogether, not having the requisite qualification of property." Apparently he is not aware that democracy means not only the right to vote but equality in that right. Where representation is weighted to favor wealthier citizens—as it was in twelve of the thirteen states—there prevails a species of aristocracy.

No doubt Beard exaggerated the role of personalty interests in the establishment of the Constitution. Beard acknowledged this in his later years. But Professor Brown, as usual, is overzealous in his criticism. "Readers of An Economic Interpretation," he states, "should be aware that the use of the phrase 'debtor farmers' throughout the work is not based on any evidence whatsoever." Shays' rebellion? Too small and local, the author says, then tells us later the Shaysites were numerous enough to win control over the government of Massachusetts. He overlooks this statement by Madison, whose credibility he does not challenge: "Landed possessions were no certain evidence of real wealth. Many enjoyed them to a great extent who were more in debt than they were worth. The unjust laws of the States had proceeded more from this class of men, than any others. It had often happened that men who had acquired landed property on credit, got into the Legislatures with a view of promoting an unjust protection agst. their Creditors."

Moreover, that personalty groups were numerically small did not make them politically insignificant—power is not a matter of numbers alone. Such groups were important enough that, as Professor Brown admits, Gouverneur Morris proposed creating a senate "based on personalty." In the newspapers of the 1780's—in Elliot's Debates too—is overwhelming evidence of conflict involving personalty interests, conflict in which "moneyed men," "speculators and blood suckers," were hotly denounced.

Professor Brown's chief contribution, perhaps, is his detailed critique of Beard's account of the framers' personal stake in their deliberations. But he does not grant that Beard, though wrong on specifics, correctly identified the social position of the framers. What is more, Beard's book, for all its shortcomings, is informed by a theory of politics still generally valid: that economic interests ordinarily dominate the political process. Beard made clear that the Constitution was an object of struggle between groups primarily economic in character. This view was confirmed by one of Professor Brown's favorite witnesses, John Quincy Adams, who noted that the Constitution was being received enthusiastically by rich and conservative elements. "Nor do I wonder at all . . . as it is calculated to increase the influence, power and wealth of those who have any influence. If the Constitution be adopted it will be a grand point in favor of the aristocratic party."

MAURICE KLAIN.

Western Reserve University.

The Civilian and the Military. By ARTHUR A. EKIRCH, JR. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1956. Pp. xi, 340. $6.50.)

This is a well-written history of the anti-military tradition in the United States. It is a useful corrective to current tendencies in American political and historical scholarship: for instance, it is well to be reminded that military fervor played an important part in Andrew Jackson's popular support and that, however commendable and timely was Theodore Roosevelt's interest in world affairs, one of its motive forces was a romantic passion for things martial. Professor Ekirch has chronicled American attitudes about military institutions from pre-Revolutionary times—with an "Anglo-American heritage" of anti-militarism—to the Eisenhower Administration. With few exceptions, whatever he has included in his chronicle he has presented dispassionately. And he has done enough digging to make his work valuable for general scholarly reference. His book is a significant addition to the growing literature on American military affairs. But its value can be properly appreciated only if its limitations are properly understood. The broad chronology is not definitive; rather, the author's meaning and use of thematic concepts focus and set the limits of the book.

Last year Professor Ekirch published a book entitled The Decline of American Liberalism; the present volume might well have been entitled The Rise of American Militarism, for it is a supplement to that earlier volume, and its theme is built upon concepts and assumptions which, though never thoroughly defined or analyzed in either book, are clearer in the first. Central to the theme of both books is the author's conception of liberalism. While he sketches its historical derivation in the first two chapters of The Decline of American

Liberalism, it is clear in both books that he is not interested in the interaction of the liberal ideal of human freedom with the political context. That is, he measures historical events against the ideal of a peaceful, laissez-faire, liberal utopia and ignores the very real dilemmas encountered in the choice of means for achieving the ultimate ideal of human freedom. Both books thus beg the question how to balance domestic liberty with national security.

Clearly, the author has forbore to explain his liberal utopian assumptions to the reader because of his compunctions as a historian. But the effect has been not to exclude those assumptions, but only to neglect their orderly exposition and examination. For the breadth of his subject has made necessary the use of unexpressed criteria in the selection of subject matter. Besides his utopian approach, Professor Ekirch's assumptions are embodied primarily in his two mutually exclusive categories, militarism and anti-militarism (or, sometimes, liberalism). He never defines either term adequately for the use to which he puts it; but he leaves the undeniable impression that the more of the first and the less of the second the better. Anyone who wears a uniform or talks about war seems to be a militarist, and is probably wrong. Anyone who opposes the use or maintenance of armed forces, for whatever reason, is an anti-militarist, and is probably right. At times this devil-angel frame of reference gives an interesting volume some strange twists; constantly, it reminds the reader of what are in fact the author's predispositions; inevitably, it limits the value of the book. Undefined, his terms are applied loosely and superficially. Unmentioned, his assumptions are a major omission.

Because the book fails to deal with the relationship of utopian liberal ideals to the real world, the causes of the change here chronicled remain a mystery. Why the anti-militarist tradition in the United States has declined is one of the crucial questions in this inquiry, yet no attempt is made to answer it. To do so would admittedly be presumptive, and the historian can be excused from trying; but to avoid any reference to the context of foreign policy in which the issues of national military policy have been shaped is to imply a wholly unjustifiable assumption, far more presumptive than would be an answer to the question why anti-militarism declined. The studied exclusion of all but a few meager references to objective strategic considerations can only imply that such considerations are irrelevant in setting the proper role of the military, a claim which, to say the least, is hardly well enough established to serve as a premise for the writing of history.

Moreover, because everything seems to be either "militarist" or "anti-militarist," discussion of the extent of influence of both concepts tends to be oversimplified and, often, superficial. For example, the appointment of Eisenhower as president of Columbia University is cited as an indication of the growth of militarism in American life. Yet later it is recognized that Eisenhower is less militarist than many civilians. In this instance the superficial application of categories leads to explicit inconsistency.

The militarist pigeon-hole is well stuffed. Into it go government centralization, high taxes, and most American presidents, who come off badly under Professor Ekirch's analysis. Indeed, Harding seems to rate the highest place among them all.

The author has done some thoughtful and careful work; it is unfortunate, however, that he has taken a series of classical liberal utopian tenets as major and unquestioned premises from which to begin, rather than examining them, and the meaning of militarism as well, in the light of American experience.

PAUL Y. HAMMOND.

Columbia University.

The New World of Henri Saint-Simon. By FRANK MANUEL. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. xi, 433. $7.50.)

It is hardly an accident that both Proudhon and Saint-Simon, both relegated to the limbo of utopian dreamers by Marx and Engels, should have become subjects of two full-length monographs in the past year—the first to appear in the English language. Whoever will review George Woodcock's Proudhon in these pages may decide that it is the more stimulating of the two works, but he should be willing to grant that Professor Manuel's study is the more exhaustive work. It omits nothing worth knowing about Saint-Simon's great vision of the coming scientific order of society and adds a great deal of disturbing information about Saint-Simon the man. What emerges is the portrait of a figure out of Balzac: a power-maddened dilettante attempting in vain to recoup his lost aristocratic fortune. The ci-devant count's real estate speculations during the French revolution were quite lurid from the viewpoint of accepted business morality. But these dubious activities were merely the foil for his truly Napoleonic ambition to become the founder of the new industrial state which would close the chasm of revolutionary anarchy. Professor Manuel is at his best in showing the essentially conservative and syncretistic character of Saint-Simon's ideas. In his "system," "the scientific élite of Condorcet, the findings of the new physiology of Bichat, the new psychology of Cabanis coalesced with an appreciation of the organic order of the theocrats," de Bonald and de Maistre. He absorbed the rationalism of the philosophes but "came away with a different reading of the natural: the natural was inequality" (p. 300). On this basis, he constructed his technocratic and theocratic hierarchy and became the ancestor of the modern elitist school as well as of the "managerial" theory of power.

All this is admirably documented in Professor Manuel's account, which also includes the disciples: Auguste Comte turned Judas, while the rest, among them a surprising number of young Jewish intellectuals, acclaimed the great bohemian as their Messiah, with Bazard and Enfantin sharing the role of Paulus. The way Professor Manuel has managed to plumb the intellectual undercurrents of the period deserves to be called an act of total scholarly immersion. By the same act, he deprived himself of the chance to come up for air and have a look at his own work and its place in the history of ideas. It is sure to play a part, a valuable part, in the Utopian renaissance which has been going on for quite a while, but it does not make an attempt to probe the causes of that renaissance.

At least three reasons may be offered to explain this most intriguing comeback of Marx's predecessors and competitors. Like them, we are conscious of a breakdown of the old morality and anxious to discover forces of renewal. Some of us are groping, as did Saint-Simon and his school, for the New Christianity. It is this element of restoration in a revolutionary scheme that should appeal to our New Conservatives. The liberals, in turn, will be attracted by the Saint-Simonian repudiation of class violence. As the attrition of the Marxist dogma proceeds apace and the utopian character of "scientific socialism" becomes transparent, the Old Utopians begin to look better and better. Their message, while presaging revolutionary advances, did preach peaceful change. Those dissatisfied today with the status quo may rediscover in Saint-Simon a Marx without the sting. And, finally, as society becomes more manageable, more susceptible to manipulation from above, Saint-Simon begins to look less and less like an utopian, much more plausible and realistic than he did in his own time. But here the ways part: those who will hail him as the prophet of the managerial, technocratic gospel will hear with dismay that "the application of scientific progress to rational transformation of society ended in a clearly articulated vision of a totalitarian society. . . . The logic and tyranny of progress gave to the world the progress of total tyranny." Thus Albert Salomon on Saint-Simon in The Tyranny of Progress (New York, 1955, p. 104). Saint-Simon's biographer was probably wise in resisting the temptation to find so much clarity where it does not exist, for the good reason that Saint-Simon, like so many other seminal thinkers, is many things to many men and should not be subjected to an exercise in logic.

JAMES H. MEISEL.

University of Michigan.

Far Eastern Politics in the Postwar Period. By HAROLD M. VINACKE. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. 1956. Pp. vii, 497. $5.00.)

With this authoritative volume Professor Vinacke adds to his stature as a careful, objective scholar. He adds also to the debt which other students and serious lay readers owe him in the expanding field of Far Eastern studies. The scope of his survey is wide, comprehending the countries of southeastern Asia as well as those until recently regarded as composing the Far East: China, Japan, and Korea. A notable feature is the treatment of the inter-relationships of policies and developments in Europe with those in Asia. Although the post-war decade is the period upon which the author's interest is centered, the reader is given a running start by a review, in the early chapters, of prewar and wartime Japan and China and of wartime relationships between the greater powers.

While more emphasis might have been placed upon the remarkable ingenuity of the Japanese administrators in what the author terms the "co-poverty" sphere, their success in stimulating nascent nationalism and their flexibility in shifting from a program of Japanization to one of sponsoring independence, as the fortunes of war changed, is well demonstrated. Professor Vinacke also points out that the Japanese were less acute in their estimate of American military spirit and industrial capacity and of Russian dependability as a neutral. One of the best features of the book is the treatment of the Kuomintang-Communist rivalry for power in China. Excellent also is the account of the rise of Mao Tse-tung and of his success in fitting the warhead of communist theory to the powder-filled shell of Chinese agrarianism.

The author passes from his four introductory chapters to the problems evoked by the war in China, Korea, Indochina, Thailand, Burma, Malaya, Indonesia, the Philippines, and Japan. He gives considerable attention to India's part in the new era and includes the Korean war. His account of the nature and major lines of policy of the Communist government of China, like his treatment of American efforts to bring two totalitarian regimes into democratic union, is adequate and unbiased. However, the view that British and Indian recognition of Communist Peiping was premature and interventionist is not convincingly argued. The same is true of the contention that "the Chinese Communist party was not in fact national but was an instrument of international communism, which, in turn, was an instrument of Soviet Russia's foreign policy." This conclusion seems not to accord with the author's statement that "the decision to intervene in Korea would seem to have been taken by the Chinese on their own initiative rather than under Russian pressure." The account of Kuomintang and Communist China's relations with Viet Minh also exhibits the two Chinese regimes as acting independently, on different bases, but without regard to other than Chinese interests.

With regard to the re-entrance of the colonial powers into territories conquered by the Japanese, the author holds that they were legally entitled to do so and that the American government was legally obligated to recognize that fact. One is led to question, however, the quality of the Allies' intelligence services in regard to the strong nationalist sentiment which prevailed so generally in those areas. Given adequate information, would the powers have reassumed the "white man's burden," incurring thereby the tremendous cost in lives and treasure that followed? Vinacke believes that Western colonialism in the Far East is ended. While repudiating charges of imperialism against American postwar policy, he stresses the difficulties involved in our efforts to reconcile programs of assistance with the containment of Communism. "Neutralism" in Asia is, he believes, a consequence of unreadiness to perceive the menace of Communism and to accept American aid upon conditions believed to be related to American rather than Asiatic interests. Uncertainties regarding our policy toward Formosa have been a major factor in complicating our relations with the new states of East Asia. At the end of the first postwar decade the paramount issue of war or peace remained to cloud the future not only of Western relations with Asia but of intra-Western relations.

Throughout this work Professor Vinacke maintains a uniformly high level of attention to available articles as well as to monographs and secondary materials. Necessarily, in covering so vast a field within five hundred pages, he has had to compress many topics into a few paragraphs. He has, however, combined clarity and conciseness with such success as to provide a readable and understandable analysis of the changes in domestic and international politics which World War II brought about in Eastern Asia. Five maps and fifteen illustrations admirably supplement the text, which is well indexed.

HAROLD S. QUIGLEY.

University of Minnesota.

The Historical Status of Tibet. BY TIEH-TSENG LI. (New York: King's Crown Press. 1956. Pp. xi, 312. $5.00.)

Because of the work of recent explorers present-day Tibet is fairly well known, but we are still ignorant of many phases of Tibetan history. This is partly due to the fact that though there is a large Tibetan literature, works dealing with history are surprisingly few in number and inadequate in scope. For this reason, all persons interested in the problem of Tibetan history will give a warm welcome to Mr. Li's work on The Historical Status of Tibet. Mr. Li does not pretend to a master of Tibetan literature or even of the Tibetan language, but he is an eminent authority on Chinese historiography and has made a careful study of the many passages in the Chinese dynastic histories which deal with the relations between China and Tibet and are little known in the West. For recent times Mr. Li makes use of numerous reports prepared by Chinese envoys to the Tibetan government, some of which exist only in manuscript and are not generally available. This greatly enhances the value of the book.

Though the book is to be warmly recommended, it suffers from one noticeable weakness. This is the fact that Mr. Li is a vigorous propagandist. Though the true facts are given, they are marshaled in such a way as to support Mr. Li's main thesis: that Tibet has long been an integral part of the Chinese Empire, and that it is only fair and just that Tibet continue in this status. As a matter of fact, this thesis is open to serious doubt even on the basis of the Chinese records as cited by Mr. Li. As the book itself shows, during the periods when China was ruled over by native Chinese dynasties (such as the T'ang, Sung, and Ming dynasties), embassies passed between China and Tibet, but the Chinese were never able to secure control over the Tibetan secular or ecclesiastical authorities. It was only when China itself was ruled over by foreigners, such as the Mongols and the Manchus, that the Tibetans paid more than lip service to the Emperors of China. In point of fact, both the Mongols and the Manchus secured control over Tibet before and not after they secured control over China.

The Tibetans considered themselves to be vassals not of the Chinese but of the Mongol and Manchu overlords of China. When the Manchu dynasty fell (1912), most Tibetans felt that their status as Manchu vassals automatically lapsed. At this time all Chinese residents inside Tibet were expelled. From 1912 to 1950 the Tibetans struggled to assert and maintain their de facto independence. Sometimes they accepted aid from the government of British India in order to keep the Chinese out; sometimes they accepted aid from China in order to keep the British from becoming too powerful. But at all times the Tibetans were anxious not to be absorbed into British India and not to be re-absorbed into China. The departure of the British from India greatly weakened the Tibetan position, and in 1950 the Chinese Communists secured control over the country. It is clear, however, even from Mr. Li's book, that this was the result of superior military force and not of the wishes of the Tibetan people. Even in the present year (1956) we hear of violent outbreaks of guerrilla warfare on the part of the Tibetans against the Chinese occupational authorities.

Even if one were to stretch a point and admit that Tibet was for many centuries an integral part of the Chinese Empire, this still does not mean that the Chinese have a rightful claim to Tibet, if one accepts the general principle of the right of self-determination. The Irish will not admit that the English have a right to govern Ireland, even though it is an undoubted fact that for several centuries Ireland was an integral part of the British Kingdom. The same is true of other peoples who first secured their independence in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

A serious objection must be made to one of Mr. Li's other claims. This is the statement (p. 211) that Tibet absorbed civilization mainly from China and only in a lesser degree from India. It is true that racially the Tibetans (being Mongoloids) are more closely related to the Chinese than to the Hindus. It is true that the Tibetan spoken language is related distantly, very distantly, to the Chinese spoken language (but so are Burmese and Siamese). It is true that from time to time certain elements of Chinese culture have been borrowed and absorbed by the Tibetans. But anyone who travels in Tibet soon becomes acutely aware that the broad basis of Tibetan culture is primarily Indian in origin. The Tibetans have never made any use of the Chinese ideographs in writing but developed a phonetic script based upon the Indian Devanagari alphabet. A few Chinese books (mostly Buddhist sutras) were translated into Tibetan, but the overwhelming mass of Tibetan literature consists of translations from Sanskrit. Such original works as exist are modelled upon these Sanskrit writings. Lamaism, the Tibetan form of Buddhism, is derived from the Tantric type of Buddhism which developed in India during the seventh and eighth centuries A.D., long after China had borrowed an earlier and purer form of Buddhism. The art, the music, and the drama of Tibet are also basically Indian in origin.

In spite of certain defects, however, Mr. Li's book is to be warmly recommended to all those interested in the by-paths of Far Eastern history.

WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN.

Northwestern University.

Judges and Jurors: Their Functions, Qualifications and Selection. BY ARTHUR T. VANDERBILT. (Boston, Mass.: Boston University Press. 1956. Pp. 76. $3.00.)

The Instrumentalities of Justice: Their Forms, Functions and Limitations. BY FRANCIS R. AUMANN. (Columbus: The Ohio State University Press. 1956. Pp. ix, 137. $3.50.)

Arthur T. Vanderbilt, the highly articulate Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, and Professor Aumann have long been concerned with the administration of justice in the United States. The former's book, Minimum Standards of Judicial Administration (1949), and the latter's study of The Changing American Legal System (1940) attest to this interest. This interest is further developed in the two books under review. Judge Vanderbilt's book is the shorter of the two, and is confined to an analysis of judges and jurors only. Professor Aumann's volume covers more ground, and indeed touches upon all of the main instrumentalities of justice, including the lawyers and the law. Neither book propounds any particular thesis, and neither breaks new ground. While both suggest the necessity of certain reforms, they follow the lines of thought previously blocked out by such writers in the field as Pound, Willoughby, and Jerome Frank. Both authors make some comparisons with English and continental European practices and institutions.

Judge Vanderbilt's little book consists of three lectures originally given in 1954-5 at Boston University under the Gaspar G. Bacon Lectureship on the Constitution of the United States. While they were written for oral delivery, the author has added the valuable and extensive supporting annotations which one expects to find in his writings. The first lecture deals with the office and functions of the judges, and the second with their attributes and selection. The final lecture is concerned with the functions, qualifications, and selection of jurors. Judge Vanderbilt managed to crowd a great deal of useful information into his three lectures.

Apart from the description of existing practices, Vanderbilt's book focuses attention on two principal ideas. So far as the judges are concerned, the contention is that their central quality, in the light of their functions, must be impartiality, and impartiality is impossible without independence. In order to achieve independence judges must be free from political influences and enjoy security of tenure. He prefers the appointment method for the selection of judges over the popular election method, but in view of American habits he settles for a combination of the two such as is found in California and Missouri. He also argues that the judiciary ought to be bipartisan. So far as the jury system is concerned, Judge Vanderbilt's position is that the key to its improvement lies in giving the judges greater control over its operation. Contending lawyers want favorable juries; in contrast, the impartial judge desires an impartial jury. Since he believes that the greatest evil in jury selection is politics, the solution in his opinion lies in shifting authority to the nonpolitical judge. The judge should also have greater control over the conduct of the trial, as in England, including the right to comment on the evidence to the jury. Vanderbilt's other suggestions for improving the jury system are now quite standard: fewer exemptions from service, use of questionnaires and personal interviews, restriction of the voir dire, etc.

Professor Aumann's book covers far more subjects than can be explored adequately within such a small number of pages. Part I, consisting of three very brief chapters, deals with the "ancient problem" of the reconciliation of justice with law and describes the growth of the Roman and English legal systems. The second part describes the machinery of justice, the judiciary, the structure of courts, the problem of personnel, and some aspects of judicial procedure. The third part deals with some public attitudes towards law and lawyers. He defends the law against the charge of being too complicated, and the lawyer against a number of time-honored canards.

One looking for a short, orderly, and eminently reasonable introduction to our legal system will find this book profitable. In a largely descriptive manner it touches upon the main facts of American justice. Something is lost from over-condensation, but on the whole the reader will learn what the law is, who administers it, and what its growing edges are today.

DAVID FELLMAN.

University of Wisconsin.

The Government and Administration of Wyoming: American Commonwealths Series. BY HERMAN H. TRACHSEL AND RALPH M. WADE. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 1955. Pp. xiv, 381. $4.95.)

The Government and Administration of New York: American Commonwealths Series. BY LYNTON K. CALDWELL. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 1954. Pp. xviii, 506. $5.95.)

The Government and Administration of Mississippi: American Commonwealths Series. BY ROBERT B. HIGHS AW AND CHARLES N. FORTENBERRY. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 1954. Pp. xiv, 414. $4.95.)

The Government and Administration of Florida: American Commonwealths Series. BY WILSON K. DOYLE, ANGUS MCKENZIE LAIRD AND S. SHERMAN WEISS. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 1954. Pp. xv, 444. $4.95.)

The Government and Administration of North Carolina: American Commonwealths Series. BY ROBERT S. RANKIN. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 1955. Pp. xiv, 429. $4.95)

The Government and Administration of Georgia: American Commonwealths Series. BY CULLEN B. GOSNELL AND C. DAVID ANDERSON. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 1956. Pp. xix, 403. $4.95)

The President's Commission on Intergovernmental Relations observed in its report that "the success of our federal system . . . depends in large measure upon the performance of the States." This is certainly true, but it might be argued further that the performance of the states is likely to be significantly improved only when there is an awareness of the inadequacy of most state governments. No such public awareness now exists despite a decade of almost unprecedented attention to state problems. The appointment of the President's Commission is evidence of the renewed interest, as are the many "little Hoover commissions" and the current interest among political scientists in comparative state government. The latest attack on public indifference to state government is the initiation of the American Commonwealths Series, one volume on each of the states, under the editorship of W. Brooke Graves. The first six of the Series have now been published.

The curse of state government literature, and especially of state government textbooks, has been the abominable tendency to "analyze" by saying that  $x$  number of states do it this way and  $y$  number that, seldom transcending this enumerative kind of superficial analysis. This shortcoming is no doubt largely due to the absence of state by state studies of the actual governmental problems and procedures of the forty-eight states. Whatever the inadequacies of these present volumes, they do begin to provide data from which more meaningful generalizations can be made. Rural over-representation in the legislatures, over-long and statute-laden constitutions, disorganized court systems, administrative irresponsibility, legislative agendas loaded down with local special legislation—all these problems and others are considered within the context of going governmental systems, not as assumed categories drawn from the tables in The Book of the States.

With some minor exceptions all six books are organized along similar lines, which facilitates making comparisons between states. Each takes up constitutional, political, legislative, executive, and administrative problems plus a detailed discussion of particular functions. Descriptions of functions and of administration are important elements of such textbooks, but it is regrettable that between one-half and two-thirds of each volume is devoted to these questions alone. This probably would not be such a detriment were the remaining portions more adequate, but unfortunately in all cases the least valuable parts are those discussing political and legislative matters. The North Carolina and New York studies give considerable insight into the politics of those two states. The Georgia and Florida studies are somewhat less revealing, but they do give the reader a reasonable understanding of the political systems. The Mississippi and Wyoming volumes unhappily do very little in this respect. An outsider reading the Mississippi study would certainly never conclude that the status of the Negro had anything in particular to do with Mississippi politics. Virtually the only reference to the Negro in regard to politics refers to their nonvoting and says: "Although now eligible to vote, few Negroes exhibit any interest or take any part in voting. Naturally the number voting may be expected to increase as the Negro increases in knowledge of, and familiarity with, state and local politics" (p. 34). Both the Mississippi and Wyoming studies substitute a summary of electoral laws for an analysis of the political system. This is especially unfortunate, since outsiders have so little opportunity to acquire this information except from on-the-spot students of the caliber of these authors.

It is to be hoped that in future numbers of the series the authors will take advantage of the prime comparative materials their predecessors have made available in these six volumes. And except where state constitutions are almost volume-length in themselves, it would seem worthwhile to include the state constitution in an appendix.

The publishers are to be congratulated on this venture. With the ultimate completion of the Series, state government literature will be the richer by far.

W. DUANE LOCKARD.

Connecticut College.

Elections and Electors: Studies in Democratic Representation. By J. F. S. Ross. (Fair Lawn, N. J.: Essential Books, Inc. 1955. Pp. 480. $6.75.)

This new study by the author of Parliamentary Representation (1943) is an impressive addition to the growing list of British works on the electoral system. Both sound scholarship and a prodigious industry have gone into it. But Mr. Ross is also a vigorous advocate with an axe to grind; he believes in proportional representation and his book is designed to convince others. Indeed, he says that those who refuse to be convinced are either ill informed or perverse. This is the language of polemic rather than of scholarship, and the first half of the book is laden with it.

The second half is a series of analyses of unrelated aspects of parliamentary representation. In contrast with the first half, it is calmer and the judgment is more dispassionate. Indeed, these are valuable studies, though they might better have been separately published; they cast much light on such things as the education and vocation of MP's, the nominating system, the Speaker's Conferences, and other matters. But the author's main interest, even so, lies in the first half of the book.

He insists quite properly that proportional representation is not an electoral system but a principle which different electoral systems achieve in varying measure. He surveys a wide variety of systems and settles his choice on one combination of these. He vehemently rejects the single-member district, plurality election scheme: it offers the voters no workable alternatives; it represents them inaccurately; and it corrupts the results. He chooses therefore a multi-member district and combines with it a system of preferential voting and counting by quota, specifically the "Droop quota," a scheme that is regularly though inaccurately called the "single transferable vote." The argument in behalf of this plan is well prepared and its appeal is powerful; clearly such a system is more accurately representative than the present one. But more is claimed for it than can be justified. Mr. Ross takes great pains to disprove in advance the charge that his method will multiply parties and encourage minor groups. He concludes upon examination that his system would have produced very little change in the outcome of the 1950 election and that it certainly would not have encouraged any minor parties. But he achieves this conclusion by calling the Liberals a major national party and insisting that they deserve even more than the doubled representation his system would have given them. This apparently means that there is little difference between a two- and a three-party system. Indeed, he insists that, although the present system "is a handicap to small parties," his plan would "hinder rather than help" them. The analysis ignores the fundamental fact that parties under such a system would behave differently. To the extent that the electoral system assures the proportional representation of small groups, it encourages them to compete. The result would inevitably be the alteration of the existing two-party arrangement.

Whether Mr. Ross would welcome this is hard to say. He castigates the two-party system for its unrepresentativeness (a mandate is "just not possible"), yet he defends his reform on the ground that it would not increase the representation of minor parties. In my view it would do exactly this.

He also expects an attack from those who consider a two-party system essential to stable government, but his discussion of this is brief and almost unconcerned. He admits that his system may require coalition governments (without encouraging minor parties?) but thinks this may not be bad; at least it would be more accurately representative. This is most unsatisfactory. Without suggesting that stability and governmental effectiveness are possible only in a two-party system, one may still insist his reform would have ramifying effects on other parts of the constitution. In particular, what would happen to the traditional role of the opposition if England should come to love coalitions?

Make no mistake; this is a useful book. The collection of data is most impressive and the analyses of various electoral schemes and problems are keen and illuminating. The book suffers badly, however, from inadequate examination of the ancillary effects of its proposals upon the surrounding institutions; and it especially fails to deal with the question of continuing stability and effectiveness in government. Mr. Ross says that "the real issue is whether we are to have representative government." Certainly this is a real issue, but equally real and at least equally important is whether we are to have effective government. Which, after all, is the main function of representative government—to represent or to govern?

WILLIAM S. LIVINGSTON.

The University of Texas.

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

The Power Elite. BY C. WRIGHT MILLS. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1956. Pp. 423. $6.00.)

Charles Wright Mills, who will be remembered for his previous book White Collar, has produced in The Power Elite a scathing indictment of contemporary American society. Some have compared The Power Elite in potential influence to Veblen's Theory of the Leisure Class, with some injustice to Veblen, who was a much sounder and more cautious theorist than Mills. The publisher claims the title of "provocative" for the work, and so it is, but chiefly because of the magnitude of the absurdity which emerges as its conclusion. Actually, much of Mills's ponderous three hundred or more pages merely labors points well known to most men. It does not come as a surprise to find that American society is elitist—all societies are—or that some men have more money and power than others, or that the increasing complexity of society has resulted in the separation of the masses from significant decision making. Nor is it a revelation to discover that the tone of contemporary American society is materialistic and that a good bit of cynicism has been introduced into the average man's evaluation of the political, economic, and social environment in which he lives. On these foundations, which the author has documented with considerable detail, he erects some startling generalizations, which constitute the "provocative" aspects of the book. He concludes that we are ruled in America today by three elites, the men of corporate wealth, the militarists, and the politicians. These three elites are victims of the "higher immorality" in that they operate in an irresponsible, immoral, and cynical disregard for all but their own interests. Seemingly they are devoid of culture, in the traditional sense of the term, and, what is worse, are consciously or unconsciously uniting together to rule the rest of us in their own interests. The sordid, vulgarized, and cynical picture of American society which emerges from the author's personal sense of frustration leaves one wondering how the organization functions at all.

This over-exaggeration of what at best are trends and tendencies in American culture places the author's conclusions in the realm of half truths. If his purpose in over-drawing his picture is to excite us to reform, he again disappoints us, for at no stage in his narrative does he offer or propose any way out of our slough of vulgarity and corruption. American society, while elitist, is still far more pluralistic than Mills will admit. There are other "power elites" unmentioned by him, and there are still fundamental traditions of honesty and responsibility in the American people, sufficient to give us at least the hope that all is not as bad as Professor Mills would have us believe. —H. MALCOLM MACDONALD, University of Texas.

Chief Justice John Marshall: A Reappraisal. Ed. W. MELVILLE JONES. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1956. Pp. xvii, 195. $3.00.)

Here is a collection of nine papers delivered at the College of William and Mary in May, 1955, to celebrate the bicentennial anniversary of the birth of the Chief Justice. The book contains in addition an Introduction to the topics of the papers written by Professor Swisher, a Foreword by Chief Justice Warren, and a Preface by the editor.

One emerges from the reading with a fairly rounded impression of what kind of man John Marshall was, where his interests lay, and what contributions he made to the foundation of American Constitutional law. The papers range in character from the heavily footnoted, such as that written by Julius Goebel, Jr., on the common law, to one with no footnotes at all, like Arthur Holcombe's analysis of John Marshall's conservatism.

While the subtitle of the book carries the word "reappraisal," the reader is left just about where he was before. But the word is justified nevertheless. Beveridge's Life of the Chief Justice is subjected to surgery; the prevailing notion that Marshall did not cite precedents because he did not know of any is dispelled once for all; his acumen as a practicing lawyer is demonstrated and linked to his judicial technique.

Because of the occasion on which the papers were delivered, the writers obviously feel free to express their own opinions. There is stimulating nourishment in a wealth of provocative comments all through the book. Irving Brant's paper on the lawyers and politicians is a gem of irony and wit. And there is George L. Haskin's comment that Marshall understood the organic relationships of commercial transactions and did not intend the mechanical tests which his followers derived from his doctrines. There is Goebel's description of a modern judicial opinion as one "with its text well larded with citations, as if too wanting in juice to be otherwise swallowed, and garnished sub pede with columns of bolstering notes." All of the papers maintain a high degree of urbanity and sophistication and show that grace of style is not unbecoming to scholarship.

It should perhaps be noted with regard to the distribution of the subject matter that three papers are given to "Marshall and His Times," two go to judicial review, and four are devoted to Marshall's particular contributions to the law. While the division of emphasis is a happy one, the order in which the chapters fall will not seem inevitable to every reader, and several of the topics can be relocated to fit the reader's mode of association without harming the presentation of the subject. Of course there had to be a sequence, and perhaps the fairest thing to say is that the one used here is justifiable, although it falls short of being self-evident.—P. T. FENN, Oberlin College.

The Rise of the Vice Presidency. BY IRVING G. WILLIAMS. (Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. vii, 266. $4.50.)

The role of Vice Presidents in Presidential election campaigns, their relations with the Presidents under whom they served, and their manner of discharging their powers and functions as second officers in the national government are the subjects treated in this historical survey. It is an aptly-titled volume, for undoubtedly, since the turn of the century and particularly in the past three decades, the office of Vice President has been enjoying what might be termed a renaissance. It is no longer the obscure, forgotten office it became soon after the adoption of the Twelfth Amendment, assigned to a party hack as a mere make-weight on the national ticket.

The increasing importance of the office in the eyes of political leaders as well as the general public is underlined by the fact that, whereas none of the four nineteenth-century Vice Presidents who succeeded to the Presidency was able to win election to the Presidency in his own right, all three of the twentieth-century succeeding Vice Presidents did so. The study also fully develops the point that today the Vice President, by usage and by statute, has duties and responsibilities that extend far beyond his single constitutional function as presiding officer in the Senate. Serious protracted illnesses of two Presidents since World War I have also served to focus attention on the problem of the Vice President's role during periods of Presidential inability.

Based upon extensive research and written in an interesting style, this is a timely volume on a subject that will command increasing attention in the future.—JOSEPH E. KALLENBACH, University of Michigan.

Working for the People: Promise and Performance in Public Service. BY ROBERT MOSES. (New York: Harper and Brothers. 1956. Pp. x, 283. $4.50.)

Robert Moses has for a long time exemplified all that is best in the tradition of the public service. The range of his activities in politics and public administration at every level of operation is fabulous indeed. Perhaps his extensive work has been possible because, as Herbert B. Swepe suggests in a brief foreword, Mr. Moses knows how to trust people and can delegate authority. Mr. Moses himself later notes that he believes in delegation, but "to the right people, not to stooges, clockwatchers, trimmers and incompetents."

This book consists of a number of speeches, letters, articles, reports, and interviews, assembled and edited by a friend. These materials are divided into twenty chapters, some of which overlap, dealing with the following matters: theory and practice in politics, recruitment for the public service; planning problems of the metropolitan area with specific emphasis on New York City, the role of government in housing, parks and museums in large urban areas, conservation of natural resources, the automobile and highway construction, and preparation for the public service. Many political scientists of varied interests should find the book worthwhile. Nevertheless, it has most to contribute to those who are concerned principally with public administration and American local government. Some of the author's insights into major contemporary problems under discussion, such as the national highway program, are extremely useful.

The book is written in a lively, breezy style. It is full of interesting anecdotes. In addition, the author's personal philosophy and orientation are revealed clearly. Mr. Moses is revealed as a man of strong, independent ideas. Some of his somewhat dogmatic assertions tend to oversimplify certain problems. For example, he seems to feel that greater interest in government by the electorate would automatically result in better governmental administration (pp. 14, 15). In another instance he asserts that "Proportional representation is the architect of communism and disorder" (p. 17).

Despite somewhat minor flaws, the book is well worth reading. Mr. Moses is an exuberant, optimistic public servant. Although keenly aware of the severe handicaps and problems of the public service, he is not a cynic. He is firmly convinced that the major governmental problems can be solved in the interest of a better American way of life. We must have "vision and idealism" and "creative realism to give them meaning."—R. J. TREBOLINI, Lehigh University.

Democracy and the American Party System.

By AUSTIN RANNEY AND WILLMOORE KENDALL. (New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company. 1956. Pp. xiv, 550. $5.75.)

The authors, a "liberal Democrat . . . [and] a conservative Republican" ask whether "the American party system is a valuable agency of democratic government" and answer affirmatively. Beginning with an examination of democratic theory and constructing a verbal democratic model, of which formal majoritarianism (to which both writers are committed) is a feature, they then examine political parties historically and comparatively as facilitating democratic institutions; and they further examine the emergence of immanent attitudes toward parties from righteous rejection through suspicious tolerance to indifferent and (for some, at least) enthusiastic acceptance. All this forms a background for discussing American parties—their structure (competitive and one-party situations, membership, and formal and informal organizations) as well as their major activities (nominating, electing, and governing). Minor parties are scrutinized, and the book culminates in a sketch of the American political environment against which the function of the political parties is further described and evaluated; the conclusion rejects the APSA Committee's report "Toward a More Responsible Two-Party System."

Registration of Voters in Alabama. By DONALD S. STRONG. (University, Ala.: University of Alabama Bureau of Public Administration. 1956. Pp. vi, 135.)

"Registration of voters is both a record-keeping process and a method of restricting the electorate." Each aspect is presented with clarity in this study. The registration process appears as the most recent in a long series of efforts to disfranchise the negro. It is also an effective deterrent for the uninterested or poorly educated white. The author suggests that local variations in administration of state law correspond to variations in the social situation. A special questionnaire used only in Montgomery to discourage labor voting would disfranchise many readers of this journal. The report concludes with carefully considered recommendations for improvement.

Letter to a Generation. By RALPH E. FLANDERS. (Boston: The Beacon Press, 1956. Pp. 116. $2.50.)

This is a strongly moral exhortation to work towards peace and freedom for all peoples. It is not noteworthy for originality of thought or newness of phrase and gives the impression that symbols can do it all, as in the late Helen Hokinson's cartoons. The book is none the less a respectable tract by a good and very admirable humanitarian.

A Catholic Runs for President: The Campaign of 1928. By EDMUND A. MOORE. (New York: The Ronald Press Company. 1956. Pp. xii, 220. $3.50.)

This book reviews the polemics excited by Al Smith's campaign for the presidency. Contemporary statements are quoted freely. The author concludes that the religious issue in the Smith-Hoover contest is difficult to separate from others and that religion is still a potentially divisive force in American politics.

The Fabulous Democrats: A History of the Democratic Party in Text and Pictures. By DAVID L. COHN. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1956. Pp. 192. $5.95.)

A simplified history of the Democratic Party with numerous illustrations. A highly favorable view of the subject.

Eisenhower the President. By MURDO J. PUSEY. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1956. Pp. 300. $3.75.)

The story of the President and his administration as they have moved without interruption from success to success. Suitable for campaign use by Republican committees.

The Hoover Report 1953-1955: What It Means to You as Citizen and Taxpayer. By NEIL MACNEIL AND HAROLD W. METZ. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1956. Pp. vi, 344. $6.00.)

A popular summary by the Commission's chief editor and research director. Chapters are devoted to the various reports of the Commission, whose conservative temper and attitudes are evidently shared by the authors of this book.

Party Politics. By IVAN HINDERAKER. (New York: Henry Holt and Company. 1956. Pp. x, 694. $6.50.)

Basically a discursive commentary on the political practices developed by the federal two-party organization. Strong theoretical cast which obstructs systematic unification of the subject. Much shrewd analysis but mixed at important points with superficial definition. Pleasant style. Many pictorial illustrations.

The Two-Party System in the United States. By WILLIAM GOODMAN. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc. 1956. Pp. xii, 649. $6.00.)

This textbook differs from other texts in the field by giving a reasoned account of the causes which produced the two-party system with its characteristic political behavior. Expository and analytical rather than historical in its method. Neatly tied in with the usual descriptive material. Closely written with fluent style. Charts and tables.

Public Finance and Economic Welfare. By KENYON E. POOLE. (New York: Rinehart & Company, Inc. 1956. Pp. xvi, 640. $6.50.)

A systematic and well integrated treatment of fiscal policy is contained in this text. Noteworthy inclusions are: the development of well defined norms; the thorough treatment of Keynesian employment theory; the discussion of the interrelationships of monetary and fiscal policy; and the impact of fiscal policy on the distribution of income. Approximately one-third of the book is concerned with taxation per se. Also included is an interesting and valuable discussion of intergovernmental fiscal relations. Particularly welcome is the thoroughgoing orientation of the analysis and the policy proposals to the important social problems of stability and growth.

Public Control of Economic Enterprise. By HAROLD KOONTZ AND RICHARD W. GABLE. (New York, Toronto, London: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 1956. Pp. xii, 851. $7.00.)

An encyclopedia of description is provided by the authors of this textbook. Control, beyond anti-trust legislation, is construed by the authors to include even monetary, fiscal, and direct controls. The meaning of economic enterprise is extended to include transportation, public utilities, labor, agriculture, and finance, in addition to manufacturing. In order to judge the desirability and efficacy of controls, the norms of results need to be more clearly and consistently set forth by the authors. In addition, a knowledge of the structure, behavior, and results of the economy beyond that to be gained from the text is necessary in order to evaluate controls. The text is suited to the control portion of an industrial organization-public policy course when this broad type of coverage is desired.

The Development of American Petroleum Pipelines: A Study in Private Enterprise and Public Policy, 1862-1906. By ARTHUR MENZIES JOHNSON. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1956. Pp. xiii, 307. $4.50.)

The thesis developed in this historical work is that the control of pipelines was a major instrument in the formation of the structure of the petroleum industry. Also, the thesis is advanced that public policy in the early period was oriented and used to enhance the position of particular firms, notably Standard Oil, rather than to gain material welfare for the consumer. Although these points in this useful study appear convincing, the various judgments of the author concerning the role of public policy in this area as opposed to other areas and the influence of the historical development of the period on the future development of the industry and of policy are not proved in this volume.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE

University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Acheson, Dean. Legislative-Executive Relations. Yale Review. June, 1956.

Bartley, Ernest R. The President and Congress. Social Science. June, 1956.

Immigration. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Spring, 1956.

Maloney, Walter H., Jr. Involuntary Loss of American Citizenship. Saint Louis University Law Journal. Spring, 1956.

Mulder, William. Immigration and the "Mormon Question": An International Episode. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Postal Rate Increase. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. June-July, 1956.

Schneider, Henry. Aliens and the United States Income Tax—1956. Taxes. September, 1956.

Surrey, Stanley S. Current Issues in the Taxation of Corporate Foreign Investment. Columbia Law Review. June, 1956.

State Government

Friedman, Robert S. A Selected Bibliography of Maryland State and Local Government. Bureau of Governmental Research, University of Maryland. 1956.

The Governors' Conference, 1956. State Government. August, 1956.

Judah, Charles B., and Frederick C. Irion. The 47th State: An Appraisal of Its Government. Division of Government Research, University of New Mexico. 1956.

Langlie, Arthur B. The Responsibility of the States and Their Governors. State Government. August, 1956.

Morrow, Glenn D. State Constitutional Limitations on the Taxing Authority of State Legislatures. National Tax Journal. June, 1956.

Scott, Stanley. Streamlining State Legislatures. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 1956.

State Control Over Watercraft. Illinois Legislative Council. 1956.

A Symposium on Legislation. Louisiana Law Review. June, 1956.

Local Government

Arnold, David S. Sources of Management Information. Public Management. August, 1956.

Bailey, Stephen K. Leadership in Local Government. Yale Review. June, 1956.

City Consolidation in the Lower Peninsula. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Virginia. 1956.

Gillespie, John. Government in Metropolitan Austin. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Texas. 1956.

Gulick, Luther H. The Coming Age of Cities. Institute of Local Government, University of Pittsburgh. 1956.

Hall, James K. Sales-Assessment Ratio Survey in Washington. National Tax Journal. June, 1956.

Kallen, Horace M. City Planning and the Idea of the City: Considerations Especially About New York. Social Research. Summer, 1956.

Lloyd, William J. Tort Liability of Municipalities for Defects in Streets and Sidewalks. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Mars, David. The Government of the Connecticut County. County Officer. June, 1956.

Municipal Inducements to Private Industry. Minnesota Law Review. May, 1956.

Parking: Legal, Financial, Administrative. Eno Foundation for Highway Traffic Control, Saugatuck, Conn. 1956.

Planning and Building for Better Living in Cities and Counties. Department of City and Regional Planning, University of California, Berkeley. 1956.

Wagner, Robert F. 1956 Federal Legislative Round-up of Bills with Municipal Interest. Western City. August, 1956.

Intergovernmental Relations

Anderson, William. The Commission on Intergovernmental Relations and the United States Federal System. Journal of Politics. May, 1956.

Chute, Charlton F. Today's Urban Regions. National Municipal Review. June, 1956. II. Ibid. July, 1956.

Federal Expenditures in Washington. Bureau of Business Research, University of Washington. 1956.

Heller, Francis H. Our Stake in the Federal System. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1956.

Jones, Victor, and John E. Bebout. Meeting of Minds, Ideas [on Metropolitan Problems]. National Municipal Review. June, 1956.

Muskin, Selma J. Distribution of Federal Taxes Among the States. National Tax Journal. June, 1956.

State Aid to Local Government. Department of Audit and Control, State of New York. August, 1956.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Abrams, Charles. Civil Rights in 1956. Commentary. August, 1956.

Constitutional Restrictions on a Lessee of Public Property. Virginia Law Review. June, 1956.

Crosskey, William Winslow. John Marshall and the Constitution. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Dembitz, Nanette. Congressional Investigation of Newspapermen, Authors, and Others in the Opinion Field—Its Legality under the First Amendment. Minnesota Law Review. April, 1956.

The Doctrine of Interposition: A Round Table. Journal of Public Law. Spring, 1956.

Dunbar, Leslie W. James Madison and the Ninth Amendment. Virginia Law Review. June, 1956.

Gardner, George K. Free Speech in Public Places. Boston University Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Horowitz, Harold W. Legal Aspects of "Political Black Listing" in the Entertainment Industry. Southern California Law Review. April, 1956.

McDonough, John R., Jr. Mr. Justice Jackson and Full Faith and Credit to Divorce Decrees: A Critique. Columbia Law Review. June, 1956.

Nineteenth Century Judicial Thought Concerning Church-State Relations. Minnesota Law Review. May, 1956.

Pittman, R. Carter. The Fifth Amendment: Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow. American Bar Association Journal. June, 1956.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Abernathy, Glenn. Organization and Jurisdiction of the Courts of South Carolina.

Bureau of Public Administration, University of South Carolina. 1956.

Buiteweg, Joannes. History of Michigan's One-Man Grand Jury. University of Detroit Law Journal. May, 1956.

Cohen, Julius. The "Good Man" and the Role of Reason in Legislative Law. Cornell Law Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Dixon, Robert G., Jr. Judicial Administration in Maryland—The Administrative Office of the Courts. Maryland Law Review. Spring, 1956. Part II. Ibid. Summer, 1956.

Douglas, William O. The Durham Rule: A Meeting Ground for Lawyers and Psychiatrists. Iowa Law Review. Summer, 1956.

Foot, Caleb. Vagrancy-Type Law and Its Administration. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. March, 1956.

Foster, G. W., Jr. Personal Jurisdiction Based on Local Causes of Action. Wisconsin Law Review. July, 1956.

Greenberg, Jack. Social Scientists Take the Stand: A Review and Appraisal of Their Testimony in Litigation. Michigan Law Review. May, 1956.

Jones, Walter B. Trial by Jury in Alabama. Alabama Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Justice Delayed. Journal of the American Judicature Society. June, 1956.

Law and the Future: A Symposium. Northwestern University Law Review. May-June, 1956.

Report of the New York State Joint Legislative Committee Studying the Publication and Dissemination of Objectionable and Obscene Materials. Legislative Document No. 32. 1956.

Ross, Russell M. The Iowa Judicial System. Iowa Journal of History. April, 1956.

Simon, David. The Attorney-Client Privilege as Applied to Corporations. Yale Law Journal. June, 1956.

Some Aspects of the California Grand Jury System. Stanford Law Review. July, 1956.

Stevens, Robert S. A Plea for the Extension of Equitable Principles and Remedies. Cornell Law Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Submission of Lesser Crimes. Columbia Law Review. June, 1956.

Swartz, Aaron S., Jr. Compulsory Arbitration: An Experiment in Pennsylvania. American Bar Association Journal. June, 1956.

Thompson, Raymond. Court Etiquette. Journal of the State Bar of California. July-August, 1956.

Vanderbilt, Arthur T. Impasses in Justice. Washington University Law Quarterly. June, 1956.

———. The Municipal Court—The Most Important Court in New Jersey; Its Remarkable Progress and Its Unsolved Problems. Rutgers Law Review. Summer, 1956.

Williamson, Hugh P. A Curious Checkboard: Disparate Rules of Admission in Federal Courts. American Bar Association Journal. August, 1956.

Winters, Glenn R. Newsfronts of Judicial Reform. Journal of the American Judicature Society. June, 1956.

Wright, Charles Alan. A Primer of Practical Evidence. Minnesota Law Review. May, 1956.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Aaron, Roy H. Scope of Judicial Review of Local Administrative Agencies in California. Southern California Law Review. April, 1956.

Ansley, Norman. The United States Secret Service: An Administrative History. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. May-June, 1956.

Appraisal, Confrontation and the Passport Applicant. Stanford Law Review. July, 1956.

Berger, Philip R. A Lesson in Cooperation. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1956.

Brownlow, Louis. Woodrow Wilson and Public Administration. Public Administration Review. Spring, 1956.

California Administrative Law. [Symposium.] California Law Review. May, 1956.

Competitors' Standing to Challenge Administrative Action under the APA. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. April, 1956.

Demerath, Nicholas J., and John W. Thibaut. Small Groups and Administrative Organizations. Administrative Science Quarterly. September, 1956.

Dotson, Arch. A General Theory of Public Employment. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1956.

Eichstedt, John H. Payments in Lieu of Taxes on Public Lands under the Jurisdiction of the Michigan Department of Conservation. Bureau of Government, Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1956.

Ficek, Karel F. After the Therblig—What? Public Administration Review. Summer, 1956.

Heady, Ferrel, and Robert H. Pealy. The Michigan Department of Administration: A Case Study in the Politics of Administration. Public Administration Review. Spring, 1956.

Helstad, Orrin L. New Law on Administrative Rule Making [in Wisconsin]. Wisconsin Law Review. May, 1956.

Joy, James V. The Disputes Clause in Government Contracts: A Survey of Court and Administrative Decisions. Fordham Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Kessler, Samuel L. The New York State Interdepartmental Committee on Methods and Procedures, 1947-1956. Public Administration Review. Spring, 1956.

Krislov, Joseph. Unemployment Compensation for Public Employees. Public Personnel Review. July, 1956.

Lappegaard, Ray. A Look at Some Administrative Problems. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1956.

Litchfield, Edward H. Notes on a General Theory of Administration. Administrative Science Quarterly. June, 1956.

Lystad, Mary H., and Robert C. Stone. Bureaucratic Mass Media: A Study in Role Definitions. Social Forces. May, 1956.

McClelland, C. S. The Covenant Against Contingent Fees as a Method of Eliminating the "5-Percenter." Cornell Law Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

McEwen, William J. Position Conflict and Professional Orientation in a Research Organization. Administrative Science Quarterly. September, 1956.

McGurrin, James J. Special Problems in Federal Personnel Management Abroad. Public Personnel Review. July, 1956.

Millett, John D. A Critical Appraisal of the Study of Public Administration. Administrative Science Quarterly. September, 1956.

Morgan, Glenn G. On Being an Intern—and Afterward. Public Administration Review. Spring, 1956.

Mosher, Frederick C. Research in Public Administration: Some Notes and Suggestions. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1956.

Netterville, Victor S. The Substantial Evidence Rule in California Administrative Law. Stanford Law Review. July, 1956.

Pealy, Robert H. A Comparative Study of Property Tax Administration in Illinois and Michigan. Bureau of Government, Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1956.

Rao, Paul P. Customs Administration and Law. Fordham Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Reining, Henry. Recent Advances in Public Administration. County Officer. July-August, 1956.

Stark, Maurice E. Claims for Refund of Federal Taxes. Iowa Law Review. Summer, 1956.

Symposium on the Proposed Administrative Court. George Washington Law Review. June, 1956.

Wells, Henry. Reorganization in Puerto Rico. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

An Analysis of Senator John W. Brieker's Report Entitled "The Network Monopoly." Columbia Broadcasting System. June, 1956.

Bloom, Arnold. Tax Results of Political Contributions. Boston University Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Bradford, Robert F. Republicans and Sinners. Harvard Business Review. July-August, 1956.

Buchanan, William. An Inquiry Into Purposive Voting. Journal of Politics. May, 1956.
Changing American Politics. [Symposium.] Current History. August, 1956.

Doss, Richard B. Inside the Democratic National Convention of 1904. Virginia Magazine of History and Biography. July, 1956.

Enoch, Kurt. The Mass Media: Challenge/Chimera? Essential Books. June, 1956.

Epstein, Leon D. American Parties: A Wisconsin Case Study. Political Studies. February, 1956.

Eulau, Heinz. Identification with Class and Political Perspective. Journal of Politics. May, 1956.

Gatlin, Douglas S., and Bruce B. Mason. Reapportionment: Its History in Florida. Public Administration Clearing Service, University of Florida. 1956.

Janowitz, Morris, and Dwaine Marvick. Competitive Pressure and Democratic Consent. Bureau of Government, Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1956.

Lasswell, Harold D. The Decision Process: Seven Categories of Functional Analysis. Bureau of Governmental Research, University of Maryland. 1956.

MacDonald, James C. Press Relations for Local Officials. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1956.

Marbut, Frederick B. Decline of the Official Press in Washington. Journalism Quarterly. Summer, 1956.

McCoy, Donald R. The Progressive National Committee of 1936. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Mitau, G. Theodore. The Status of Political Party Organization in Minnesota Law. Minnesota Law Review. April, 1956.

Naftalin, Arthur. The Tradition of Protest and the Roots of the Farmer-Labor Party. Minnesota History. June, 1956.

Network Practices. Columbia Broadcasting System. June, 1956.

Ogburn, William F., and Charles M. Grigg. Factors Related to the Virginia Vote on Segregation. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Pollack, Jack Harrison. They'll Steal Your Vote. National Municipal Review. July, 1956.

Pool, Itfiel de Sola, ed. Studies in Political Communication. [Symposium.] Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Reissman, Leonard, K. H. Silvert, and Cliff W. Wing, Jr. The New Orleans Voter: A Handbook of Political Description. Tulane Studies in Political Science, Vol. II. 1955. [1956.]

Reock, Ernest C., Jr., and Stanley H. Friedelbaum. Congressional Districting in New Jersey. Bureau of Government Research, Rutgers University. 1956.

Ridge, Martin. Ignatius Donnelly and the Granger Movement in Minnesota. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. March, 1956.

Rogers, Lindsay. U. S. Political Party System. Think. June, 1956.

Scammon, Richard M. Washington Votes Again. National Municipal Review. July, 1956.

Smuckler, Ralph H., and George M. Belknap. Leadership and Participation in Urban Political Affairs. Government Research Bureau, Michigan State University. 1956.

Sweeting, Orville J. John Q. Tilson and the Reapportionment Act of 1929. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Vines, Kenneth N. Republicanism in New Orleans. Tulane Studies in Political Science, Vol. II. 1955. [1956.]

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Baratz, Morton S. Corporate Giants and the Power Structure. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

The Budget, the Economy and Tax Reduction in 1956. Committee for Economic Development. June, 1956.

Federal Excise Taxes. Tax Foundation. 1956.

Kaltenbach, Henry J. The Federal Highway Program and Its Significance to Real Estate. The Appraisal Journal. July, 1956.

Ritter, Lawrence S. Functional Finance and the Banking System. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. July, 1956.

A Symposium on the Legal Aspects of an Atomic Era. Texas Law Review. June, 1956.

Agriculture

American Farm Policy. [Symposium.] Current History. September, 1956.

Federal Farm Policy. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. August-September, 1956.

Knapp, David C. Congressional Control of Agricultural Conservation Policy. A Case Study of the Appropriations Process. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1956.

Liss, Samuel. Farm Wage Boards under the Wage Stabilization Program during World War II. Agricultural History. July, 1956.

Ryan, John L. Government Regulations Affecting the Value of Agricultural Properties. The Appraisal Journal. July, 1956.

Shideler, James H. Herbert Hoover and the Federal Farm Board Project, 1921-1925. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. March, 1956.

Business and Labor

Alexander, John H., and William B. Landis, Jr. Bail-outs and the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Yale Law Journal. June, 1956.

Edwards, Corwin D. Twenty Years of the Robinson-Patman Act. Journal of Business. July, 1956.

Graham, Howard Jay. "Built Better Than They Knew." Part 1: The Framers, the Railroads and the Fourteenth Amendment. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. Summer, 1956.

Kaye, Stephen Rackow. Are "Conventional Methods" Necessary in Natural Gas Rate Regulation? Cornell Law Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Kharas, Ralph E., and Robert F. Koretz. Judicial Determination of the Arbitrable Issue in Labor Arbitration—Some Recent Developments. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Koretz, Robert F. The Lockout Revisited. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1956.

McConnell, Campbell R. Pros and Cons of the Guaranteed Annual Wage. Labor Law Journal. July, 1956.

McGee, John S. Price Discrimination and Competitive Effects: The Standard Oil of Indiana Case. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Morgan, Chester A. Unions and State Antitrust Laws. Labor Law Journal. July, 1956.

Rains, Harry H. The Current Status of Organizational or Recognition Picketing. Labor Law Journal. September, 1956.

Regulation of Employee Benefit Plans: Activate the Law of Trusts. Stanford Law Review. July, 1956.

Sandler, Woodrow J. NLRB Administrative Rulings Concerning the "24-Hour Rule." Labor Law Journal. September, 1956.

Securities and Exchange Commission Regulation of Proxy Contests. Harvard Law Review. June, 1956.

Shubik, Martin. A Game Theorist Looks at the Antitrust Laws and the Automobile Industry. Stanford Law Review. July, 1956.

State Mediation in 1956: Problems and Prospects. [Symposium.] Labor Law Journal. August, 1956.

Stone, David O. Assignment of Employee Accident Claims and the Conflict of Laws. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1956.

———. The Forum's Policy and the Defense of Faith and Credit to Workmen's Compensation Acts. Iowa Law Review. Summer, 1956.

Strong, George E. Role of the Lawyer in Arbitration, Mediation and Conciliation. Labor Law Journal. July, 1956.

A Symposium on the Federal Regulation of Natural-Gas Producers. Georgetown Law Journal. June, 1956.

Vile, M. J. C. Federalism and Labor Regulation in the United States and Australia. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1956.

Wyle, Benjamin. Unions in Search of a Forum to Enforce Contracts. Labor Law Journal. July, 1956.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Bolmeier, E. C. Legality and Propriety of Religious Instruction in the Public Schools. Educational Forum. May, 1956.

Campbell, Donald F., Jr. The Social Security Act: Twenty Years Experience. Journal of Accountancy. August, 1956.

Elkins, Eugene R., and Larry Young. Public Health Administration in West Virginia. Bureau for Government Research, West Virginia University. 1956.

Freeman, Roger A. Crisis in School Finance. Part II: How Can Rising School Needs Be Financed? National Tax Journal. June, 1956.

McKay, Robert B. "With All Deliberate Speed": A Study of School Desegregation. New York University Law Review. June, 1956.

Perkins, Ellen J. State and Local Financing of Public Assistance, 1935-55. Social Security Bulletin. July, 1956.

Military Affairs and National Security

Avins, Alfred. State Court Review of National Guard Courts-Martial and Military Board Decisions. Cornell Law Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Everett, Robinson O. Persons Who Can Be Tried by Court-Martial. Journal of Public Law. Spring, 1956.

Misconduct in the Prison Camp: A Survey of the Law and an Analysis of the Korean Cases. Columbia Law Review. May, 1956.

Pasley, Robert S. Sentence First—Verdict Afterwards: Dishonorable Discharges without Trial by Court-Martial? Cornell Law Quarterly. Summer, 1956.

Petersen, Val. Civil Defense and Law. Nebraska Law Review. March, 1956.

Prugh, George S., Jr. The Code of Conduct for the Armed Forces. Columbia Law Review. May, 1956.

Walsh, William F. Military Law: Return to Drumhead Justice? American Bar Association Journal. June, 1956.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Cotton Futures Contracts. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Farm Credit. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Miscellaneous Credit. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Armed Services. Commercial-Use of Selective Service Forms. Report and Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Area Assistance Act of 1956. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Housing Act of 1956. Hearings. Also House Report No. 2363. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Longshoremen's and Harbor Worker's Compensation Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Minimum Wages for Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. Hearings. 84th Cong. 1956.

———. Proposed Amendments to Public Laws 815 and 874, 81st Congress (Assistance to Federally Affected School Districts). Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. To Promote the Education of the Blind. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2771. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Foreign Affairs Advisory Board. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Foreign Service Act Amendments of 1956. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Mutual Security Act of 1956. Hearings. Also House Reports Nos. 2213, 2643. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Administration of Surplus Property Disposal. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 1956.

———. Employment of Experts and Consultants by Federal Agencies. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. The General Accounting Office: A Study of Its Organization and Administration with Recommendations for Increasing Its Effectiveness. House Report No. 2264. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Inquiry into the Expansion and Operation by General Services Administration of the Government Nickel Plant at Nicaro, Cuba. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2390. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1956 (New Offices in the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force). Hearing before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2585. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1956 (Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation). Hearing before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2599. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. To Simplify Accounting, Facilitate the Payment of Obligations, and for Other Purposes. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on House Administration. Paperwork Management. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Withdrawal and Utilization of the Public Lands of the United States. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Automobile Marketing Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong. 1956.

———. Communications Act Amendments. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2540. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (Chemical Additives in Food). Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Health Amendments Act of 1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2569. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. State Taxation of Interstate Trucking and the Reciprocity Problem. Staff Report. House Doc. No. 449. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Trip Leasing (Interstate Commerce Act). Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Appeal of Administrative Agency Decisions. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Automobile Dealer Franchises. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2850. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Establishment of a National Policy for Commercial Fisheries. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Liberalized Civil Service Retirement Benefits. House Report No. 2854. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Scientific, Professional, and Administrative Positions to Promote the National Defense. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Study of Manpower Utilization and Personnel Management in the Federal Government. House Report No. 2961. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Public Works. Rivers and Harbors and Beach Erosion Omnibus Bill. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2639. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Rules. Civil Rights. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Proposed Establishment of Committee on Administrative Procedure and Practice. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Un-American Activities. Investigation of Communist Activities in the Rocky Mountain Area. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Barring Payment of Pension to Veterans Imprisoned for More than 60 Days—Restricting Payments to Beneficiaries of Certain Veterans. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2584. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Findings and Recommendations of the President's Commission on Veterans' Pensions (Bradley Commission). Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. Organization for Trade Cooperation. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Renegotiation Amendments Act of 1956. House Report No. 2549. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. The Organization and Procedures of the Federal Regulatory Commissions and Agencies and Their Effect on Small Business. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

House and Senate. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, Senate, and Committee on Government Operations, House. The Al Sarena Case. Joint hearings before Subcommittees. Also House Report No. 2408. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. Civilian Atomic Power Acceleration Program. Hearing. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Governmental Indemnity. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Sale of Communities. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2693. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Shortage of Scientific and Engineering Manpower. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Joint Committee on the Economic Report. Conflicting Official Views on Monetary Policy: April 1956. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Defense Essentiality and Foreign Economic Policy (Case Study: The Watch Industry and Precision Skills). Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 2629. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

Senate. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Administration of Farm Programs by Farmer Committees. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Farm Credit Act of 1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Armed Services. Military Public Works Construction. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Study of Airpower. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Regulation of Bank Mergers. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Finance. Methods of Determining Value of Imported Goods for Duty Purposes. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Survivor Benefit Act. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Mutual Security Act of 1956. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Budgeting and Accounting. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Communist Interrogation, Indoctrination and Exploitation of American Military and Civilian Prisoners. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Reorganization of Safety Functions of the Federal Government. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Extension of Purchase Programs of Strategic and Critical Minerals. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Hawaii Reapportionment. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Session. 1956.

———. Nomination of Wesley A. D'Ewart to be Assistant Secretary of the Interior. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

——— and Committee on Public Works. Conservation and Development of Water Resources. Joint Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Amending Interstate Commerce Act (To Alleviate Freight Car Shortage). Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Amendments to Public Utility Holding Company Act, 1935. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Merchant Marine Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. New Ship Construction. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Permanent Certification for Alaska-Hawaii Airlines. Hearing. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Study of Operation of Civil Aeronautics Administration. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. The Television Inquiry: Allocations Phase. Senate Report No. 2769. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. To Amend Section 2 of the Clayton Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Amendments to Refugee Relief Act of 1953. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Balancing of the Budget. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Equal Rights. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Federal-State Concurrent Jurisdiction. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Jurisdiction in Sedition Cases. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Juvenile Delinquency: Commercial Child Adoption Practices. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Legislation Affecting Corporate Mergers. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Nomination of Simon E. Sobeloff. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Return of Confiscated Property. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Taxes on Incomes, Inheritances, and Gifts. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Area Redevelopment. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 2555. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Federal Advisory Council on the Arts. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Railroad Retirement. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Veterans' Loan Guaranty

Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Administration of the Federal Employees' Security Program. Senate Report No. 2750. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. F.H.A. Investigation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Committee on Public Works. Amending the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act. Hearing before Subcommittee. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Report of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation Relating to Renegotiation. Senate Doc. No. 126. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. Motion-Picture Distribution Trade Practices—1956. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 2818. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Small Business Administration—1956. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

———. Supply and Distribution of Nickel. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956.

Other Federal

Department of Agriculture. Graduate School. Democracy in Federal Administration. Edited by O. B. Conaway, Jr. 1956.

Department of the Army. Adjutant General's Office. Army Library. United States National Security. Special Bibliography No. 7. 1956.

National Academy of Sciences—National Research Council. The Biological Effects of Atomic Radiation. Summary Reports. Also: A Report to the Public. 1956.

National Science Foundation. Organization of the Federal Government for Scientific Activities. 1956.

President's Committee on Government Contracts. A Manual for the Guidance of Personnel Engaged in Obtaining Compliance with the National Equal Job Opportunity Program. 1956.

Small Business Administration. Technical Aids for Small Business. Edited by J. Wade Rice. 1956.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

Modern Political Parties: Approaches to Comparative Politics. EDITED BY SIGMUND NEUMANN. WITH CONTRIBUTIONS BY FREDERICK C. BARGHOORN, SAMUEL H. BEER, GWENDOLEN M. CARTER, ANDREW GYORGY, CHARLES A. MICAUD, SIGMUND NEUMANN, FELIX E. OPPENHEIM, DANKWART A. RUSTOW, ROBERT A. SCALAPINO, AND E. E. SCHATTSCHEIDER. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1956. Pp. xii, 460. $7.50.)

This should prove to be a widely used reference book on comparative party systems. It contains separate expositions of democratic party systems in Great Britain, the British self-governing dominions, France, Belgium, the Scandinavian countries, and the United States. There are also treatments of the one-party systems of the Soviet Union and of the East European satellites. The present German and Japanese party systems are also presented, with extensive background material on the earlier political systems of those countries.

In all cases the treatment is basically functional, without excessive emphasis upon formal structure though the more important features of party structure are adequately presented. Party functioning is discussed in relation to appropriate phases of historical background and of social context. Each section is written by a specialist in the area or country concerned.

These studies were made independently, in so far as no general conceptual framework was imposed, but in the hope that they might contribute to a needed general theory of political parties. Toward this goal very little has been attained. This is probably to be expected of a project which attempts "a simultaneous attack on both theory and practice" and which employs area specialists in the presentation of all the empirical material.

There are introductory and concluding essays by the editor. The latter essay summarizes the more or less accepted theoretical considerations as to democratic party systems—the different functioning of two-party and multi-party systems and the historical sequence of different types of parties in Western Europe—and also characterizes a number of questions for study in the development of a modern "sociology of parties." For the most part these latter considerations are merely suggestive. As the editor suggests in the introductory essay, genuine comparison is seriously hampered in this as in other aspects of comparative government because "we are still living within an ideological framework of a hundred years back." In this as in other areas of political generalization it is probable that serious progress will depend upon the introduction of new classificatory concepts which will draw distinctions more fruitful in an explicative sense than those secured by the application of the traditional concepts.—G. LOWELL FIELD, The University of Connecticut.

The Political Role of Women. BY MAURICE DUVERGER. (Paris: UNESCO. 1955. Pp. 221. $2.50.)

The scope of this book is far more limited than its title suggests. The work is based on a relatively small body of statistics drawn from only four countries—France, the German Federal Republic, Norway, and Yugoslavia—and indeed from rather inadequate material even for these four. None the less, the conclusions the study reaches and certainly the questions it asks are important. The book should serve as a pioneer venture in a field which needs far more exploration.

The Political Role of Women is divided into two sections: the part women play in elections and the part they play in political leadership. As can be expected, the survey finds that in the countries under consideration the role of women in parliament, local government, the civil service, and political parties is far less than their numbers as voters might suggest. Part of the reason, in M. Duverger's view, is male opposition to sharing positions of importance; no less or perhaps even more important is the general assumption that politics is a man's field, an assumption made no less widely by women themselves than by men. Whether women's continued use of the franchise will help to break down this assumption, as M. Duverger suggests, remains to be seen. Even in the United States, groups like the League of Women Voters and the women's colleges have done little enough as yet to change this view, as he himself comments in the report he presented to the Political Science Congress at The Hague in 1952, which is reprinted as one of the four appendices of the book.

What the study suggests about women's use of their franchise is again not unexpected but also not unimportant. On the whole, married women were found to vote in the same way as their husbands, but it is far from sure that the influence runs all one way. Women are less party-bound than men; they abstain more often from voting; they are more likely to be influenced by personalities than are men, though, contrary to the general view, more women among those for whom there are statistics vote on the basis of platforms than of people.*

Perhaps the most important conclusion drawn from M. Duverger's material is that, despite the hospitality of left-wing parties to women candidates, women voters tend to support the more conservative and religiously-oriented parties, like those of continental Christian Democracy. Particularly in France, this may be far from unimportant for the balance of parliamentary power. At least on one occasion—the defeat of the draft constitution of the Fourth Republic in the referendum of May 1948—the women's vote is thought to have been decisive.

One rather disturbing suggestion in M. Duverger's general conclusions is that there is an increasing tendency for women in politics to specialize on what are known as women's fields: health, housing, education, family welfare, etc. Thus in place of the earlier insistence on equality of citizenship, which was maintained so strongly in the fight for women's suffrage, there is a growing emphasis by political parties, and even by women's groups, on serving particular interests. The advantage may be that these very important interests will receive attention which they would otherwise lack; the danger is of an unnatural segmenting of life. Any over-sharp division between men and women, particularly in the field of political parties, could sacrifice individuality and personality to numbers and to an assumption of basic intellectual differences which has certainly not yet been proved.—GWENDOLEN M. CARTER, Smith College.

Public Enterprise: A Study of its Organisation and Management in Various Countries. EDITED BY A. H. HANSON. (Brussels: International Institute of Administrative Sciences. 1955. Pp. 530. $7.00.)

A useful selection of working papers prepared for the Seminar on the Organisation and Administration of Public Enterprise in the Industrial Field, held in Rangoon in March, 1954, under the joint sponsorship of the United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, the United Nations

Technical Assistance Administration, and the International Institute of Administrative Sciences. This does not purport to be a world survey of public enterprise; it is, rather, an unsystematic presentation of certain national experiences in public enterprise in several highly developed and less highly developed countries. There is great variety in the aspects of the subject chosen for discussion, there are many gaps, and the papers are uneven in quality. The collection, however, is interesting, informative, and stimulating; and the variety does not detract from its value.

The Colonial Office. By SIR CHARLES JEFFRIES. (New York: Oxford University Press, Inc. London: George Allen & Unwin, Ltd. 1956. Pp. 222. $2.40.)

This latest issue in the New Whitehall Series has been long needed and will prove invaluable to any student of the modern British empire. The author is now Deputy Under-Secretary in the Colonial Office; he thus writes with sympathy and authority, but he writes, too, with charm and objectivity. The book describes the organization of the office, the recruitment and management of its personnel, the problems confronted in various colonial territories and functional fields, and the general pattern of British colonial administration.

British Government Inspection as a Dynamic Process: The Local Services and the Central Departments. By JOHN S. HARRIS. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1955. Pp. xii, 196. $4.25.)

A careful study of inspection as a device by which the central government ministries ensure compliance by local bodies with central policies and standards. The author emphasizes the two-way function of the inspectorate, passing information and complaint to Whitehall as well as enforcing local conformity. Each functional area is examined, the techniques are described, and the effectiveness of the inspection process is evaluated. A very competent piece of work.

The People and the Constitution: Being a History of the Development of the People's Influence in British Government. By CECIL S. EMDEN. (2nd ed., rev. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press. 1956. Pp. vi, 339. $6.75.)

This new edition of a book first published in 1933—see this REVIEW, XXVII (1933), 643 f.—has been "revised and brought up to date."

It remains, however, useful chiefly as a convenient summary of the eighteenth-nineteenth century development of the machinery of popular influence and of the changing opinion of statesmen on the constitutional role of the people. Mr. Emden's treatment of more recent developments, his analyses of actual popular influence, and his ventures at normative theory are too elementary to be of value to political scientists.

The British Commonwealth: An Experiment in Co-operation Among Nations. By FRANK H. UNDERHILL. (Durham: Duke University Press. 1956. Pp. xxiii, 127. $2.00.)

These three brief lectures by an eminent Canadian historian inaugurate a publication series by Duke University's new Commonwealth Studies Center. One hopes the series will maintain this impressive standard of perceptiveness, urbanity, and charm. The author offers an analysis of the historical development of the Commonwealth, an interpretation of its present structure, and a cautious prognosis of its future.

Divided We Stand: A Study of Partition. By MICHAEL SHEEHY. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1956. Pp. 104. $2.75.)

The author of this thin volume is a rarity: a young Southern Irishman and sincere Roman Catholic who deplores the current efforts to end the partition of the island by forcing Ulster into the Republic of Eire. The arguments he makes in defense of partition (reasonably dispassionate in view of the controversy) embrace historical, sociological, and ethical considerations.

The Struggle for Responsible Government in the North-West Territories, 1870-97. By LEWIS HERBERT THOMAS. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press. 1956. Pp. vii, 276. $5.00.)

A history of the various stages of territorial rule in western Canada, particularly in the areas now comprising Saskatchewan and Alberta. The book is divided into two sections, "The Establishment of the Territorial System" and "The Movement for Territorial Autonomy."

Trade Union Government and Administration in Great Britain. By B. C. ROBERTS. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. vii, 570. $6.00.)

An extensive study of the government and administration of British trade unions. The legal framework, the main structure of trade union government, the electoral process, officialdom, finance, and federal and T.U.C. organization are considered successively. Some of the data are reassembled, union by union, in an appendix. The author is specially concerned with democratic organization and control. He concludes that "while the unions have sacrificed democratic control for administrative efficiency as they have grown larger and more centralized, there is evidence to show that in the last resort the wishes of the members are paramount." However, the location of power within the unions is not very sharply defined. Trade union policy and political activity, with the exception of political funds, are outside the scope of this study.

Return to Power: A Report on the New Germany. BY ALISTAIR HORNBY. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1956. Pp. 415. $7.00.)

A study of Germany, 1952-1955, by the London Daily Telegraph's correspondent at Bonn. The author emphasizes the struggle over Germany's relations to the EDC and NATO and political and economic developments in West Germany; interesting observations are also made about conditions in Russian-dominated East Germany.

Die Neugliederung des Bundesgebietes: Gutachten des von der Bundesregierung eingesetzten Sachverständigenausschusses. HRSG. VOM BUNDESMINISTERIUM DES INNERN. (Bonn, Köln, Berlin; Carl Heymanns Verlag K.G. 1955. Pp. 221. 3 fold. maps. DM 12.00.)

A government committee to consider problems of the rearrangement of the territory of the Länder of the Federal Republic was appointed by the Government on January 15, 1952, under the authority of art. 29 of the Federal Constitution. The chairman was former Reichskanzler Dr. Luther, who had long been interested in the problem. The report is the result of a three-year study of the various points involved and deals not only with the historical development of the areas but also with various considerations affecting the ability of the Länder to function effectively.—(J.B.C.)

Bibliographischer Dienst Staat und Recht. PUBLISHED BY THE DEUTSCHES INSTITUT FÜR RECHTSWISSENSCHAFT. Bi-monthly. (Berlin: Akademie Verlag GmbH. 1955-. DM 3.70 each number.)

For the current periodical literature in the fields of political science and law in the German Democratic Republic and in the People's Democracies, the highest official legal research agency of the DDR has been publishing since October, 1955, a bi-monthly classified bibliography. Included with this is a similar partial service for the journals of the German Federal Republic so far as received there, as well as an accessions-list of the library of the Institute, lists of translations into German from the Russian journal Sovetskoe gosudarstvo i pravo, and lists of unpublished translations into German available at the library of the Institute.—(J.B.C.)

250 questions, 250 answers, about the German Democratic Republic. BY THE COMMITTEE FOR GERMAN UNITY. (Berlin: Verlag Die Wirtschaft. 1955. Pp. 184.)

The English language edition, translated from the 4th German edition, presents the case for the unification of Germany from the official point of view of the German Democratic Republic, in a series of questions and answers. The first German edition is dated January, 1954.—(J.B.C.)

Mouvements ouvriers et socialistes (chronologie et bibliographie): La Russie. Tome I, 1725-1907. BY EUGÈNE ZALESKI. (Paris: Les Editions Ouvriers. 1956. Pp. 462.)

This is a bibliographical volume in a series dealing with the workers' movements in various countries, brought out under the auspices of L'Institut Français d'Histoire Social. The present work covers four areas: the infiltration of western ideas into Russia (1725-1850), the Populist Movement (1851-84), the emergence of the working-class and the birth of the Social Democratic Party (1885-1904), and the First Revolution (1905-1907). Volume Two, which is yet to appear, will carry the listings from 1907 to the present. The book is of special value to scholars not only because of its exhaustive listings, but also because of the inclusion under each work of a reference to the principal libraries in which it may be found.

Stalin's Great Secret. BY ISAAC DON LEVINE. (New York: Coward-McCann, Inc. 1956. Pp. 126. $2.50.)

Much expanded from an article in Life magazine, this book provides further evidence for the author's assertion that Stalin was an agent of the Okhrana. It will not be easy to confirm (or to refute) this well constructed case, which opens a new avenue to the understanding of a mysterious character.

The Balkans in Our Time. By ROBERT LEE WOLFF. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. xxi, 618. $8.00.)

A thorough study of Yugoslavia, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Albania since the beginning of World War II, with adequate background material to bring present-day Balkan problems into proper focus, by the wartime chief of the Balkan Section, Research and Analysis Branch, OSS, who is one of America's foremost Balkan experts. In detail, the author describes conditions in the Balkans before and during World War II, shows how the Communists came into power in all four countries, and describes political, social, and economic life in these countries since they fell into the Soviet orbit.

History of Turkey: From Empire to Republic. By M. PHILIPS PRICE. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1956. Pp. 224. $4.50.)

Written by a British Member of Parliament and specialist on Near Eastern affairs, this brief history stresses the events leading to the rise of modern Turkey, the reforms of the Ataturk era, current political, social, and economic problems, and the role of Turkey in resisting Russian expansion.

Nationalism and Communism in East Asia. By W. MACMAHON BALL. (New York: Cambridge University Press. 2nd ed., rev. 1956. Pp. v, 220. $5.15.)

A revised edition of a standard short work by an Australian political scientist and governmental official. The relationship between nationalism and communism is examined in the context of developments and trends in ten Asian countries.

The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. (Karachi: Department of Advertising, Films and Publications. 1956. Pp. xvii, 224.)

The Constitution of Pakistan, finally adopted and enacted by the Constituent Assembly on February 29, 1956, was published by the Ministry of Law in March, 1956. The official edition of the text is unfortunately not indexed, and a rapid scanning of the table of contents does not furnish sufficient indication of many interesting features of the basic law of the first Islamic Republic.—(J.B.C.)

Policy Statement. ADOPTED BY THE SECOND NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF THE PRAJA SOCIALIST PARTY HELD AT GAYA, 26-30 DECEMBER, 1955. (New Delhi: Praja Socialist Party. 1956. Pp. 99. Annas 12.)

The statement was prepared mainly by the late chairman of the Party, Acharya Narendra Deva, and "elucidates the Party's ideological differences from individualism and communism, offers a brief criticism of the principles and policies of the Congress and the Communist Parties, and reviews in brief the objectives and claims of the Congress Government."—(J.B.C.)

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

HIRAM M. STOUT

Washington, D. C.

General

Collin, P. V. Considérations sur le Recrutement et la Formation Professionnelle du Personnel de l'État. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1, 1956.

Cooper, H. Political Preparedness for Self-Government. The Annals. July, 1956.

Domenach, J. M. Again the Popular Front. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Dretse, G. Constitutional Courts in Europe. Dickinson Law Review. June, 1956.

Ellis, H. S. The Financing of Economic Development in Underdeveloped Areas. Indian Economic Journal. January, 1956.

Gersh, G. Communism and Catholic Parties in Europe. Social Science. June, 1956.

Lowenthal, R. Three Roads to Power. Problems of Communism. July-August, 1956.

Schiller, O. Significance of the Soviet Agrarian System in Asian Countries. International Affairs. July, 1956.

Tinker, I. and Walker, M. The First General Elections in India and Indonesia. Far Eastern Survey. July, 1956.

Tixier, G. Essai sur les Gouvernements Militaires Contemporains. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. June, 1956.

Specific Areas

United Kingdom

Abel, D. The Whip in History. Parliamentary Affairs. Spring, 1956.

Britain's Defense Policy. Labor and Industry in Britain. June, 1956.

The British System of Taxation. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1956.

Dunworth, J. V. Nuclear Power in Great Britain. Journal of the Town Planning Institute. May, 1956.

Finer, S. E. In Defence of Pressure Groups. The Listener. June 7, 1956.

Gaitskell, H. Socialism and Nationalization. London, 1956. (Fabian Tract No. 300).

Gibbs, H. Britain's Defense Budget. Air Force. July, 1956.

Hanham, H. J. The Local Organization of the British Labour Party. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Healey, D. Bulganin and Khrushchev in Britain. Problems of Communism. July-August, 1956.

Jukes, J. A. Nuclear Energy: A Survey of Britain's Position. International Affairs. July, 1956.

Kilmuir, Viscount. The Office of Lord Chancellor. Parliamentary Affairs. Spring, 1956.

Local Government. Areas and Status of Local Authorities in England and Wales. Cmd. 9831. London, H.M.S.O., 1956.

Munby, D. The Procedure of Public Inquiries. Public Administration. Summer, 1956.

Our National Church. A symposium. National and English Review. June, 1956.

Potter, A. M. The English Conservative Constituency Association. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Report of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service (1953-55). Public Administration. Summer, 1956.

Smith, H. R. The Dispersal of Population from Congested Urban Centres in Scotland. Public Administration. Summer, 1956.

Colonial Areas

Conference on British Caribbean Federation. Cmd. 9733. London, H.M.S.O., 1956.

Constitutional Progress in Mauritius. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1956.

Crist, R. E. Malta: Development Problems and Economic Prospects. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. July, 1956.

Drake, S. Prospects for Democracy in the Gold Coast. The Annals. July, 1956.

Fawzi, S. The Transfer of Political Power. Listener. July 12, 1956.

Hanningan, J. J. The Impact of English Law upon the Existing Gold Coast Custom and the Possible Development of the Resulting System. Journal of African Administration. July, 1956.

Low, A. The British and the Baganda. International Affairs. July, 1956.

Progress Towards Full Self-Government in the Gold Coast. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1956.

Rosberg, C. G., jr. The Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland: Problems of Democratic Government. The Annals. July, 1956.

Spector, S. Students and Politics in Singapore. Far Eastern Survey. May, 1956.

Tinker, I. Malayan Elections: Electoral Pattern for Plural Societies? Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Tregonning, K. Malaya, 1955. Australian Quarterly. June, 1956.

West, F. J. Colonial Development in Central New Guinea. Pacific Affairs. June, 1956.

Commonwealth of Nations

Alexandrowicz-Alexander, C. H. American Influence on Constitutional Interpretation in India. The American Journal of Comparative Law. Winter, 1956.

Aschinger, F. E. Government and Enterprise in India. Swiss Review of World Affairs. July, 1956.

Aschinger, F. E. Socialism in India. Swiss Review of World Affairs. June, 1956.

Bakshi, P. M. Comparative Law: Separation of Powers in India. American Bar Association Journal. June, 1956.

Balaraman, K. The Indian Press and Foreign Policy. Journal of International Affairs. No. 2, 1956.

Ball, W. M. The Duties of a Member of Parliament. Parliamentary Affairs. Spring, 1956.

Balogh, T. The Plan under Scrutiny. Banker. July, 1956.

Barrett, R. H. Recent Domestic and International Politics in Australia. Far Eastern Survey. May, 1956.

Braden, G. D. Constitutional Law in India. Part II: Civil Liberties. Connecticut Bar Journal. March, 1956.

Brookes, E. H. South Africa's Problems; the Possibilities in an Impossible Situation. African World. June, 1956.

Campbell, P. The New Zealand Public Service Commission. Public Administration. Summer, 1956.

daCosta, E. P. W. India's New Five Year Plan. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Engelmann, F. C. Membership Participation in Policy-making in the C. C. F. The Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. May, 1956.

The Future of the Commonwealth. The Round Table. June, 1956.

Goode, R. Report of the India Taxation Enquiry Commission. National Tax Journal. June, 1956.

Gutteridge, W. F. The Commonwealth Conference. Contemporary Review. August, 1956.

Harrison, S. S. The Challenge to Indian Nationalism. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Jennings, I. Crown and Commonwealth in Asia. International Affairs. April, 1956.

Kingsbury, R. C. India's Industrial Growth. Focus. May, 1956.

Laskin, B. and others. Survey of Canadian Legislation. University of Toronto Law Journal. No. 2, 1956.

Low, H. R. Weapons of the Mind—For Canada's Armed Forces. Queen's Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

MacKay, I. N. A Progress Report on Canadian Atomic Power. Engineering Journal. May, 1956.

McCarroll, D. New Zealand Taxes on Income. Taxes. July, 1956.

McInnis, E. The Commonwealth Today. Sackville, N. B., Canada, Mount Allison University, 1955. (Mount Allison University Publication No. 1.)

Meile, P. Les Élections de Ceylan. Revue Française de Science Politique. April-June, 1956.

Miller, B. The Commonwealth Conference in Perspective. The Listener. June 28, 1956.

Pakistan. Constitution. The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. Karachi, Department of Advertising, Films and Publications, Government of Pakistan, 1956.

A "People's Government": Social and Political Trends in Ceylon. World Today. July, 1956.

Ramaswamy, M. Constitutional Developments in India, 1600-1955. Stanford University Law Review. May, 1956.

Simonds, G. Where We've Gone Wrong on Defense. Maclean's. June 23, 1956.

Skeet, T. H. H. India on the Move. Banker. July, 1956.

Vile, M. J. C. Federalism and Labor Regulation in the United States and Australia. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1956.

Weiner, M. India's Political Problems: The Longer View. The Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Wentworth, W. C. Responsible Government in Australia: State Constitutions and Federal Power. Australian Quarterly. June, 1956.

Western Europe

Bauer, R. Il Costume Burocratic. Occidente. No. 6, 1955.

Beloff, N. The Visionaries. Occidente. No. 6, 1955.

Bondy, F. Young Spain and the Old Regime. Encounter. July, 1956.

Bugard, J. Sécurité Sociale et Dirigeants de Sociétés. Revue des Sociétés. January-February-March, 1956.

Carey, J. P. C. Italy: Stable Instability. Foreign Policy Bulletin. July 1, 1956.

Caxton, J. Falling Idols. Commonweal. May 25, 1956.

Chastenet, J. Les Français; Sont-ils Patriotes? Le Revue de Paris. June, 1956.

Cocatre-Tilgien, A. Recours pour Excès de Pouvoir et Contrat dans la Jurisprudence du Conseil d'État Français. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1, 1956.

Debré, M. Réflexions sur le Sentiment National dans la France d'aujourd'hui. Occidente. No. 6, 1955.

Del Vayo, J. A. Split Down the Middle. Nation. July 28, 1956.

Elfvengren, E. The Finnish Labour Force. International Labour Review. April, 1956.

Fusillier, R. Le Statut du Personnel des Entreprises Nationalisées Comparé au Statut des Agents de la Fonction Publique. Revue du Droit Public. May-June, 1956.

Galli, G. The Italian CP. Part II: The Road Toward a Dilemma, 1945-56. Problems of Communism. May-June, 1956.

Harder, E. La Constitution danoise de 1953. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1, 1956.

Katsenbach, E. L., jr. The French Army. Yale Review, Summer, 1956.

Lamson, A. L'organisation de la Défense

Nationale et des Forces Armées. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. June, 1956.

L'Aménagement du Territoire: Problèmes Politiques et Administratifs. A symposium. Revue Française de Science Politique. April-June, 1956.

Luethy, H. Poujade: Hitler or Pierrot? Commentary. April, 1956.

Nelson, L. Land Reform in Italy. National Planning Association. Washington, D. C. August, 1956.

Salvadori, M. A Look at Italian Democracy in 1956. International Journal. Summer, 1956.

Solal-Celigny, J. La Question de Confiance. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. March-April, 1956.

Sollie, F. Control over Public Administration in Norway. Journal of Public Law. Spring, 1956.

Soubeyrol, J. Le Président de l'Assemblée Nationale. Revue du Droit Public. May-June, 1956.

Stjerschants, G. Monetary Restriction in Finland. Banker. July, 1956.

Veneriana, G. I Licei Italiani e la Politica. Occidente. No. 6, 1955.

Zariski, R. Problems and Prospects of Democratic Socialism in France and Italy. Journal of Politics. May, 1956.

Zartman, I. W. French Communist Foreign Policy, 1952-1954: A Propaganda Analysis. The Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Central Europe

A Year After the Staatsvertrag in Austria. World Today. July, 1956.

Beach, V. W. Germany: East or West?—Danger in the Making. Queen's Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Chapel, V. Le Droit Disciplinaire des Fonctionnaires Fédéraux dans la République Fédérale Allemande. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1, 1956.

Easlary, C. L'organisation Administrative Autrichienne. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. June, 1956.

Kadenbach, E. Zur bindenden Wirkung der Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. April, 1956.

Kirchheimer, O. West German Trade Unions. World Politics. July, 1956.

Kohn, H. The Problem of German Nationalism. Contemporary Review. May, 1956.

Mommson, W. Deutsche Demokratie Gestern und Heute. Politische Studien. June, 1956.

Nemo, La "Démocratur" Allemande. L'an-

née Politique et Économique. April-May, 1956.

Prittie, T. German Christian Democracy. Occidente. No. 6, 1955.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Achminov, H. Social Conflicts at the Twentieth Party Congress. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the U.S.S.R. May, 1956.

After Stalin. A symposium. Encounter. June, 1956.

After the Twentieth Congress. Monthly Review. July-August, 1956.

Alexinsky, G. A. The Problem of Nationalities in the U.S.S.R. East and West. March, 1956.

Aytorkhanov, A. The Political Outlook after the Twentieth Party Congress. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the U.S.S.R. May, 1956.

Barth, J. Wieviel Menschen Kann Russisch-Asien Ernähren? Osteuropa. April, 1956.

Bedo, A. K. The Role of the Trade Unions in Communist Hungary. Highlights of Current Legislation and Activities in Mid-Europe. May, 1956.

Berg, V. New Changes in the Communist Party Regulations. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the U.S.S.R. June, 1956.

Bouscaren, A. T. Khrushchev and the Twentieth Congress. Catholic World. August, 1956.

The Case of Laszlo Rajk. World Today. June, 1956.

Chardonnet, J. Y a-t-il Depuis 1953 une Nouvelle Politique Économique Soviétique? Revue de Défense Nationale. June, 1956.

Czechoslovakia: National Party Conference. News from behind the Iron Curtain. August, 1956.

Czechoslovakia: Short History of the Communist Party. News from behind the Iron Curtain. August, 1956.

Dallin, D. J. Whither Soviet Russia? Sign. June, 1956.

Draft of the New Law on State Pensions. Current Digest of the Soviet Press. June, 20, 1956.

Dulles, A. W. The Soviet Concept of Legal Institutions. Mercer Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Eisele, L. W. Recent Developments in Soviet Education. School and Society. July 21, 1956.

Évolution Récente de la République Populaire Roumaine (1945-1955)—Première Partie: L'évolution Politique et le IIe Congress du Parti Ouvrier Roumain. Notes et Études Documentaires. April 17, 1956.

Fainsod, M. The C.P.S.U. Takes Stock of Itself. Problems of Communism. May-June, 1956.

Gliksmann, J. Recent Trends in Soviet Labor Policy. Problems of Communism. July-August, 1956.

The Great Pretense. A symposium on Anti-Stalinism and the Twentieth Congress of the Soviet Communist Party. Committee on Un-American Activities, U. S. House of Representatives. Washington, D. C. May 19, 1956.

Hargreaves, R. Heel of Achilles. Military Review. June, 1956.

Hayit, B. Die Turkestanischen Unionsrepubliken. Osteuropa. April, 1956.

Hibbs, R. S. Significance of the Volga-Don Canal. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. June, 1956.

Kardelj, E. Evolution in Yugoslavia. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Krivickas, D. The Evolution of the Soviet Constitution Imposed on Lithuania. Baltic Review. March, 1956.

Kucherov, S. The Soviet Union is not a Socialist Society. (In "Defense" of V. M. Molotov.) Political Science Quarterly. June, 1956.

Johnson, D. G. Observations on the Economy of the U.S.S.R. Journal of Political Economy. June, 1956.

Kruschev, N. S. Text of Speech on Stalin. New York Times. June 5, 1956.

L. L. Operation Lazarus. World Today. July, 1956.

Leading Positions and Personalities in the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Soviet Government. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the U.S.S.R. Supplement. May, 1956.

Lowenthal, R. Inventaire Soviétique. Preuves. May, 1956.

Meder, W. Die Hierarchie der Rechtsquellen in der Sowjetunion. Osteuropa-Recht. May, 1956.

Mehnert, K. Kolchosa und Baumwolle in Usbekistan. Osteuropa. April, 1956.

Meissner, B. Die Ergebnisse des 20. Parteikongresses der Kommunistischen Partei der Sowjetunion (Erster Teil). Europa Archiv. May 5, 1956.

Mosley, P. E. Soviet Foreign Policy: New Goals or New Manners? Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Nosek, J. Czechoslovakia; Government Arbitration. Highlights of Current Legislation and Activities in Mid-Europe. May, 1956.

Pepper, N. Seeing Russia Straight. Virginia Quarterly Review. June 26, 1956.

Resolutions of the Twentieth Party Congress. Current Digest of the Soviet Press. June 20, 1956.

Rusis, A. Recent Changes in the Constitution of Soviet Latvia and Russification of the Latvian Government. Highlights of Current Legislation and Activities in Mid-Europe. May, 1956.

Seton-Watson, H. The Soviet Ruling Class. Problems of Communism. May-June, 1956.

Shulman, M. D. Is the Soviet Union Changing? Problems of Communism. May-June, 1956.

Silone, I. and others. L'U.R.S.S., Demain. Preuves. June, 1956.

Schlesinger, R. From the XIX to the XX Party Congress. Soviet Studies. July, 1956.

Souvarine, B. Le Stalinisme sans Staline. La Revue de Paris. June, 1956.

Ströhm, C. G. Jugoslawien und der XX. Parteitag. Osteuropa. April, 1956.

Tochitch, D. Les Conseils Ouvriers en Yougoslavie. Revue d'Histoire Économique et Sociale. No. 4, 1955.

Tokaiev, G. A. Stalin's Death and After. East and West. March, 1956.

Tucker, R. C. Stalin and the Uses of Psychology. World Politics. July, 1956.

Unpublished Documents Distributed among Delegates to Twentieth Congress of Soviet Communist Party. Department of State Bulletin. July 23, 1956.

Valkenier, E. The Catholic Church in Communist Poland. Review of Politics. July, 1956.

Voprosy Istorii Asks New Treatment of Party History. Current Digest of the Soviet Press. June 20, 1956.

Wolfe, B. D. Stalinism versus Stalin. Commentary. June, 1956.

Wolfe, B. D. Stalin's Ghost at the Party Congress. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Middle East and Africa

Adrian, D. The First Five Years of the Israel Civil Service. Studies in Economic and Social Sciences. The Hebrew University. Vol. III, 1956.

Aksin, B. Codification in a New State. A Case Study of Israel. The American Journal of Comparative Law. Winter, 1956.

Bagley, F. R. C. Egypt under Nasser. International Journal. Summer, 1956.

Codrai, R. Desert Sheikdoms of Arabia's

Pirate Coast. National Geographic Magazine. July, 1956.

Comhaire, J. Some Aspects of Urbanization in the Belgian Congo. American Journal of Sociology. July, 1956.

Crowder, M. An Industrial Revolution in West Africa. New Commonwealth. June 11, 1956.

Egypt. Constitution. The Egyptian Constitution. Cairo, Arab News Agency. 1956.

France in North Africa. The Round Table. June, 1956.

Holt, P. M. Sudanese Nationalism and Self-Determination. Part I. The Middle East Journal. Summer, 1956.

The Independence of the Sudan. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1956. (R. 3310.)

Iran. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1956. (R. 3519.)

Knight, E. G. Education in French North Africa. Islamic Quarterly. December, 1955.

Islam and Secularism in Turkey Today. Quarterly Review. July, 1956.

Jandy, E. C. Ethiopia Today: A Review of Its Changes and Problems. The Annals. July, 1956.

Jones, C. F. The New Egyptian Constitution. The Middle East Journal. Summer, 1956.

Lewis, W. H. Ethiopia's Revised Constitution. The Middle East Journal. Spring, 1956.

Lewis, W. H. The Ethiopian Empire: Progress and Problems. The Middle East Journal. Summer, 1956.

Livneh, E. Is Israel a Zionist State? Midstream. Summer, 1956.

Malik, C. Call to Action in the Near East. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Maulnier, T. L'Afrique est à faire. Preuves. May, 1956.

McCall, D. F. Ligeria: An Appraisal. The Annals. July, 1956.

McCally, S. P. Party Government in Turkey. Journal of Politics. May, 1956.

Meyer, G. Le Problème Constitutionnel en Égypte. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. June, 1956.

Philip, D. The Real Drama of Algeria. Contemporary Review. May, 1956.

Political Trends in the Fertile Crescent. World Today. June, 1956.

Roshwald, M. Political Parties and Social Classes in Israel. Social Research. Summer, 1956.

Samuel, E. A New Civil Service for Israel. Public Administration. Summer, 1956.

Sfeir, G. N. The Abolition of Confessional

Jurisdiction in Egypt. The Middle East Journal. Summer, 1956.

The Trust Territory of Somaliland Prepares for 1960. United Nations Review. August, 1956.

Tütsch, H. E. Report on Turkey. Swiss Review of World Affairs. August, 1956.

South and Southeast Asia

Armstrong, H. F. North of the Khyber. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Higgins, B. Indonesia's Development Plans and Problems. Pacific Affairs. June, 1956.

Political Progress in Nepal. World Today. June, 1956.

Stephens, I. Nepal between Two Worlds. The Listener. May 31, 1956.

Pacific and Far East

Ballia, W. B. The Political Evolution of a Soviet Satellite: The Mongolian People's Republic. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Dore, R. P. Japanese Election Candidates in 1955. Pacific Affairs. June, 1956.

Hellenthal, W. Der Tennō. Politische Studien. July, 1956.

Houh, F. W. and Yuan-li W. Chinese Communist Publication Policy and Thought Control. Pacific Spectator. Summer, 1956.

Jones, F. E. Justice in Modern China. Listener. July 19, 1956.

Knauss, B. Die Demokratie in Japan in Spiegel der Zeitschriftenliteratur. Politische Studien. July, 1956.

Mendel, D. H., jr. Ozaki Yukio: Political Conscience of Modern Japan. The Far Eastern Quarterly. May, 1956.

Murakami, S. and Bunkichi, I. Postwar Reconstruction of Japanese Education and its Social Aspects. Journal of Educational Sociology. March, 1956.

Nagato, M. New Party Alignment and Political Stability. Contemporary Japan. Nos. 1-3.

Ohe, S. The Socio-Political Experiment in Postwar Japan. Ethics. July, 1956.

Schwarz, U. Domestic Politics in Japan. Swiss Review of World Affairs. June, 1956.

Sohier, A. En Chine: l'Église Catholique sous le Régime Communiste. Vie Intellectuelle. July, 1956.

Soodruff, J. S. The Japanese Lawyer. Nebraska Law Review. March, 1956.

Strope, W. E. On Japanese Naval Rearmament. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. June, 1956.

Thomas, S. B. Communist China's Agrarian

Policy, 1954-56. Pacific Affairs. June, 1956.

Wittfogel, K. A. Forced Labor in Communist China. Problems of Communism. July-August, 1956.

Latin America

An Old Civilization Stirs up Political Problems. Business Week. June 9, 1956.

Ballou, E. Z. Sickness Insurance in Latin America. Bulletin of the International Social Security Association. April, 1956.

Fitzgibbon, R. H. How Democratic is Latin America? Inter-America Economic Affairs. Spring, 1956.

Fitzgibbon, R. H. Revolutions: Western Hemisphere. South Atlantic Quarterly. July, 1956.

Lipson, L. Government in Brazil. The Canadian Journal of Political Science. March, 1956.

Mendes, M. A., jr. O Princípio da Profissão Pública. Serviço Público. Novembro, 1956.

Pendle, G. Revolution in Latin America. International Affairs. April, 1956.

Sayagues Laso, E. Les Révolutions Économiques en Uruguay. Revue Internationale des Sciences Sociales. 1956.

Verengo, R. Freedom and Industrial Relations in Latin America. International Labour Review. 1956.

Verengo, R. Freedom and Industrial Relations in Latin America. International Labour Review. 1956.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

Europe's Classical Balance of Power: A Case History of the Theory and Practice of One of the Great Concepts of European Statecraft. BY EDWARD VOSE GULICK. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1955. Pp. xvii, 337. $5.50.)

The ceaseless struggle for influence is an abiding characteristic of human relations with which every society must contend. The great variety of ways in which the problem has been dealt with provide the fascinating, and frequently fantastic, material of political history. Not the least interesting exhibit is that afforded by eighteenth-century Europe, whose outlook and particular set of practices culminated in the Congress of Vienna. It is a period set off by the religious controversies that preceded and the nationalistic conflicts that followed it. Characterized by rationalism, scepticism, and moderation, it produced its own brand of politics. Balance of power was its ideal, much as, Gulick remarks, democracy is the twentieth-century ideal.

Balance of power is one of those loose terms in which political science abounds. Yet in the eighteenth-century context it had a certain precision. More than merely a peripheral concept, it was a philosophy of politics which the practicing diplomats sought earnestly to apply. Gulick is admirably successful in describing the system. He first constructs a theoretical model based on the writings of the time, and secondly he shows, in an extended account of the Congress of Vienna, the profound influence of the concept on the political thought of the period. He gives a lucid account of a phenomenon that students of international relations only too often are content to treat as a generality. The book is full of quotations and contains a good deal of value.

Gulick's final judgment of the balance of power is clearly formed. It is fully set forth here, for it is avoidably complex. But he distinguishes between balance of power and balance of power policy. He states his main point: "Woodrow Wilson did much to discredit the balance of power, but he popularized the idea of the balance of power. He conceived the two to be the same, and he rested on an unstable balance of power. The other foundation of a preponderance of power, the balance of power, was seriously wrong in the eyes of the world. The viewer has found that an examination of the history of Wilson's policy confirms this. Gulick suggests that the difficulty is failure to distinguish between what he calls 'alliance equilibrium,' the growth of the former, and 'balance of power,' that collective security, the logical end-point of the former."—EDWARD H. LEWIS, University of Chicago.

Treaties and Federal Constitutions. By JAMES McLEOD HENDRY. (Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. v, 186. $4.50.)

That a study of this subject should be made by a Canadian professor of law, trained both in Canada and in the United States, is altogether commendable. In addition to that of the two federal governments under which he has lived, Professor Hendry analyzes the experience of Switzerland and Australia. In Part I of his book he presents a background description of the historical and constitutional aspects of treaty-making in the four federations. Capacity to enter into treaties and performance ability under them are compared in Part II and Part III respectively. In Part IV the author offers opinions and suggestions intended to solve or to simplify some of the problems earlier clarified.

The extent to which federations are handicapped in treaty matters is the main theme of Professor Hendry's investigation, and on this subject he makes a number of well-supported generalizations. For instance, he points out the more clear-cut and definite arrangement of executive power in the United States and Switzerland, as compared with Australia and Canada. The treaty powers of the central government of the United States, both in respect to "capacity" and "performance," he believes adequate to the expanding need for treaties in world affairs. Examining judicial opinions, he finds state laws no bar to treaties dealing with proper subjects for international regulation; he nevertheless considers the Tenth Amendment a "deterrent to a too expansive interpretation of treaty clauses." He might well have explained an actual, if not legal, handicap in treaty-making in this country resulting from executive fear of charges that treaties are being used to amend the Constitution, should it sign United Nations treaties dealing with human rights: our government has opposed a covenant of human rights, and more recently it has rejected a newly negotiated convention against slavery. Canada, the author argues, is handicapped when agreements require legislative action outside the orbit of Section 91 of the Constitution because the prior approval of the provinces must be obtained.

Professor Hendry contends that treaties municipally inoperative and unenforceable are nevertheless valid in international law, whether they be violative of the "capacity" limitations or the "performance" limitations of the constitution. His well-constructed argument might be strengthened by reference to the practice of the United States of conceding its international responsibility and granting financial redress when one of the forty-eight states has been delinquent in protecting aliens and has thus rendered inoperative a treaty to which this nation is a party.

Professor Hendry is critical of federations for their weaknesses in treaty matters. In his opinion, the growing need for agreements on economic and social matters raises a question as to whether the federal form of government can endure. Switzerland and the United States have, he believes, experienced more of a trend toward the centralization which modern conditions demand than have Australia and Canada.

The reader will find in this volume a well-documented and well-reasoned treatment of the subject. Americans will discover little about their governmental system that is new but will profit from a thoughtful comparison of our methods and problems with those of other countries.—NORMAN HILL, University of Nebraska.

The German Fifth Column in the Second World War. By LOUIS DE JONG. TRANSLATED FROM THE DUTCH BY C. M. GEYL. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. Pp. xi, 308. $5.00.)

This valuable study of an important subject was written for the State Institute for War Documentation in Amsterdam, by its Executive Director. He believes the book bears "a provisional character" (pp. vii-viii) because he did not have access to all sources—hardly possible under the circumstances. However, he has dug up sufficient evidence to make his points convincingly.

In Part I the author graphically describes the "Fear" of the German civilian and military Fifth Column which developed in many countries after 1933, often growing into veritable panics. The alarm caught on in the United States and in the Americas, with the help of reports from reputable statesmen and established reporters, until there was a "Fixed Image" (Chapter VIII). Nor has the story changed in post-war writings. Only "a few [historians have] expressed any clear doubts of the omnipotence of the Fifth Column" (p. 139).

Part II of the book, entitled "Reality," tells what actually happened, in Europe and in America. The author concludes his careful examination by stating: "There is a striking difference between the ideas about the German Fifth Column . . . and the actual activities . . . in almost all countries the size of the German military Fifth Column was grossly overestimated." Evidence of its activities "of any considerable magnitude [was] confined to Poland and Yugoslavia" (pp. 246, 266).

However, the "German political Fifth Column certainly was no myth." Hitler wielded this weapon with consummate mastery. The Anschluss and the annexation of the Sudetenland "were the two greatest, the two only important successes really that Hitler was able to achieve by manipulating mass movements in foreign parts." Much as the notions that sprang up during 1933-39 "may have been exaggerated or incorrect as to particulars . . . in many respects the actual events were even worse . . ." (pp. 289, 295-96). For various reasons, however, political Fifth Columns developed only in Memel, Hungary, Roumania, Poland, and Yugoslavia. In some countries such developments were not feasible; in others they did not fit in with Hitler's plans, as in Estonia, Latvia, and the South Tyrol (p. 294).

In a chapter called "Historical Summary," the author describes the activities abroad of the functionaries of the various Nazi party organizations, the Gestapo, Foreign Office, and the Army intelligence (as he points out, the latter two institutions of all countries were engaged in similar activities). He also treats with great clarity the various factors favoring the rise of Fifth Column activities among volksdeutsche groups outside Germany.

The book is carefully indexed and documented. The author points out that its Dutch edition contains "a 35-page survey of all source materials used as well as an introduction to these sources" (p. 301). It is a pity that the Chicago University Press did not see its way clear to include them and thus make the book even more valuable.

We might add that a jacket for a scholarly publication should be written with more regard for the actual contents and conclusions of the book than was done in this case.—JOHN BROWN MASON, Georgetown University.

World Indivisible: With Liberty and Justice for All. BY KONRAD ADENAUER. TRANSLATED BY RICHARD AND CLARA WINSTON. (New York: Harper and Brothers Publishers, 1955. Pp. xxx, 128. $2.75.)

The fifth volume of World Perspectives, planned and edited by Ruth Nanda Anshen, consists of selections from speeches by German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer that portray him as a consistent advocate of "World Indivisible: With Liberty and Justice for All." He asserts that "narrow-minded nationalism" was the root of Germany's disaster and that the age of national states has come to an end. He has favored an integrated Europe as the nucleus of an alliance among those political forces whose basis is Christianity; such a union is seen as a deterrent to the further advance of Soviet Russia, which he characterizes as "Christianity's deadliest and most terrible enemy." He is hopeful that some day the U.S.S.R. will negotiate with the United West and that an honorable modus vivendi may be established. "Once the immediate crisis has been overcome and becomes a thing of the past, the new-formed community of the West will continue as a living example of practical neighborly union, at first only in the West, but with time, possibly, in the whole world."

In his introduction, Professor Ernest Jackh makes it clear that consistency in personal conduct and political philosophy as a feature of Konrad Adenauer's character is not limited to his period as Chancellor but has been evident in his entire public career.

An explanatory note states that these selections from the Chancellor's speeches are concerned with three distinct periods extending from the founding of the Federal Republic in September, 1949, to the return of German sovereignty in May, 1955. Unfortunately, however, the speeches are neither dated nor identified. They are presented in essentially chronological order in fifteen chapters with such headings as "End of Nationalism," "Christian Civilization at Stake," "Worldwide Aggression by Totalitarian Communism," "Germany's Reunification," and so on.

This collection will not be useful for the historian who is interested in discovering what the Chancellor said on specific occasions, but it is of great value for anyone interested in obtaining a portrait of the political thought of "the best German statesman since Bismarck."

—CHARLES D. HOUNSHELL, Emory University.

Argentine Upheaval: Perón's Fall and the New Regime. BY ARTHUR P. WHITAKER. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1956. Pp. x, 179. $3.50.)

This little volume, as Professor Whitaker would doubtless be the first to admit, is a piece of reporting and analysis (and a most competent one) rather than one of research.

In some respects it is unfortunate to have it come out in book form, and yet we could have got it, in the detail that it gives, in no other way. The official terminal date of the study is December 1, 1955 (the author in one footnote recounts a development of as late as December 15) and yet the inevitable delays of book manufacturing prevented publication before the end of May, 1956. Professor Whitaker was faced, in exaggerated form, with the dilemma a newspaper correspondent would be confronted with if he knew that his very timely dispatch would not be published for, say, two weeks.

And yet, granting that unescapable sort of awkwardness in the timing of the study, the author has done an uncommonly good job of not only lucidly recounting the factual developments in the critical and dramatic Argentine picture of the last half of 1955, but also in analyzing and interpreting the impacts and attitudes of classes, power groups, and parties.

One might quarrel mildly with some of the details of the interpretation, as for instance in regard to the future rôle of the very young Catholic parties, but that does not deny the essential validity of the way in which the author has read between the lines. It is at least startling, too, to read the ultra-realistic suggestion that "if the United States wishes to strengthen the present regime in Buenos Aires, it could do worse than stir up a sharp diplomatic controversy with the authorities there" and then subsequently eat humble pie and perhaps make a large loan in pseudo-contribution, thus enabling nationalistic Argentina to gain a presumptive diplomatic triumph. It would indeed be a novel technique if projected into the general conduct of United States foreign relations!

The utility of the volume is increased by the addition of translations of some ten key broadcasts emanating from Buenos Aires at critical points in the late 1955 scene. All in all, the study is a highly useful one to add to the Argentine shelf.—RUSSELL H. FITZGIBBON, University of California (Los Angeles).

The United Nations and Human Rights. By JAMES FREDERICK GREEN. (Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution. 1956. Pp. viii, 194. $1.50.)

This paperback volume is Part I of a projected book on The United Nations and Promotion of the General Welfare; it is published in advance of the full work (one of seven in the Brookings series on the United Nations) "because of . . . current public interest." The author comprehensively surveys U. N. experience in defining, promoting, and protecting human rights; the treatment begins logically with a deft sketch of the historical setting and concludes with a summary examination of efforts to deal with violations of these rights. Green writes competently and with meticulous care as to details of procedure, albeit with a fervor for condensation that excludes much of the "human interest." As appendices appear the texts of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the two International Draft Covenants, one on Civil and Political Rights and the other on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights. As a most reliable reference work and an aid to research, this partial study will serve well.

The general reader will be impressed with the vast scope of the subject, with the sustained idealism and pioneering character of myriad diverse enterprises to make headway in this vital field through organized international action, and with the grave difficulties that retard, if not seriously impeach the wisdom of, the cause. For the underlying philosophical premise—that, while maintaining world peace is the primary objective, the long-run success of the U. N. requires substantial progress in achieving justice among peoples and nations—pervades the whole effort, as it undoubtedly will the complete book on the U. N. and the general welfare. The validity of this premise is a lesson as yet only imperfectly learned by the American people, as the reversal of national policy on the Draft Covenants demonstrates. The author's account makes surpassingly clear how such high purpose has been obscured and its pursuit frustrated by the interplay of the politics of national interest with the diverse cross purposes of the East-West cold war, colonialism versus dependent peoples, developed countries versus the underdeveloped, and white races versus the colored. Miracle it is that anything has been accomplished; but Green vouches that it has, however tentative and piecemeal.—AUGUST O. SPAIN, Texas Christian University.

Survey of International Affairs, 1953. By PETER CALVOCORESSE. (Oxford, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1956. Pp. vii, 400. $7.70.)

Documents on International Affairs, 1953.

EDITED BY DENISE FOLLIOT. (Oxford, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1956. Pp. xix, 513. $9.20.)

Felicitous in style, judicious in the selection of materials, straightforward in opinion, Mr. Calvocoressi and his collaborators manage again to cover a great many events in a relatively slender volume. Continuing the policy of emphasizing now one area or country, now another, they provide for 1953 a rather detailed account of France and, for the first time since the Survey for 1947-8, a separate section, written by George Pendle, on Latin America. In both cases, there is considerable emphasis on internal political and economic conditions. Mr. Pendle, in addition, takes up the threat of communism within the Latin American states, carrying the story of Guatemala down to the events of June, 1954. F. C. Jones contributes the sections covering the Far East.

This is the last of the surveys for which Mr. Calvocoressi will have responsibility, a fact that one must note with regret. The volume of documents, as usual in the postwar series, parallels the Survey in its organization.

The Anglo-American Tradition in Foreign Affairs: Readings from Thomas More to Woodrow Wilson. EDITED BY ARNOLD WOLFERS AND LAURENCE W. MARTIN. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1956. Pp. xxvii, 286. $4.50.)

Containing selections from twenty English and American philosophers and officials of the past four centuries, the present volume demonstrates that the historical study of political thought has relevance for international as well as for domestic politics and problems. The editors have chosen well. Their selections convey the fundamental propositions made by each man, an understanding of why he reacted as he did to the problems of his time, and something of the flavor of his personality as well. Taken together, the readings present some recurring problems and patterns of thought, some common threads forming, perhaps, an Anglo-American tradition in foreign affairs, and a good many points of contact with Continental thought besides. Continuity is provided by the running commentaries of the editors, and the whole is introduced by Professor Wolfers.

Sbornik destruktivnykh dogovorov, soglashenii i konventsiy zakliuchennykh SSSR s inostranny mi gosudarstvami. Vypusk XII. PUBLISHED BY THE SOVIET MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS. (Moscow: Gosudarstvennoe Izdatelstvo Politicheskoi Literatury. 1956. Pp. 198.)

The twelfth volume of the Soviet official treaty collection covers the period from September, 1945, through the end of 1946, and includes only the texts in Russian. For Mongolia and certain other countries, treaty texts do not seem to be normally available except in this Russian collection.—(J.B.C.)

The Communist International: 1919-1943 Documents. Vol. I: 1919-1922. SELECTED AND EDITED BY JANE DEGRAS. (Oxford, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1956. Pp. xvi, 463. $3.80.)

A valuable collection of documents illustrative of the policies, pronouncements, and organizational problems of the Communist International from 1919-1943. A second volume is planned, continuing the story up to the dissolution of the Third International. The work will be welcomed as a handy and authoritative reference by scholars working in the field of Communism and Russian History.

Annuaire Européen. European yearbook. Vol. II. PUBLISHED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE COUNCIL OF EUROPE. (The Hague: M. Nijhoff. 1956. Pp. xix, 727.)

Several present-day European organizations are treated for the first time in Vol. II. Among these may be mentioned the Central Commission for the Navigation of the Rhine, Benelux, Balkan Alliance, International Commission on Civil Status, Customs Co-operation Council, European Plant Protection Organization, and the Conference on the Coordination of Air Transport in Europe. Information and documents about most of these are obtainable only with much difficulty. Also included in this volume are articles on American and Russian attitudes towards European integration.—(J.B.C.)

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS
Catholic University of America

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies

General

Berger, E. M. Antarktis-Landnahme und Erforschung. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. August, 1956.

Berlitzer, H. Hunger und Aussenpolitik. Aussenpolitik. July, 1956.

Deshpande, N. R. Peaceful Co-existence. Indian Journal of Political Science. January-March, 1956.

de Zavala Castella, J. Geopolitics—its Present Value. Military Affairs. August, 1956.

Emeny, B. Mainsprings of World Politics. New York, Foreign Policy Association, 1956. (Headline Series No. 118).

Giscard d'Estaing, E. Communisme et Nationalisme. Revue de Paris. January, 1956.

Hans, N. Exportation of Educational Ideas. Journal of Educational Sociology. March, 1956.

Lifton, R. J. "Thought Reform" of Western Civilians in Chinese Communist Prisons. Psychiatry. May, 1956.

Mackenroth, G. Weltbevölkerung und Weltwirtschaft. Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. No. 1, 1956.

Maroger, J. L'Évolution de l'Idée de Supranationalité. Politique Étrangère. No. 3, 1956.

Preston, R. A. Nationalism in the Atomic Age. International Journal. Summer, 1956.

The Problems of the Nuclear Period. Confluence. April, 1956.

Rudin, H. R. Diplomacy, Democracy, Security: Two Centuries in Contrast. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1956.

Salvatorelli, L. La Nuova Fase della Politica Internazionale. Comunità Internazionale. January, 1956.

Schein, E. H. The Chinese Indoctrination Program for Prisoners of War: a Study of Attempted "Brainwashing." Psychiatry. May, 1956.

Sencourt, R. New Trends in Diplomacy. Quarterly Review. July, 1956.

Shaffer, H. B. Educational Exchange. Educational Research Reports. July 11, 1956.

Struye, P. La Vie Internationale. Revue Politique. March, 1956.

Timmler, M. Der Wettlauf um die Unterentwickelten Gebiete. Internationales Jahrbuch der Politik. January, 1956.

U. S. Library of Congress. General Reference and Bibliography Division. A Guide to Bibliographic Tools for Research in Foreign Affairs. Washington, 1956.

Waples, D. Publicity versus Diplomacy: Notes on the Reporting of the "Summit" Conferences. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Military and Functional Questions

Amery, J. The World Distribution of Military Power. East and West. March, 1956.

Bericht zur Atomaren Lage. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. June, 1956.

Bogardus, E. S. Social Implications of Atomic Energy. Sociology and Social Research. February, 1956.

Buzzard, A. The Crux of Defence Policy. International Relations. April, 1956.

Hodgson, P. E. The International Control of Atomic Energy. Atomic Scientists Journal. March, 1956.

Inglis, D. National Security with the Arms Race Limited. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. June, 1956.

Kaempffert, W. The Many Uses of the Atom. New York, Foreign Policy Association, 1956. (Headline Series, No. 117.)

Koch, N. Revolution des Wehrdenkens. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. May, 1956.

Leghorn, R. S. Controlling the Nuclear Threat in the Second Atomic Decade. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. June, 1956.

Moch, J. L'État Actuel des Négociations sur le Désarmement. Cahiers Français. March, 1956.

Mountbatten, L. Allied Naval and Air Commands in the Mediterranean. Military Review. June, 1956.

L'Organizzazione delle Nuove Forze Armate. Relazioni Internazionali. April 14, 1956.

Pergent, J. Les Principales Conceptions Stratégiques "Atomiques." Revue de Défense Nationale. March, 1956.

Von Studnitz, H. G. Die Luft ist nicht Frei. Aussenpolitik. July, 1956.

United States

Allen, G. V. United States Foreign Policy in Africa. Annals. July, 1956.

Armstrong, H. F. North of the Khyber. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Bowie, R. B. United States Foreign Economic Policy. Department of State Bulletin. July 23, 1956.

Dean, V. M. American Policy on European Integration. European Yearbook, 1954.

Une Étude Critique de la Politique Étrangère Américaine. Articles et Documents. January 12, 1956.

Kennan, G. F. Weiter als Koexistenz. Aussenpolitik. August, 1956.

Knorr, K. E. Euratom and American Policy; a Conference Report. Princeton, Center of International Studies, 1956.

Malenbaum, W. U. S. Economic Policy in South and Southeast Asia. India Quarterly. April-June, 1956.

Martin, C. The Soft War. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Nitze, P. H. The Modern President as a World Figure. Annals. September, 1956.

Péeters, P. Aux États-Unis: la Politique Étrangère des États-Unis et la Stratégie Atomique. Revue Nouvelle. May 15, 1956.

Stokes, J. M. The International Cooperation Administration. World Affairs. Summer, 1956.

Trivers, H. Morality and Foreign Affairs. Virginia Quarterly Review. June, 1956.

Van Alstyne, R. W. Myth versus Reality in the Far Eastern Policies of the United States. International Affairs. July, 1956.

Wit, D. The United States and Japanese Atomic Power Development. World Politics. July, 1956.

Wriston, H. M. The Secretary of State Abroad. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Young, K. T., Jr. The Challenge of Asia to United States Policy. Department of State Bulletin. August 27, 1956.

Canada

Joynt, C. B. Canadian Dilemma. World Affairs Quarterly. July, 1956.

McInnes, E. Canadian Opinion and Foreign Policy. Queen's Quarterly. Winter, 1956.

Pearson, L. B. Some Aspects of Canadian-American Relations. External Affairs. May, 1956.

Taylor, A. Canada and Competitive Co-existence; Our Role in the UN. Queen's Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Latin America

L.B.T. La Actividad Internacional en Hispanoamérica durante el Año 1955. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. October-December, 1955.

Salazar, J. L. C. The New Communist Economic Offensive in Latin America. Vital Speeches. August 1, 1956.

Technical Cooperation in Latin America—Recommendations for the Future. Washington, National Planning Association, 1956.

Wyckoff, T. The Strategic Location of South America. Military Review. July, 1956.

United Kingdom

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. Anglo-Iraqi Relations, 1918-1956. London, 1956.

———. Britain and Middle East Development. London, 1956.

Jukes, S. A. Nuclear Energy: A Survey of Britain's Position. International Affairs. July 1956.

Meyer, F. V. The Commonwealth and Europe: Britain's Dilemma. Political Quarterly. April-June, 1956.

Neilson, F. England and the Balance of Power. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. July, 1956.

New Tests of Anglo-American Alliance. Statist. April 7, 1956.

Younger, K. La France et la Grande Bretagne devant les Problèmes Européens. Politique Étrangère. No. 3, 1956.

Western Europe

Chastenot, J. L'Union Française et son Destin. Revue de Paris. March, 1956.

Devinat, P. Un Renouveau Franco-Vietnamien est-il Possible? Politique Étrangère. No. 4, 1956.

Dix Ans après Hitler: la France a-t-elle Pardonné? Réalités. July, 1956.

Eriksen, E. La Quatrième Session du Conseil Nordique. Bulletin Interparlementaire. 2nd trim., 1956.

Günther, H. K. Dänemark und die Verteidigung Westeuropas. Wehr-Wissenschaftliche Rundschau. May, 1956.

Lange, H. La Norvège dans les Rapports Internationaux. Revue de la Politique Internationale. March 16, 1956.

Lapie, P. O. Politique Coloniale et Politique Étrangère. Revue des Deux Mondes. May 1, 1956.

Petrén, G. Scandinavian Cooperation. European Yearbook, 1954.

La Politique Étrangère de la France. Perspectives. March 17, 1956.

Vernant, J. La France et la Coopération Atomique Européenne. Revue de Défense Nationale. April, 1956.

Zartman, I. W. French Communist Foreign Policy, 1952-1954: a Propaganda Analysis. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Central Europe

Adenauer, K. La République Fédérale et l'Intégration Européenne. Documentation Française. April 3, 1956.

L'Armée Allemande de l'Est. Documents. February-March, 1956.

Les Aspects Économiques du Réarmement Allemand. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. November, 1955.

Le Direttive di Politica Estera di Adenauer. Relazioni Internazionali. March 31, 1956.

Documents sur le Problème Militaire en Allemagne Orientale. Notes et Études Documentaires. October 27, 1955.

Erlor, F. La Politique Extérieure de la République Fédérale. Politique Étrangère. No. 4, 1956.

Friedrich, O. A. Aussenpolitik mit Wirtschaftlichem Boden. Aussenpolitik. June, 1956.

Das Militärische Kriegspotential Westdeutschlands. Dokumente der Zeit. February, 1956.

Morel, P. L'Allemagne Face à l'Euratom. Documents. February-March, 1956.

Scheuner, U. Die Frage der Wiedervereinigung nach den Genfer und Londoner Gesprächen. Aussenpolitik. June, 1956.

Schmitt, M. Grundfragen der Künftigen Aussenhandelspolitik. Volkswirt. March 17, March 24, April 14, April 21, 1956.

Younger, K. Neue Weltpolitische Perspektiven. Aussenpolitik. July, 1956.

Southern Europe and Mediterranean

Dimitri, C. S. Greek Foreign Policy. Revue de Droit International (Sollie-Genève). April-June, 1956.

L'Espagne et le Projet de Pacte Méditerranéen. Perspectives. May 12, 1956.

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. The Black Sea Straits. London, 1956.

L'Italia nell'O.N.U. Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali. January-March, 1956.

La Jugoslavia e l'Attuale Momento Internazionale. Relazioni Internazionali. March 12, 1956.

Katona, P. The Détente between Yugoslavia and her Neighbours. International Relations. April, 1956.

Lazar, H. J. Spanien und der Aufbruch des Islams. Aussenpolitik. June, 1956.

Nincic, D. The Balkan Pacts. European Yearbook, 1954.

Salazar conto l'Unità Europea & Gli Obiettivi Internazionali di Salazar. Relazioni Internazionali. February 4, 1956.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Apremont, B. La Pénétration des Pays du Bloc Soviétique au Moyen-Orient et dans le Sud-Est Asiatique. Politique Étrangère. April, 1956.

Bechtoldt, H. Von Molotow zu Schepilow. Aussenpolitik. August, 1956.

Beck, L. N. Soviet Military Literature and Soviet Air Doctrine. Air University Quarterly Review. Spring, 1956.

Beloff, M. The Russian View of European Integration. European Yearbook, 1954.

Dallin, A. Red Star on Military Affairs, 1945-1952. Santa Monica, Rand Corp., 1956.

Galay, N. La Percée Soviétique au Moyen-Orient et en Asie Méridionale. Documentation Française. April 28, 1956.

———. New Trends in Soviet Military Doctrine. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. June, 1956.

———. The New Reduction in the Soviet Armed Forces. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. July, 1956.

Gardner, E. L'Armée Soviétique. Revue de Défense Nationale. November, 1955.

Glaser, W. A. Theories of Soviet Foreign Policy: a Classification of the Literature. World Affairs Quarterly. July, 1956.

Le Gouvernement Soviétique Lie le Problème du Désarmement au Développement des Échanges Est-Ouest. Bilans Politiques, Économiques et Sociaux Hebdomadaires. April 5, 1956.

Hogan, W. C. The Spirit of Geneva. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. August, 1956.

Horatius. Strategy of the Arctic Zone. East and West. March, 1956.

Keeskemeter, P. The Soviet Approach to International Political Communication. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

London, I. Evolution of the U.S.S.R.'s Policy in the Middle East, 1950-1956. Middle Eastern Affairs. May, 1956.

Long, J. F. L. Russia's Oil. Air Power. April, 1956.

Meissner, B. Die Ergebnisse des 20. Partei-kongresses der Kommunistischen Partei der Sowjetunion (2). Europa Archiv. May 20, 1956.

Mosely, P. E. Soviet Foreign Policy: New Goals or New Manners? Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Nesterow, M. Sowjetunion für Erweiterung des Westhandels. Volkswirt. March 31, 1956.

Les Relations entre l'U.R.S.S. et l'Asie. Notes et Études Documentaires. February 28, 1956.

Rubio Garcia, L. Un Arma Soviética de la "Guerra Fría": La Ofensiva Comercial. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. October-December, 1955.

The Soviet Bloc and Under-developed Countries. World Today. June, 1956.

Taylor, J. W. R. How Good is the Soviet Air Force? Air Power. April, 1956.

Toma, P. A. Soviet Attitude towards the Acquisition of Territorial Sovereignty in the Antarctic. American Journal of International Law. July, 1956.

Voir, J. K. The Soviet General Staff Takes Stock. World Today. November, 1955.

Wandycz, P. S. The Soviet System of Alliances in East Central Europe. Journal of Central European Affairs. July, 1956.

Weltrevolution durch Koexistenz. Ost-Probleme. November, 1955.

Whiting, K. R. The Search for a Soviet Air Doctrine. Air University Quarterly Review. Spring, 1956.

Middle East and Africa

Atyeo, H. C. Arab Politics and Pacts. Current History. June, 1956.

The Baghdad Pact. British Survey. April, 1956.

Giraud, E. Les Aspects Internationaux de la Question Algérienne. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. July, 1956.

Hirsch, A. M. From the Indus to the Jordan: Characteristics of Middle East International River Disputes. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1956.

Kelly, J. B. The Buraimi Oasis Dispute. International Affairs. July, 1956.

Khan, Z. Islam and International Relations. Internationale Spectator. June 8, 1956.

Knauss, B. Der Vorstoß der Sowjetunion in den Mittleren Osten. Politische Studien. August, 1956.

Lewis, B. The Middle Eastern Reaction to Soviet Pressures. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1956.

Longrigg, S. Oil in the Middle East. Current History. June, 1956.

Malik, C. Call to Action in the Near East. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Marchand, J. Stratégie et Psychologie en Afrique Noire. Revue de Défense Nationale. February, 1956.

———. Les Puissances Anticolonialistes et l'Afrique Noire Française. Revue de Défense Nationale. May, 1956.

Price, P. Tensions in the Middle East. Royal Central Asian Journal. April, 1956.

Rétif, A. Le Marxisme en Afrique Noire. Études. January, 1956.

Rudin, H. R. The International Position of Africa Today. Annals. July, 1956.

Sharp, W. R. The United Nations System in Egypt: a Country Survey of Field Operations. International Organization. May, 1956.

Silvain, R. Le Moyen-Orient Entre dans la Guerre Froide. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. May, 1956.

Torres, M. C. Panorama Diplomático de Africa. Cuadernos Africanos y Orientales. 1st trim., 1956.

Troutbeck, J. Britain in the Middle East. Current History. June, 1956.

Vernant, J. Vers une Nouvelle Stratégie Diplomatique au Proche-Orient? Revue de Défense Nationale. March, 1956.

Via Suez. Economist. August 4, 1956.

Woodhouse, C. M. Cyprus and the Middle Eastern Crisis. International Journal. Winter, 1955-56.

South and Southeast Asia

Asian Studies in Undergraduate and Teacher Education. New York, Conference on Asian Affairs, 1955.

Chowdhury, H. H. Pakistan's Foreign Policy. Karachi, 1956.

Fisher, C. A. Crisis in Southeast Asia. Queen's Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Ghosal, A. K. Panch Shila. Indian Journal of Political Science. January-March, 1956.

Haqqi, S. A. H. Some Reflections on India's Foreign Policy. Indian Journal of Political Science. January-March, 1956.

India and Pakistan. Economist. June 9, 1956.

Lawrence, D. Where is Indonesia Going? Foreign Policy Bulletin. June 15, 1956.

Nehru Riafferma il Principio della Coesistenza. Relazioni Internazionali. April 7, 1956.

Pakistan and her Neighbours. Round Table. June, 1956.

Sing, S. C. America, India and the Commonwealth. Indian Journal of Political Science. January-March, 1956.

Wint, G. Last Transfers in Asia. Twentieth Century. March, 1956.

Zinkin, T. Indien in der Welt. Aussenpolitik. June, 1956.

Far East and Pacific

Crankshaw, E. China and Russia. Atlantic Monthly. June, 1956.

The Far East in the Free World. Symposium. Current History. July, 1956.

Seidensticker, E. G. Thoughts on Anti-American Sentiment in Japan. Japan Quarterly. April-June, 1956.

Smythe, H. H. Japan and China. Phylon. 4th trim., 1955.

Soviet Political Strategy in Asia. World Today. May, 1956.

Tyler, A. L. Anti-Americanism in the Philippines. Pacific Spectator. Summer, 1956.

U. S. Information Agency. "Contiguous Territory"—An Important Historic Principle of Soviet-Communist Revolution in East Asia. Washington, 1956.

International Economic Policy and Relations

Bilet, Y. L'Union Européenne des Païments. European Yearbook, 1954.

Biedenkopf, K. H. Massenproduktion, Wettbewerb und Europäische Vereinigung. Europa Archiv. June 5, 1956.

Brandt, K. La Stratégie Économique du Développement Agricole. Revue d'Économie Politique. January-February, 1956.

La Dixième Session du G.A.T.T. Bulletin du Conseil National du Patronat Français. March, 1956.

Donner, O. Die Weltbank und Deutschland. Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. No. 1, 1956.

Economic Activity in Africa. United Nations Review. August, 1956.

L'Espansione Economica Europea e i Suoi Problemi. Mondo Economico. March, 1956.

Hammarskjöld, D. For a New Approach to International Aid and Technical Assistance. United Nations Review. July, 1956.

Heilbronner, R. L. This Growing World. Economic Development and the World Bank. New York, Public Affairs Committee, 1956. (Public Affairs Pamphlet No. 237.)

Köllner, L. Die Bedeutung der Notenbanken für eine Gemeinsame Europäische Wirtschaftspolitik. Europa Archiv. June 20, 1956.

Lombardo, I. M. L'Azione Internazionale per l'Aumento della Produttività. Mondo Aperto. February, 1956.

Morgenstern, W. Der "Europäische Kongress der Arbeit" in Paris. Europa Archiv. June 5, 1956.

The Post-War Economic Record. United Nations Review. August, 1956.

Snapp, R. B. International Business Aspects of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. Texas Law Review. June, 1956.

Stein, G. Il Ritmo degli Investimenti nell'Europa Occidentale. Mercurio. March 31, 1956.

———. Investimenti (e Consumi) nel Blocco Sovietico. Mercurio. April 7, 1956.

Stone, W. T. Trading with Communists. Editorial Research Reports. July 25, 1956.

Weghorn, E. Die 11. Plenarsitzung der ECE. Europa Archiv. June 5, 1956.

Wyndham White, E. Les Obstacles à la Libération des Échanges Internationaux. Aussenwirtschaft. June, 1956.

International Law

Bartos, M. Codification du Droit Diplomatique. Revue de la Politique Internationale. February 15, 1956.

Bindschedler, R. L. Die Neutralität im Modernen Völkerrecht. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. June, 1956.

Bishop, W. W., Jr. International Law Commission Draft on Fisheries. American Journal of International Law. July, 1956.

Blix, H. The Rule of Unanimity in the Revision of Treaties: a Study of Treaties Governing Tangier. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1956.

Canyes, M. Transformación Jurídica del Sistema Interamericano en el Trienio de 1945 a 1948. Inter-American Juridical Yearbook, 1952-54.

De Visser, C. Reflections on the Present Prospects of International Adjudication. American Journal of International Law. July, 1956.

Fioravanzo, G. Le Droit de Guerre est-il Mort? Revue de Défense Nationale. February, 1956.

Friedmann, W. Some Impacts of Social Organization on International Law. American Journal of International Law. July, 1956.

Glaser, S. Élément Moral de l'Infraction Internationale. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. October-December, 1955.

Hayton, R. D. The "American" Antarctic.

American Journal of International Law. July, 1956.

Korowicz, M. St. The Problem of the International Personality of Individuals. American Journal of International Law. July, 1956.

Lauterpacht, E. The Contemporary Practice of the United Kingdom in the Field of International Law—Survey and Comment. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1956.

Mid-South Regional Conference on International Law and Foreign Trade: Papers and Other Proceedings. Louisiana Law Review. June, 1956.

Münch, F. Tätigkeit der Vereinten Nationen in Völkerrechtlichen Fragen. Archiv des Völkerrechts. July, 1956.

Northey, J. F. Constitutional Limitations as Affecting the Validity of Treaties. University of Toronto Law Journal. No. 2, 1956.

Notes on Current Inter-American Developments. Inter-American Juridical Yearbook, 1952-54.

Oda, S. The Hydrogen Bomb Tests and International Law. Friedens-Warte. No. 2, 1956.

Orfield, L. B. Jurisdiction of Foreign Courts over Crimes Committed Abroad by American Military Personnel. South Carolina Law Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Phleger, H. United States Treaties: Recent Developments. Department of State Bulletin. July 2, 1956.

Rudolf, W. Informationsfreiheit und Rundfunk im Völkerrecht. Jahrbuch für Internationale Recht. Nos. 2-3, 1954.

Schätzel, W. Die Theorie des Krieges bei Francisco de Victoria und der Moderne Angriffskrieg. Acta Scandinavica Juris Gentium. No. 4, 1955.

Walther, H. Le Statut International de la Navigation du Rhin. European Yearbook, 1954.

Wright, Q. The Prevention of Aggression. American Journal of International Law. July, 1956.

International Organization

United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Bartos, M. L'O.N.U. et la Coopération Régionale. Revue de la Politique Internationale. February 1, 1956.

Bastid, S. Le Rôle de l'Europe aux Nations-Unies jusqu'à la Dixième Session de l'Assemblée Générale. Revue Générale de Droit

International Public. October-December, 1955.

Brügel, J. W. Der Konflikt zwischen Völkerrecht und Rassenpolitik. Südafrika und die Vereinten Nationen. Europa Archiv. July 20, 1956.

La Coopération Atomique Pacifique. Notes et Études Documentaires. March 20, 1956.

Cottrell, W. F. The United Nations and Africa. Annals. July, 1956.

Determined Efforts to Seek Agreement on Disarmament. United Nations Review. July, 1956.

Disarmament—Continued Narrowing of Differences Sought. United Nations Review. August, 1956.

Frye, W. R. Press Coverage of the UN. International Organization. May, 1956.

García Arias, L. El Problema Político de la Admisión de Nuevos Miembros en la O.N.U. Política Internacional. July-September, 1955.

Gross, E. A. Major Problems in Disarmament. Northwestern University Law Review. July-August, 1956.

Mr. Hammarskjöld's Continuing Good Offices in the Middle East—The Security Council's Unanimous Decision. United Nations Review. July, 1956.

Pollard, H. M. Die Völkerrechtskommission der Vereinten Nationen. Europa Archiv. July 5, 1956.

La Question Palestienne devant les Nations Unies, 1945-1955. Revue de Droit International pour le Moyen-Orient. December, 1955.

Richardson, L. M. The Legal Relation between an International Organization and its Personnel. Wayne University Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Röling, B. V. A. Some Observations on the Review of the Charter. India Quarterly. January-March, 1956.

Sebastian de Erice, J. Las Naciones Unidas y el Ingreso de Nuevos Miembros. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. October-December, 1955.

Striking Rise in Technical Aid: Progress Reviewed in Survey of Operations for 1955. United Nations Review. August, 1956.

Vers la Création de l'Agence Atomique Internationale. Revue des Nations Unies. February, 1956.

Wehberg, H. Der Gegenwärtige Stand der Internationalen Organisation. Universitas. March, 1956.

Wilcox, F. O. The United Nations and the Search for Disarmament. Department of State Bulletin. July 16, 1956.

Regional and Collective Security Organizations

Accioly, H. A. ONU e os Organismos Regionais. Inter-American Juridical Yearbook, 1952-1954.

Armand, L. Atomic Energy and the Future of Europe. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

La Bataille de l'Euratom. Bilans Hebdomadaires. January 26, 1956.

Benoist, J. L'Union de l'Europe Occidentale. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. October-December, 1955.

Bonnefous, E. Les Impératifs d'une Relance Atlantique. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. April, 1956.

Carlier, M. J. Communes et Organisations Communales devant la Construction Européenne. Cahiers de Bruges. April, 1956.

Le Conseil de l'Europe 1951-1956. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. May, 1956.

Cuevas Cancino, F. El Problema de las Relaciones entre un Organismo Regional y el Mundial. Inter-American Juridical Yearbook, 1952-1954.

Erven, L. Le Pacte de Bagdad. Revue de la Politique Internationale. February 15, 1956.

Friedmann, W. New Tasks for NATO? International Journal. Summer, 1956.

Greppi, E. A Propos du Caractère de la C.E.C.A. Cahiers de Bruges. April, 1956.

Hayoul, M. L'Europe Atomique. Revue Nouvelle. May 15, 1956.

Heilperin, M. A. Europe Edges toward a Common Market. Fortune. September, 1956.

Heintz, F. J. The Baghdad Pact. Duquesne Review. Spring, 1956.

Heywood, M. Der Colombo Plan. Europa Archiv. July 5, 1956.

Huet, P. Les Problèmes Financiers et les Méthodes de L'Alliance Atlantique. Europa Archiv. June 5, 1956.

Kitcheev, G. O.T.A.N. et Sécurité Collective. Politique Étrangère. April, 1956.

Lavergne, B. L'Esroquerie de l'Euratom, Nouvelle C.E.D. ou M. Jean Monnet Aspirant au Pouvoir Absolu en Europe Occidentale. Année Politique et Économique. January-March, 1956.

Little, T. R. The Arab League: a Reassessment. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1956.

N.A.T.O. at the Crossroads: Disengagement in the Cold War. Round Table. June, 1956.

L'VIII Sessione del Consiglio d'Europa—Definità i Principi Politici Europei. Relazioni Internazionali. April 28, 1956.

Organisation de l'Union de l'Europe Occidentale. Notes et Études Documentaires. March 1, 1956.

Oriente e Occidente all'Assemblea di Strasburgo. Relazioni Internazionali. April 28, 1956.

Le Plan de Colombo: Historique et Premières Années d'Application. Problèmes Économiques. April 3, 1956.

Ramos Galino, F. Actividades y Perspectivas del Consejo de Europa. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. October-December, 1955.

Remigt, A. Politique Européenne de l'Énergie Atomique. Revue Nouvelle. May 15, 1956.

Robertson, A. H. The Creation of Western European Union. European Yearbook, 1954.

Schröder-Brzosniowsky, I. Der Stand der Wirtschaftlichen Integration Europas im Frühjahr 1956. Gewerkschaftliche Monatshefte. April, 1956.

Speckaert, G. P. La Formation et le Perfectionnement des Fonctionnaires Européens. Associations Internationales. March, 1956.

Steindorf, E. Literatur zur Entwicklung der Europäischen Gemeinschaft für Kohle und Stahl. Europa Archiv. June 20, 1956.

Vernant, J. L'O.T.A.N. Cherche son Avenir. Revue de Défense Nationale. June, 1956.

Wingenroth, C. G. SEATO: Lösung von Gestern? Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. May, 1956.

DOCUMENTS

General and Miscellaneous

Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. August 12, 1949. American Journal of International Law. July, 1956.

Great Britain. Foreign Office. Vietnam and the Geneva Agreements. Documents Concerning the Discussions between Representatives of Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the U.S.S.R. held in London in April and May, 1956. London, H.M.O., 1956.

I.L.O. Social Aspects of European Economic Co-operation. Geneva, 1956.

WHO. Proposed Programme and Budget Estimates for the Financial Year 1 January-31 December 1957. Geneva, December 1955.

United Nations

All entries under this heading bear the imprint of the United Nations (New York), 1956, unless a different place or date is shown.

Disarmament Commission. Third Report of the Sub-Committee of the . . . (Doc. DC/83; May 4, 1956).

ECOSOC. ECE. The Commission's Programme of Work for 1956/1957 (Doc. E/ECE/236; February 29, 1956).

———. ECLA. Brief Review of the Work and Activities of the Commission, 1948-1955 (Doc. E/CN.12/AC.34/2/add.1; April 11, 1956).

International Law Commission. International Responsibility. Report (Doc. A/CN.4/96; January 20, 1956).

———. Questions Relating to the Law of the Sea. Report (Doc. A/CN.4/97; January 27, 1956).

———. Codification of the International Law Relating to Diplomatic Intercourse and Immunities. Memorandum Prepared by the Secretariat (Doc. A/CN.4/98; February 21, 1956).

———. Comments by Governments on the Provisional Articles Concerning the Regime of the High Seas and the Draft Articles on the Regime of the Territorial Sea Adopted by . . . at its Seventh Session (Doc. A/CN.4/99; March 12, 1956).

———. Report on the Law of Treaties (Doc. A/CN.4/101; March 14, 1956).

Secretary-General. Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards. Report by . . . (Doc. E/2822; January 31, 1956).

———. Report of . . . to the Security Council Pursuant to the Council's Resolution of 4 April 1956 on the Palestine Question (Doc. S/3596; May 9, 1956).

———. Summary Statement by . . . on Matters of which the Security Council is Seized (Doc. S/3618; July 16, 1956).

United States

Unless otherwise indicated, all entries under this heading bear the imprint: "Washington: Government Printing Office."

Congress

House. Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Foreign Service. Basic Information on Organization, Administration and Personnel. 84th Cong., 1st sess.

———. Draft Bills Amending the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948. Hearings. March 6 . . . 15, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Mutual Security Act of 1956. Hearings. March 20 . . . May 10, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Foreign Affairs Advisory Board. Hearings before Subcommittee. June 22, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Foreign Service Act Amendments. Hearings. June 27-29, 1956.

———. Foreign Service Act Amendments of 1956. Report. H. Rep. 2696. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Survey of Activities—February 5, 1955-July 27, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Subcommittee on International Organizations and Movements. International Organizations and Movements. Hearings. February 20 . . . July 4, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Subcommittee on the Near East and Africa. Report of the Special Study Mission to Africa, South and East of the Sahara. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Committee on Un-American Activities. The Communist Conspiracy; Strategy and Tactics of World Communism—Part I, Communism Outside the United States—Section B: The U.S.S.R. (H. Rep. 2241); Section C: The World Congresses of the Communist International (H. Rep. 2242); Section D: Communist Activities Around the World (H. Rep. 2243); Section E: The Comintern and the CPUSA (H. Rep. 2244). 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. Organization for Trade Cooperation. Hearings. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

Senate. Committee on Appropriations. Financing of Aswan High Dam in Egypt. Hearing. January 26, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Technical Assistance and Related Programs. Report. S. Rep. 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Providing for a Study of the Possibility and Desirability of Establishing a University of the Americas. Report. S. Rep. 2671. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Subcommittee on Disarmament. Control and Reduction of Armaments. Second Interim Report. S. Rep. 2829. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Control and Reduction of Armaments. Hearings. Part 8—June 8, 1956. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Control and Reduction of Armaments. A Decade of Negotiations, 1946-1956. Staff Study No. 3. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Subcommittee on Technical Assistance Programs. Soviet Technical Assistance. Staff Study No. 7. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Subcommittee on Investigations. East-West Trade. Hearings. 3 pts. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. East-West Trade. Report. S. Rep. 2621. 84th Cong., 2nd sess.

———. ———. Communist Interrogation, Indoctrination and Exploitation of American Military and Civilian Prisoners. Hearings. June 19 . . . 27, 1956. 84th Cong. 2nd sess.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act. Scope of Soviet Activity in the United States. Hearing. Part 6—March 6, 1956.

Executive Departments

Department of the Army. Communist Interrogation, Indoctrination and Exploitation of Prisoners of War (Pamphlet No. 30-101).

Department of State. U. S. Participation in the UN. Report by the President to the Congress for the Year 1955 (Pub. No. 6318).

———. Swords into Plowshares (Pub. No. 6344).

———. Circular No. 175, December 13, 1955: Proper Exercise of the Treaty-Making Power of the United States (American Journal of International Law, July, 1956).

———. International Cooperation Administration. Mutual Security Legislation and Related Documents.

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

James Wilson: Founding Father, 1742-1798.

By CHARLES PAGE SMITH. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press. 1956. Pp. xii, 426. $7.50.)

It is odd that James Wilson has had to wait more than a century and a half for adequate biographical treatment. A signer of the Declaration of Independence, a key politician in both Pennsylvania and the Continental Congress, one of the two or three vital figures in the Constitutional Convention, a legal theorist and Justice of the Supreme Court—such a man would seemingly have merited extensive eulogy by the ancestor collectors who dominated American historiography throughout most of the nineteenth century. His dubious financial enterprises and incredible career as a land speculator might even have earned him a place in the rogues' gallery of the debunkers. Yet Professor Smith has had a clear field, and one can risk the guess that his exhaustive labors have made it unlikely that the task will need doing again.

James Wilson is a fine book, written by a literate scholar who is obviously thoroughly at home in the period. Wilson was an extraordinarily complex person and lived in an age which defies simple analysis, but at long last he has received his due at the hands of a perceptive student of both. Smith has managed to weld the various facets of Wilson's personality into a coherent pattern and in so doing has supplied the reader with a crystal window onto the life of the time.

Professor Smith suggests that the reason for the long delay in memorializing Wilson was the essentially off-beat character of this dour, brilliant Scot. "Jimmy de Caledonia," as the Pennsylvania anti-Federalists scornfully dubbed him, simply refused to be jammed into anyone's conceptual bed of Procrustes. The nationalist historians considered him a skeleton in the Federalist closet—a Founding Father and Supreme Court Justice who died in pathetic and ignominious flight from his creditors. The populist interpreters were likewise stymied: how could they fit into the aristocratic Federalist stereotype a man who advocated direct popular election of both the President and the Senate?

The book is particularly valuable on the strictly political activities of this extremely active, if not hyper-active, party stalwart. In contrast—and this is my only significant criticism of the work—the sections dealing with Wilson's legal and metaphysical efforts read as though they had been written in fits of absent-minded boredom. Chapters XXI and XXII, "The Nature of Law" and "Law and Society," are notable offenders on this score, and it is a tribute to the overall style of the biography that the reader finds himself shocked by the sudden deterioration. But despite all the incantations about "Scottish Realism" which Smith inserts, Wilson was, in my view, primarily a man of action, a fast, acute pragmatic reasoner. It is surely true that his Common Sense metaphysic supplied him with foundations for action that differed from those of, say, Hamilton or Jefferson, but I think this difference can be exaggerated, and certainly he was in his worst form when he wandered into the rarefied realm of abstraction. Professor Smith has vividly recreated James Wilson, Man of Action; it seems probable to me that no one could blow real life into James Wilson, Abstract Thinker.—JOHN P. RACHE, Brandeis University.

Energy and Society: The Relation Between Energy, Social Change and Economic Development. By FRED COTTELL. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc. 1956. Pp. xix, 330. $6.00.)

One of the great gaps in current political science literature and research involves the relationships of the physical sciences and technology to political values and processes. Whether this lacuna in knowledge is due to overspecialization in political science, to fears of concepts of scientific determinism, or to some other factors, not enough attention is being given to the social consequences of the physical aspects of man's living environment. Unfortunately, therefore, this pioneering volume which deals with perhaps the most basic of all physical processes, namely, energy, will not receive the study and recognition which it deserves by our profession.

In brief, this book is an examination of the impact of the growth and use of energy upon an evolving civilization and institutions. Its major thesis is that the extent to which man employs and converts the various forms of energy conditions the types of social and political organizations which are established. The transition from a low-energy-using society to a high-energy-using society is not inevitable, though, given the various circumstances under which energy is employed, it is possible to predict the kind of social arrangements which will be developed. The three major factors limiting any nation's energy-using capacity are deemed to be (1) natural resources and mechanical limitations, (2) excessive population pressures, and (3) non-responsive customs and ideologies.

What are the implications of increasing use of energy for a nation's political structure? In general, the author sees an enlargement and concentration of political power, an expansion of state functions together with the loss of local autonomy, greater controls over systems of production and distribution, more emphasis upon public administration, and shifts in the processes of political decision-making. On an international basis, he predicts that high-energy technology will produce regional systems or alliances rather than the single international state since the former can more readily take advantage of energy development opportunities.

There are bound to be many rough spots and omissions in a work such as this, which breaks so much new ground and is so interdisciplinary in scope. This reviewer, for example, thought that the significance of coal vis-à-vis fissionable fuels is overplayed or, as another illustration, that too much weight is given to problems associated with the industrialization of agriculture in contemporary society. Also, in a number of instances the social and political aspects of physical processes were not fully developed. However, these are subordinate considerations when viewed within the context of the overall design of this volume. What is important is that political scientists be encouraged to comprehend the basic significance of this study, since technological trends indicate that increasingly in the future it will be upon works such as these that a meaningful system of political analysis will be built.—ERNEST A. ENGELBERT, University of California (Los Angeles).

The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages: A Study in the Ideological Relations of Clerical to Lay Power. By WALTER ULLMANN. (New York: Barnes and Noble, Inc. 1956. Pp. xviii, 482. $8.00.)

In 1949 Dr. Walter Ullmann published Medieval Papalism: The Political Theories of the Medieval Canonists, in which he constructed the thesis that the medieval canonists were primarily responsible for the growth of "the theory of political omnipotence of the Pope as Boniface VIII propounded it in Unam Sanctam." In the volume now under review, Dr. Ullmann purports to trace the development of "papal-hierocratic" doctrine from the fourth century to its maturity prior to the canonists' juristic formulation of it in the mid-twelfth century. Both volumes give abundant evidence of the author's vast erudition and of his scholarly dedication to the recovery of the meaning and significance of medieval ideas and events as they were mutually related. The virtues of both volumes are unhappily marred by a defective methodology and a rigorist interpretation which seeks out a "unity of themes and a consistency of principles" in a period of medieval history when in fact there were no systematic, definitive, and precise statements of the ideological relations of clerical to lay power.

Dr. Ullmann posits at the start that government achieves for society its proper end through the instrumentality of those functionally qualified. When, therefore, in the medieval period, roughly between Emperor Gratian and the Bolognese Monk Gratian, the State was neither actual nor even conceived as in the Graeco-Roman politeia or in the Aristotelian-Thomistic speculation, the nature and purpose of the Church, unchallenged, marked society with its supreme goal, eternal life, and, in accordance with its teleological principle, subordinated all exercise of temporal power to this singleness of purpose. Dr. Ullmann sees a vertical and coherent development from the premises of the Petrine commission and the vicariate of Christ, as with inevitable logic the implications of these divine empowerments are brought forth by the Gelasian conception of the superiority and universality of the spiritual power; by the Isidorian conception of the auxiliary role of the Christian prince for the implementation of Christian justice, as interpreted by the sacerdotally qualified; by the annexation of the Roman conception of principatus to the sedes apostolica; by the juristic involvements of the fabricated Donation of Constantine; and by the symbolism of substantive doctrinal content of the coronation ceremonies. All these themes conduce to the subordination of the regia potestas, wholly devoid of any autonomy, to the auctoritas papalis.

The architectonic structure of this dialectic is its very weakness. It rests upon some rather hazardous scaffoldings. The author presumes that expressions and premises of general reference were understood, and intended for application in the settlement of particular conflicting claims, in precisely the same sense and broad application as he understands them; and that the instances in which the role of the medieval ruler was judged by the ecclesiastics to be subordinate and auxiliary to the sacramental and magisterial jurisdiction of the Church provided exhaustive definitions of the entire purpose of temporal governance. Moreover, that the distinction of function, though subordinate, might not as well have argued for a temporal autonomy with purposes broader than those supposed by the author is a consideration not to be too lightly dispensed with. Finally, his reconstruction of fragmentary testimonies of claims and counter-claims, resolving an ad hoc conflict into systematic, coherent ideologies of papalist and imperialist positions, is more likely a modern projection into the past than medieval events speaking for themselves. A. M. Stickler has put forth six directives for the discernment of the meaning of the decretalists which, I think, may rather profitably be heeded in the study of the pre-canonists ("Sacerdotium et Regnum nel decretisti e primi decretalisti: considerazioni metodologiche di ricerca e testi," Salesianum, XV, 1953, 572-612).

Dr. Ullmann has made a major contribution to medieval studies, not only because of his vast learning and dedicated purpose but more because his scholarship is directed to the establishment of theses that are at variance with those more commonly held. His present work will surely call for a re-examination of interpretations and a re-appraisal of the texts that were vibrantly part of the complex events of medieval Christendom. It may well be that his theses will not prevail, for want of a sound methodology.—JOSEPH F. COSTANZO, S. J., Fordham University.

Studies in Hindu Political Thought and Its Metaphysical Foundations. BY VISHWANATH PRASAD VARMA. (Banaras: Motilal Banarsidass. 1954? Pp. ii, 218. Rs 15/-.)

There is very little political thought in India in the Western sense of the term. Indian political theory is an integral part of the totality of Hindu philosophy. Man's principal goal in life, according to Hindu philosophy, is to achieve Moksha (freedom) from worldly bonds and toil by following the dictates of Dharma (supreme law). The State is considered to be the handiwork of Dharma and thereby serves as a means toward the realization of Moksha. Thus in the political scheme of things it is spiritual aspirations that predominate.

However, in an apparent effort to match Hindu traditions with those of the West, many Indian scholars seem to have overlooked these factors in assessing the importance of their political heritage. As a consequence, Indian scholarship in political theory has, with few exceptions, suffered from one or more of these defects: reading Western concepts into ancient Hindu texts; using Anglo-Saxon nomenclature to discuss Indian ideals and institutions; mistaking speculative materials for historical data; and neglecting contextual integrity while quoting from classics to substantiate the existence of modern concepts in primitive India.

It is a chief merit of Dr. Varma's book that it avoids the above pitfalls and pursues the subject matter in a spirit of scientific inquiry, free from propensities of national or cultural pride. In this scholarly treatise, a doctoral thesis for the University of Chicago, Dr. Varma describes and evaluates Indian political thought from the Rig-Veda (ca. 1500 B.C.) to the Manusmriti (ca. 100 B.C.) in terms of its origins and development, its nature, scope and significance.

In the first chapter, the author examines the historical origins and foundations of Hindu political philosophy. The political institutions of kingship, republicanism, Samiti (people's assembly) and Sabha (assembly of elders) are discussed in relation to the social structure. Along with theories of economic and racial origin of caste, note is taken of the mythical account of caste's inception showing how with the immolation of the god Purusha, his mouth became transformed into a priest, his arms into a warrior, his thighs into a husbandman, and his feet into a servant. However, the author fails to state that this Rig-Vedic hymn about Purusha has little to do with the creation of caste as such. The hymn is, in fact, a symbolical statement about the creation of the universe, since it also states that the sun emerged from Purusha's eyes, the moon from his mind, the sky from his head, fire (like the priest) from his mouth, earth (like the servant) from his feet, and breath and space from his ears.

An analysis of the fundamental concepts of Hindu political theory, e.g., Artha (wealth), Danda (punishment), Brahma (the Absolute), Kshatra (ruling power), Bala (material power), and Shakti (primal energy), is given in the second chapter. Dharma, "the most comprehensive concept in the entire history of Hindu thought," receives a thorough treatment in chapter three. The author takes issue with the view advanced by many Indian scholars, including Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan, that Dharma was sovereign in Indian polity. He points out that despite a universal acceptance of the supremacy of the doctrine, there was no legal agency to prevent breaches of Dharma by the ruler. In this connection, the author's commentary on the political philosophy of the Bhagavad Gita is keen and provocative, but it does not justify his claim that such an analysis is rendered for "the first time."

The theories of kingship by election and by divine right are discussed in great detail in chapters four and five. Despite the existence of republican forms of government, the author rightly contends, Indian political theories were mostly concerned with the institution of monarchy. The doctrine of Karma (determination of the fortunes of man's life on the basis of his conduct and deeds in previous incarnations) receives a rather generous interpretation. The author seems to discount the fatalistic facets of Karma in favor of its ethical merits.

In the last three pages of the book, Dr. Varma summarizes his conclusions, which, considering the nature of the work, are far from adequate. The primacy of spiritual values over political objectives, the author concludes, prevented the rise of such issues as the individual versus the State, politics versus ethics, and the ruler's responsibility to the people. Nevertheless, he asserts that "there is a fundamental spiritual and moral note in Hindu thought which is surpassing in its proclamation of the sacred character of the individual human personality. This emphasis on spirituality and morality in Hindu political thought is a great contribution to world political thought."

Dr. Varma has written a scholarly book on an important subject. The diligence and minuteness with which he has treated his subject are commendable. However, in his zeal for detail and documentation, he has made the book exceptionally turgid and dry. Swarms of Sanskrit quotations without translation would be hardly welcome to scholars not versed in the epic language. Besides, one wishes that the author had attached a bibliography for the benefit of the reader. With these reservations, Dr. Varma's work has all the earmarks of sound scholarship.—CHATTAR SINGH SAMRA, University of California (Berkeley).

The Self and the Dramas of History. BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1955. Pp. ix, 242. $3.75.)

This book is basically a theological treatise in which Niebuhr stresses the three dialogues in which the Self finds itself involved. The first is the empirical fact of the dialogue of the Self with itself, the second the Self's dialogue with its neighbors, and the third the seemingly empirically unverifiable dialogue of the Self with God. In the latter situation, the insight given by Biblical faith gives some hope of man's ability to grasp the "realm of mystery beyond rational comprehension" and in this way synthesize for life a meaning which cannot be found in the partialness of the observed historic dramas of everyday existence. The political theorist will find much of interest in this book: notably Niebuhr's emphasis on the Reformation's restoration of the Biblical mode of thought as against the Renaissance distillation of classic elements out of the medieval synthesis with a consequent emphasis on reason as the sole key to understanding human problems and personality. The effect of this latter development on the formulations both of Hobbes and the philosophers of the Enlightenment, and ultimately even upon Marx as traced out by the author, makes provocative reading. Part III of the book, which relates the Christian faith to contemporary problems of democracy, property, justice, and the international community, reiterates the approach developed and expounded by Niebuhr in his previous works. Here the political theorist will again find much of interest and value. The general tone of this work places Niebuhr firmly in the camp of Conservatism with a capital C, in Rossiter's use of the term, and should definitely refute those liberals who claim Niebuhr as their own. The toughness of Niebuhr's style makes the book slow and difficult reading, but the compensations derived from it in the form of philosophical insight and tightness of analysis far outweigh the labor involved in its perusal and mastery. —H. MALCOLM MACDONALD, University of Texas.

Modern German Political Theory. By OTTO BUTZ. (Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday & Co., Inc. 1955. Pp. 72. $ .95.)

This is a new title in the Short Studies in Political Science published by Doubleday. The author views the study of political theory as one of the most rewarding techniques for understanding the decision-making processes and related social aspects of any society. He therefore hopes in his present work to introduce the reader to the leading political theorists of Germany since 1870 and thereby reveal the basic problems and limitations conditioning the present status and the future potential of the West German Republic. After sketching the historical background of modern German political theory, the author presents his analysis under three headings: the political theory of Imperial Germany, characterized by Staatsrechtswissenschaft, Reichsstaat, and Sozialpolitik modified by the introduction of empiricism via Treitschke, Gierke, and Schmidt; the development of political ideas under the Weimar regime, marked by the rejection, in part, of the Imperial tradition and the introduction of contributions from political geography, sociology, and jurisprudence, plus the appearance of "true" political theory in the writings of Grabowsky and Heller; and, lastly, the intrusion of the Nazi ideology in the form of Volksgemeinschaft, the Führerprinzip, and the concept of Staatsräson. A brief statement on the future of German political theory concludes the study. Although brief in form, the work is a usable introduction to German thought and problems and provides a foundation for further specialized research. German political ideas have, with the exception of the Nazi period, been somewhat neglected in most undergraduate courses in American universities, and Professor Butz's monograph, it is hoped, may start a reversal of that trend.

Being and Nothingness: An Essay on Phenomenological Ontology. By JEAN PAUL SARTRE. TRANSLATED AND WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY HAZEL E. BARNES. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1956. Pp. lxix, 638. $10.00.)

This is the long overdue translation of Sartre's systematic exposition of the foundations of Existentialism, L'Être et le Néant, which first appeared in France in 1943. The translation, though drier and more pedantic than the original (Is it possible to present Existentialism in English at all? Doesn't this kind of philosophy rely almost entirely on peculiar connotations of French or German?), is as faithful as it can be made. The translator has also corrected the errors of the French text and has provided occasional footnotes to elucidate her rendering of some of the more difficult expressions. Her introduction, though sound, is not likely to shed much light on the vagaries of Sartre's philosophy or to make easier for the uninitiated reader what he will find in the body of the book.

Concept of Freedom. EDITED BY REV. CARL W. GRINDEL. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1955. Pp. xii, 513. $10.00.)

In this thoughtful and provocative work, fifteen members of the faculty of St. John's University, New York, attempt an analysis of the fundamental nature of freedom and its relation to contemporary problems. The analysis is basically an Aristotelian-Thomistic one and formulated within the limitations of Roman Catholic assumptions. Each of the essays is a unit in itself; collectively they treat of the metaphysics and philosophy of freedom and its relation to government, law, economics, labor, education, aesthetics, and religion. The leitmotif of the work is that freedom truly conceived is freedom under God.

Power and Community. By ROBERT STRAUSS-HUPÉ. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1956. Pp. 134. $3.00.)

In this work Professor Strauss-Hupé presents a series of essays on the problem of power in the modern world. Specific chapters relate power to personality, history, science, the community, and security. While admitting the importance, indeed the dominance, of power motives in contemporary society, the author declines to admit the contentions of Russell, Lasswell, and Morgenthau that power is the key to history. There are for the author other explanations of history, among them the desire for dignity and freedom and the preservation of human liberty. Power is justified only when it is subordinated to these ends, and the challenge to modern man is to legitimize power by making it not an end in itself but a means for the attainment of more righteous and worthy goals.

The Bourgeoisie in 18th Century France. By ELINOR G. BARBER. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1955. Pp. x, 165. $3.50.)

A historical-sociological study of the religious, economic, social, and political attitudes and practices of the eighteenth-century French bourgeoisie. The author maintains that the bourgeoisie did not constitute a revolutionary class bent on destroying the Old Regime but only slowly became antagonistic to the status quo.

Democracy and Dictatorship: Their Psychology and Patterns of Life. By ZEVEDEI BARBU. (New York: Grove Press. 1956. Pp. viii, 275. $3.50.)

This work, by a Roumanian intellectual and diplomat now Lecturer in Social Psychology at the University of Glasgow, is an able and stimulating psychological analysis of the life patterns of democracy and dictatorship. The democratic way of life is expressed in a socio-cultural complex in which confidence in reason, belief in human personality, and the presence of change compatible with security are predominant. Nazism develops out of insecurity, conditions of stress, and a loss of confidence in rationalism; it seeks compensation in mass identification and Gleichschaltung. Communism follows much the same pattern, with the element of irrationalism tending to outweigh that of emotionalism. The author's analysis of the impact of the human mind on the historic process and his discussion of the role of personality in history are of special interest. The book was originally published in England as one of the titles in the Inter- national Library of Sociology and Social Reconstruction.

Socialism and the Individual. By WILLIAM ANGUS SINCLAIR. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1956. Pp. 168. $2.50.)

William Angus Sinclair was at the time of his death Reader in Philosophy at Edinburgh University. The book is an explanation of his abandonment of the Conservative Party in 1945 and a defense of the program and future of the Labor Party as he sees it. It may be read with profit by Americans interested in the intellectual reassessments going on in certain circles in Britain today.

A John LaFarge Reader. EDITED BY THURSTON N. DAVIS, S. J., AND JOSEPH SMALL, S. J.. (New York: The America Press. 1956. Pp. xiv, 272. $3.50.)

The volume contains three dozen articles and editorials by the former editor of the Jesuit weekly America. Father LaFarge has been a leading fighter for interracial justice and an opponent of isolationism. Topics include, inter alia, "Franco-American Understanding," "War Aid to Russia," and "The Basis of Interracial Peace."

At the Feet of Mahatma Gandhi. By DR. RAJENDRA PRASAD. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1955. Pp. vii, 350. $6.00.)

A highly personal account by the President of India of three decades of social and political struggle, first written in Hindi in 1950 from what the author "felt and remembered" of his association with Gandhi. It permits the reader to follow the evolution of Gandhi's philosophy and method and contributes valuable insight into the nature of Gandhi's leadership and the character of the Indian response.

Historical Atlas. By WILLIAM R. SHEPHERD. (New York: Barnes & Noble, Inc. 1956. 8th ed. Pp. xii, 226, 115. $12.50.)

Those who have regretted the long unavailability of Shepherd's Historical Atlas will welcome the new edition, which contains all the maps of the 7th revised and enlarged edition (1929) plus eight maps for the period since 1929, prepared by C. S. Hammond and Company. Since the original plates had been destroyed, the Shepherd maps have been reproduced—very successfully—by offset lithography. As in the 7th edition, the treatment of post-World War I history is somewhat disappointing; but as a whole the atlas still far surpasses its competitors.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

ARNAUD B. LEAVELLE

Stanford University

History and Criticism

Anderle, Othmar. Giambattista Vico als Vorläufer einer morphologischen Geschichtsbetrachtung. Die Welt Als Geschichte. XVI/2, 1956.

Anderson, F. H. Plato's Aesthetics Reconsidered. University of Toronto Quarterly. July, 1956.

Benz, E. Luther et l'Eglise orthodoxe. Irenikon. XXVIII/4, 1955.

Berlin, Isaiah. Hersen and the Grand Inquisitors. Encounter. May, 1956.

Bluck, R. S. The Parmenides and the "Third Man." The Classical Quarterly. January-April, 1956.

Blumenberg, W. Ein Unbekanntes Kapitel Aus Marx' Leben. International Review of Social History. Vol. 1, Part 1, 1956.

Bressler, Leo A. The Anchor Club, Defender of Federalism. The Pennsylvania Magazine. July, 1956.

Brinton, Crane. Toynbee's City of God. The Virginia Quarterly Review. Summer, 1956.

Broome, J. H. Collins and Desmaizeaux. Revue de Littérature Comparée. April-June, 1956.

Brownlow, Louis. Woodrow Wilson and Public Administration. Public Administration Review. Spring, 1956.

Bruner, Jerome S. Freud and the Image of Man. Partisan Review. Summer, 1956.

Carlin, Edward A. Schumpeter's Constructed Type—The Entrepreneur. Kyklos. IX/1, 1956.

Cherry, George L. The Role of the Convention Parliament (1688-89) in Parliamentary Supremacy. Journal of The History of Ideas. June, 1956.

Chevallier, J. J. Reflexions sur le dernier ouvrage de Bertrand de Jouvenel. Revue Française De Science Politique. April-June, 1956.

Cisneros, Jose Marfo Hernández-Rubio. Examen Político-Jurídico del siglo XIX. Revista de la Facultad de Derecho, Universidad de Oviedo. September, 1955.

Coulborn, Rushton. Fact and Fiction in Toynbee's Study of History. Ethics. July, 1956.

Coyle, Alcuin F. Cicero's De officiis and De officiis ministrorum of St. Ambrose. Franciscan Studies. September, 1955.

Dubarle, Dominique. Teilhard de Chardins

Entwurf einer neuen Kosmologie. Dokumente. June, 1956.

Duroselle, J. B. Michel Chevalier saint-simonien. Revue Historique. April-June, 1956.

Emerson, Everett H. Reginald Pecoock: Christian Rationalist. Speculum. April, 1956.

Emerson, Everett H. Calvin and Covenant. Church History. June, 1956.

Eulau, Heinz. From Public Opinion to Public Philosophy [Lippmann]. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. July, 1956.

Fetscher, Iring. Über Marx und die Gegenwart. Archiv Für Rechts-und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/2, 1956.

Fraser, C. M. Edward I of England and the Regalian Franchise of Durham. Speculum. April, 1956.

French, A. The Economic Background to Solon's Reforms. The Classical Quarterly. January-April, 1956.

Gelzer, Thomas. Aristophanes und sein Sokrates. Museum Helveticum. April, 1956.

Ghoraba, Hammouda. The Dilemma of Religion and Philosophy in Islam. Islamic Quarterly. December, 1955.

Grabowsky, Adolf. Robespierre: Versuch einer Charakteristik. Zeitschrift für Politik. December, 1955.

Greene, Theodore M., and others. Reinhold Niebuhr: A Symposium. Union Seminary Quarterly Review. May, 1956.

Guicheteau, Marcel. L'art et l'illusion chez Platon. Revue Philosophique De Louvain. May, 1956.

Haeggglund, Bengt. Was Luther a Nominalist? Theology. June, 1956.

Hainchelin, Charles. Der Mythos Jesu. Aufbau. April, 1956.

Harrison, A. R. W. Law-making at Athens at the End of the Fifth Century B. C. The Journal of Hellenic Studies. 1955.

Heberle, Rudolf. A Note on Riesman's The Lonely Crowd. The American Journal of Sociology. July, 1956.

Hippel, Ernst von. Ideas políticas en las culturas pre-hispanicas. Estudios Americanos. February, 1956.

Hoffman, William S. Willie P. Mangum and the Whig Revival of the Doctrine of Instructions. The Journal of Southern History. August, 1956.

Hulme, Harold. The Winning of Freedom of Speech by the House of Commons. The American Historical Review. July, 1956.

Islamic Civilization versus Western Civilization [Various Articles]. Islamic Literature. May-June, 1956.

Kaplan, Morton A. How Sovereign is Hobbes' Sovereign? Western Political Quarterly. June, 1956.

Kaplan, Sidney. Social Engineers as Saviors: Effect of World War I on Some American Liberals. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1956.

Kaufmann, Walter. Hegel-Legende und Wirklichkeit. Zeitschrift Für Philosophische Forschung. X/2, 1956.

Kenrick, Edward F. Paradise Lost and the Index of Prohibited Books. Studies in Philology. July, 1956.

King, Hugh R. Aristotle without Prima Materia. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1956.

Kohn, Hans. France Between Britain and Germany. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1956.

Krause, Anna. Unamuno and Tennyson. Comparative Literature. Spring, 1956.

Kroner, Richard J. Heidegger's Private Religion. Union Seminary Quarterly Review. May, 1956.

La Mountain, George F. J. The Concept of the Infinite in the Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas. The Thomist. July, 1956.

Landmann, Michael. Platons Traktat von den drei Unsterblichkeiten. Zeitschrift Für Philosophische Forschung. X/2, 1956.

Lefebvre, Georges. A Historian's Remarks on the Transition from Feudalism to Capitalism. Science and Society. Summer, 1956.

Lekai, Louis J. Cardinal La Rochefoucauld and the Cistercian Reform. American Benedictine Review. Winter, 1955-56.

Levitt, Theodore. The Lonely Crowd and the Economic Man. Quarterly Journal of Economics. February, 1956.

Lookwood, David. Some Remarks on "The Social System." The British Journal of Sociology. June, 1956.

McAlur, Edward C. Browning's "Cleon" and Auguste Comte. Comparative Literature. Spring, 1956.

Maurois, André. Metternich. La Revue De Paris. July, 1956.

Mellone, S. H. Voltaire. The Hibbert Journal. July, 1956.

Menzel, Johanna M. The Sinophilism of J. H. G. Justi. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1956.

Miller, S. J. T. The Position of the King in Bracton and Beaumanois. Speculum. April, 1956.

Moellering, R. L. Rauschenbusch in Retrospect. Concordia Theological Monthly. August, 1956.

Morris, Christopher. The Liberalism of the Enlightenment. The Listener. May 24, 1956.

Morris, Richard B. The Confederation Period and the American Historian. The William and Mary Quarterly. April, 1956.

Mulder, William. Image of Zion: Mormonism as an American Influence in Scandinavia. The Mississippi Valley Historical Review. June, 1956.

Müller, Georg. Eugen Rosenstock—ein Hegelianer? Archiv Für Rechts-und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/2, 1956.

Ong, W. J. System, space, and intellect in Renaissance symbolism. Bibliothèque D'Humanisme et Renaissance. May, 1956.

Ornstein, Robert. Donne, Montaigne, and Natural Law. The Journal of English and German Philology. April, 1956.

Peters, R. S. Freud's Theory. The British Journal for the Philosophy of Science. May, 1956.

Platonism and Neo-Platonism [Various Articles]. Revue Philosophique. January-March, 1956.

Pontalis, J. B. Freud aujourd'hui: I, II. Les Temps Modernes. May, June, 1956.

Richter, Will. Kritisches und Exegetisches zu Senecas Prosaschriften. Hermes. June, 1956.

Ricoeur, Paul. Note critique sur "Chine ouverte." Esprit. June, 1956.

Rivier, A. L'homme et l'expérience humaine dans les fragments d'Heraclite. Museum Helveticum. July, 1956.

Rodolsky, Roman. Zur neuen Kritik des Marxschen Gesetzes der fallenden Profitrate. Kyklos. IX/2, 1956.

Rouquette, R. Ignace De Loyola Dans Le Paris Intellectuel Du XVI<sup>e</sup> Siècle. Études. July-August, 1956.

Rubel, Maximilien. L'état et le droit dans la "Deutsche Ideologie." Archiv für Rechts-und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/1, 1956.

Schmidt, Royal J. Cultural Nationalism in Herder. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1956.

Scholem, Gershom. The Meaning of the Torah in Jewish Mysticism. Diogenes. Summer, 1956.

Schutz, Alfred. Mozart and the Philosophers. Social Science. Summer, 1956.

Simon, Walter M. History for Utopia:

- Saint Simon and the Idea of Progress. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1956.
- Smith, James Morton. John Adams Pardons William Durrell: A Note on Sedition Proceedings, 1798-1800. The New-York Historical Society Quarterly. April, 1956.
- Sohier, Albert. Le catholicisme en Chine. Esprit. June, 1956.
- Steenberghen, Fernand Van. L'avnir du thomisme. Revue Philosophique De Louvain. May, 1956.
- Streadbeck, Avral L. Juridical Redemption and the Graser Marienleben. The Germanic Review. April, 1956.
- Ste. Croix, G. E. M. The Constitution of the Five Thousand. Historia. Heft 1, 1956.
- Tarrant, Dorothy. Plato as Dramatist. The Journal of Hellenic Studies. 1955.
- Thérive, Andre. Julien Benda. La Revue Des Deux Mondes. July 15, 1956.
- Thomas, Norman. The Socialism of Bernard Shaw. The Socialist Call. August, 1956.
- Tilliette, Xavier. Die Philosophie Merleau-Pontys. Dokumente. April, 1956.
- Toynbee's Contributions [Various Articles]. Diogenes. Spring, 1956.
- Tucker, Robert C. The Cunning of Reason in Hegel and Marx. Review of Politics. July, 1956.
- Tucker, Robert C. Stalin and the Uses of Psychology. World Politics. July, 1956.
- Villey, Michel. Sur l'antique inclusion du droit dans la morale. Archiv für Rechts-und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/1, 1956.
- Wahl, J. L. "Introduction à la Métaphysique" de M. Heidegger. Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale. April-June, 1956.
- Weigel, Gustave. The Theological Significance of Paul Tillich. Cross Currents. Spring, 1956.
- Wendon, John. Christianity, History, and Mr. Toynbee. The Journal of Religion. July, 1956.
- Wiese, Leopold V. G. D. H. Cole über soziale Klassen und Eliten. Kyklos. IX/1, 1956.
- Wilkins, Burleigh Taylor. James, Dewey, and Hegelian Idealism. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1956.
- Wilkins, Ernest H. Five Mazzini Letters. Italica. June, 1956.
- Williams, T. Harry. Thaddeus Stevens: An American Radical. Commentary. June, 1956.
- Williams, William Appleman. On the Restoration of Brooks Adams. Science and Society. Summer, 1956.
- Willson, Lawrence. Shakespeare and the Genteel Tradition in America. New Mexico Quarterly. Spring, 1956.
- Wilson, John B. A Transcendental Minority Report. The New England Quarterly. June, 1956.
- Wolfe, Bertram D. Lenin "Consults" Hegel. The Antioch Review. June, 1956.
- Worsley, P. M. Emile Durkheim's Theory of Knowledge. The Sociological Review. July, 1956.

Analysis

- Baker, A. E. Toleration. Theology. August, 1956.
- Bell, Daniel. The Theory of Mass Society. Commentary. July, 1956.
- Benjamin, A. Cornelius. Mysticism and Scientific Discovery. The Journal of Religion. July, 1956.
- Butterfield, H. The Role of the Individual in History. History. February and June, 1956.
- Chiaromonte, Nicola. State Reason and Individual Reason. Confluence. July, 1956.
- Coblentz, Stanley A. Truth Via the Tabulating Machine. Prairie Schooner. Summer, 1956.
- Cranston, Maurice. The Rights of Man—III. The Listener. May 17, 1956.
- Crosland, C. A. R. About Equality. Encounter. July, 1956.
- Deininger, Whitaker T. Some Reflections on Epistemology and Historical Inquiry. The Journal of Philosophy. July 5, 1956.
- Devons, Ely. The Role of the Myth in Politics. The Listener. June 21, 1956.
- Easton, David. Limits of the Equilibrium Model in Social Research. Behavioral Science. April, 1956.
- Fletcher, Ronald. Functionalism as a Social Theory. The Sociological Review. July, 1956.
- Fortes, Meyer. The Study of Society. The Listener. June 14, 1956.
- Friedman, Georges. Psychoanalysis and Sociology. Diogenes. Summer, 1956.
- Garandy, Roger. De l'empirisme logique à la sémantique. Revue Philosophique. April-June, 1956.
- Gurvitch, Georges. Les caractères cardinaux des classes sociales. Archiv Für Rechts-und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/2, 1956.
- Hasenfuss, Josef. Religion und Recht. Archiv für Rechts-und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/1, 1956.
- Jorgensen, Carl. On the Possibility of Deducing What Ought To Be from What Is. Ethics. July, 1956.
- Lacambra, Gas y. Notas para una teoría de la obligacion política. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1956.

Margenau, Henry. A Unified Method of Science: Can It Be Applied to Religion? Christian Register. May, 1956.

Marcuson, Simon. Information, Education, Propaganda, and Attitude Change. Phylon. No. 2, 1956.

Maroger, Jean. L'évolution de l'idée de supranationalité. Politique Étrangère. June, 1956.

Mental Health. [Various Articles]. Twentieth Century. May, 1956.

Money, John. Mind-Body Dualism and the Unity of Bodymind. Behavioral Science. July, 1956.

Murphy, Gardner. The Enigma of Human Nature. Christian Register. July, 1956.

Nelson, J. Robert. Tradition and Traditions as an Ecumenical Problem. Theology Today. July, 1956.

Pähler, Karl H. Verein und Sozialstruktur. Archiv für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/2, 1956.

Partridge, P. H. Value Judgments and the Social Sciences. Australian Journal of Politics and History. May, 1956.

Platen, Alexander von. Die Abenteuer der Dialektik. Archiv für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/1, 1956.

Political Communication [Various Articles]. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1956.

Russell, Bertrand. Philosophical Analysis. The Hibbert Journal. July, 1956.

Sanchiz, José Bugada. Los instrumentos de investigación en las ciencias sociales. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1956.

Scheibert, Peter. Nihilismus und Revolution. Archiv für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/1, 1956.

Schelling, T. C. An Essay on Bargaining. American Economic Review. June, 1956.

Shapley, Harlow. We Are Not Alone. Christian Register. July, 1956.

Skinner, B. F. Freedom and the Control of Men. Perspectives U. S. A. Spring, 1956.

Smith, John E. and others. The Christian in Philosophy. The Christian Scholar. June, 1956.

Stern, Alfred. Science and the Philosopher. American Scientist. July, 1956.

Taubes, Jacob. Four Ages of Reason. Archiv für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/1, 1956.

Tillich, Paul J. Religion. Perspectives U. S. A. Spring, 1956.

Topitsch, Ernst. Sozialtheorie und Gesellschaftsgestaltung. Archiv für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie. XLII/2, 1956.

Weigel, Gustave. Catholic and Protestant Theologies in Outline. The American Scholar. Summer, 1956.

Weil, Eric. Good Sense or Philosophy. Diogenes. Winter, 1955.

Wishy, Bernard W. Is There a Revolt Against Reason? Political Science Quarterly. June, 1956.

Yolton, John W. Individuality, Leadership, and Democracy. Diogenes. Winter, 1955.

Zajdlic, W. The Limitations of Social Sciences. Kyklos. IX/1, 1956.

Contemporary Issues

Amin, 'Osman. The Message of Muslim Thought. Islamic Review. July, 1956.

Arnavon, C. Les Nouveaux Conservateurs Américains. Études Anglaises. April-June, 1956.

Arnold, G. L. Notes on Fabianism. The Twentieth Century. June, 1956.

Aron, Raymond. Can War in the Atomic Age Be Limited? Confluence. July, 1956.

Bernard, Ellsworth. Communism Is Not the Question! AAUP Bulletin. Summer, 1956.

Bates, M. Searles. Religious Liberty: Recent Phases of the Problem. Ecumenical Review. July, 1956.

Bennett, John C. The Draft and Christian Vocation. The Christian Century. August 22, 1956.

Birnbaum, Norman. Religion in America. The Listener. May 24, 1956.

Bliven, Bruce. Why Are Intellectuals Distrusted? The Pacific Spectator. Spring, 1956.

Born, Max. Development and Essence of the Atomic Age. Confluence. July, 1956.

Britton, William E. Objectives of Higher Education in America. AAUP Bulletin. Summer, 1956.

Bunche, Ralph. Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy. Ecumenical Review. July, 1956.

Burnham, James. Why Secrets? Confluence. July, 1956.

Cairó, Anibal Ismodes. América y la técnica. Estudios Americanos. February, 1956.

Clark, Kenneth B. A Struggle for Complete Human Dignity. Christian Register. July, 1956.

Davies, Horton, Charles S. Braden, and Charles W. Ransom. Centrifugal Christian Sects. Religion in Life. Summer, 1956.

Dikelius, Otto. Christian Unity in a Divided Europe. Ecumenical Review. July, 1956.

Domenach, J. M. Again the Popular Front. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

- Drucker, Peter F. Organized Religion and the American Creed. Review of Politics. July, 1956.
- Dulles, Avery. The Legion of Decency. America. June 2, 1956.
- Dulles, John Foster. Positive Measures for Peace. Ecumenical Review. July, 1956.
- Fiedler, Leslie A. The Intellectual Roots of Anti-Intellectualism. The Pacific Spectator. Summer, 1956.
- Finer, S. E. In Defence of Pressure Groups. The Listener. June 7, 1956.
- Finer, S. E. The Political Power of Private Capital. The Sociological Review. July, 1956.
- Fitzgibbon, Russell H. Revolutions: Western Hemisphere. The South Atlantic Quarterly. July, 1956.
- Folejewski, Abigniew. Frustrations of Socialist Realism. The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism. June, 1956.
- Galbraith, J. K. On the Economics of F. D. R. Commentary. August, 1956.
- Galdston, Iago. Psychopathia Intellectualis. The Pacific Spectator. Spring, 1956.
- Gillis, James M. Catholics and Intellectuals. The Catholic World. June, 1956.
- Goodspeed, D. J. The Arts of Subversion. Queen's Quarterly. Spring, 1956.
- Globig, Fritz von. Die grossen Federn. Aussen Politik. July, 1956.
- Hammarckjold, Dag. Spiritual Impact on the United Nations. Ecumenical Review. July, 1956.
- Hamrighausen, E. G. Billy Graham and the Protestant Predicament. The Christian Century. July 18, 1956.
- Harmel, Claude. Le Parti Communiste et Les Intellectuels. La Revue Des Deux Mondes. May 15, 1956.
- Hays, Paul R. Academic Freedom and Communist Teachers. Commentary. June, 1956.
- Henterson, Hanford. Backsliding Liberalism. The Freeman. July, 1956.
- Hicks, Granville. Liberalism in the Fifties. The American Scholar. Summer, 1956.
- Hocking, W. E. Christianity and the Faith of the Coming World Civilization. The Hibbert Journal. July, 1956.
- Hudson, G. F. The Heirs of Stalin. The Twentieth Century. August, 1956.
- Hunt, N. C. Pressure Groups in the U. S. A. Occidente. March-April, 1956.
- Hutkins, Robert M. Religion and Education. The Commonwealth. June 29, 1956.
- Keeny, Barnaby C. Education and Progress—Then and Now. ACLS Newsletter. Spring, 1956.
- Kocharian, S. Religion and Communism. Caucasian Review. No. 2, 1956.
- Kohn, Hans. A New Look at Nationalism. The Virginia Quarterly Review. Summer, 1956.
- Levitt, Theodore. The Changing Character of Capitalism. Harvard Business Review. July-August, 1956.
- Lévy-Bruhl, Henri. Le culte de la personnalité. La Revue Socialiste. May, 1956.
- Mus, Par Paul. Esquisse d'une situation sociologique du Bouddhisme. Esprit. June, 1956.
- Naegele, Kaspar D. Clergymen, Teachers, and Psychiatrists. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1956.
- Neuberger, Richard L. Principles or Party? The Christian Century. July 18, 1956.
- Niebuhr, Reinhold. A Proposal to Billy Graham. The Christian Century. August 8, 1956.
- Peltier, Hélène. La destalinisation. Esprit. July, 1956.
- Porter, John. Concentration of Economic Power and the Economic Elite in Canada. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. May, 1956.
- Poulain, Dorothy. French Catholic Left and Anti-Americanism. The Catholic World. May, 1956.
- Romero, Francisco. Las corrientes filosóficas en el siglo XX. Cuadernos. July-August, 1956.
- Ross, Ralph G. Academic Freedom and Faculty Status. Commentary. August, 1956.
- Silone, Ignazio, and others. Ist Russland anders geworden? Der Monat. June, 1956.
- Silvain, Rene. Les contradictions internes de l'U. R. S. S. post-stalinienne. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. July, 1956.
- Souvarine, Boris. Le Stalinisme sans Staline. La Revue de Paris. June, 1956.
- Sullivan, William J. The Catholic Liberal. The Catholic World. June, 1956.
- Trapp, Jacob. Humanism and Beyond. Christian Register. July, 1956.
- Viereck, Peter. A Third View of the New Deal. New Mexico Quarterly. Spring, 1956.
- White, Helen C. Freedom to Teach. AAUP Bulletin. Summer, 1956.
- Wolfe, Bertram D. Stalinism versus Stalin. Commentary. June, 1956.
- Wolfe, Bertram D. Stalin's Ghost at the Party Congress. Foreign Affairs. July, 1956.

Legal Theory

- Abrams, Charles. Civil Rights in 1956. Commentary. August, 1956.

Baker, Richard C. Self Incrimination: Is the Privilege an Anachronism? American Bar Association Journal. July, 1956.

Bard, A. S. Aesthetics and the Police Power. The American Journal of Economics and Sociology. April, 1956.

Berman, Harold J. Law Reform in the Soviet Union. The American Slavic and East European Review. April, 1956.

Church-State Relations: Nineteenth Century Judicial Thought Concerning [Note]. Minnesota Law Review. May, 1956.

Crosskey, William Winslow. John Marshall and the Constitution. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Dession, George H. Psychiatry and Public Policy. Buffalo Law Review. Fall, 1955.

Demkitz, Nonette. Congressional Investigation of Newspapermen, Authors, and Others in the Opinion Field—Its Legality Under the First Amendment. Minnesota Law Review. April, 1956.

Douglas, Paul H. (Senator). The Case for the Consumer of Natural Gas. Georgetown Law Journal. June, 1956.

Douglas, William O. (Justice). The Durham Rule: A Meeting Ground for Lawyers and Psychiatrists. Iowa Law Review. Summer, 1956.

Frankfurter, Felix (Justice), and others. Law and the Future: A Symposium. Northwestern University Law Review. May-June, 1956.

French Administrative Law [Various Articles]. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. March-April; May-June, 1956.

Gardner, George K. Free Speech in Public Places. Boston University Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Gest, John B. Dr. Wu and the Natural Law. Pennsylvania Bar Association Quarterly. June, 1956.

Graham, Howard Jay. "Built Better than They Knew." Pt. 1: The Framers, the Railroads and the Fourteenth Amendment. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. Summer, 1956.

Greenberg, Jack. Social Scientists Take the Stand: A Review and Appraisal of their Testimony in Litigation. Michigan Law Review. May, 1956.

Hawley, Cameron. Morality vs. Legality. Pennsylvania Bar Association Quarterly. April, 1956.

Horowitz, Harold W. Legal Aspects of "Political Blacklisting" in the Entertainment Industry. Southern California Law Review. April, 1956.

Hubbard, H. A. Artificial Insemination: A Reply to Dean Tallin. The Canadian Bar Review. April, 1956.

Interposition: A Round Table [Various Articles]. Journal of Public Law. Spring, 1956.

Kelsen, Hans. A "Dynamic" Theory of Natural Law. Louisiana Law Review. June, 1956.

Llewellyn, Karl N. On What Makes Legal Research Worth While. Journal of Legal Education. VIII/4, 1956.

Markham, Jesse W. Report of the Attorney General's Committee on Antitrust Laws. Quarterly Journal of Economics. May, 1956.

McKay, Robert B. "With All Deliberate Speed": A Study of School Desegregation. New York University Law Review. June, 1956.

Perkins, Rollin M. Sampling the Evolution of Social Engineering. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. Spring, 1956.

Pittman, R. Carter. The Fifth Amendment: Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow. American Bar Association Journal. June, 1956.

Pound, Roscoe. The Causes of Popular Dissatisfaction with the Administration of Justice. Baylor Law Review. Winter, 1956.

Pound, Roscoe. The Supreme Court in our System: A Review of Mr. Justice Jackson's Last Book. American Bar Association Journal. May, 1956.

Randall, Charles H., Jr. Sir Edward Coke and the Privilege Against Self-incrimination. South Carolina Law Quarterly. Summer, 1956.

Rorty, James. Virginia's Creeping Desegregation. Commentary. July, 1956.

Self-Incrimination [Various Articles]. Kentucky Law Journal. Spring, 1956.

Shuman, Samuel I. Jurisprudence and the Analysis of Fundamental Legal Terms. Journal of Legal Education. VIII/4, 1956.

Simmons, Robert G. The Use and Abuse of Dissenting Opinions. Louisiana Law Review. April, 1956.

Warren, Earl (C. J.). The Law and the Future. Fortune. November, 1955.

Westin, Alan F. Liberals and the Supreme Court. Commentary. July, 1956.

Yntema, Hessel E. Comparative Legal Research. Michigan Law Review. May, 1956.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

HERBERT A. SIMON

Carnegie Institute of Technology

Philosophy of Social Science

Bowman, Mary Jean. The Conference on Research on Expectations, Uncertainty and Business Behavior. Items. September, 1956.

March, James G. Sociological Jurisprudence Revisited. Stanford Law Review. May, 1956.

Research Methods and Organization

Boguslaw, R. Sociometric Methodology and Valid Cross-National Research. International Social Science Bulletin. 1955, #4.

Comparative Cross-National Research: Bibliography. International Social Science Bulletin. 1955, #4.

Dukiker, H. C. C. Comparative Research in Social Science. International Social Science Bulletin. 1955, #4.

The Interview in Social Research. American Journal of Sociology, Whole number, September, 1956.

Key, V. O., Jr. Strategies in Research on Public Affairs. Items. September, 1956.

Motivation and Personality

Arnhoff, Franklyn N. Ethnocentrism and Stimulus Generalization. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology.

Bernberg, Raymond E. Personality Correlates of Social Conformity: II. Journal of Social Psychology. May, 1956.

Freeman, Howard E. and Gene G. Kasbaum. The Illiterate in American Society. Social Forces. May, 1956.

French, Elizabeth G. Motivation as a Variable in Work-Partner Selection. Journal of Abnormal & Social Psychology. July, 1956.

Kogan, Nathan. Authoritarianism and Depression. Journal of Abnormal & Social Psychology. July, 1956.

Neems, Ralph and Alvin Seodol. Authoritarianism and Level of Aspiration Scores. Journal of Social Psychology. May, 1956.

Wells, William D., Guy Weinert and Marilyn Rubel. Conformity Pressure and Authoritarian Personality. Journal of Social Psychology. May, 1956.

Opinions and Attitudes

Asch, Solomon E. Studies of Independence and Conformity I. Psychological Monographs #416. 1956.

Belbin, Eunice. The Effects of Propaganda on Recall, Recognition and Behaviour. British Journal of Psychology. August, 1956.

Clark, K. E., and R. L. Jones. Changes in Attitude Toward a Low-Rent Housing Project. Journal of Applied Psychology. June, 1956.

Dunnette, M. D., W. H. Uphoff, and M. Aylward. The Effect of Lack of Information on the Undecided Response in Attitude Surveys. Journal of Applied Psychology. June, 1956.

Eulau, Heinz. Identification with Class and Political Perspective. Journal of Politics. May, 1956.

Gilbert, Thomas F. Experiments in Morale. Journal of Social Psychology. May, 1956.

Jones, Edward E., and Jane Aneshansel. The Learning and Utilization of Contravalant Material. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1956.

King, Bert. T., and Irving L. Janis. Comparison of the Effectiveness of Improvised versus Non-Improvised Role-Playing in Producing Opinion Changes. Human Relations. May, 1956.

London, Ivan D., and Miriam B. London. Differential Reactions of Recent and Earlier Defectors to Anti-Soviet Propaganda Themes. Psychological Reports. September, 1956.

London, Ivan D., and Oleg Anisimov. Non-thematic, Non-technical Factors Influencing the Effectiveness of Plausible Appeals Directed to a Soviet Audience. Psychological Reports. September, 1956.

London, Ivan D., and Miriam B. London. Soviet Reaction to the Downgrading of Stalin. Psychological Reports. September, 1956.

Richter, Maurice N. The Conceptual Mechanism of Stereotyping. American Sociological Review. October, 1956.

Runkel, Philip J. Cognitive Similarity in Facilitating Communication. Sociometry. September, 1956.

Secord, Paul F., and William Bevan. A Cross-Cultural Comparison of Impressions of Physiognomy and Personality in Faces. Journal of Social Psychology. May, 1956.

Group Behavior, General

Aggar, Robert E. Power Attributions in the Local Community. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Bates, Frederick L. Position, Role and Status: A Reformulation of Concepts. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Berkowitz, Leonard. Social Desirability and Frequency of Influence Attempts as Factors in Leadership Choice. Journal of Personality. June, 1956.

Borgatta, Edgar F., and Robert F. Bales. Sociometric Status Patterns and Characteristics of Interaction. Journal of Social Psychology. May, 1956.

Cartwright, Rosalind D., Julius Seeman, and Donald L. Grummon. Patterns of Interpersonal Relations. Sociometry. September, 1956.

Davis, James. Status Symbols and the Measurement of Status Perception. Sociometry. September, 1956.

Dittes, James J., and Harold H. Kelley. Effects of Different Conditions of Acceptance Upon Conformity to Group Norms. Journal of Abnormal & Social Psychology. July, 1956.

Fanelli, A. Alexander. A Typology of Community Leadership. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Fanelli, A. Alexander. Extensiveness of Communication Contacts and Perceptions of the Community. American Sociological Review. August, 1956.

Harsanyi, John C. Approaches to the Bargaining Problem Before and After the Theory of Games. Econometrica. April, 1956.

Hemphill, John K. and others. The Relation Between Possession of Task-Relevant Information and Attempts to Lead. Psychological Monographs. 1956, #414.

Lenski, Gerhard E. Social Participation and Status Crystallization. American Sociological Review. August, 1956.

Luce, R. Duncan, and Ernest W. Adams. The Determination of Subjective Characteristic Functions in Games with Misconceived Payoff Functions. Econometrica. April, 1956.

Mishler, Elliot G. and Asher Tropp. Status and Interaction in a Psychiatric Hospital. Human Relations. May, 1956.

Schelling, T. C. An Essay on Bargaining. American Economic Review. June, 1956.

Shuval, Judith T. Patterns of Inter-Group Tension and Affinity. International Social Science Bulletin. 1956, #1.

Sussman, Marvin B. "The Calorie Collectors": A Study of Spontaneous Group Formation. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Organization Behavior

Bell, Wendell, and Maryanne T. Force. Social Structure and Participation in Different Types of Formal Associations. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Bennis, Warren G. Values and Organization in a University Social Research Group. American Sociological Review. October, 1956.

Berkowitz, Leonard. Group Norms Among Bomber Crews. Sociometry. September, 1956.

Chandler, Alfred D., Jr. Management Decentralization: An Historical Analysis. Business History Review. June, 1956.

Chapin, F. Stuart, and John E. Tsouderos. The Formalization Process in Voluntary Associations. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Demerath, Nicholas J., and John W. Thibaut. Small Groups and Administrative Organizations. Administrative Science Quarterly. September, 1956.

Litchfield, Edward H. Notes on a General Theory of Administration. Administrative Science Quarterly. June, 1956.

Lystad, Mary H., and Robert C. Stone. Bureaucratic Mass Media. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Mack, John A. The Glacier Metal Experiments. The Political Quarterly. July-September, 1956.

Parsons, Talcott. Sociological Approach to the Theory of Organizations. Administrative Science Quarterly. June and September, 1956.

Richardson, Stephen A. Organizational Contrasts on British and American Ships. Administrative Science Quarterly. September, 1956.

Suojanen, Waino W. Substantive Decentralization in the Large Corporation. Advanced Management. September, 1956.

Urwick, Lyndall F. The Manager's Span of Control. Harvard Business Review. May-June, 1956.

Voting Behavior

Buchanan, William. An Inquiry Into Purposive Voting. Journal of Politics. May, 1956.

Ogburn, William F., and Charles M. Grigg. Factors Related to the Virginia Vote on Segregation. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Pennock, J. Roland. Party and Constituency in Postwar Agricultural Price-Support Legislation. Journal of Politics. May, 1956.

Pool, Ithiel de Sola (ed.). Studies in Political Communication. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1956 (whole number).

Rokkan, S. Party Preferences and Opinion

Patterns in Western Europe. International Social Science Bulletin. 1955, #4.

Culture and Institutions

Eisenstadt, S. N. Patterns of Leadership and Social Homogeneity in Israel. International Social Science Bulletin. 1956, #1.

Harbison, Frederick. Entrepreneurial Organization as a Factor in Economic Development. Quarterly Journal of Economics. August, 1956.

Hobhouse, L. T. The Simplest Peoples: Part II—Peace and Order Among the Simplest Peoples. British Journal of Sociology. June, 1956.

Johnson, D. Gale. Observations on the Economy of the USSR. Journal of Political Economy. June, 1956.

Martin, Walter T. The Structuring of Social Relationships Engendered by Suburban Residence. American Sociological Review. August, 1956.

Morris, Richard T. National Status and Attitudes of Foreign Students. Journal of Social Issues. 1956, #1.

"Occupational Choice: A Conceptual Framework." Industrial & Labor Relations Review. July, 1956.

Philblad, C. T., and C. L. Gregory. The Role of Test Intelligence and Occupational Background as Factors in Occupational Choice. Sociometry. September, 1956.

Svalastoga, K., E. Høgh, M. Pedersen, and E. Schild. Differential Class Behavior in Denmark. American Sociological Review. August, 1956.

Warren, Roland L. Toward a Typology of Extra-Community Controls Limiting Local Community Autonomy. Social Forces. May, 1956.

Williams, Robin M., Jr., Burton R. Fisher, and Irving L. Janis. Educational Desegregation as a Context for Basic Social Science Research. American Sociological Review. October, 1956.

Willis, Richard H. Political and Child-Rearing Attitudes in Sweden. Journal of Abnormal & Social Psychology. July, 1956.

Youmans, E. Grant. Occupational Expectations of Twelfth Grade Michigan Boys. Journal of Experimental Education. June, 1956.

Value Theory and Social Policy

Dobzhansky, Theodosius, and Gordon Allen. Does Natural Selection Continue to Operate in Modern Mankind? American Anthropologist. August, 1956.

Fisher, Franklin M. Income Distribution, Value Judgments, and Welfare. Quarterly Journal of Economics. August, 1956.

MacDougall, G. D. A. Does Productivity Rise Faster in the United States? Review of Economics and Statistics. May, 1956.

Nourse, Edwin G. Defining Our Employment Goal Under the 1946 Act. Review of Economics and Statistics. May, 1956.

Schultz, Theodore W. Reflections on Agricultural Production, Output, and Supply. Journal of Farm Economics. August, 1956.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

ABRAHAM, HENRY J. Government as Entrepreneur and Social Servant. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. 62. $1.00.

BERKOVITS, ELIEZER. Judaism: Fossil or Ferment? New York: Philosophical Library. 1956. Pp. xii, 176. $4.50.

BRILL, JOHN. The Chance Character of Human Existence. New York: Philosophical Library. 1956. Pp. 150. $3.75.

BRUNER, JEROME S.; GOODNOW, JACQUELINE J.; AND AUSTIN, GEORGE A. A Study of Thinking: An Analysis of Strategies in the Utilization of Information for Thinking and Problem Solving. New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc.; London: Chapman & Hall, Ltd. 1956. Pp. x, 330. $5.50.

DUNLAP, A. M. Behind the Bamboo Curtain:

The Experience of an American Doctor in China. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. 208. $3.75.

EISENSTADT, A. S. Charles McLean Andrews: A Study in American Historical Writing. New York: Columbia University Press. 1956. Pp. xx, 273. $5.00.

FRANKLIN, JOHN HOPE. The Militant South, 1800-1861. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. xi, 315. $5.00.

FRASER, PETER. The Intelligence of the Secretaries of State: Their Monopoly of Licensed News, 1660-1688. New York: Cambridge University Press. 1956. Pp. xi, 177. $3.75.

GREEN, GILBERT. The Enemy Forgotten. New York: International Publishers. 1956. Pp. 318. $3.50.

HANKIN, FRANCIS. Making Democracy Work.

- Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1956. Pp. 74. $1.00.
- HARRIS, MARVIN. Town and Country in Brazil. New York: Columbia University Press. 1956. Pp. x, 302. $4.50.
- HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM. The Philosophy of History. Introduction by C. J. Friedrich. New York: Dover Publication, Inc., 1956. Pp. xvi, 457. $1.75.
- HODGSON, SISTER M. MICHAEL CATHERINE, O.P. Caleb Cushing: Attorney General of the United States, 1853-1857. Washington, D. C.: The Catholic University of America Press. Pp. vii, 247. $2.75.
- HUEBNER, THEODORE AND VOSS, CARL HERMANN. This is Israel. Palestine: Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow. New York: Philosophical Library. 1956. Pp. x, 166. $3.75.
- KENTUCKY LEGISLATIVE RESEARCH COMMISSION. The Legislative Process in Kentucky. Frankfort, Kentucky: Legislative Research Commission. 1955. Pp. 244.
- LAUGHARNE, GRACE. Canada Looks Ahead. London and New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1956. Pp. ix, 158. $2.25.
- LESLIE, R. F. Polish Politics and the Revolution of November 1830. London: The Athlone Press; New York: John De Graff, Inc. 1956. Pp. xii, 307. $7.50.
- LI, DUN J. British Malaya: An Economic Analysis. New York: The American Press. 1955. Pp. 121. $3.00.
- O'NEIL, JOHN TETTEMER. Policy Formation in Railroad Finance: Refinancing the Burlington, 1936-1946. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. xii, 234. $4.50.
- RAEFF, MARC. Siberia and the Reform of 1822. Seattle: University of Washington Press. 1956. Pp. xvii, 210. $3.50.
- REOCK, ERNEST C., JR. AND FRIEDELBAUM, STANLEY H. Congressional Districting in New Jersey. New Brunswick, N. J.: Bureau of Government Research, Rutgers University. 1956. Pp. vii, 42, A-32, B-33, C-31, D-5. $2.00.
- ROGERS, WILLIAM C. Community Education in World Affairs. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1956. Pp. vi, 86. $1.25.
- ROTHER, BERTHA M. (ED.) Daniel Webster Reader. New York: Oceana Publications. 1956. Pp. 255. $1.00.
- SALOUTOS, THEODORE. They Remember America: The Story of the Repatriated Greek-Americans. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1956. Pp. 153. $3.50.
- SETH, RONALD. The Undaunted: The Story of Resistance in Western Europe. New York: Philosophical Library. 1956. Pp. 327. $6.00.
- SINCLAIR, KEITH. Imperial Federation: A Study of New Zealand Policy and Opinion, 1880-1914. Commonwealth Papers, No. II. New York: John De Graff, Inc. 1956. Pp. 51. $1.00.
- TAYLOR, GEORGE ROGERS AND NEU, IRENE D. The American Railroad Network, 1861-1890. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1956. Pp. viii, 113. $3.75.
- TOKAIEV, G. A. Soviet Imperialism. New York: Philosophical Library, Inc. 1956. Pp. 73. $2.75.
- YESSELSON, ABRAHAM. United States-Persian Diplomatic Relations, 1883-1921. New Brunswick, N. J.: Rutgers University Press. 1956. Pp. ix, 252. $5.00.

NEWS AND NOTES

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

INFORMATION ON THE 1957 PROGRAM

The Program Committee for the 1957 Annual Meeting met at the Association's National Office in Washington on October 26th and chose as a general theme: "The Shifting Balance of Political Power: National and International Problems." Any member of the Association desiring to participate in the program either by giving a paper or as a listed discussant is cordially invited to communicate with the Committee member in charge of panels in his area of interest. Committee members and their sections are:

Austin Ranney, University of Illinois—Chairman.

Joseph LaPalombara, Michigan State University—Comparative Government.

Roland Young, Northwestern University—National Government.

Robert J. Harris, Vanderbilt University—Constitutional Law.

Warren E. Miller, University of Michigan—Political Behavior.

Kenneth W. Thompson, The Rockefeller Foundation—International Law and Relations.

Herbert Kaufman, Yale University—State and Local Government (address: 155 E. Mosholu Parkway North, New York 67, N. Y.).

Samuel Eldersveld, University of Michigan—Political Parties.

Norman Wengert, University of Maryland—Public Administration.

Herbert Deane, Columbia University—Political Theory.

Fifty-second Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association: Minutes of the Council Meeting

The Council of The American Political Science Association met at 9:30 A.M., September 5, 1956 at the Hotel Statler, Washington, D. C., with President Harold D. Lasswell in the chair. The following officers and members of the Council were present: Gabriel A. Almond, Stephen K. Bailey, James M. Burns, Gwendolen M. Carter, Weldon Cooper, Paul T. David, Samuel J. Eldersveld, Wilson Gaddis, Claude E. Hawley, Norman L. Hill, Thomas P. Jenkin, Max M. Kampelman, Evron M. Kirkpatrick, Earl Latham, Harold D. Lasswell, Avery Leiserson, Leslie M. Lipson, Harvey C. Mansfield, Louise Overacker, Norman Palmer, Emmette S. Redford, Charles B. Robson, E. E. Schattschneider.

Also present at the Council Meeting were the new nominees for the Council, for Vice President, and President Elect, as well as the following past Presidents of the Association: Francis Coker, Pendleton Herring, Arthur W. Macmahon, and Quincy Wright.

The Chairman of the Program Committee, Earl Latham, reported for the Committee. He called particular attention to two innovations in the work of the Committee: (1) the Committee held a meeting in Washington, D. C. in October 1955 and (2) the program was organized around a central theme, namely: commemoration of the Woodrow Wilson Centennial. He recommended that the practice of holding a meeting of the Committee be continued and strongly urged that the next year's Committee explore the possibility of a central theme for the 1957 program. The Council accepted the report and unanimously adopted a resolution commending and thanking the Program Committee for its excellent work on the 1956 program.

The Managing Editor of THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, Harvey C. Mansfield, read his report, copies of which were distributed to members of the Council. Mr. Mansfield, in his report as Managing Editor, expressed appreciation to his predecessor, Hugh Elsbree, for seeing the publication of the Review through the June issue and to Emmette Redford for carrying on the Book Review section through that issue. Mr. Mansfield summarized Review problems as follows: (1) the quarterly can operate on substantially its present financing only by a large measure of decentralization of responsibilities and cooperation of individuals and institutions; (2) the volume of manuscripts is so heavy that it poses many editorial problems, principally those of determining the most promising of the borderline possibilities, soliciting some manuscripts, and calling on many colleagues to help out as readers. He closed his report by moving that the following persons be appointed to the Board of Editors for the coming year: Wallace S. Sayre and Samuel H. Beer, Associate Editors, and Hugh Elsbree, Edgar S. Furniss, Jr., Alexander Heard, Victor L. Jones, and Leo Strauss. Miss Carter seconded the motion and the report was approved unanimously.

The Chairman of the Nominating Committee, Benjamin E. Lippincott, read his report, copies of which were distributed to members of the Council. He emphasized the following points: (1) that essentially the same procedures were followed as in the past, including invitations to individual members of the Association, Regional and District Associations' past Presidents, and Departments of Political Science to suggest names; (2) that the criteria used, particularly with respect to the President and the Vice Presidents, were scholarship and contributions to the Association's work; and also, with regard to the Council, geographical spread, fields of specialization and attention to the smaller colleges; (3) that for the third consecutive year an organized campaign for a particular nominee for President Elect was conducted; despite the appearance of this form of "pressure" the Committee gave full consideration to this nominee's qualifications, noting that, while there is no constitutional objection to such a campaign, the Committee felt that spontaneous suggestions were more impressive than organized ones; (4) that the Committee had proved to its own satisfaction that a meeting of the Committee prior to balloting was most beneficial, since it brought about a greater pooling of knowledge than could be accomplished by correspondence, avoided "mathematical accident," facilitated balance in distribution of offices according to geography and fields, and saved time; (5) that a mail ballot was considered but was not recommended, for several reasons, including the criteria mentioned in (2) above, and the desirability of charging one group with the responsibility of studying and locating especially well qualified candidates suggested by the membership; (6) that present procedures be improved by giving more prominence in the Review to the Nominating Committee's request for suggestions from individual members and departments; furnishing the Chairman of the Committee with a list of departmental chairmen (in order to suggest to them personally that their departments submit nominations collectively, or as individuals); maintaining in the national office and supplying to the incoming chairman each year a list of Association offices held by members during the past 25 years, and maintaining an alphabetical appendix at the end of each Directory of all past officers, including their offices and dates of incumbency.

Mr. Lippincott reported that the Committee had unanimously agreed on the following nominees as officers of the Association for 1956-57: President Elect: V. O. Key (Harvard University); Vice Presidents: Carl Brent Swisher (The Johns Hopkins University), Wilfred Binkley (Ohio Northern University), Albert Lepawsky (University of California, Berkeley); Secretary: Gladys Kammerer (University of Kentucky); Treasurer: Max M. Kampelman (Washington, D. C.); Council: William T. R. Fox (Columbia University), Ruth Weintraub (Hunter College), John D. Lewis (Oberlin College), Thomas Eliot (Washington University, St. Louis), Alexander Heard (University of North Carolina), York Willbern (University of Alabama), Allan Saunders (University of Hawaii), Christian Larsen (Sacramento State College). Mr. Almond moved and Mr. Hawley seconded acceptance of the report. The motion was carried unanimously.

Treasurer Max M. Kampelman summarized briefly the information contained in the auditor's report, copies of which were distributed to members of the Council. Mr. Kampelman noted particularly that expenses were over $3,000 less than the 1956 budget adopted at the Boulder Annual Meeting in 1955 and income was over $4,500 more than the amount provided for in that budget. The result of operations in 1955-56, therefore, is that a budgeted deficit of more than $4,000 was turned into a surplus of $3,635.37. The Treasurer also called attention to the auditor's report of recent defalcations by the bookkeeper of the the Association, which will be recovered from the bonding company. The Executive Director explained the conditions of the loss and its discovery in detail and asked for the advice of the Council on future action. Following the discussion, Mr. Bailey moved that the Council express their confidence in the Executive Director and authorize him to proceed to protect the Association's interests humanely. Miss Carter seconded the motion and it was approved unanimously.

The Executive Director reviewed the work of the National Office during the year 1955-56. He reported that the membership was now over 6,000, explained the present status of the program of Awards to Journalists in the 12 midwestern states for excellent reporting of state and local public affairs, discussed the relationships of the Association with the Foundations, reviewed the work of various committees, explained the operation of the Personnel Placement Service and reported on proposed revisions of procedures, and reviewed the Congressional Fellowship program. He then called attention to the Minutes of Executive Committee meetings held during the year, copies of which had been distributed to the Council, and reviewed briefly the major items contained therein. After brief discussion of some items of the report, Mr. Almond moved and Mr. Hawley seconded a motion to accept the report. The Council approved unanimously.

President Lasswell reported the recommendation of the Executive Committee that Mr. Gabriel Almond be elected as a representative of the Association on the Board of Directors of the Social Science Research Council. On a motion of Mr. Redford, seconded by Mr. Robson, the recommendation was unanimously approved by the Council.

The Executive Director reported discussion with Banta Publishing Company about the continued storage of back issues of the REVIEW. After discussion, on motion by Mr. Leiserson, seconded by Mr. Almond, the Executive Director was instructed by unanimous vote to ask Banta to continue their present policy of storing back issues; any new policy on this matter is to be cleared with the Executive Committee.

The Executive Director outlined the proposal for publication of a Wilson memorial volume based on the papers delivered at the Annual Meeting. On motion of Mr. Almond, seconded by Mr. Lipson, the Council approved the proposal in principle, with Mr.

Latham as editor. The Executive Committee was authorized to make the final determination on the basis of a plan to be presented to it after further exploration by Mr. Latham and the Executive Director.

Mr. Lasswell reviewed discussions with the Governmental Affairs Institute during the year concerning its relations with the APSA. The minutes of the Executive Committee report fully on these discussions and their results. A committee of the Association composed of Messrs. Latham, Kirkpatrick and Lasswell, and a committee of GAI composed of Messrs. Litchfield, Gulick and Pollock, had agreed that the best solution of the relationship between the two organizations would be (1) to establish formally that they are separate, independent organizations and that neither has any dependence on or control over the other; and (2) to enter into a formal contract governing the use of the Political Science Building. Both points were approved by the Executive Committee. Copies of the exchange of letters between Messrs. Litchfield and Lasswell relating to point (1) and of the contract relating to the building were included in materials furnished to the Council. After reviewing the minutes, examining the letters and contract, and having a brief discussion, Mr. Leiserson moved and Mr. Cooper seconded acceptance of the Lasswell report and the recommendations of the Executive Committee. The motion was approved unanimously.

Mr. Lasswell reported that the Executive Committee during the year had discussed an overall program for the Association and called on the Executive Director to outline briefly the highlights of the draft of this program statement that had been supplied to the Council. Mr. Kirkpatrick reviewed the program statement which attempts to set up categories that will include the various activities of the Association. These categories are: Basic Professional and Liberal Education, Continuing Professional Education, Basic Civic Education, Continuing Civic Education, Consultation, Publications, Informed Civic Judgment and Effective Civic Action. He then discussed the various ongoing and proposed programs that fit into these categories: the Self Survey, Congressional Fellowship Program, Awards to Journalists, Facilitation of Exchange Professorships, Continuing Conferences, Regional Seminars, and Monograph Series.

After brief discussion, it was moved by Mr. Burns and seconded by Mr. Almond that the Council accept the report and authorize further exploration of the proposed projects by the Executive Director and Executive Committee. The motion carried unanimously.

The Executive Director outlined a project proposed by Mr. Pollock, President of the International Political Science Association, to request funds from a foundation to support the travel of representatives from various social science fields to the meetings of their respective International Associations. Mr. Kirkpatrick reported on conversations with the other social science organizations—all of which had approved the submission of a joint proposal by The American Political Science Association. Mr. Palmer moved and Miss Carter seconded acceptance of the report and authorization for the Executive Director to proceed in cooperation with Mr. Pollock to submit a proposal for foundation support. The motion was approved unanimously.

Mr. David presented the following two resolutions for consideration by the Council:

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON PRINTING THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE NATIONAL PARTY CONVENTIONS

Whereas, the printing of the proceedings of the national party conventions has been greatly delayed in recent years, the proceedings of the Republican National Convention of 1952 not having appeared until the following year, and those of the Democratic National Convention not having appeared until 1954, and

Whereas, the proceedings have been distributed in limited editions only, in part because of Hatch Act difficulties, real or alleged; have often gone out of print while still in demand; and have frequently been difficult to obtain through any orderly procedure, and

Whereas, the verbatim record of the debates and votes of the national party conventions constitutes documentary material that is greatly needed for voting analysis, research, and reference purposes by the members of The American Political Science Association and by other students of politics and political parties,

BE IT RESOLVED, that the National Committees of the Democratic and Republican Parties are hereby urged and requested to publish the proceedings of the national party conventions of 1956 with all possible speed, and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that the appropriate Congressional authorities are urged and requested to reprint the 1956 proceedings of the two national party conventions as a public document for general distribution as soon as possible.

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE NEED FOR IMPROVED FACILITIES FOR RESEARCH AT THE NATIONAL PARTY CONVENTIONS

Whereas, with the growing size and increasing congestion of the national party conventions, the opportunities for observation and research by professional political scientists and historians have become more and more unsatisfactory, with many difficulties in securing access even to those parts of the proceedings that are supposed to take place in public,

BE IT RESOLVED, that the Democratic and Republican Parties be urged and requested, when making arrangements for future national party conventions, to make an appropriate allocation of the available facilities for observing and reporting on the conventions, to be assigned to such professional political scientists and historians as may wish to come to the conventions for purposes of scholarly research, leading to book and other publication under responsible academic and professional auspices.

On motion by Mr. Eldersveld and second by Miss Carter the resolutions were unanimously approved and Mr. David was requested to prepare final drafts for submission to the Business Meeting.

The Executive Director raised the question of publishing a new Directory. After some discussion indicating general approval of publication of a new Directory of 1958, Mr. Bailey moved and Miss Carter seconded a resolution that the Executive Director prepare a financial report on the 1953 Directory, explore the costs of printing a new Directory, and submit this information to the Executive Committee for final decision.

Mr. Lasswell called on Mr. Palmer to summarize the memorandum he had prepared and distributed to Council members relating to the responsibilities of the Council and its participation in governing the Association. Mr. Palmer briefly outlined his views that the Council should play a larger and more important role in the Association. The Executive Director supported Mr. Palmer's views and expressed his desire to take whatever action he can to achieve this end. Mr. Lasswell and Mr. Schattschneider expressed accord. There was general discussion by the Council and a number of constructive suggestions for keeping the Council better informed, for utilizing the Council more effectively, and for improving Council meetings. At the end of the discussion, on motion of Mr. Burns and second by Miss Overacker, the Council unanimously approved a vote of confidence in and appreciation of the Executive Director for his handling of Association affairs and, at the same time, expressed the view that every effort should be made to improve the flow of information to the Council and to make effective use of its advice and guidance.

Mr. Lasswell raised the question of location of the 1958 meeting. After general discussion, Mr. Bailey moved and Mr. Almond seconded a motion to have the 1958 meeting in the Midwest and to leave the decision as to the specificity to the Executive Committee. The motion was unanimously approved.

Mr. Lasswell called on the Executive Director to review the budget proposal for 1956-57, copies of which had been distributed to the Council. Mr. Kirkpatrick reviewed the financial situation briefly and explained the 1956-57 proposals. Mr. Bailey moved and Mr. Hawley seconded acceptance of the proposed 1956-57 budget with the understanding that shifts can be made in items by the Executive Director with the approval of the Executive Committee. The Council approved unanimously.

Mr. Bailey moved and Mr. Hawley seconded a unanimous vote of thanks to the Stern Family Fund for its generous support of the Association and the Congressional Fellowship program in 1955-56.

Mr. Almond moved and Mr. Burns seconded a vote of thanks to Father James B. Horgan of Georgetown University, Chairman, and the members of the Local Arrangements Committee for their fine work in arranging the 1956 Annual Meeting.

Mr. Lasswell adjourned the meeting at 6:15 P.M.

Minutes of the Annual Business Meeting

The Annual Business Meeting of The American Political Science Association was held at 4:30 P.M., Friday, September 7, 1956 in the Presidential Ballroom of the Hotel Statler, Washington, D. C. The meeting was called to order by President Harold D. Lasswell, who made a brief report on the activities of the Association during the preceding year.

Mr. Mansfield, Secretary of the Association, summarized the decisions taken by the Council at its meeting of September 5, 1956 and read the two resolutions the Council had authorized Mr. David to prepare (for the texts, see the Council Minutes). The report of the Secretary and the two resolutions, were approved unanimously.

Mr. Latham, Chairman of the Program Committee for the 1956 Annual Meeting, reported on the activities of the Committee. The two most important innovations in the work in 1956 were (1) the meeting of the Program Committee and (2) building the program around a central theme. He recommended that both be continued next year. At the conclusion of the report, a resolution thanking the Program Committee for its excellent work was adopted unanimously.

Mr. Kampelman, Treasurer, presented the financial report for the fiscal year ending July 31, 1956. Mr. Kampelman noted particularly that the Association had completed the fiscal year with income exceeding expenditures and that the auditor's report showed the financial affairs of the Association to be in sound condition. The Business Meeting voted unanimous approval of the Treasurer's report.

Mr. Lippincott, Chairman of the Nominating Committee, gave a brief report on the work of the Committee. He then presented the Committee's unanimous nominations for the offices of the Association for 1956-57, as previously reported to the Council (for the names, see the Council Minutes). The Business Meeting voted unanimous approval of the Committee's slate.

The President asked the new President Elect, Mr. Key, to come to the platform, and then turned the gavel over to the incoming President, Mr. Schattschneider.

President Schattschneider adjourned the Business Meeting at 5:45 P.M.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

Regional and Topical

The annual meeting of the Iowa Conference of Political Scientists was held on the campus of Grinnell College on April 28, 1956. The speaker for the morning session was President

Charles J. Turek of Macalester College who spoke on the "Aims and Achievements of UNESCO." The speaker at the noon luncheon was Clark M. Eichelberger, executive director of the American Association for the United Nations, who spoke on the subject of "Great Issues Facing the United Nations." The afternoon session heard state senators William C. Molison of Grinnell and George E. O'Malley of Des Moines speak on the "Issues Before the Iowa 57th General Assembly." Kirk Porter of the State University of Iowa was elected president. George B. Telford of Drake University was reelected secretary.

The 14th Annual Institute on World Affairs was held at San Diego State College, August 6-24, under the direction of professors Minos D. Generales and Ned V. Joy. The theme was "20th Century Realities in International Relations—New Dimensions in the Quest for Peace."

Among the speakers who appeared were: Currin Vance Shields, professor of political science, University of California at Los Angeles; James Avery Joyce, British author, barrister, economist, and educator; C. Easton Rothwell, director, The Hoover Library on War, Revolution and Peace; Kenneth T. Young, director, Office of Southeast Asian Affairs, United States Department of State; Benton W. Decker, R. Adm., Ret., U.S.N.; Albert Hutler, executive director, United Jewish Fund of San Diego; Robert Neumann, professor of political science, University of California at Los Angeles; Richard Richards, Democratic candidate for United States senator from California; L. Vincent Padgett, assistant professor of political science, San Diego State College; and diplomatic representatives from Iran, Indonesia, Belgium, Iraq, Israel, Greece, Turkey, Great Britain, France, Japan, Germany and India.

The 23rd Congress of the International Federation for Housing and Town Planning, held in Vienna, July 22 to 28, drew more than 900 registered participants from 36 countries. The theme of the Congress was "The City and its Surroundings."

Exhibits based on the Congress' theme were shown by 21 countries. The Puerto Rican Planning Board and Massachusetts Institute of Technology represented the U.S.

The International Challenge Cup for films, offered by the City of Vienna, was won by "It Can Be Done," prepared by the University of Pennsylvania for the International Cooperation Administration.

It was voted to hold the 25th Congress in Puerto Rico in 1960, on invitation of Rafael Pico, Secretary of the Treasury of the Commonwealth. This will be the first Congress in the western hemisphere since 1938. The 24th

Congress will be in Liège, Belgium, in 1958; the theme being "Regional Man."

Erik Rolfsen, town planner of Oslo, was re-elected president. Dennis O'Harrow of the American Society of Planning Officials was re-elected to the executive committee; Candido Oliveras, chairman of the Puerto Rico Planning Board, was elected to succeed Rafael Pico.

Pi Sigma Alpha, national political science honor society (81 chapters), held its biennial convention in Washington on September 6. Officers elected are: Franklin L. Burdette, University of Maryland, president; Cullen B. Gosnell, Emory University, vice president; and Don L. Bowen, American Society for Public Administration, secretary-treasurer. Members of the executive committee elected are: Mona Fletcher, Kent State University; Charles W. Shull, Wayne University and Rita W. Nealon, New York University. The Annual Essay Contest prize of $100 was awarded to Gertrud H. Bauer of American University.

The District of Columbia Political Science Association (DCPSA) held its fifth meeting of the current year in the Hall of Government, George Washington University, October 8, 1956. "The Place of Polls and Election Forecasts in Political Campaigns" was the topic; the panel consisted of Stuart A. Rice, Economic Consultant; Floyd E. McCaffree, Director of Research, Republican National Committee; John Sharon, Assistant to Gov. Stevenson; Louis H. Bean, author of How to Predict Elections.

The Woodrow Wilson Department of Foreign Affairs at the University of Virginia held a conference on "The Principle of Self-determination in the Modern World" as part of the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Celebration on November 29 and 30, 1956. Scheduled speakers included Philip Jessup and Vernon McKay.

The Graduate School of Boston University has begun a new program of graduate study and research on the metropolitan community.

The department of political science at the University of California, Berkeley, has established an undergraduate honors program designed to provide for superior students some of the advantages of the small liberal arts colleges without sacrificing the special resources of the university. The first group of honors students is under the direction of Victor Jones and G. Leslie McConnell.

A School of International Studies has been started in New Delhi, affiliated with the University of Delhi. It will prepare students for the Ph.D. degree either of the Delhi University or of any other university in the world.

The School specializes in the following areas:

- (a) East Asian History and Institutions (covering China, Japan and Korea).
- (b) Southeast Asian History and Institutions (covering countries from Burma to Philippines).
- (c) South Asia (India, Pakistan, Nepal and Ceylon).
- (d) West Asian History and Institutions (Afghanistan to Israel as well as Arab-Africa).
- (e) American History and Institutions.
- (f) International Economics.

Fuller information may be obtained from Dr. A. Appadorai, Director, I.S.I.S., Sapru House, Barakhamba Road, New Delhi.

A new periodical, the Free World Review, P.O. Box 1254, New York 8, New York, has recently published its first issue. According to the editors, Stephen Sisu and Z. Michael Szaz, its aim is "to contribute to the understanding of the complex issues of international politics by emphasizing the need for unity among free nations, and the need for the preservation of Christian and humanist traditions against the challenge of Communist totalitarianism."

The Field Politics Center at Goucher College, aided by a grant from the Maurice and Laura Falk Foundation, is expanding its research function into the peripheral areas of campaign politics, examining the use and effect of campaign gadgetry, songs, and slogans in 19th and 20th century America.

Funds have been made available to facilitate the travel of American specialists in the Soviet and East Central European fields to the area of their professional interest. Limited travel grants will be made for the purpose of strengthening the core of fully-trained, linguistically competent Soviet and East Central European specialists now teaching in universities and colleges throughout the United States and Canada. Scholars interested in traveling to the area of their specialization should apply as soon as possible to Professor William B. Edgerton, chairman of the Inter-University Committee on Travel Grants, 429 West 117th Street, New York 27, New York.

The Ford Foundation has made a five year grant of $975,000 to the Citizenship Clearing House, affiliated with the Law Center of New York University, to support a program of encouraging active participation by college men and women in the party of their choice. The bulk of the grant will be expended through the 24 state and regional affiliates located at leading colleges and universities throughout the country. George H. Williams of the law faculty of New York University is director of the Clearing House. Rhoten A. Smith of the University of Kansas served as associate director during 1955-1956, and Professor Ivan Hinderaker of the University of California at Los Angeles will serve as associate director during 1956-1957.

The Soviet Bloc Foreign Economic Relations Project has recently been established in the Woodrow Wilson Department of Foreign Affairs of the University of Virginia. Robert Loring Allen, associate professor in economics, will direct the project. Foreign economic policies and activities of Soviet Bloc countries will be subjected to scrutiny; Soviet aid programs in underdeveloped countries, Burmese-Soviet barter agreements, Iceland's trade agreements with the Soviet Union and other Bloc countries, and other such widely varied activities are to be investigated. A grant from the Dearborn Foundation of Chicago has made this project possible. It will be administered by S. Walter Washington, lecturer in the foreign affairs department of the university.

At its last annual meeting, the Midwest Conference of Political Scientists voted to publish a quarterly review of political science. Final plans were made by the executive council of the conference at its meeting in Washington in early September. The publication will be known as the Midwest Journal of Political Science. It will be a quarterly, with the first issue appearing May 1, 1957. The editor will be David Fellman, University of Wisconsin; the managing editor, in charge of business affairs, will be Charles W. Shull, Wayne State University; C. Herman Pritchett, University of Chicago, will serve as book review editor. The following will serve on the editorial board: Samuel J. Eldersveld, University of Michigan; Louis C. Kesselman, University of Louisville; Glendon A. Schubert, Michigan State University; Mulford Q. Sibley, University of Minnesota; Edward H. Buehrig, University of Indiana. The Journal will be published by the Wayne State University Press, Detroit. All business inquiries should be addressed to Professor Shull of Wayne State University. The Journal will be a general political science review, open to all areas of the discipline and to all members of the profession. Manuscripts should be sent to Professor Fellman at 203 South Hall, University of Wisconsin, Madison 6, Wisconsin.

Chadwick F. Alger, now a Proctor fellow at Princeton University, will join the staff of the Swarthmore College political science department as instructor in political science for the second semester of the current year.

John A. Armstrong, Jr., assistant professor, University of Wisconsin, spent the latter part of the summer in the Soviet Union under an award from the Inter-University Committee on Travel Grants. During the second semester of 1956-1957, he will act as visiting assistant professor in the Russian Institute at Columbia University.

Erwin W. Bard, while on sabbatical leave as professor of political science at Brooklyn College, is visiting lecturer at the College of Europe at Bruges. He attended the International Congress of Administrative Sciences in Madrid in September.

Paul C. Bartholomew, professor of political science at the University of Notre Dame, has returned to the campus after serving as a consultant for the Navy Department in Washington during the past summer.

Burton Brazil, assistant professor of political science at San Jose State College, led the ticket for City Council at a recent election at which the City of Saratoga was incorporated.

James Robert Brown, visiting lecturer at Wesleyan University, has accepted an appointment as associate professor at St. Joseph's College, Hartford, for the coming year.

John Cotton Brown, assistant professor of political science and public administration at Cornell College, Mount Vernon, Iowa, spent last summer in England where he was awarded grants by the British and his own college to participate in a seminar on problems of international organization at St. Anthony's College, Oxford.

Henry C. Bush, formerly of Hunter College, was visiting assistant professor at Wayne

State University during the summer of 1956. During the year 1956-57 he will direct a 12 month program of training in the field of local government administration, a program sponsored by the International Cooperation Administration for a group of government officials of the Republic of Indonesia, at Wayne State University.

E. Glenn Callen of Nebraska Wesleyan University has been selected as a member of the Charter Revision Commission of the city of Lincoln.

Earl C. Campbell of San Jose State College taught courses in public administration this summer at the University of Southern California Civic Center Division.

George Catlin, McGill University, has been elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature, London.

David T. Cattell, University of California (Los Angeles), spent the latter part of the summer in Moscow on an Inter-University Travel Grant. Professor Cattell returned to Los Angeles early in October.

Eugene P. Chase, professor of civil rights at Lafayette College, lectured on American institutions during the summer course in American and English studies in Nice, France, during July and August under the auspices of the University of Aix and the French Fulbright Commission.

Harwood L. Childs, Princeton University, is on leave for the academic year, 1956-57. During the second semester, he will serve as visiting lecturer at the University of Southern California on a lectureship sponsored by the John Randolph Haynes and Dora Haynes Foundation of Los Angeles.

Morris H. Cohen, associate professor of government, has returned to Clark University after a year abroad as Fulbright lecturer at the Municipal University of Amsterdam.

Francis W. Coker is teaching at Vanderbilt University during the winter term, 1957.

E. Lane Davis of the State University of Iowa has been granted a leave of absence for the academic year 1956-57. He has been appointed a Fellow at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences at Stanford, California.

Paul Dolan, chairman of the department of political science at the University of Delaware, is lecturing during the current academic year at the Hochschule fuer Sozialwissenschaften, Wilhelmshaven-Ruestersiel, Germany, under a Fulbright grant.

John T. Dorsey, Jr., Michigan State University, has returned from Saigon, Viet-Nam, where he was deputy advisor in charge of the Presidency Program of the MSU Technical Assistance Project. After serving as acting coordinator of the project in East Lansing during the summer, he has resumed teaching duties and is assistant coordinator of the project.

Alex N. Dragnich has returned to Vanderbilt University after a year's leave of absence on a Ford Faculty Fellowship, which he spent mostly at Harvard University. During the summer he took a six weeks' tour of the Soviet Union, coming back by way of West Germany and France.

Leon D. Epstein, of the University of Wisconsin, is to be on leave during the second semester 1956-57 in order to engage in research sponsored by the Social Science Research Council.

David G. Farrelly has returned from a year in Italy as a Fulbright Scholar to resume his duties at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Herman Finer has been appointed a director of the Chicago Regional Port Authority. The nomination was made by Mayor Richard Daley and endorsed by Governor Stratton.

G. James Fleming, associate professor of political science at Morgan State College, has been named by the mayor of Baltimore, Maryland, to the newly created Baltimore Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. This is the first FEPC-type public body below the Mason-Dixon line. Dr. Fleming was regional director of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice, for the states of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware during World War II.

William Fleming, associate professor of political science and chairman of the department of political science at Ripon College, Ripon, Wisconsin, spent the summer as visiting professor at Northwestern University.

Peter J. Fliess has returned to Louisiana

State University from his sabbatical leave at the University of Frankfurt, Germany.

Edgar S. Furniss, Princeton University, has been a visiting professor at Columbia University during the current winter session.

William Goodman is acting chairman of the department of political science at the University of Tennessee for the academic year of 1956-57, during the absence of Lee S. Greene who is on leave.

Albert Gorvine, on the staff of the University of Ankara, on leave from Brooklyn College, attended the International Congress of Administrative Sciences in Madrid in September.

H. Field Haviland, on leave from Haverford College during the present academic year, is serving as senior staff member in international studies at the Brookings Institution, Washington, D.C.

A. Miller Hillhouse, Cornell University, served as a special fiscal consultant to the Baltimore Urban Renewal Study Board in preparation for their report to the mayor, September, 1956, on the city's redevelopment problems.

Gilbert O. Hourtoile, of Lafayette College, served during the summer as consultant to the Commission on Government Security.

Philip E. Jacob returned to the University of Pennsylvania after a year's leave of absence during which he directed a study for the Edward W. Hazen Foundation on the results of general education in the social sciences.

Gayle K. Lawrence has returned to his teaching duties at Temple University after serving 18 months as director of personnel in the Office of Administration, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Leslie Lipson, professor of political science at the University of California, Berkeley, was visiting professor of government at the University of Hawaii's summer session, 1956.

Herbert McClosky, University of Minnesota, has returned to the university to resume his teaching and research duties, following a one-year fellowship at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Stanford, California.

James W. Morley has returned to the East

Asian Institute at Columbia University after a year's absence.

Frederick J. Osborn, British town planner who has been active in the garden city movement, was knighted this year, his name being included on the Queen's Birthday Honors List.

Norman D. Palmer, professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania, participated in the following conferences: The Joint Conference on Indo-American Relations, sponsored by the Indian Council of World Affairs (New Delhi) and the Council on Foreign Relations (New York), at Endicott House, Dedham, Mass., June 13-18, 1956. He also was a member of the seminar on "Leadership and Political Institutions in India" at the University of California (Berkeley), August 12-17, 1956, which was organized in conjunction with the Committee on South Asia of the Association of Asian Studies.

Paul A. Pfretzschner taught local government and administration in the summer session in the University of Buffalo.

James K. Pollock, Murfin professor of political science and chairman of the department of political science at the University of Michigan, has been awarded the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit by the government of the German Federal Republic. The presentation was made by President Theodore Heuss on August 31, 1956, and was in recognition of Professor Pollock's contributions to the strengthening of democratic institutions in Germany.

Benjamin Rivlin, now a Fulbright research fellow in North Africa, attended the International Congress of Administrative Sciences in Madrid in September.

Carl J. Schneider has resumed his teaching duties at the University of Nebraska, following a year spent in Germany as a Fulbright Research Fellow.

Jasper Shannon is serving as visiting professor of political science at the University of Nebraska during the 1956-57 academic year.

Dr. Kalman H. Silvert, associate professor in the department of political science at Tulane University continues on leave of absence with the American Universities Field Staff, and is presently in Chile.

H. Arthur Steiner has returned to the University of California (Los Angeles) after a six month tour of south and southeast Asia which was sponsored in part by the International Educational Exchange Program, Department of State.

James A. Storing returned to Colgate University in September after a year's leave spent in Germany, England and Norway with the Overseas Program of the University of Maryland.

Ronald M. Stout, Colgate University, has been granted a leave of absence for the current year to accept a position as director of the intern program, New York State Department of Civil Service.

Robert W. Tucker of Johns Hopkins University joined the political science department of Swarthmore College on a part-time basis for the current semester to teach the seminar in international politics, law and organization.

William Vatcher, Jr., San Jose State College, was nominated for Congress at the Democratic primary in June, and went on half-time status while conducting his campaign for the November election.

Eric Voegelin, Boyd professor of government at Louisiana State University, is on sabbatical leave for the first semester of the academic year 1956-57. He will give the Loeb Lectures at the University of Frankfurt on "The Law and the Prophets" in November-January.

John C. Wahlke will be on leave from Vanderbilt University during the winter and spring terms, 1957, for field work on the comparative state legislative project, financed by the Social Science Research Council.

George A. Warp has resumed his duties at the University of Minnesota after spending fourteen months as a member of the UN mission at the Brazilian School of Public Administration in Rio de Janeiro.

Belle Zeller, professor of political science at Brooklyn College, took part in the Conference on Legislative Services of the Council of State Governments in Seattle in August.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

David Apter has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Northwestern University.

Richard G. Art, study director for institutional research of the National Science Foundation, has been appointed assistant director of the Western Interstate Commission for Higher Education, established by an interstate compact of 11 western states and territories, with offices at the University of Colorado, Boulder.

Richard C. Bain has been promoted to research associate at the Brookings Institution.

Sidney Baldwin has been appointed assistant professor of public administration at the New York University Graduate School of Public Administration and Social Service. He will also serve as administrative assistant in the office of the dean.

William C. Benson, former chairman of the department of political science at St. Olaf College, retired from his teaching and administrative duties last spring.

Frederick T. Bent, formerly assistant professor of political science at Coe College, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, has been appointed assistant professor in the Institute of Local and State Government of the University of Pennsylvania.

During the past summer, Conrad L. Bergendoff, Jr., resigned from his position as assistant professor of political science at St. Olaf College to assume a position with UNICEF.

W. Richard Bigger, San Diego State College, has accepted an appointment as associate professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Leonard Binder, who received his Ph.D. from Harvard last June, has accepted an appointment as instructor at the University of California at Los Angeles.

Kenneth O. Bjork has been appointed chairman of the political science department at St. Olaf College.

Harold L. Blostein has become instructor in political science at Washburn University.

Virgil Blum, S. J., formerly of Creighton

University, was appointed associate professor of political science at Marquette University, effective September, 1956.

Frank R. Brandenburg, who served during the summer months as consultant to the president, Pennsalt International Corporation, has been appointed an assistant professor in political science, Michigan State University.

Erwin C. Buell has been added to the Baylor University department of political science as an assistant professor.

Franklin L. Burdette, who has been on leave of absence from the University of Maryland for two years to serve as head of the overseas book program and related cultural activities of the U.S. Information Agency, has returned to the University as professor of government and politics and has been appointed director of the Bureau of Governmental Research.

Warren M. Campbell has been named instructor in political science at Colgate University.

James C. Charlesworth has resigned as secretary of administration of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and has resumed his duties as professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania and as president of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. He will remain as executive director of the Pennsylvania Reorganization Commission.

Inis L. Claude, Jr., formerly of Harvard University, is now associate professor of political science and acting chairman of the department of political science at the University of Delaware.

Samuel DuBois Cook has resigned his position as associate professor of political science at Southern University to become chairman of the department of political science at Atlanta University.

Dean Cresap has been promoted to the rank of professor of political science at San Jose State College.

Claude B. Cross, visiting assistant professor of political science at the University of Idaho, resigned to accept a position with the U.S. Information Agency.

Winston Crouch has assumed the chairmanship of the department of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles). Dr. Crouch remains director of the bureau of governmental research.

John H. Ferguson, who is on leave as professor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University, has been appointed secretary of administration of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. During the past year he has been director of program evaluation in the governor's office.

William Fitzgerald, formerly of Loyola University (Los Angeles), has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at Marquette University.

James J. Flannery, formerly director of the bureau of governmental research, School of Public Administration, Florida State University, Tallahassee, and more recently senior research analyst in the Harrisburg office of the Pennsylvania Economy League, has joined the U. S. Public Health Service.

Edward S. Flash, Jr., has joined the faculty of the Graduate School of Business and Public Administration, Cornell University, as director of student affairs and lecturer in public administration.

John L. Fletcher has been appointed assistant dean of the Graduate School at Boston University.

Robert S. Friedman of the University of Maryland has been appointed instructor in government at Louisiana State University.

Richard Frost has been appointed an instructor in the Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton University.

Robbins L. Gates, Columbia University, has become an instructor at Trinity College (Hartford).

John S. Gillespie has been promoted to assistant professor of political science at Tulane University.

Thomas V. Gilpatrick has been appointed visiting instructor in political science at the Pennsylvania State University for the year 1956-57.

Edward B. Glick, formerly of the political science department of the University of Florida in Gainesville, has been appointed director of the newly created Department of International Affairs of the American Jewish Congress. AJC is the United States affiliate of the Jewish Congress.

Edward M. Goldberg has been an instructor in the political science at the University of Pennsylvania.

Jack Gourman has been appointed instructor in the department of politics at The Immaculate Heart College (Chicago) for 1956-57.

Robert C. Hartnett, S. J., former chief of the national Catholic week America (1948-1955), has been dean of the College of Arts at Loyola University, Chicago. Father resumed teaching political theory in the semester of 1955-56 at the University of Michigan, where he had headed the department of political science for five years, before taking the position in New York City.

Mark O. Hatfield resigned from the department of political science at Willamette University to become the Republican U. S. Secretary of State in Oregon. He served terms in the Oregon House of Representatives and one in the Senate while teaching at Willamette.

Richard Hough, graduate student, has accepted a one-year appointment as instructor in government at the University of Amsterdam. He is replacing Robert H. Hough, who is filling a Fulbright appointment at the University of Amsterdam.

Robert Huckshorn, who received an appointment at the State University of Iowa, has received an appointment as instructor at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Eric James is teaching American government at Brooklyn College during the year 1956-57.

Thomas P. Jenkin, currently at New York, has been promoted to professor at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Paul F. Johnston joins the staff of the University of Idaho as assistant professor of political science, executive secretary of the Political Science Committee.

Thomas E. Joyner, formerly of the University of Tampa, has become field of the Housing-Code Study, Division of Housing, State of New York.

Fred Kort has been promoted to an assistant professorship in the department of government and international relations at the University of Connecticut.

G. Leighton LaFuze has been appointed visiting associate professor of political science at the University of Idaho.

Eleanor T. Linenthal has been appointed a research associate on the staff of the Sloan Institute of Hospital Administration in the Graduate School of Business and Public Administration at Cornell University.

Edward H. Litchfield has resigned as dean of the Graduate School of Business and Public Administration at Cornell University to assume the chancellorship of the University of Pittsburgh.

Charles A. McCoy, formerly of the bureau of public administration at the University of Virginia, has joined the department of political science at Temple University.

Joyce McLeod, formerly at the University of California (Berkeley), is now an acting instructor at the University of California at Los Angeles.

Charles P. McVicker, Jr., has been appointed an instructor in political science, Yale University.

Gerald Mangone has resigned as associate professor of political science at Swarthmore College to accept a position at Syracuse University.

Beatrice Markey, formerly of the Haynes Foundation, has joined the faculty of San Diego State College.

Henry L. Mason, Tulane University, has been promoted to associate professor of political science.

Douglas H. Mendel, Jr., has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Warner E. Mills, Jr., formerly of the University of Texas, has been appointed assistant professor of government at Beloit College.

Robert Morgan has been made associate professor of political science at the University of Nebraska.

Benjamin Nimer has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Washington and Jefferson College.

Irwin Oder is teaching in the political science department at Brooklyn College during the year 1956-57.

Frank Paddock, professor of political science at Temple University, retired in June, 1956, after 28 years of service at the university.

L. Vincent Padgett has joined the faculty of San Diego State College as an assistant professor.

Wallace Parks recently resigned from the Government Operations Committee of the House of Representatives, where his last assignment was chief counsel of the Government Information Subcommittee, to engage in a study under a grant from the Fund for the Republic.

DeVere Pentony has been appointed to an instructorship in political science at the State University of Iowa for the academic year 1956-57.

Dwynal B. Pettengill has been appointed instructor in the department of political science and associate director of the Field Politics Center at Goucher College.

R. Vance Presthus was appointed associate professor of business administration in the Graduate School of Business and Public Administration, Cornell University. He will also serve as associate editor of the Administrative Science Quarterly.

Donato J. Pugliese was appointed an instructor in political science at Temple University for the academic year 1956-1957.

Alan C. Rankin, Cornell University, has accepted an appointment as the assistant to the chancellor of the University of Pittsburgh.

Fred Rathjen has joined the department of government of West Texas State College as an instructor beginning September 1, 1956.

John C. Rensenbrink, who recently completed his doctoral studies at the University of Chicago, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Coe College.

John P. Roche has been appointed chairman of the department of politics, Brandeis University.

James Roherty, who received his doctorate at the University of Wisconsin in the summer of 1956, accepted an appointment as instructor in political science at Marquette University, beginning September, 1956.

Emil J. Sady, who has recently served on the staff of Public Administration Service as chief consultant to the Alaska Constitutional Convention, has been appointed senior staff member in governmental studies at the Brookings Institution.

Robert G. Scigliano of the political science department at Michigan State University was promoted to the position of assistant professor recently.

John Shannon, who received his degree from Kentucky in August, 1956, has been named instructor in political science at Creighton University.

Theodore L. Shay has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Willamette University.

George Shepherd is teaching in the political science department at Brooklyn College during the year 1956-57.

Foster Sherwood has been promoted to the rank of professor of political science, University of California at Los Angeles.

Currin V. Shields has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Robert A. Sigafos has been appointed assistant executive secretary of the Institute of Local Government at the Pennsylvania State University. He was formerly financial consultant to the Secretary of the Treasury, and director of research for the Department of the Treasury of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

Edmund F. Spellacy, professor of government, became dean of the College of General Studies, University of Hawaii, on September 1, 1956.

Richard F. Staar has been elected to the chairmanship of the social sciences division of Harding College which includes the departments of business and economics, political science, as well as history, geography and sociology.

Robert J. Steamer of the University of Massachusetts has been appointed assistant professor of government at Louisiana State University.

Harold Stein, who has been with the Twentieth Century Fund, has been appointed visiting lecturer with rank of professor in the Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton University.

Loren E. Tesdell was appointed an instructor in political science at Temple University beginning with the fall semester in 1956.

Harold M. Thewlis, formerly of Queens College, has been appointed an instructor at the University of Connecticut.

Earl Warner has been reappointed as chairman of the department of political science at Ohio Wesleyan University for a two-year period ending June, 1958.

IN MEMORIAM

Leslie A. Foust, in July, 1956, died of a heart attack. His experiences were many and varied. He was a teacher and principal in elementary and secondary schools and served in the infantry in the Argonne and Vosges Mountains engagements of World War I. He received his Bachelor and Master of Science degrees at Washington and Jefferson College, and later his Doctor of Philosophy degree at the University of Pittsburgh. He served as an administrator for Washington and Jefferson through two decades but concluded his career as professor of political science and chairman of that department, respected by both students and colleagues for his scholarship and integrity. He was a member of Delta Sigma Rho, Pi Sigma Alpha, Pennsylvania Political Science and Public Administration Association, and American Political Science Association.

Isidor Loeb, a life member of the Association since 1909, and its President in 1933, died recently at his home in St. Louis.

James E. Pate, professor of political science at William and Mary for more than 25 years, government consultant, scholar and public servant, died June 12 in Williamsburg. He had been ill for several weeks, following an attack of cerebral thrombosis.

Long an expert in the field of local government and planning, Dr. Pate was author of "Local Government and Administration," a widely used college textbook, and of numerous articles in professional journals.

Dr. Pate was appointed to the William and Mary faculty in 1927, and has served as professor of political science since 1930.

Ten years ago Arnaud B. Leavelle was called to Stanford University to be assistant professor of political science. On October 22, 1956, his death came suddenly with a massive coronary thrombosis while he was exercising his polio-crippled limbs. Only 42, Professor Leavelle's life was arrested in mid-career. Born a native of California, he had spent part of his youth in China, where he contracted the polio that incapacitated him for long and ravaged him to the end. He prepared at the University of California, Los Angeles, where he received the bachelor's degree in 1937, the master's in 1939 and the doctorate in 1940. Always an outstanding student, he won undergraduate scholarships and was elected to Phi Beta Kappa and as a graduate was made a teaching fellow.

After beginning his professional work at Swarthmore College, which later called him back twice, first from UCLA and then from Illinois, he came to Stanford University, there to remain except for one year as Fulbright Research Professor at Nuffield College, Oxford. Both as a teacher and as a research scholar, Professor Leavelle was primarily interested in the political theory field. An exciting and exacting class-room teacher, he became a general favorite among undergraduates both within and beyond the ranks of political science majors. The current junior class at Stanford has established a perpetual memorial in his honor, the Leavelle Prize in Political Theory, to go to the best student in the introductory course, for which he was famous on campus. He was equally respected by the graduate students, for whom, in most cases, he was the first faculty contact. To himself he gave no quarter; for them, he had an endless patience.

It is a grievous loss to scholarship that Professor Leavelle's career was cut short while his writings were still few. Except for articles in scholarly journals, the sole literary monument he has left is the manuscript of a volume to be posthumously published on the political philosophy of Justice James Wilson, member of the Constitutional Convention and Justice of the Supreme Court. Stanford University recognized Professor Leavelle's signal talent; by rapid promotion, to an associate professorship in 1949 and to a professorship in 1954. Even earlier he had acted as executive head of his Department.

He was a devoted member of the American Political Science Association, on whose Executive Council he had served; the American Association of University Professors, of whose Stanford chapter he was a moving spirit; and of the American Civil Liberties Union. At the time of his death he was bibliographical editor in the theory field for this Review, editorial consultant for the Western Political Quarterly, and President of the Northern California Political Science Association.—JAMES T. WATKINS, IV

1957 PROGRAM OF CONGRESSIONAL FELLOWSHIPS

Applications for the 1957 program of Congressional Fellowships will close on February 15, 1957. This program which is now in its fourth year of operation, enables young political scientists and journalists to gain the practical experience of working as staff members of Congressional committees and in the offices of House and Senate members. Half of the Fellowships will be awarded to those with graduate training and/or teaching experience in political science and half for journalists or young teachers in schools of journalism (including those active in either radio, television, or on periodicals or newspapers). The stipend for each Fellowship will be $4,500, plus travel expenses to and from Washington, D. C. According to current tax rulings, a large portion of the stipend is tax-free.

The age limit has been lowered somewhat from last year and preference will be given to applicants in the 25-32 age group. It is no longer necessary to submit applications through the Chairman of the department of political science. Any number of applicants may apply directly to The American Political Science Association.

Preference will be given to applicants who have not had the opportunity to work or live in Washington, D. C. The following types of experience and training are suggestive rather than binding:

(1) Completion of two years' graduate work in political science plus one year of experience in politics, teaching or public administration.

(2) A.B. degree (honor graduate) in political science or journalism with two years of full-time practical experience in newspaper, radio or television work.

The program will commence on November 18, 1957, with a one-month orientation period of intensive readings, seminars and discussions with experts in the legislative process. The last eight months will be divided between staff assignments with Senators, Representatives and Congressional committees. As far as possible, each Fellowship winner will be allowed to choose his preference, commencing with an assignment in the House of Representatives in January, and moving to the Senate in May. The program will conclude on August 18, 1957.

As this program has developed, the Congressional Fellows have received increasingly responsible assignments on Capitol Hill, handling legislation, speech writing, committee work, constituent inquiries, relations with executive departments, and have in many cases been given access to executive sessions of committee meetings and have been given an inside picture of Congress in operation.

Additional information and application forms may be obtained from the Association office.

1957 POLITICAL SCIENCE AWARDS FOR STATEHOUSE AND CITY HALL JOURNALISTS

Applications will be accepted through July 1, 1957 for the second series of awards to newspaper men or women in 12 Midwestern states. The awards will be made for the 12 best articles or series of articles on any phase of state or local government or politics, published in any newspaper in the following states: North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Ohio. Eligible will be any newspaper man or woman between the ages of 25 and 35 currently working full time on any daily newspaper in the above states. Articles will be judged on the basis of: Ability to clarify a complex issue; persistence and imaginateness of research; originality of presentation and quality of writing. Articles will be eligible for the awards if published at any time from June 1, 1956 to June 1, 1957. Plaques will be presented to the newspaper publishing the winning articles, and to the individual winners. The winners will also be invited for an all-expense paid, two weeks stay at Allerton Park, Illinois during the period December 1-15, 1957. During these two weeks they will be invited to participate in a conference in public affairs reporting with leading journalists and political scientists. Application blanks may be secured by writing to the Association.

INDEX TO VOLUME L.

- Acheson, Dean. Books of, reviewed . . . . . 867
- Adenauer, Konrad. Books of, noted . . . . . 1192
- ADMINISTRATIVE LAW. Book notes . . . . . 577
- Adrian, Charles R. Books of, noticed . . . . . 241
- AFRICA. Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. Responses to Planned Political Change in a Tanganyika Tribal Group . . . . . 442
- Robinson, Kenneth. A Survey of the Background Material for the Study of Government in French Tropical Africa . . . . . 179
- Book notices . . . . . 251, 260, 580, 590
- Book reviews on: Apter, David. The Gold Coast in Transition . . . . . 1138
- Ahmad, Mushtaq. Books of, noted . . . . . 907
- Aksin, Benjamin. Books of, reviewed . . . . . 1152
- ALABAMA. Book notes . . . . . 884
- Book notices . . . . . 1170
- ALBANIA. Book notices . . . . . 1184
- Alderfer, Harold F. Near East Local Government . . . . . 1120
- Allport, Gordon W. Books of, reviewed . . . . . 541
- Almond, Gabriel A. Book reviews . . . . . 512
- AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION.
- Constitutional revision . . . . . 488
- News and Notes . . . . . 284, 613, 927, 1219
- Obituaries . . . . . 622, 942, 1232
- Presidential address . . . . .
- AMERICAN POLITICAL THOUGHT. Dean, Howard E. J. Allen Smith: Jeffersonian Critic of the Federalist State . . . . . 1093
- Kariel, Henry. The Limits of Social Science: Henry Adams' Quest for Order . . . . . 1074
- Prothro, James W. Verbal Shifts in the American Presidency: A Content Analysis . . . . . 726
- Book notes . . . . . 267
- Book notices . . . . . 270, 552, 553, 917, 918, 1168
- Book reviews on: Acheson, Dean. A Democrat Looks at His Party . . . . . 867
- Brown, Robert E. Charles Beard and the Constitution . . . . . 1154
- Dahl, Robert A. Preface to Democratic Theory . . . . . 1134
- Ekirch, Arthur A., Jr. The Civilian and the Military . . . . . 1156
- The Decline of American Liberalism . . . . . 866
- Hofstadter, Richard. The Age of Reform . . . . . 862
- and Metzger, Walter P. The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States . . . . . 527
- MacIver, Robert M. Academic Freedom in Our Time . . . . . 527
- Mason, Alpheus Thomas. Security Through Freedom . . . . . 525
- Rossiter, Clinton. Conservatism in America . . . . . 864
- Anderson, C. David. Books of, reviewed . . . . . 1164
- Apter, David. Books of, reviewed . . . . . 1138
- ARGENTINA. Book notes . . . . . 1192
- Arndt, Christian O. Books of, noticed . . . . . 590
- Arnett, Ethel Stephens. Books of, noticed . . . . . 241
- Arnold, G. L. Books of, noticed . . . . . 589
- Ascher, Charles S. Book reviews . . . . . 1152
- Aumann, Francis R. Books of, reviewed . . . . . 1162
- AUSTRALIA. Book notices . . . . . 578
- Book reviews on: Birch, A. H. Federalism, Finance and Social Legislation in Canada, Australia, and the United States . . . . . 232
- AUSTRIA. Book notices . . . . . 249
- Bailey, Stephen K. Books of, reviewed . . . . . 544
- Baker, Roscoe. Books of, noticed . . . . . 240
- Baldwin, George D. Books of, reviewed . . . . . 1150
- Baldwin, Leland Dewitt. Books of, noticed . . . . . 241
- Ball, W. Macmahon. Books of, noticed . . . . .
- Barber, Elinor G. Books of, noticed . . . . . 1208
- Barbu, Zevedei. Books of, noticed . . . . . 1208
- Barker, Sir Ernest. Books of, noticed . . . . . 579
- Barnes, Hazel E. Books of, noticed . . . . . 1207
- Bartholomew, Harland. Books of, noticed . . . . . 241
- Bartley, Ernest R. Books of, noticed . . . . . 242
- Basu, Durga Das. Books of, noticed . . . . . 578
- Battistini, Lawrence H. Books of, noticed . . . . . 589
- Baude, Annika. Swedish Local Government . . . . . 1115
- Beard, Mary Ritter. Books of, noticed . . . . . 552
- Beer, Samuel H. Pressure Groups and Parties in Britain . . . . . 1
- Books of, noticed . . . . . 270
- Beisel, Albert R., Jr. Books of, reviewed . . . . . 877
- Bell, Daniel. Books of, noticed . . . . . 918
- Beloff, Max. Book reviews . . . . . 851
- Books of, reviewed . . . . . 538
- Bender, Alexander. Books of, noticed . . . . . 579
- Benedict, Murray R. Books of, noticed . . . . . 552
- Berlin, Isaiah. Books of, noted . . . . . 598
- Bernstein, Irving. Books of, noticed . . . . . 241
- Bernstein, Samuel. Books of, noticed . . . . . 271
- Bhaskaran, R. Local Government in India . . . . . 1123
- BIBLIOGRAPHY. Burdette, Franklin L. Articles and Documents on American

- Government and Politics. . . . . 242, 569, 890, 1172
- Leavelle, Arnaud B. Articles and Documents on Political Theory. . . . . 919, 1209
- Roberts, William H. Articles and Documents on Foreign and Comparative Government. . . . . 251, 580
- Articles and Documents on International Law and Relations. . . . . 260, 590, 909, 1195
- Robinson, Kenneth. A Survey of the Background Material for the Study of Government in French Tropical Africa. . . . . 179
- Seyler, William C. Doctoral Dissertations in Political Science. . . . . 807
- Simon, Herbert A. Articles and Documents on Methodology and Research in the Social Sciences. . . . . 279, 607, 923, 1215
- Stout, Hiram M. Articles and Documents on Foreign and Comparative Government. . . . . 901, 1184
- Wilson, Francis G. Articles and Documents on Political Theory. . . . . 271, 601
- Zink, Harold. Slected Materials for A Comparative Study of Local Government. . . . . 1107
- Book notices. . . . . 240, 259, 260, 269, 578, 580, 917, 918, 1183
- BIOGRAPHY. Book notes. . . . . 599, 897, 1168, 1192, 1203
- Book notices. . . . . 240, 241, 242, 550, 552, 553, 918, 1170, 1208
- Book reviews on: Buehrig, Edward H. Woodrow Wilson and the Balance of Power. . . . . 547
- Birch, A. H. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 232
- Blake, Nelson Manfred. Books of, noted. . . . . 886
- Blake, Robert. Books of, noted. . . . . 897
- Blitzer, Charles. Books of, noticed. . . . . 271
- Bodin, Jean. Books of, noticed. . . . . 917
- Bone, Hugh A. An Introduction to the Senate Policy Committees. . . . . 339
- Borton, Hugh. Books of, noticed. . . . . 248, 258
- Bracher, Karl Dietrich. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 533
- Braibanti, Ralph. Book reviews. . . . . 876
- Breitling, Rupert. Books of, noted. . . . . 898
- Bretton, Henry L. Book notes. . . . . 246
- Books of, reviewed. . . . . 534
- Briggs, Asa. Books of, noticed. . . . . 249
- Brinton, Crane. Book notes. . . . . 598
- Brower, Frank E. Books of, noticed. . . . . 270
- Brown, Robert E. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 1153, 1154
- Brownlow, Louis. Books of, noticed. . . . . 550
- Bruner, Jerome S. Books of, noticed. . . . . 916
- Brzezinski, Zbigniew K. Totalitarianism and Rationality. . . . . 751
- Books of, reviewed. . . . . 782
- Buehrig, Edward H. Book notes. . . . . 1190
- Books of, reviewed. . . . . 547
- BULGARIA. Book notices. . . . . 1184
- Burch, Philip H., Jr. and Rich, Bennett M. The Changing Role of the National Guard. . . . . 702
- Burdette, Franklin L. Articles and Documents on American Government and Politics. . . . . 242, 569, 890, 1172
- Burdine, J. Alton. Book notes. . . . . 267
- BURMA. Book reviews on: Emerson, Rupert. Representative Government in Southeast Asia. . . . . 505
- Burnham, W. Dean. Books of, noticed. . . . . 241
- Butler, D. E. Books of, noticed. . . . . 579
- Butler, Rohan. Books of, noticed. . . . . 588, 589
- Butters, J. Keith. Books of, noted. . . . . 887
- Butz, Otto. Books of, noticed. . . . . 1207
- Byé, Maurice. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 519
- Caldwell, Lynton K. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 1164
- Calkins, Howard A. Book notes. . . . . 549
- Calvocoressi, Peter. Books of, noticed. . . . . 1193
- Campion, Lord. Books of, noticed. . . . . 580
- CANADA. Musolf, Lloyd D. Canadian Public Enterprise: A Character Study. . . . . 405
- Book notices. . . . . 579, 1182
- Book reviews on: Birch, A. H. Federalism, Finance and Social Legislation in Canada, Australia, and the United States. . . . . 232
- Mallory, J. R. Social Credit and the Federal Power in Canada. . . . . 230
- Williams, John R. The Conservative Party of Canada, 1920-1949. . . . . 1146
- Cannarsa, Spartaco. Books of, noticed. . . . . 250
- CARIBBEAN. Book reviews on: Development Toward Self-Government in the Caribbean: A Symposium. . . . . 858
- Carson, George Barr, Jr. Books of, noticed. . . . . 250
- Carter, Gwendolen M. Book notes. . . . . 1181
- Chamberlin, Waldo. Books of, noticed. . . . . 259
- Chapman, Brian. French Local Government. . . . . 1108
- Italian Local Government. . . . . 1111
- Chapman, John W. Book notes. . . . . 599
- Chatham House Study Group. Books of, noticed. . . . . 590
- Cheever, Daniel S. Book reviews. . . . . 856
- CHINA. Book notices. . . . . 901

- Book reviews on: Lindsay, Michael.
China and the Cold War..... 514
- Chinoy, Ely. Books of, reviewed..... 235
- Christol, Carl Q. Book reviews..... 234
- Chung, Kyung Cho. Books of, noticed.... 580
- Claude, Inis L., Jr. Book notes..... 587
- Books of, reviewed..... 222
- Cohn, David L. Books of, noticed..... 1170
- Cole, Henry B. Books of, noticed..... 579
- Cole, K. C. Book reviews..... 525
- Coleman, James S. Book reviews..... 1138
- Colm, Gerhard. Books of, reviewed..... 847
- COLONIES AND DEPENDENCIES. Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. Responses to Planned Political Change in a Tanganyika Tribal Group..... 442
- Robinson, Kenneth. A Survey of Background Material for the Study of Government in French Tropical Africa..... 179
- Book notices..... 580
- Book reviews on: Apter, David. The Gold Coast in Transition..... 1138
- Development Toward Self-Government in the Caribbean: A Symposium*..... 858
- Committee for German Unity (Berlin). Books of, noticed..... 1183
- COMMUNISM. Godfrey, E. Drexel, Jr. The Communist Presence in France..... 321
- Kenney, Charles D. The Twentieth C.P.S.U. Congress: A Study in Calculated Moderation..... 764
- Book notes..... 247, 268
- Book notices..... 249, 901, 1184, 1194
- Book reviews on: Brzezinski, Zbigniew K. The Permanent Purge..... 872
- Stouffer, Samuel A. Communism, Conformity, and Civil Liberties..... 223
- COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT. Beer, Samuel H. Pressure Groups and Parties in Britain..... 1
- Brzezinski, Zbigniew. Totalitarianism and Rationality..... 751
- Lott, Leo B. Executive Power in Venezuela..... 422
- Macridis, Roy. A Note on the Revision of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic..... 1011
- Ward, Robert E. The Origins of the Present Japanese Constitution..... 980
- Articles and documents..... 251, 580, 901, 1184
- Book notes..... 1180, 1190
- Book notices..... 577, 578, 580, 889, 900, 901, 1184, 1194
- Book reviews on: Birch, A. H. Federalism, Finance and Social Legislation in Canada, Australia, and the United States..... 232
- Bracher, Karl Dietrich. Die Auflösung der Weimarer Republik..... 533
- Kelsall, R. K. Higher Civil Servants in Britain..... 229
- McKenzie, R. T. British Political Parties..... 227
- Mallory, J. R. Social Credit and the Federal Power in Canada..... 230
- Quigley, Harold S. and Turner, John E. The New Japan..... 876
- Rustow, Dankwart. A. The Politics of Compromise..... 1149
- Williams, John R. The Conservative Party of Canada, 1920-1949..... 1146
- CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. Fellman, David. Constitutional Law in 1954-1955.... 43
- Huntington, Samuel P. Civilian Control and the Constitution..... 676
- Book notes..... 549, 1168, 1190
- Book notices..... 240, 241
- Book reviews on: Beisel, Albert R. Jr. Control over Illegal Enforcement of the Criminal Law..... 877
- Cookerboo, Lealie, Jr. Books of, noted.. 239
- Cooper, James Fenimore. Books of, noticed..... 918
- Corson, John J. Books of, noticed..... 552
- Corwin, Edward S. Books of, reviewed.. 880
- Costanzo, Joseph F. Book notes..... 1205
- Cottrell, Fred. Books of, noted..... 1204
- Coulborn, Rushton. Books of, reviewed. 1136
- Craig, Gordon A. Books of, noted..... 246
- CUBA. Book notices..... 251
- Cunningham, Merrimon. Books of, noticed 270
- Curl, Peter V. Books of, noticed..... 259
- Current, Richard N. Books of, noticed.. 241
- Cushman, Robert Fairchild. Book reviews..... 877
- D'Addio, Mario. Books of, reviewed.... 869
- Dahl, Robert A. Book reviews..... 860
- Books of, reviewed..... 544, 1134
- Daland, Robert T. Book notes..... 886
- Books of, noted..... 884
- Dallin, David J. Books of, reviewed.... 1147
- Dauer, Manning J. Books of, noticed.... 551
- Stephenson, William A. F.; Macy, Harry; and Temple, David. Toward A Model State Presidential Primary Law..... 138
- David, Paul T. Books of, reviewed..... 544
- Davies, James C. Book reviews..... 1144
- Davis, Thurston N. Books of, notices... 1208
- Dean, Howard E. J. Allen Smith: Jeffersonian Critic of the Federalist State. 1093
- Deane, Herbert A. Books of, reviewed... 522

- De Enterria, Eduardo Garca. Books of, noted..... 577
- Degras, Jane. Books of, noticed..... 1194
- De Grazia, Alfred. Books of, reviewed... 544
- De Jong, Louis. Books of, noted..... 1191
- DENMARK. Holm, Alex. Danish Local Government..... 1117
- Dewar, Margaret. Books of, reviewed... 1147
- Dill, Alonzo Thomas. Books of, noticed.. 241
- Dimock, Marshall E. The Administrative Staff College: Executive Development in Government and Industry.. 166
- Dinerstein, Herbert S. Books of, noted.. 247
- Dondo, Mathurin. Books of, noticed.... 917
- Douglass, Elisha P. Books of, noted.... 267
- Doyle, Wilson K. Books of, reviewed.... 1164
- Drummond, Donald F. Books of, noticed 260
- Duverger, Maurice. Books of, noted..... 1181
- Eagelton, Clyde. Books of, noticed..... 259
- Earle, Valerie A. Book notes..... 884
- EAST GERMANY. Book notices..... 250
- Ebenstein, William. Book notes..... 268
- Book reviews..... 199
- Eckstein, Harry (Rapporteur). Political Theory and the Study of Politics: A Report of a Conference..... 475
- ECONOMIC PROBLEMS. Book notices..... 552
- ECONOMICS. Book notes..... 239, 887, 1204
- Book notices..... 240
- Book reviews on: Smithies, Arthur, et al. Economics and Public Policy: Brookings Lectures, 1954..... 860
- Ehrmann, Henry W. Book reviews..... 519
- Einaudi, Mario. Book reviews..... 869
- Books of, reviewed..... 519
- Ekirch, Arthur A., Jr. Books of, reviewed..... 866, 1156
- Eldersveld, Samuel J. Experimental Propaganda Techniques and Voting Behavior..... 154
- ELECTIONS. Dauer, Manning J., et al. Toward a Model State Presidential Primary Law..... 138
- Eldersveld, Samuel J. Experimental Propaganda Techniques and Voting Behavior..... 154
- Harrison, Selig S. Caste and the Andhra Communists..... 378
- Book notices..... 241, 250, 579, 580, 1170
- Book reviews on: Ross, J. F. S. Elections and Electors..... 1166
- Scammon, Richard M. America Votes—A Handbook of Contemporary American Election Statistics..... 1141
- Thomson, Charles A. H. Television and Presidential Politics..... 882
- Emden, Cecil S. Books of, noticed..... 1182
- Emerson, Rupert. Book reviews..... 216
- Books of, reviewed..... 505
- Enarson, Harold L. Books of, noticed... 241
- Engelbert, Ernest A. Book notes..... 1204
- Engels, Friedrich. Books of, noticed.... 270
- Epstein, Leon D. Cohesion of British Parliamentary Parties..... 360
- Esslinger, William. Books of, noticed.... 270
- ETHIOPIA. Book notices..... 251
- EUROPE. Book notes..... 905
- Book notices..... 248, 590, 1194
- Everett, Samuel. Books of, noticed..... 590
- Ewart, Lewis. The Contribution of Medieval Thought to the American Political Tradition..... 462
- Eysenck, H. J. Books of, noted..... 599
- FAR EAST. Book notices..... 589, 901, 1184
- Book reviews on: Emerson, Rupert. Representative Government in Southeast Asia..... 505
- Li, Tieh-tseng. The Historical Status of Tibet..... 1161
- Lindsay, Michael. China and the Cold War..... 514
- Rostow, W. W. and Hatch, Richard W. An American Policy in Asia.... 225
- Vinacke, Harold M. Far Eastern Politics in the Postwar Period..... 1159
- Farmer, Hallie. Book notes..... 237
- FEDERALISM. Huntington, Samuel P. Civilian Control and the Constitution. 676
- Book notes..... 885, 905
- Book notices..... 248, 889
- Book reviews on: Birch, A. H. Federalism, Finance and Social Legislation in Canada, Australia, and the United States..... 232
- Mallory, J. R. Social Credit and the Federal Power in Canada..... 230
- The Commission on Intergovernmental Relations: A Report to the President for Transmittal to the Congress*..... 208
- Fellman, David. Constitutional Law in 1954-1955..... 43
- Book reviews..... 1162
- Fenn, P. T. Book notes..... 1168
- Field, G. Lowell. Book notes..... 1180
- Filley, Walter O. Book reviews..... 1146
- Fitzgibbon, Russell H. Book notes..... 1193
- Flanders, Ralph E. Books of, noticed.... 1170
- Fleming, R. W. Books of, noticed..... 241
- Fliess, Peter J. Books of, noted..... 899
- Flom, Floyd O. Books of, noticed..... 551
- FLORIDA. Book reviews on: Doyle, Wilson K., Laird, Angus M. and Weiss, S.

- Sherman. The Government and Administration of Florida. . . . . 1164
- Florinsky, Michael T. Books of, noticed. . . . . 248
- Folliot, Denise. Books of, noticed. . . . . 1193
- Fordham, Jefferson B. Books of, noticed. . . . . 918
- Fortenberry, Charles N. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 1164
- Fusfeld, Daniel R. Books of, noticed. . . . . 552
- FRANCE. Chapman, Brian. French Local Government. . . . . 1108
- Godfrey, E. Drexel, Jr. The Communist Presence in France. . . . . 321
- Macridis, Roy. A Note on the Revision of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic. . . . . 1011
- Book reviews on: Einaudi, Mario, Byé, Maurice, and Rossi, Ernesto. Nationalization in France and Italy. . . . . 519
- Frank, Joseph. Books of, noticed. . . . . 271
- Freydig, Constance A. Books of, noticed. . . . . 578
- Friedrich, Carl J. Book reviews. . . . . 1136
- Furniss, Edgar S., Jr. Book reviews. . . . . 538
- Books of, noticed. . . . . 259
- Gable, Richard W. Books of, noticed. . . . . 1171
- Galloway, George B. Book reviews. . . . . 520
- Garceau, Oliver. Book reviews. . . . . 867
- GEOGRAPHY. Book notices. . . . . 1208
- GEORGIA. Book reviews on: Gosnell, Cullen B. and Anderson, C. David. The Government and Administration of Georgia. . . . . 1164
- GERMANY. Wells, Roger H. German State and Local Government. . . . . 1112
- Book notes. . . . . 246, 898, 899, 1191, 1192
- Book notices. . . . . 249, 250, 269, 589, 899, 900, 917, 1183, 1207
- Book reviews on: Bracher, Karl Dietrich. Die Auflösung der Weimarer Republik. . . . . 533
- Kohn, Hans (ed.). German History. . . . . 543
- Pollock, James K.; Bretton, Henry L.; Grace, Frank; and McHargue, Daniel S. German Democracy at Work. . . . . 534
- Geyl, C. M. Books of, noted. . . . . 1191
- Gladden, E. N. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 874
- Glum, Friedrich. Books of, noticed. . . . . 269
- Godfrey, E. Drexel, Jr. The Communist Presence in France. . . . . 321
- Goodman, William. Books of, noticed. . . . . 1171
- Goodrich, Leland M. Book notes. . . . . 587
- Books of, reviewed. . . . . 218
- Gosnell, Cullen B. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 1164
- Gouré, Leon. Books of, noted. . . . . 247
- Grace, Frank. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 534
- GREAT BRITAIN. Epstein, Leon D. Cohesion of British Parliamentary Parties. . . . . 360
- Book notes. . . . . 576, 897
- Book notices. . . . . 249, 250, 579, 588, 589, 900, 1182
- Book reviews on: Baldwin, George D. Beyond Nationalization. . . . . 1150
- Kelsall, R. K. Higher Civil Servants in Britain. . . . . 229
- McKenzie, R. T. British Political Parties. . . . . 227
- Ross, J. F. S. Elections and Electors. . . . . 1166
- Spero, Sterling D. Labor Relations in British Nationalized Industry. . . . . 1150
- Green, F. C. Books of, noted. . . . . 599
- Green, James Frederick. Books of, noted. . . . . 1193
- Greenwood, Gordon. Books of, noticed. . . . . 578
- Griffith, Ernest S. Books of, noticed. . . . . 550
- , Plamenatz, John, and Pennock, J. Roland. Cultural Prerequisites to a Successfully Functioning Democracy: A Symposium. . . . . 101
- Grinsell, Carl W. Books of, notices. . . . . 1207
- Gross, Bertram M. Book reviews. . . . . 536
- Grosser, Alfred. Books of, noticed. . . . . 249
- Gruber, Karl. Books of, noticed. . . . . 249
- GUATEMALA. Taylor, Philip B., Jr. The Guatemalan Affair: A Critique of United States Foreign Policy. . . . . 787
- Gulick, Charles A. Books of, noticed. . . . . 580
- Gulick, Edward Vose. Books of, noted. . . . . 1190
- Haas, Ernst B. Books of, noticed. . . . . 588
- Haimson, Leopold H. Books of, noticed. . . . . 249
- Hall, H. Duncan. Books of, noticed. . . . . 249
- Hammond, Paul Y. Book reviews. . . . . 1156
- Handlin, Oscar. Books of, noticed. . . . . 241, 242
- Hanson, A. H. Books of, noticed. . . . . 1181
- Harbold, William H. Book notes. . . . . 905
- Hardin, Charles M. Book reviews. . . . . 541, 1143
- Harris, John S. Books of, noticed. . . . . 1182
- Harrison, Selig. S. Caste and the Andhra Communists. . . . . 378
- Hatch, Richard W. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 225
- Havard, William C. Books of, noticed. . . . . 551
- Haviland, H. Field, Jr. Book notes. . . . . 258
- Heard, Alexander. Book reviews. . . . . 1141
- Heimann, Eduard. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 532
- Hendry, James McLeod. Books of, noted. . . . . 1190
- Henry, Roberts L. Books of, noticed. . . . . 259
- Herz, John H. Book reviews. . . . . 533
- Hicks, John D. Books of, noticed. . . . . 241
- Highsaw, Robert B. Books of, reviewed. . . . . 1164
- Hill, Norman. Book notes. . . . . 1191
- Book reviews. . . . . 218
- Hinderaker, Ivan. Books of, noticed. . . . . 1171
- HISTORY. Book notes. . . . . 237, 246, 267, 598, 885, 1190, 1191, 1203, 1204

- Book notices..... 241,
242, 248, 249, 250, 258, 259, 260, 271, 552,
579, 888, 889, 900, 917, 1182, 1183, 1194, 1208
- Book reviews on: Brown, Robert E.
Charles Beard and the Constitution... 1154 — *Middle-Class Democracy and the Revolution in Massachusetts, 1691-
1780*..... 1158
- Coulborn, Rushton (ed.). *Feudalism
in History*..... 1136
- Hofstadter, Richard. The Age of Reform..... 862
- and Metzger, Walter P. The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States..... 527
- Kohn, Hans (ed.). German History.. 543
- Li, Tieh-teeng. The Historical Status of Tibet..... 1161
- Hofstadter, Richard. Books of, reviewed.
..... 527, 862
- Hogan, Willard N. Books of, noted. . . . 258
- Holm, Alex. Danish Local Government.. 1117
- Hook, Sidney. Books of, noticed..... 270
- Horne, Alistair. Books of, noticed..... 1183
- Hounshell, Charles D. Book notes..... 1192
- Howarth, Patrick. Books of, noticed.... 579
- Huitt, Ralph K. Book notes..... 239
- Hunt, Elgin F. Books of, noticed..... 271
- Hunt, R. N. Carew. Books of, reviewed.. 199
- Hunter, Floyd. Book notes..... 268
- Huntington, Samuel P. Civilian Control and the Constitution..... 676
- Book reviews..... 878
- ICELAND. Book notices..... 251
- INDIA. Bhaskaran, R. Local Government in India..... 1123
- Harrison, Selig S. Caste and the Andhra Communists..... 378
- Book notes..... 906, 1205
- Book notices..... 578, 589, 908, 1184, 1208
- INDONESIA. Book notices..... 248, 578
- Book reviews on: Emerson, Rupert.
Representative Government in Southeast Asia..... 505
- Book reviews on: Schiller, A. Arthur.
The Formation of Federal Indonesia, 1945-1949..... 505
- Informationsburo West (Berlin—Schlachtensee). Books of, noticed..... 250
- INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION AND OR-GANIZATION. Book notes..... 258, 1192
- Book notices..... 260, 589, 1170, 1182, 1208
- Book reviews on: Aksin, Benjamin.
New States and International Organizations..... 1152
- Price, Harry Bayard, Jr. The Marshall Plan and its Meaning..... 509
- Wilcox, Francis O. and Marcy, Carl
M. Proposals for Changes in the United Nations..... 856
- INTERNATIONAL LAW. Articles and documents..... 260, 590, 909, 1195
- Book notes..... 587
- Book notices..... 260, 1194.
- Book reviews on: Khadduri, Majid.
War and Peace in the Law of Islam.. 854
- and Liebesny, Herbert J. (eds.).
Law in the Middle East. Volume I.. 854
- INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS. Articles and documents..... 260, 590, 909, 1195
- Book notes..... 258, 905, 906, 1190
- Book notices..... 258, 259,
260, 577, 588, 589, 590, 901, 908, 1193
- Book reviews on: Claude, Inis L., Jr.
National Minorities..... 222
- Goodrich, Leland M. and Simons,
Anne P. The United Nations and the Maintenance of International Peace and Security..... 218
- Jones, Joseph M. *The Fifteen Weeks
(February 21-June 5, 1947)*..... 509
- Lattimore, Owen. Nationalism and Revolution in Mongolia..... 851
- Lindsay, Michael. China and the Cold War..... 514
- Vinacke, Harold M. *Far Eastern
Politics in the Postwar Period*..... 1159
- Wright, Quincy. The Study of International Relations..... 216
- IRELAND. Book notices..... 900, 1182
- ISLAM. Book notices..... 578
- ISRAEL. Book reviews on: Rackman, Emanuel. Israel's Emerging Constitution, 1948-51..... 536
- ITALY. Chapman, Brian. Italian Local Government..... 1111
- Book notices..... 250, 900, 901
- Book reviews on: Einaudi, Mario, Byé,
Maurice, and Rossi, Ernesto. Nationalization in France and Italy... 519
- Jackson, Robert H. Books of, noticed... 550
- Jaffa, Harry V. Book reviews..... 515
- JAPAN. Steiner, Kurt. Japanese Local Government..... 1126
- Ward, Robert E. The Origins of the Present Japanese Constitution..... 980
- Book notices..... 248, 578
- Book reviews on: Quigley, Harold S. and Turner, John E. The New Japan 876
- Jeffries, Sir Charles. Books of, noticed.. 1182
- Jenkin, Thomas P. Books of, noticed.... 270
- Jewkes, John. Books of, reviewed..... 860

- Jones, F. C. Books of, noticed..... 258
 Jones, Joseph M. Books of, reviewed.... 509
 Jones, W. Melville. Books of, noted.... 1168
 Johnson, Arthur Menzies. Books of, noticed..... 1171
 Johnson, Claudius O. Books of, noticed..... 240, 551
 Joy, Admiral C. Turner. Books of, noticed 590
 JUDICIARY. Book notices..... 550
   Book reviews on: Mayers, Lewis. The American Legal System..... 234
 Kabir, Humayun. Books of, noticed..... 918
 Kahin, George McT. Book reviews..... 505
   — Books of, noticed..... 590
 Kallenbach, Joseph E. Book notes..... 1169
   — Book reviews..... 880
 Kariel, Henry. The Limits of Social Science: Henry Adams' Quest for Order..... 1074
 Karsch, Robert F. Books of, noticed.... 551
 Katz, Elihu. Books of, noticed..... 918
 Kaufman, Herbert. Emerging Conflicts in the Doctrines of Public Administration..... 1057
   — Book reviews..... 874
 Kaufmann, William W. Books of, reviewed..... 878
 Keith-Lucas, Alan. Book notes..... 238
 Kelsall, R. K. Books of, reviewed..... 229
 Kelsen, Hans. Books of, noted..... 268
 Kendall, Willmoore. Books of, noticed.... 1170
 Kennedy, John F. Books of, noticed.... 553
 Kenney, Charles D. The Twentieth C.P.S.U. Congress: A Study in Calculated Moderation..... 764
 Kenyon, Cecelia M. Book reviews... 866, 1153
 Key, V. O., Jr. Books of, reviewed..... 1143
 Khadduri, Majid. Books of, reviewed... 854
 Kilmer, Kenton. Books of, noticed..... 550
 Klain, Maurice. Book reviews..... 1154
 Knight, Frank H. Books of, reviewed... 860
 Kochan, Lionel. Books of, noticed..... 249
 Koenig, Louis W. Books of, reviewed.... 880
 Kohn, Hans. Books of, noticed..... 259
   — Book of, reviewed..... 543
 Koontz, Harold. Books of, noticed..... 1171
 KOREA. Book notices..... 580
 Kraenzel, Frederick. Books of, noted.... 885
 Kraus, Wolfgang H. Book notes..... 898
 Kropotkin, Peter. Books of, noticed.... 270
 Kundra, J. C. Books of, noted..... 906
 LABOR. Book notices..... 241, 580, 1182
   Book reviews on: Baldwin, George D. Beyond Nationalization..... 1150
   Chinoy, Ely. Automobile Workers and the American Dream..... 235
   Dewar, Margaret. Labour Policy in the USSR, 1917-1928..... 1147
   Spero, Sterling D. Labor Relations in British Nationalized Industry..... 1150
 Laird, Angus McKenzie. Books of, reviewed..... 1164
 Lane, Robert E. Book notes..... 599
   — Book reviews..... 223
 Larson, James E. Books of, noticed.... 551
 Lasswell, Harold D. The Political Science of Science: An Inquiry into the Possible Reconciliation of Mastery and Freedom..... 961
 Latham, Earl. Book reviews..... 544
 LATIN AMERICA. Lott, Leo. Latin American Local Government..... 1118
 Lattimore, Owen. Books of, reviewed.... 851
 Laves, Walter H. C. Book reviews..... 220
 Lazarsfeld, Paul F. Books of, noticed.... 918
 Leach, Richard H. Book notes..... 549
 Leavelle, Arnaud B. Articles and Documents on Political Theory..... 919, 1209
 Lecht, Leonard A. Books of, noticed.... 552
 LEGAL THEORY AND INSTITUTIONS. Book notes..... 268, 549
   Book notices..... 917
   Aumann, Francis R. The Instrumentalities of Justice..... 1162
   Khadduri, Majid. War and Peace in the Law of Islam..... 854
   — and Liebesny, Herbert J. (eds.). Law in the Middle East. Volume I... 854
   Mayers, Lewis. The American Legal System..... 234
   Vanderbilt, Arthur T. Judges and Jurors..... 1162
 LEGISLATIVE PROCESS. Bone, Hugh A. An Introduction to the Senate Policy Committees..... 339
   Truman, David B. The State Delegations and the Structure of Party Voting in the United States House of Representatives..... 1023
   Book notices..... 550, 553, 580, 889, 900
   Book reviews on: Young, Roland. Congressional Politics in the Second World War..... 520
 Lerner, Max. Book reviews..... 522
 Levine, Isaac Don. Books of, noticed.... 1183
 Lewis, Ben W. Book reviews..... 1150
 Leyendecker, Hilary M. Books of, noted. 238
 Li, Tieh-tseng. Books of, reviewed..... 1161
 LIBERIA. Book notices..... 579
 Lidderdale, D. W. S. Books of, noticed.. 580
 Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. Responses to Planned Political Change in a Tan-

- ganyika Tribal Group..... 442
- Liebesny, Herbert J. Books of, reviewed. 854
- Lindsay, Michael. Books of, reviewed... 514
- Lippmann, Walter. Books of, reviewed... 212
- Lipsky, George A. Book notes..... 247
- Lipson, Leslie. Book reviews..... 227
- Liu Wu-Chi. Books of, noticed..... 918
- Livingston, William S. Book notes..... 897
- Book reviews.....1166
- Lockard, W. Duane. Book reviews.....1164
- Lott, Leo B. Executive Power in Venezuela..... 422
- Latin American Local Government.....1118
- Lubell, Samuel. Books of, reviewed.....1144
- McClosky, Herbert. Book reviews.....1134
- McConnell, John W. Books of, noticed.. 552
- Macdonald, Austin F. Books of, noticed. 551
- MacDonald, H. Malcolm. Book notes. . . . .1168, 1207
- McGovern, William M. Book reviews...1161
- McHargue, Daniel S. Books of, reviewed. 534
- MacIver, Robert M. Books of, reviewed. 527
- McKenzie, R. T. Books of, reviewed.... 227
- Macmahon, Arthur W. Woodrow Wilson as Legislative Leader and Administrator..... 641
- McMillan, Malcolm Cook. Books of, noted..... 237
- MacNeil, Neil. Books of, noticed.....1171
- Macridis, Roy. A Note on the Revision of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic.....1011
- Book reviews..... 534
- McWhinney, Edward. Book reviews... 232
- Macy, Harry; Dauer, Manning J.; Stephenson, William A. F.; and Temple, David. Toward a Model State Presidential Primary Law... 138
- MALAYA. Book reviews on: Emerson, Rupert. Representative Government in Southeast Asia..... 505
- Mallory, J. R. Books of, reviewed..... 230
- Manly, Chesly. Books of, noticed..... 260
- Manual, Frank. Books of, reviewed.....1158
- Marcy, Carl M. Books of, reviewed..... 856
- Marein, Nathan. Books of, noticed..... 251
- Marke, Julius J. Books of, noticed..... 241
- Martin, Laurence W. Books of, noticed.1194
- Marx, Karl. Books of, noticed..... 270
- Mason, Alpheus Thomas. Books of, reviewed..... 525
- Mason, Henry L. Books of, noted..... 905
- Mason, John Brown. Book notes.....1192
- MASSACHUSETTS. Book notices..... 889
- Book reviews on: Brown, Robert E. Middle-Class Democracy in the Revolution in Massachusetts, 1691-1780..1153
- Matthews, Donald R. Book reviews..... 235
- Mayer, Frederick. Books of, noticed.... 270
- Mayers, Lewis. Books of, reviewed..... 234
- Mayo, H. B. Books of, reviewed..... 199
- Meisel, James H. Book reviews.....1158
- Merson, Martin. Books of, noticed..... 553
- METHODOLOGY. Eckstein, Harry (Rapporteur). Political Theory and the Study of Politics: A Report of a Conference..... 475
- Kariel, Henry. The Limits of Social Science: Henry Adams' Quest for Order.....1074
- Prothro, James W. Verbal Shifts in the American Presidency: A Content Analysis..... 726
- White, Howard B. Commentary on Prothro's Content Analysis..... 740
- Articles and documents...279, 607, 923, 1215
- Book notices..... 270
- Book reviews on: Bailey, Stephen K., et al. Research Frontiers in Politics and Government: Brookings Lectures, 1955..... 544
- Wright, Quincy. The Study of International Relations..... 216
- Metz, Harold W. Books of, noticed.....1171
- Metzger, Walter P. Books of, reviewed.. 527
- Meyer, Alfred G. Book reviews.....1147
- Books of, reviewed..... 199
- Meynaud, Jean. Books of, noticed..... 269
- Meyriat, Jean. Books of, noticed..... 269
- MIDDLE EAST. Alderfer, Harold F. Near East Local Government.....1120
- Book notices..... 590
- Book reviews on: Khadduri, Majid. War and Peace in the Law of Islam.. 854
- and Liebesny, Herbert J. (eds.). Law in the Middle East. Volume I... 854
- MILITARY AFFAIRS. Book reviews on: Ekirch, Arthur A., Jr. The Civilian and the Military.....1156
- Kaufmann, William W. (ed.). Military Policy and National Security... 878
- Book notices..... 899
- Miller, Warren E. One-Party Politics and the Voter..... 707
- Mills, C. Wright. Books of, noted.....1168
- Ministerio de Relaciones Exteriores (Nicaragua). Books of, noticed..... 251
- Ministerium des Innern of the Saar. Books of, noticed..... 579
- MISSISSIPPI. Book reviews on: Highsaw, Robert B. and Fortenberry, Charles N. The Government and Administra-

- tion of Mississippi.....1164
- MONGOLIA. Book reviews on: Latimore, Owen. Nationalism and Revolution in Mongolia..... 851
- Moore, Edmund A. Books of, noticed...1170
- Moore, Frank J. Books of, noticed..... 578
- Moos, Malcolm. Books of, reviewed..... 544
- Morlan, Robert L. Books of, noted..... 237
- Moses, Robert. Books of, noted.....1169
- MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT. Zink, Harold. Selected Materials for a Comparative Study of Local Government.....1107
- Book notes.....886, 1169
- Book notices.....240, 241, 260, 551, 918
- Musolf, Lloyd D. Canadian Public Enterprise: A Character Study..... 405
- Nadworny, Milton J. Books of, noticed.. 552
- NATURAL RESOURCES. Book notes...885, 886
- Book notices..... 888
- Neumann, Sigmund. Book reviews..... 532
- Books of, noted.....1180
- NEW YORK. Book reviews on: Caldwell, Lynton K. The Government and Administration of New York.....1164
- News and Notes.....284, 613, 927, 1219
- Nibley, Hugh. Book notes..... 887
- NICARAGUA. Book notices..... 251
- Niebuhr, Reinhold. Books of, noted....1206
- Nigro, Felix. Book notes..... 577
- Book reviews..... 858
- NORTH CAROLINA. Book reviews on: Rankin, Robert S. *The Government and Administration of North Carolina*1164
- Nye, Russel B. Books of, noticed..... 242
- Ockert, Roy A. Books of, noticed..... 580
- Odegard, Peter H. Book reviews..... 527
- Ogata, Shijuro. Books of, noticed..... 578
- O'Keane, Josephine. Books of, noticed.. 242
- Overstreet, Gene D. Book notes..... 906
- Padelford, Norman J., Penniman, Howard R., et al. Revision of the Nomination and Election Procedure of the Association: A Symposium..... 488
- PAKISTAN. Book notes..... 907
- Book notices.....1184
- Patterson, Bennett B. Books of, noted.. 549
- Pearn, B. R. Books of, noticed..... 258
- Peel, Roy V. Book reviews.....1149
- Penniman, Clara. Books of, noticed..... 551
- Penniman, Howard R., Padelford, Norman J., et al. Revision of the Nomination and Election Procedure of the Association: A Symposium..... 488
- Pennock, J. Roland, Griffith, Ernest S., and Plamenatz, John. Cultural Prerequisites to a Successfully Functioning Democracy: A Symposium..... 101
- Percy, Lord, of Newcastle. Books of, noticed..... 269
- PHILIPPINES. Thomas, M. Ladd. Philippine Local Government.....1124
- Book notes..... 576
- Book reviews on: Emerson, Rupert. Representative Government in Southeast Asia..... 505
- Plamenatz, John. Books of, reviewed.... 199
- , Pennock, J. Roland, and Griffith, Ernest S. Cultural Prerequisites to a Successfully Functioning Democracy: A Symposium..... 101
- Plano, Jack C. Book notes..... 907
- Plischke, Elmer. Books of, noticed..... 589
- POLITICAL BEHAVIOR. Eldersveld, Samuel J: Experimental Propaganda Techniques and Voting Behavior..... 154
- Harrison, Selig S. Caste and the Andhra Communists..... 378
- Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. Responses to Planned Political Change in a Tanganyika Tribal Group..... 442
- Miller, Warren E. One-Party Politics and the Voter..... 707
- Book notes.....898, 1181
- Book notices..... 889
- Book reviews on: Lubell, Samuel. Revolt of the Moderates.....1144
- Scammon, Richard M. America Votes — A Handbook of Contemporary American Election Statistics.....1141
- Stouffer, Samuel A. Communism, Conformity, and Civil Liberties..... 223
- Thomson, Charles A. H. Television and Presidential Politics..... 882
- POLITICAL LEADERSHIP. Macmahon, Arthur W. Woodrow Wilson as Legislative Leader and Administrator..... 641
- Book notes..... 897
- Book reviews on: Bracher, Karl Dietrich. Die Auflösung der Weimarer Republik..... 533
- POLITICAL PARTIES. Dauer, Manning J., et al. Toward a Model State Presidential Primary Law..... 138
- Epstein, Leon D. Cohesion of British Parliamentary Parties..... 360
- Miller, Warren E. One-Party Politics and the Voter..... 707
- Sorauf, Frank J. State Patronage in a Rural County.....1046
- Truman, David B. The State Delegations and the Structure of Party

- Voting in the United States House of Representatives.....1023
 The Democratic Party's Approach to Its Convention Rules..... 553
 Book notes.....237, 576, 1180
 Book notices.....241, 242, 1170, 1171
 Book reviews on: Acheson, Dean. A Democrat Looks at His Party..... 867
 Key, V. O., Jr. American State Politics.....1143
 Williams, John R. The Conservative Party of Canada, 1920-1949.....1146
- POLITICAL SCIENCES. Lasswell, Harold D.
 The Political Science of Science: An Inquiry into the Possible Reconciliation of Mastery and Freedom..... 961
 Seyler, William C. Doctoral Dissertations in Political Science..... 807
 Book notices..... 270
 Book reviews on: Bailey, Stephen K., et al. Research Frontiers in Politics and Government: Brookings Lectures, 1955 544
- POLITICAL THEORY. Eckstein, Harry (Rapporteur). Political Theory and the Study of Politics: A Report of a Conference..... 475
 Ewart, Lewis. The Contribution of Medieval Thought to the American Political Tradition..... 462
 Griffith, Ernest S., Plamenatz, John, and Pennoek, J. Roland. Cultural Prerequisites to a Successfully Functioning Democracy: A Symposium.. 101
 White, Howard B. Commentary on Prothro's Content Analysis..... 740
 Wolin, Sheldon S. Politics and Religion: Luther's Simplistic Imperative..... 24
 Articles and documents.. 271, 601, 919, 1209
 • Book notes.....598, 599, 1204, 1205, 1206
 Book notices..... 241, 269, 270, 271, 917, 1207, 1208
 Book reviews on: D'Addio, Mario. L'Idée del Contratto Sociale dai Sofisti alla Riforma..... 869
 Dahl, Robert A. A Preface to Democratic Theory.....1134
 Deane, Herbert A. The Political Ideas of Harold J. Laski..... 522
 Heimann, Eduard. Vernunftglaube und Religion in der Modernen Gesellschaft..... 532
 Hunt, R. N. Carew. Marxism: Past and Present..... 199
 Lippmann, Walter. Essays in the Public Philosophy..... 212
 Manuel, Frank. The New World of Henri Saint-Simon.....1155
 Mayo, H. B. Democracy and Marxism 199
 Meyer, Alfred G. Marxism: The Unity of Theory and Practice..... 199
 Plamenatz, John. German Marxism and Russian Communism..... 199
 Rowe, Constance. Voltaire and the State..... 870
 Von Fritz, Kurt. The Theory of the Mixed Constitution in Antiquity..... 515
 Pollock, James K. Books of, reviewed... 534
 Poole, Kenyon E. Books of, noticed.... 1171
 Popper, Monica. Books of, noticed..... 917
 Prasad, Rajendra. Book of, noticed.... 1208
 PRESS. Book notes. Book notices.....888, 899
 Price, Harry Bayard, Jr. Books of, reviewed..... 509
 Price, M. Philips. Books of, noticed.... 1184
 PROPAGANDA. Book notices..... 260
 Prothro, James W. Verbal Shifts in the American Presidency: A Content Analysis..... 726
- PSYCHOLOGY. Book notes..... 599
 Book notices.....241, 916, 918, 1208
 Book reviews on: Allport, Gordon W. Becoming..... 541
- PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION. Dimock, Marshall E. The Administrative Staff College: Executive Development in Government and Industry..... 166
 Kaufman, Herbert. Emerging Conflicts in the Doctrines of Public Administration.....1057
 Macmahon, Arthur W. Woodrow Wilson as Legislative Leader and Administrator..... 641
 Book notes.....1169
 Book notices.....551, 553, 888, 1171, 1181
 Book reviews on: Colm, Gerhard. The Federal Budget and the National Economy..... 847
 Gladden, E. N. The Essentials of Public Administration..... 874
 Kelsall, R. K. Higher Civil Servants in Britain..... 229
 Smithies, Arthur. The Budgetary Process in the United States..... 847
 Tickton, Sidney G. The Budget in Transition..... 847
The Commission on Intergovernmental Relations: A Report to the President for Transmittal to the Congress..... 208
The Need for Further Budget Reform: A Joint NPA Statement..... 847
- PUBLIC FINANCE. Book notes..... 886
 Book notices.....1171
 Book reviews on: Colm, Gerhard. The

- Federal Budget and the National Economy*..... 847
- Smithies, Arthur. The Budgetary Process in the United States..... 847
- Tickton, Sidney G. The Budget in Transition..... 847
- The Need for Further Budget Reform: A Joint NPA Statement*..... 847
- PUBLIC OPINION. Eldersveld, Samuel J. Experimental Propaganda Techniques and Voting Behavior..... 154
- Book notes..... 599
- Book notices..... 916
- PUBLIC REGULATION. Book notes..... 239
- Book notices..... 240, 552, 888, 889, 1171
- Pullen, William R. Books of, noticed.... 240
- Pusey, Merlo J. Books of, noticed..... 1170
- Pyziur, Eugene. Books of, noticed..... 917
- Quigley, Harold S. Book reviews... 225, 1159
- Books of, reviewed..... 876
- Rackman, Emanuel. Books of, reviewed. 536
- Rankin, Robert S. Books of, reviewed... 1164
- Ranney, Austin. Books of, noticed..... 1170
- Redfield, Robert. Books of, noted..... 268
- Rees, Richard. Books of, noticed..... 249
- Reid, J. H. Stewart. Books of, noted.... 576
- Reischauer, Edwin O. Books of, reviewed 225
- Reiss, H. S. Books of, noticed..... 917
- RELIGION. Book notes..... 1204, 1206
- Book notices..... 1170
- RESEARCH. Book reviews on: Bailey, Stephen K., et al. Research Frontiers in Politics and Government: Brookings Lectures, 1955..... 544
- Articles and documents... 279, 607, 923, 1215
- Reshetar, John S., Jr. Book reviews.... 539
- Rex, Millicent Barton. Books of, noticed.. 579
- Rich, Bennett M. and Burch, Philip H., Jr. The Changing Role of the National Guard..... 702
- Riethmayer, Leo C. Book notes..... 576
- Robbins, Lionel. Books of, reviewed.... 860
- Roberts, B. C. Books of, noticed..... 1182
- Roberts, Elliott. Books of, noted..... 885
- Roberts, William H. Articles and Documents on Foreign and Comparative Government..... 251, 580
- Articles and Documents on International Law and Relations..... 260, 590, 909, 1195
- Robinson, Kenneth. A Survey of the Background Material for the Study of Government in French Tropical Africa..... 179
- Roche, John P. Book notes..... 1203
- Book reviews..... 862
- Rodell, Fred. Books of, noticed..... 550
- Rosenblum, Victor G. Books of, noticed. 917
- Ross, J. F. S. Books of, reviewed..... 1166
- Rossi, Ernesto. Books of, reviewed..... 519
- Rossiter, Clinton. Books of, reviewed.... 864, 881
- Rostow, W. W. Books of, reviewed.... 225
- Rowe, Constance. Books of, reviewed... 870
- Royal Commission on Agriculture and Rural Life (Saskatchewan). Books of, noticed..... 579
- Royama, Michio. Books of, noticed..... 578
- Royama, Shimako. Books of, noticed.... 578
- RUMANIA. Book notices..... 1184
- RUSSIA. Kenney, Charles D. The Twentieth C.P.S.U. Congress: A Study in Calculated Moderation..... 764
- Book notes..... 247
- Book notices..... 249, 250, 589, 1183, 1194
- Book reviews on: Brzezinski, Zbigniew K. The Permanent Purge..... 872
- Dallin, David J. The Changing World of Soviet Russia..... 1147
- Dewar, Margaret. Labour Policy in the USSR, 1917-1928..... 1147
- Simmons, Ernest J. (ed.). Continuity and Change in Russian and Soviet Thought..... 539
- Rustow, Dankwart A. Book reviews.... 854
- Books of, reviewed..... 1149
- SAAR. Book notices..... 579, 589
- Samra, Chattar Singh. Book notes..... 1208
- Sartre, Jean Paul. Books of, noticed.... 1207
- Savord, Ruth. Books of, noticed..... 589
- Sayre, Wallace S. Book reviews..... 229
- Scaff, Alvin H. Books of, noted..... 576
- Scammon, Richard M. Books of, reviewed..... 1141
- Schiffman, Joseph. Books of, noticed.... 917
- Schiller, A. Arthur. Books of, reviewed.. 505
- Schrieke, B. Books of, noticed..... 248
- Schwartz, Bernard. Books of, noticed... 240
- Scott, F. R. Book reviews..... 230
- Seckler-Hudson, Catheryn. Books of, noticed..... 551
- Seyler, William C. Doctoral Dissertations in Political Science..... 807
- Shannon, David A. Books of, noticed.... 242
- Shea, Donald R. Books of, noted..... 587
- Sheehy, Michael. Books of, noticed..... 1182
- Shepherd, William R. Books of, noticed.. 1208
- Shils, Edward A. Books of, noted..... 887
- Short, Lloyd M. Books of, noticed..... 551
- Shwadran, Benjamin. Books of, noticed.. 590
- Sigafoos, Robert A. Books of, noted.... 886

- Simmons, Ernest J. Books of, reviewed... 539
- Simon, Herbert A. Articles and Documents on Methodology and Research in the Social Sciences... 279, 607, 923, 1215
— Books of, reviewed... 544
- Simon, Walter M. Books of, noticed... 249
- Sinons, Anne P. Books of, reviewed... 218
- Sinclair, William Angus. Books of, noticed... 1208
- Small, Joseph. Books of, noticed... 1208
- Smith, Charles Page. Books of, noted... 1203
- Smith, David G. Book notes... 899
- Smith, M. Brewster. Books of, noticed... 916
- Smith, R. E. Books of, noticed... 248
- Smithies, Arthur. Books of, noted... 887
— Books of, reviewed... 847, 860
- Snyder, Richard C. Books of, noticed... 259
— Book of, reviewed... 544
- SOCIAL PROBLEMS. Book notes... 238, 884, 887
Book notices... 240, 552, 918
- SOCIALISM. Musolf, Lloyd D. Canadian Public Enterprise: A Character Study... 405
Book notices... 270, 1184, 1208
Book reviews on: Einaudi, Mario, Byé, Maurice, and Rossi, Ernesto. Nationalization in France and Italy... 519
Heimann, Eduard. Vernunftglaube und Religion in der Modernen Gesellschaft... 532
- SOCIOLOGY. Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. Responses to Planned Political Change in a Tanganyika Tribal Group... 442
Book notes... 268, 1168
Book notices... 248, 271, 890, 909, 918, 1208
Book reviews on: Chinoy, Ely. Automobile Workers and the American Dream... 235
- Sorauf, Frank J. State Patronage in a Rural County... 1046
- SOUTHEAST ASIA. Book reviews on: Emerson, Rupert. Representative Government in Southeast Asia... 505
- SPAIN. Book notes... 576
- Spain, August O. Book notes... 1193
- Spencer, Samuel R., Jr. Books of, noticed... 240
- Spengler, Joseph J. Books of, reviewed... 860
- Spero, Sterling D. Books of, reviewed... 1150
- Spiro, Melford E. Books of, noticed... 918
- STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT. Dauer, Manning J. et al. Toward a Model, State Presidential Primary Law... 138
Sorauf, Frank J. State Patronage in a Rural County... 1046
Zink, Harold. Selected Materials for a Comparative Study of Local Government... 1107
- Book notes... 237, 884, 886, 1169
- Book notices... 240, 241, 260, 551, 889, 890, 918
- Book reviews on: Caldwell, Lynton K. The Government and Administration of New York... 1164
Doyle, Wilson K., Laird, Angus M. and Weiss, S. Sherman. The Government and Administration of Florida... 1164
Gosnell, Cullen B. and Anderson, C. David. The Government and Administration of Georgia... 1164
Highsaw, Robert B. and Fortenberry, Charles N. The Government and Administration of Mississippi... 1164
Key, V. O., Jr. American State Politics... 1143
Rankin, Robert S. The Government and Administration of North Carolina... 1164
Trachsel, Herman H. and Wade, Ralph M. The Government and Administration of Wyoming... 1164
- Book reviews on: The Forty-Eight States... 873
- Statistisches Landesamt* (Stuttgart). Books of, noticed... 250
- Stebbins, Richard P. Books of, noticed... 259
- Stesfel, Lawrence. Book reviews... 543
- Steiner, Kurt. Japanese Local Government... 1126
- Stephenson, William A. F.; Dauer, Manning J.; Macy, Harry; and Temple, David. Toward a Model State Presidential Primary Law... 138
- Stevens, Edmund. Books of, noticed... 260
- Stevenson, Adlai E. Books of, noticed... 553
- Stillman, Calvin W. Books of, noticed... 590
- Stocking, George W. Books of, noticed... 240
- Stouffer, Samuel A. Books of, reviewed... 223
- Stout, Hiram M. Articles and Documents on Foreign and Comparative Government... 901, 1184
- Strauss-Hupé, Robert. Books of, noticed... 1208
- Strong, Donald S. Book reviews... 882
— Books of, noticed... 1170
- Stuart, Graham H. Books of, noticed... 260
- Svarlien, Oscar. Books of, noticed... 260
- Swarthout, John M. Books of, noticed... 242
- SWEDEN. Baude, Annika. Swedish Local Government... 1115
Book reviews on: Rustow, Dankwart A. The Politics of Compromise... 1149
- Swift, Richard N. Books of, noticed... 259
- SWITZERLAND. Book notices... 580
- Szunyogh, Bela. Books of, noticed... 260
- Taborsky, Edward. Book reviews... 872

- TANGANYIKA. Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. Responses to Planned Political Change in a Tanganyika Tribal Group..... 442
- Taylor, Philip B., Jr. The Guatemalan Affair: A Critique of United States Foreign Policy..... 787
- TEACHING. Book notices..... 590
- Book reviews on: Wright, Quincy. The Study of International Relations..... 216
- Temple, David; Dauer, Manning J., Stephenson, William A. F.; and Macy, Harry. Toward a Model State Presidential Primary Law..... 138
- THAILAND. Book notices..... 578
- Thomas, Lewis Herbert. Books of, noticed..... 1182
- Thomas, M. Ladd. Philippine Local Government..... 1124
- Thompson, Arthur W. Books of, noticed.. 271
- Thomson, Charles A. H. Books of, reviewed..... 882
- TIBET. Book reviews on: Li, Tieh-tseng. The Historical Status of Tibet..... 1161
- Tiekton, Sidney G. Books of, reviewed... 847
- Toedemann, Arthur E. Books of, noticed..... 248
- Tooley, M. J. Books of, noticed..... 917
- Toynbee, Arnold. Books of, noticed..... 258
- Toynbee, Veronica M. Books of, noticed.. 258
- Trachsel, Herman H. Books of, reviewed. 1164
- Tresolini, R. J. Book notes..... 1169
- Truman, David B. The State Delegations and the Structure of Party Voting in the United States House of Representatives..... 1023
- Books of, reviewed..... 544
- Tufts, Robert W. Book reviews..... 509
- Tugwell, Rexford G. Books of, noticed... 552
- TURKEY. Book notices..... 1184
- Turner, John E. Books of, reviewed..... 876
- Ulam, Adam B. Book notes..... 576
- Ullmann, Walter. Books of, noted..... 1204
- Underhill, Frank H. Books of, noticed.... 1182
- UNESCO. Books of, noticed..... 269, 909
- United Nations. Book notes.... 587, 907, 1192
- Book notices..... 259, 260, 588, 908
- Book reviews on: Claude, Inis L., Jr. National Minorities..... 222
- Goodrich, Leland M. and Simons, Anne P. The United Nations and the Maintenance of International Peace and Security..... 218
- Wilcox, Francis O. and Marcy, Carl M. Proposals for Changes in the United Nations..... 856
- United Nations Secretariat. Books of, noticed..... 588
- UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY. Taylor, Philip B., Jr. The Guatemalan Affair: A Critique of United States Foreign Policy..... 787
- Book notices..... 240, 259, 260, 553, 589, 590, 908, 1194
- Book reviews on: Beloff, Max. Foreign Policy and the Democratic Process... 538
- Buehrig, Edward H. Woodrow Wilson and the Balance of Power..... 547
- Price, Harry Bayard, Jr. The Marshall Plan and Its Meaning..... 509
- Reischauer, Edwin O. Wanted: An Asian Policy..... 225
- Study Group Sponsored by the Woodrow Wilson Foundation and the National Planning Association. The Political Economy of American Foreign Policy..... 220
- Westerfield, H. Bradford. Foreign Policy and Party Politics..... 512
- Young, Roland. Congressional Politics in the Second World War..... 520
- UNITED STATES MILITARY GOVERNMENT
- Ward, Robert E. The Origins of the Present Japanese Constitution..... 980
- UNITED STATES NATIONAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS. Bone, Hugh A. An Introduction to the Senate Policy Committees..... 339
- Huntington, Samuel P. Civilian Control and the Constitution..... 676
- Macmahon, Arthur W. Woodrow Wilson As Legislative Leader and Administrator..... 641
- Rich, Bennett M. and Burch, Philip H., Jr. The Changing Role of the National Guard..... 702
- Truman, David B. The State Delegations and the Structure of Party Voting in the United States House of Representatives..... 1023
- Articles and documents.. 242, 569, 890, 1172
- Book notes..... 887, 1169
- Book notices..... 240, 242, 889, 890, 1170
- Book reviews on: Corwin, Edward S. and Koenig, Louis W. The Presidency Today..... 880
- Price, Harry Bayard, Jr. The Marshall Plan and Its Meaning..... 509
- Rossiter, Clinton. The American Presidency..... 881
- Young, Roland. Congressional Politics in the Second World War..... 520
- Commission on Intergovernmental Re-*

lations: A Report to the President for Transmittal to the Congress .....	208	— Books of, reviewed.....	512
Urrutia, Ledo. Mico. Books of, noticed....	251	Wheare, K. C. Book reviews.....	208
Uyehara, Cecil H. Books of, noticed....	578	Whitaker, Arthur P. Books of, noted....	1192
Vanderbilt, Arthur T. Books of, noted....	549	White, Howard B. Commentary on Prothro's Content Analysis.....	740
Van Leur, J. C. Books of, noticed.....	248	White, Robert W. Books of, noticed....	916
Varma, Vishwanath Prasad. Books of, noted.....	1205	Whiting, Allen S. Books of, noticed....	588
VATICAN. Book notices.....	908	Wilcox, Francis O. Books of, reviewed...	856
Vaughan, Floyd L. Books of, noticed....	552	Willbern, York. Book notes.....	885
Vella, Walter F. Books of, noticed.....	578	Williams, Irving G. Books of, noted....	1169
VENEZUELA. Lott, Leo B. Executive Power in Venezuela.....	422	Williams, John R. Books of, reviewed...	1146
Vigman, Fred K. Books of, noticed....	240	Wilson, Francis G. Articles and Documents on Political Theory.....	271, 601
Vinacke, Harold M. Books of, reviewed...	1159	Winston, Clara. Books of, noted.....	1192
Viner, Jacob. Books of, reviewed.....	860	Winston, Richard. Books of, noted....	1192
VIRGINIA. Book notices.....	889	Wolfers, Arnold. Books of, noticed....	1194
Von Fritz, Kurt. Books of, reviewed....	515	Wolff, Robert Lee. Books of, noticed....	1184
Von Grunebaum, Gustave E. Books of, noticed.....	578	Wolin, Sheldon S. Politics and Religion: Luther's Simplistic Imperative.....	24
Wade, Ralph M. Books of reviewed.....	1164	— Book reviews.....	870
Waldo, Dwight. Book reviews.....	847	Woodman, Dorothy. Books of, noticed..	578
Wallace, Raymond J. Books of, noticed..	580	Woodward, E. L. Books of, noticed... 588, 589
Waltz, Kenneth. Book reviews.....	222	Woytinsky, E. S. Books of, noticed....	577
Ward, Robert E. The Origins of the Present Japanese Constitution.....	980	Woytinsky, W. S. Books of, noticed....	577
Wasson, Donald. Books of, noticed....	589	Wright, Quincy. Books of, reviewed....	216
Watkins, Frederick M. Book reviews....	212	WYOMING. Book reviews on: Trachsel, Herman H. and Wade, Ralph M. The Government and Administration of Wyoming .....	1164
Watkins, James T., IV. Book reviews....	514
Weeks, O. Douglas. Book reviews.....	864	Young, Roland. Books of, reviewed....	520
Weidner, Edward W. Book notes.....	886	Young, William H. Book reviews.....	873
Weiss, S. Sherman. Books of, reviewed..	1164	YUGOSLAVIA. Book notices.....	1184
Wells, Roger H. German State and Local Government.....	1112
Wengert, Norman. Book notes.....	237, 885	Zaleski, Eugène. Books of, noticed....	1183
Westerfield, H. Bradford. Book reviews..	547	Zink, Harold. Selected Materials for a Comparative Study of Local Government.....	1107

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

E. E. SCHATTSCHEIDER
Wesleyan University

President Elect

V. O. KEY
Harvard University

Vice Presidents

CARL BRENT SWISHER
Johns Hopkins University

WILFRED BINKLEY
Ohio Northern University

ALBERT LEPAWSKY
University of California
(Berkeley)

Secretary

GLADYS KAMMERER
University of Kentucky

Treasurer

MAX M. KAMPFMAN
Washington, D. C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK
1726 Massachusetts Ave., N.W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Managing Editor

The American Political Science Review
HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

Associate Director

KENNETH HECHLER

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers et officis

WELDON COOPER
University of Virginia

PAUL T. DAVID
The Brookings Institution

HERBERT EMMERICH
Public Administration Clearing House

CLAUDE E. HAWLEY
United States Information Agency

NORMAN L. HILL
University of Nebraska

THOMAS P. JENKIN
University of California (Los Angeles)

LOUISE OVERACKER
Wellesley College

CHARLES B. ROBSON
University of North Carolina

WILLIAM T. R. FOX
Columbia University

RUTH WEINTRAUB
Hunter College

JOHN D. LEWIS
Oberlin College

THOMAS H. ELIOT
Washington University, St. Louis

ALEXANDER HEARD
University of North Carolina

YORK WILBERN
University of Alabama

ALLAN SAUNDERS
University of Hawaii

CHRISTIAN LARSEN
Sacramento State College

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW

ALBERT SHAW

FREDERIC N. JUDSON

JAMES BRYCE

A. LAWRENCE LOWELL

WOODROW WILSON

SIMEON E. BALDWIN

ALBERT BUSHNELL HART

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

JOHN BASSETT MOORE

ERNST FREUND

JESSE MACY

MUNRON SMITH

HENRY JONES FORD

PAUL S. REINSCH

LEO S. ROWE

WILLIAM A. DUNNING

HARRY A. GARFIELD

JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM

CHARLES A. BEARD

WILLIAM B. MUNRO

JESSE S. REEVES

JOHN A. FAIRLIE

BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH

EDWARD S. CORWIN

WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY

ISIDOR LOEB

WALTER J. SHEPARD

FRANCIS W. COKEE

ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE

THOMAS REED POWELL

CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA

CHARLES GROVE HAINES

ROBERT C. BROOKS

FREDERIC A. OGG

WILLIAM ANDERSON

ROBERT E. CUSHMAN

LEONARD D. WHITE

JOHN M. GAUS

WALTER F. DODD

ARTHUR W. MACMAHON

HENRY R. SPENCER

QUINCY WRIGHT

JAMES K. POLLOCK

PETER H. ODEGARD

LUTHER H. GULICK

PENDLETON HERRING

RALPH J. BUNCHE

CHARLES MCKINLEY

HAROLD D. LASSWELL